

Library of The Theological Seminary

PRINCETON · NEW JERSEY

From the library of Prof. Wm. H. Green

BR 75 .B6 1845 v.1
Bingham, Joseph, 1668-1723.
Origines ecclesiastic

Mr. Henry Green

Philadelphia

May 16th 1849

ORIGINES ECCLESIASTICÆ

THE ANTIQUITIES

OF

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

WITH TWO SERMONS AND TWO LETTERS
ON THE NATURE AND NECESSITY OF ABSOLUTION.

BY JOSEPH BINGHAM,

RECTOR OF HAVANT.

REPRINTED FROM THE ORIGINAL EDITION,

MDCCVIII.—MDCCXXII.

WITH AN ENLARGED ANALYTICAL INDEX.

VOL. I.

LONDON :

HENRY G. BOHN, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

MDCCCXLVI.

THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY

ASTEN LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
LIBRARY

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

LIBRARY

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

LIBRARY

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

LIBRARY

LIBRARY

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

JOHN CHILDS AND SON, BUNGAY.

THE AUTHOR'S DEDICATIONS.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

JONATHAN, LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER,

AND PRELATE OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

[PUBLISHED WITH VOL. I. OF THE ORIGINAL EDITION.]

MY LORD,

HAVING once determined with myself to make these collections public, I needed no long time to consider to whom I should first address and present them. They are, my Lord, the first-fruits of my labour under your Lordship's government and inspection; and I was willing to think, and do presume I did not think amiss, that your Lordship had a sort of title to the first-fruits of any of your clergy's labour; especially if the subject, on which they were employed, was suitable to their calling, and had any direct tendency to promote Christian knowledge in the world. The subject of the present discourse, being an essay upon the ancient usages and customs of the primitive church, and a particular account of the state of her clergy, is such as, being considered barely in its own nature, I know cannot but be approved by a person of your Lordship's character; whose care is concerned not only in preserving the purity of the primitive faith, but also in reviving the spirit of the ancient discipline and primitive practice: and were the management any ways answerable to the greatness of the subject, that would doubly recommend it to your Lordship's favour; since apples of gold are something the more beautiful for being set in pictures of silver. But I am sensible the subject is too sublime and copious, too nice and difficult, to have justice done it from any single hand, much less from mine: all, therefore, I can pretend to hope for from your Lordship is, that your candour and goodness will make just allowances for the failings, which your sagacity and quickness will easily perceive to be in this performance. I am not, I confess, without hopes, that as well the abstruseness and difficulty of the subject itself, as my own difficult circumstances, under which I was forced to labour, for want of proper assistance of abundance of books, may be some apology for the defects of the work: and if I can but so far obtain your Lordship's good opinion, as to be thought to have designed well: as I am already conscious of my own good intentions to consecrate all my labours to the public service of the church; that will inspire me with fresh vigour, notwithstanding these difficulties, to proceed with cheerfulness and alacrity in the remaining parts of this work, which are yet behind, and which I shall be the more willing to set about, if I can perceive that it has your Lordship's approbation. The countenance and encouragement of such a judge may perhaps have a more universal influence, to excite the zeal of many others, who have greater abilities to serve the church: and I know not how better to congratulate your Lordship upon your happy accession to the episcopal throne of this diocese, than by wishing you the blessing and satisfaction of such a clergy; whose learning and industry, and piety and religion, influenced by the wisdom of your conduct, and animated by the example of your zeal and perseverance, even to imprisonment in times of greatest difficulty, may so qualify them to discharge every office of their function, as may make your diocese one of the shining glories of the present church, and a provoking example to the future: which is the hearty prayer and desire of,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's faithful and obedient Servant,

J. BINGHAM.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE AND RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

JONATHAN, LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER,

AND PRELATE OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

[PUBLISHED WITH VOL. II. OF THE ORIGINAL EDITION.]

MY LORD,

As the kind entertainment which your Lordship and the world have been pleased to give to the first part of this work, has encouraged me to go on in hopes of doing public service to the church; so the nature of the subject contained in this second volume, being but a continuation of the former account of the primitive clergy, obliges me again with all submission to present this second part to your Lordship, in hopes of no less kind acceptance and approbation. The matters here treated of are many of them things of the greatest importance, which when plainly set in order and presented to public view, may perhaps excite the zeal of many in the present age, to copy out those necessary duties, by the practice of which the primitive church attained to great perfection and glory; and, as I may say, still provokes and calls us to the same attainments by so many excellent rules and noble examples. In the fourth and sixth of these Books I have endeavoured to draw up something of the general character of the primitive clergy, by showing what qualifications were required in them before their ordination, and what sort of laws they were to be governed by afterwards, respecting both their lives and labours, in the continual exercise of the duties of their function. Many of them, I must own, have been very affecting to myself in the consideration of them; and I was willing to hope they might prove so to such others as would be at the pains to read them. For here are both directions and provocations of the best sort, to excite our industry, and inflame our zeal, and to make us eager and restless in copying out the pattern set before us. If any shall think I have collected these things together to reflect upon any persons in the present age, I shall only say, with one of the ancients in a like case,* they mistake my design; which was not to reproach any man's person, who bears the sacred character of a priest, but to write what might be for the public benefit of the church. For as when orators and philosophers describe the qualities, which are required to make a complete orator or philosopher, they do no injury to Demosthenes or Plato, but only describe things nakedly in themselves without any personal applications; so in the description of a bishop or priest, and explication of ancient rules, nothing more is intended but to propose a mirror of the priesthood, in which it will be in every man's power and conscience to take a view of himself, so as either to grieve at the sight of his own deformity, or rejoice when he beholds his own beauty in the glass.

Nothing is here proposed but rules and examples of the noblest virtues; probity and integrity of life; studies and labours becoming the clerical function; piety and devotion in our constant addresses to God; fidelity, diligence, and prudence in preaching his word to men; carefulness and exactness, joined with discretion and charity, in the administration of public and private discipline; candour and ingenuity in composing needless disputes among good men; and zeal in opposing and confronting the powerful and wily designs of heretics and wicked men; together with resolution and patience in suffering persecutions, calumnies, and reproaches, both from professed enemies and pretended friends; with many other instances of the like commendable virtues, which shined in the lives and adorned the profession of the primitive clergy; whose rules and actions, I almost promise myself, your Lordship and all good men will read with pleasure, because they will but see their own beauty represented in the glass; and they that fall short of the character here given, will find it a gentle admonition and spur to set in order the things that are wanting in their conduct, and to labour with more zeal to bring themselves a little nearer to the primitive standard.

* Hieron. Ep. 83. ad Ocean. t. 2. p. 323. Ne quis me in sugillationem istius temporis sacerdotum scripsisse, quæ scripsi, existimet, sed in ecclesie utilitatem. Ut enim oratores et philosophi, describentes qualem velint esse perfectum oratorem et philosophum, non faciunt injuriam Demostheni et Platoni, sed res ipsas absque personis definiunt. Sic in descriptione episcopi, et in eorum expositione quæ scripta sunt, quasi speculum sacerdotii proponitur. Jam in potestate et conscientia singulorum est, quales se ibi aspiciant: ut vel dolere ad deformitatem, vel gaudere ad pulchritudinem possint.

THE AUTHOR'S DEDICATIONS.

Your Lordship is enabled, by your high station and calling, to revive the exercise of ancient discipline among your clergy in a more powerful way; and you have given us already some convincing proofs, that it is your settled resolution and intention so to do: as the thoughts of this is a real pleasure to the diligent and virtuous, so it is to be hoped it will prove a just terror to those of the contrary character; and, by introducing a strict discipline among the clergy, make way for the easier introduction of it among the laity also; the revival of which has long been desired, though but slow steps are made toward the restoration of it. In the mean time it becomes every man, according to his ability, though in a lower station, to contribute his endeavours toward the promoting these good ends: to which purpose I have collected and digested these observations upon the laws and discipline of the ancient clergy, that such as are willing to be influenced by their practice, may have great and good examples set before them; whilst they whom examples cannot move, may be influenced another way, by the authority which your Lordship, and others in the same station, are invested with, for the benefit and edification of the church: the promoting of which is, and ever will be, the hearty endeavour of him, who is,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most dutiful and obedient Servant,

JOSEPH BINGHAM.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE AND RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

JONATHAN, LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER,

AND PRELATE OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER,

THIS THIRD VOLUME OF

THE ANTIQUITIES OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,

Is humbly submitted and inscribed by the Author,

His Lordship's

Most dutiful and obedient Servant,

JOSEPH BINGHAM.

[PUBLISHED WITH VOL. III. OF THE ORIGINAL EDITION.]

TO

HIS MOST SACRED MAJESTY, GEORGE,

BY THE GRACE OF GOD KING OF GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND IRELAND, DEFENDER
OF THE FAITH, &c.

[PUBLISHED WITH VOLS. IV. V. VI. VII. VIII. OF THE ORIGINAL EDITION.]

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

I HUMBLY beg leave to lay at your Majesty's feet a part of a larger work, which was at first designed to promote those great and worthy ends, which your Majesty, in your princely wisdom, by your royal declarations has lately thought fit to recommend to your universities and clergy: that is, the promotion of Christian piety and knowledge, and such useful learning as may instil good principles into the minds of younger students; upon which the prosperity of church and state will in this, and all succeeding ages, so much depend. The practice of the primitive ages of the church, when reduced into one view, seems to be one of the most proper means to effect these honourable designs; and with that consideration I have hitherto proceeded in this laborious work, not without the countenance and approbation of many worthy men, and now hope to finish it under your Majesty's favour and protection: humbly beseeching Almighty God to bless your Majesty's great designs for the good of this church and nation, and the protestant interest abroad: which is, and ever shall be, the hearty prayer of

Your Majesty's

Most loyal and obedient Subject,

JOSEPH BINGHAM.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE AND RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

CHARLES, LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER,

AND PRELATE OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

[PUBLISHED WITH THE CONCLUDING TWO VOLUMES.]

MY LORD,

It was one of those ancient rules, many of which I have had occasion to speak of in this work, That presbyters should do nothing ἀνευ γνώμης τοῦ ἐπισκόπου, or sine conscientia episcopi, without the consent or knowledge of the bishop: which though it extend not to all private, domestical, and secular affairs, yet doubtless it was intended to keep a good harmony and subordination between them, in all matters of a public nature relating to the affairs and welfare of the church. And therefore, with a view to this rule, as I first presented the beginning of this work to your predecessor, my then diocesan, so now I lay this last and finishing part of it at your Lordship's feet; not doubting but that your Lordship, who is an encourager of good literature and ancient learning, will give it your favourable acceptance and approbation. I have the more reason to hope for this, because, out of your great good nature and condescension, your Lordship has always been an encourager of the undertaking, as I have been made sensible by happy experiment, in many years' distant correspondence with you. The work, I hope, is of general use, and will meet with a general acceptance among all those who are, without prejudice, true lovers of ancient learning. A noble lord was once pleased to tell me, he had sent it into Scotland by the hands of a great man of the assembly: though what approbation it meets with there, I cannot say. But I can speak it with more satisfaction, that our worthy primate was once pleased to acquaint me in private conversation, that he himself had sent it to the professors of Geneva, who returned him their thanks together with their approbation. And if it be well accepted there, there is some reason to hope it may be accepted in most other protestant churches, and be a little means to bring them to a nearer union to the church of England in some points, for which some parts of the work are particularly designed. A late author has thought fit to epitomise some part of it, for the service (as he says) of his poor brethren of the clergy: though I fear, for the reasons I have been forced to give against his undertaking, it will prove of no service, but rather hurtful to them. But if he, or any other person of ability, would undertake to translate the whole into Latin, now that it is finished and completed, that might perhaps be of more general use to all the protestant churches. And in the mean time our poor brethren, if it please God to bless me with health, shall not want such an epitome, it it be needful, as is proper for their information.

And now, my Lord, that I have made mention of my own health, I cannot but with hearty prayers to God most sincerely wish yours, for the good things you have already done to this diocese, and more that may be expected, if it shall please God to confirm your health in such a state, as may enable you to go through the great work you want no will to perform. The reducing the exorbitant fees of this diocese to a proper standard, is a thing that will never be forgotten by your poor brethren, who will always feel the sweet effect of it. Your encouragement given to the meanest clergymen to write to yourself in person, and not to any officers, upon business relating to the church, is a singular instance of your good nature and condescension; and also a sure method to prevent corruption. Your care to inform yourself of the character and worth of your clergy, with a view to the promotion of such as have long laboured diligently in great cures, or small livings, is a method that cannot fail of giving a new life and spirit to all such, as may reasonably hope that their merits and labours will not always be overlooked and despised; but that they may in due time find their reward, both in ease and advancement, from so kind an inspector.

That you may have health and long life to proceed in such good acts, and all other offices of your function, I believe is the wish of all your clergy: I am sure it is the hearty prayer of him who is,

My Lord,

Your most dutiful and obedient servant,

JOSEPH BINGHAM.

THE PREFACE.

[PUBLISHED WITH VOL. I. OF THE ORIGINAL EDITION.]

THIS volume, which is now published, being only a part of a larger work, the reader, I presume, will expect I should give him some little account of the whole design, and the reasons which engaged me upon this undertaking. The design which I have formed to myself, is to give such a methodical account of the Antiquities of the Christian Church, as others have done of the Greek, and Roman, and Jewish antiquities; not by writing an historical or continued chronological account of all transactions as they happened in the church, (of which kind of books there is no great want,) but by reducing the ancient customs, usages, and practices of the church under certain proper heads, whereby the reader may take a view at once of any particular usage or custom of Christians, for four or five of the first centuries, to which I have generally confined my inquiries in this discourse. I cannot but own, I was moved with a sort of emulation (not an unholy one, I hope) to see so many learned men with so much zeal employed in collecting and publishing the antiquities of Greece and Rome; whilst in the mean time we had nothing (so far as I was able to learn) that could be called a complete collection of the antiquities of the church, in the method that is now proposed. The compilers of church history indeed have taken notice of many things of this kind, as they pass along in the course of their history, as Baronius, and the Centuriators, and several others: but then the things lie scattered in so many places in large volumes, that there are few readers of those few that enter upon reading those books, that will be at the pains to collect their accounts of things into one view, or digest and methodise their scattered observations. There are a great many other authors, who have written several excellent discourses upon particular subjects of church antiquity, out of which, perhaps, a Gronovius or a Grævius might make a more noble collection of antiquities than any yet extant in the world: but as no one has yet attempted such a work, so neither, when it was effected, would it be for the purchase or perusal of every ordinary reader, for whose use chiefly my own collections are intended. There are a third sort of writers, who have also done very good service, in explaining and illustrating several parts of church antiquity in their occasional notes and observations upon many of the ancient writers; of which kind are the curious observations of Albaspiny, Justellus, Petavius, Valesius, Cotelarius, Baluzius, Sirmondus, Gothofred, Fabrotus, Bishop Beveridge, and many others, who have published the works of the ancient fathers and canons of the councils, with very excellent and judicious remarks upon them. But these, again, lie scattered in so many and so large volumes, without any other order, than as the authors on whom they commented would admit of, that they are not to be reckoned upon, or used as any methodised or digested collection of church antiquities, even by those who have ability to purchase, or opportunity to read them. Besides these, there are another sort of writers, who have purposely undertaken to give an account of the ancient usages of the church, in treatises written particularly upon that subject, such as Gavantus, Casalius, Durantus, and several others of the Roman communion; but these writers do by no means satisfy a judicious and inquisitive reader, for several reasons: 1. Because their accounts are very imperfect, being confined chiefly to the liturgical part of church antiquity, beside which, there are a great many other things necessary to be explained, which they do not so much as touch upon, or once mention. 2. Because, in treating of that part, they build much upon the collections of Gratian, and such modern writers, and use the authority of the spurious epistles of the ancient popes, which have been exploded long ago, as having no pretence to antiquity in the judgment of all candid and judicious writers. But chiefly their accounts are unsatisfactory, because, 3. Their whole design is to varnish over the novel practices of the Romish church, and put a face of antiquity upon them: to which purpose, they many times represent ancient customs in disguise, to make them look like the practices of the present age, and offer them to the reader's view, not in their own native dress, but in the similitude and resemblance of modern customs. Cardinal Bona himself could not forbear making this reflection upon some such writers as these, whom he justly censures, as deserving very ill * of the sacred rites of the church, and their venerable antiquity; who measure all ancient customs by the practice of the present times, and judge of the primitive discipline only by the rule and customs of the age they live in; being deceived by a false persuasion, that the practice of the church never differed in any point from the customs which they learned from their forefathers and teachers, and which they have been inured to from their tender years: whereas we retain many words in common with the ancient fathers, but in a sense as different from theirs, as our times are remote from the first ages after Christ; as will appear (says he) when we come to discourse of the oblation, communion, and other parts of Divine service. This is an ingenuous confession, and withal a just reflection upon the partiality of the writers of his own church; and a good reason, in my opinion, why we are not to expect any exact accounts of antiquity from any writers of that communion; though some are less tainted with her errors than others, and can allow themselves to be a little more liberal and free upon some occasions than the rest of their brethren: yet even Bona himself, after the reflection he has made upon others, runs into the very same error, and falls under his own censure; and Habertus, though otherwise a very learned and ingenuous person, who has written about the Greek liturgies, as Bona has of the Latin, is often through prejudice carried away with the common failing of the writers of that side, whose talents are chiefly employed in palliating the faults of the communion and cause they are engaged in. So that if we are to expect any exact accounts of church antiquities, it must be from some protestant authors, who can write with greater freedom and less prejudice concerning the usages and customs of the primitive church. But among these there are very few that have travelled very far in this way; the generality of our writers contenting themselves to collect and explain so much of church antiquity, as was necessary to show the errors and novelties of popery; but not descending to any more minute and particular consideration of things, which did not come within the compass of the controversy they had with the Romish church. Hospinian indeed, in the beginning of the Reformation, wrote several large volumes of the origin of temples, festivals, monachism, with the history of the eucharist; but as these take in but a very few subjects, so they are too full of modern relations; which make them something tedious to an ordinary reader, and no complete account of primitive customs neither. Spalatensis, in his books de Republica Ecclesiastica, has gone a little further; yet he generally confines himself to the popish controversy, and has much out of Gratian and the canon law; which indeed served him as good arguments ad hominem against those whom he had to deal with, but it will not pass for authentic history in other cases. Suicerus's Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus is abundantly more particular, and indeed the best treasure of this sort of learning that has yet been published: but his collections are chiefly out of the Greek fathers; and only in the method of a Vocabulary or Lexicon, explaining words and things precisely in the order of the alphabet. The most methodical account of things of this kind that I have yet seen, is that of our learned countryman Dr. Cave, in his excellent book of Primitive Christianity; wherein he has given a succinct, but clear account of many ancient customs and practices, not ordinarily to be met with elsewhere. But his design being chiefly to recommend the moral part of primitive Christianity to the observation and practice of men, he was not obliged to be very particular in explaining many other things, which, though useful in themselves, yet might be looked upon as foreign to his design; and for that reason, I presume, he industriously omitted them. There are some other books, which I have not yet seen, but only guess by the titles that they may be of this kind; such as Bebelius's Antiquitates Ecclesiasticæ, Martinay de Ritibus Ecclesiæ, Hendecius de Antiquitatibus Ecclesiasticis, Quenstedt Antiquitates Biblicæ et Ecclesiasticæ: but I presume, whatever they are, they will not forestall my design, which is chiefly to gratify the English reader with an entire collection of church antiquities in our own language, of which this volume is published as a specimen. And if this proves useful to the public, and finds a favourable acceptance, it will be followed with the remaining parts of the work, (as my time and occasions will give me leave,) according to the scheme here laid down, or with as little variation as may be. I shall next treat of the inferior orders of the clergy, as I have done here of the superior: then of the elections and ordinations of the clergy, and the several qualifications of those that were to be ordained: of the privileges, immunities, and revenues of the clergy, and the several laws and rules which particularly respected their function. To which I shall subjoin an account of the ancient ascetics, monks, virgins, and widows, who were a sort of retainers to the church. After this shall follow an account of the ancient churches, and their several parts, utensils, consecrations, immunities, together with a Notitia of the ancient division of the church into provinces, dioceses, parishes, and the original of these. After which I shall speak of the service of the church, beginning with the institution or instruction of the catechumens, and describing their several stages before baptism; then speak of baptism itself, and its ordinary concomitant, confirmation. Then proceed to the other solemn services of psalmody, reading of the Scripture, and preaching, which were the first part of the ancient church service. Then speak of their prayers, and the several rites and customs observed therein; where of the use of liturgies and the Lord's prayer; and of the prayers of catechumens, energumens, and penitents; all which part of the service thus far was commonly called by the name of the missa catechumenorum: then of the missa fidelium, or communion service; where of the manner of their oblations and celebration of the eucharist, which was always the close of the ordinary church service. After this I shall proceed to give a particular account of their fasts and festivals, their marriage rites and funeral rites, and the exercise of ancient church discipline; their manner of holding councils and synods, provincial, patriarchal, œcumenical; the power of Christian princes in councils and out of them; the manner and use of their literæ formatæ, and the several sorts of them; their different ways of computation of time: to which I shall add an account of their schools, libraries, and methods of educating and training up persons for the ministry, and say something of the several translations of the Bible in use among them, and several other miscellaneous rites and things, which would properly come under none of the forementioned heads; such as their manner of taking oaths, their abstinence from blood, their frequent use of the sign of the cross, their several sorts of public charities, the honours which they paid to their martyrs, together with an account of their sufferings, and the several instruments of cruelty used by the heathen to harass and torment them. In treating of all which, or any other such like matters as shall offer themselves, I shall observe the same method that I have done in this volume, illustrating the ancient customs from the original records of antiquity, and joining the opinions of the best modern authors that I can have opportunity to peruse, for unfolding points of greatest difficulty. I confess, indeed, this work will suffer something in my hands, for want of several books, which I have no opportunity to see, nor ability to purchase; but that perhaps may tempt some others, who are at the fountains of learning, and have all manner of books at command, to add to my labours, and improve this essay to a much greater perfection, since it is a subject that will never be exhausted, but still be capable of additions and improvement. The chief assistance I have hitherto had is from the noble benefaction of one, who, "being dead, yet speaketh;" I mean the renowned Bishop Morley, whose memory will for ever remain fresh in the hearts of the learned and the good; who, among many other eminent works of charity and generosity, becoming his great soul and high station in the church, such as the augmentation of several small benefices, and provision of a decent habitation and maintenance for the widows of poor clergymen in his diocese, &c., has also bequeathed a very valuable collection of books to the church of Winchester, for the advancement of learning among the parochial clergy; and I reckon it none of the least part of my happiness, that Providence, removing me early from the university, (where the best supplies of learning are to be had,) placed me by the hands of a generous benefactor,* without any importunity or seeking of my own, in such a station, as gives me liberty and opportunity to make use of so good a library, though not so perfect as I could wish. But the very mentioning this, as it is but a just debt to the memory of that great prelate, so perhaps it may provoke some other generous spirit, of like abilities and fortune with him, to add new supplies of modern books published since his death, to augment and complete his benefaction: which would be an addition of new succours and auxiliaries to myself, and others in my circumstances, and better enable us to serve the public. In the mean time, the reader may with ease enjoy, what with no small pains and industry I have collected and put together; and he may make additions from his own reading and observation, as I have done upon several authors, whom I have had occasion to peruse and mention: from some of which, and those of great fame and learning, I have sometimes thought myself obliged to dissent, upon some nice and peculiar questions; but I have never done it without giving my reasons, and treating them with that decency and respect which is due to their great learning and character. If in any thing I have made mistakes of my own, (as I cannot be so vain as to think I have made none,) every intelligent reader may make himself judge, and correct them with ingenuity and candour. All I can say is, that I have been as careful to avoid mistakes as I could in so critical and curious a subject; and I hope there will not be found so many, but that this essay may prove useful both to the learned and unlearned, to instruct the one, who cannot read these things in their originals, and refresh the memories of the other, who may know many things that they cannot always readily have recourse to. Or, if it be of no use to greater proficients, it may at least be some help to young students and new beginners, and both provoke them to the study of ancient learning, and a little prepare them for their entrance upon it. Besides, I considered there were some who might have a good inclination toward the study of these things, who yet have neither ability to purchase, nor time and opportunity to read over many ancient fathers and councils; and to such, a work of this nature, composed ready to their hands, might be of considerable use, to acquaint them with the state and practice of the primitive church, when they have no better opportunities to be informed about it. If, in any of these respects, these collections (which were designed for the honour of the ancient church, and the benefit of the present) may prove serviceable toward those ends, I shall not think my time and pains ill bestowed.

* Bona, Rerum Liturgic. lib. 1. c. 18. n. 1.

* Dr. Radcliffe.

THE PREFACE.

[PUBLISHED WITH VOLS. IX. X. OF THE ORIGINAL EDITION.]

WHEN I had finished these two volumes, and completed the whole work that I intended, and sent it to the press, hoping to give myself a little rest and vacation from hard labour; I was immediately called to a new work by a book that was sent me, bearing the title of Ecclesie Primitivæ Notitia, or a Summary of Christian Antiquities. To which is prefixed, an Index Hæreticus, containing a short account of all the principal heresies since the rise of Christianity; and subjoined, A Brief Account of the Eight first General Councils, dedicated to the venerable Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, by A. Blackmore, in two volumes, 8vo. Lond. 1722. I confess, I was very much surprised at first with the title and epistle dedicatory, thinking it to be some new work, that had done some mighty thing, either in correcting my mistakes, or supplying my deficiencies, after twenty years' hard labour in compiling my Origines for the use of the church. But as soon as I looked into the preface, and a little into the book itself, I found it to be only a transcript of some part of my Origines, under the notion of an epitome, though no such thing is said in the title-page. This seems to be an art of the gentleman, and the ten booksellers that are in combination with him, to render my books unuseful, and his own more valuable, as containing all I have said and something more at a less price; which, he says, will be of use to those poor clergymen and others whose genius and inclination lies towards antiquity, but are not able to purchase my books for the dearness of them. But the gentleman imposes very much upon poor readers in saying this, upon two accounts: first, In pretending that he gives them an epitome of my whole work, when yet there were two volumes still behind, which he could have no opportunity to epitomize, because they were not printed. He says indeed in his preface, that I had happily completed my whole work in eight volumes, and gives it a higher commendation and elogium, than perhaps it really deserves: but where he learned that I had finished my work in eight volumes, I cannot understand: I am sure I had advertised the readers, and him among the rest, that I intended two volumes more, which now I give them to complete my design. So that this gentleman deceives his poor brethren, when he pretends to give them an epitome of the whole, when it is only in part; and he must put them to the charge of another volume to make even his epitome complete. But secondly, If this gentleman was so concerned for his poor brethren, why did he make his epitome so large? The substance of my books for the use of such men might be brought into much less compass: there needed no authorities to have been cited for their use, who have no books to examine and compare them; but they might have rested upon the authority of the compiler; whose authority they may more decently and honestly use upon any occasion, than the authority of fathers and councils, which our author, with me, very well supposes they have no opportunity to see. And further, if our author meant to gratify his poor brethren at an easy rate, why did he clog his epitome, both before and behind, with two long discourses of his own? Sure this was not to make it cheaper, but to put them to more expense, in being obliged to buy his discourses, if they were minded to read any thing of mine. The fair way of epitomizing, had been to have given an abstract of my books by themselves, and printed his own separate from them: this had been more for the interest of his indigent readers, and I believe he will find it would have been more for the interest of his booksellers. I know not what authority he or his booksellers had to reprint my books in effect, which are my property by law. But I argue not with him at present upon that point. If he had done it in a genteel way, by asking leave, and under direction, he should have had my leave and encouragement also. Or if he had done it usefully, so as truly to answer the end he pretends, even without leave, he should have had my pardon. But now he has defeated his own design, both by unnecessary and hurtful additions of his own, which will not only incommode and encumber his books, but render them dangerous and pernicious to unwary readers, unless timely antidoted and corrected by some more skilful hand. For which reason, since they are sent into the world together with an abstract of my Antiquities, I have thought it just both to the world and myself to make some proper animadversions on them. I freely own, that a just and authentic account of ancient and modern sects and heresies, done by a learned and judicious hand, would be a very useful work: and it is what has been long wanted, and long desired by many learned men, who observe the failings of the common heresiologists on all sides: but I cannot see what an account of modern heresies has to do with the antiquities of the church, or how the knowledge of modern sectaries can help to explain the ancient usages and practices of the catholics in former ages. For which reason, our author might have dropped that part of his work without any detriment, to have made his book the cheaper. But whether it was proper or improper to clog his work with any account of heresies ancient or modern, what had been done in either kind, should have been done with care and judgment, and something of exactness, which, after all the compliments he passes on my work, I cannot say of his, and I am heartily sorry that in justice to the world I cannot do it. For some of his accounts are very trifling and jejune, and such as give no light or information to a reader: others are very false and injurious to great men, whom he makes heretics, when they were really the great defenders of the catholic faith: and his whole account is very imperfect, omitting some of the most considerable sects and errors, whilst his title-page pretends to be an account of all the principal heresies since the rise of Christianity. I love not to censure any man without reason, and therefore I will give some evident proof of each particular I lay to his charge; only premising one thing, which I believe will make the grammarians smile: the running title of his treatise is, Index Hæreticus, which in English is not what he calls it, An Account of Heresies; but, An heretical Index: which, I believe, he did not intend should be its character. But if we soften the meaning of the word heretical, and take it only for erroneous; however ominous it be, it is a very just character indeed. For, besides its other faults, it is very erroneous in the characters he gives of very great, and orthodox, and eminent saints of God, who in his account are some of the worst of heretics. I will make good in order the several charges I bring against him.

1. Some of his accounts are very trifling and jejune, and such as give no light or information to a reader. In speaking of the Hypsistarians, all that he says of them is only this, "That they were maintainers of a heresy in the fourth century, made up of Judaism and paganism." Now, what is a reader the wiser for all this? This character, being in such general terms only, would serve at least twenty heresies, and a reader would not know how to distinguish them, seeing no particular opinions or practices of Jews or Gentiles are here ascribed to the Hypsistarians, whereby to discern them from other heretics that mixed Judaism and paganism in one common religion. He says in his preface, one of the chief reasons for drawing up his Index Hæreticus was, because in my books I had only touched lightly and in transitu upon heresies, as they made for my purpose, without giving any perfect description of them. Which is very true. But why then did not he give a perfect description of those Hypsistarians, or at least a more perfect one than I had done? He could not be ignorant, whilst he was epitomizing my books, that I had given a pretty good description of them, Book XVI. chap. 6. sect. 2. p. 306. vol. vii., where I say, They called themselves Hypsistarians, that is, worshippers of the most high God, whom they worshipped, as the Jews did, only in one person; and they observed their sabbaths, and used distinction of meats, clean and unclean, though they did not regard circumcision, as Gregory Nazianzen, whose father was once of this sect, gives the account of them. This is some account of them, if it be not a perfect one. Why then did he not give the same or a better account of them, or at least refer his reader to my book, or his own epitome, p. 335, where he transcribes my account of them? The gentleman was in haste when he wrote his Index, and could not stand to do justice neither to me nor his readers. I could add something more concerning these Hypsistarians out of Gregory Nyssen, Hesychius, and Suidas; but it will be time enough to do that, if I live to give the reader an epitome of my own with some additions. I only remark here, that there is no notice taken of these Hypsistarians in Epiphanius, Theodoret, Philastrius, or St. Austin, or any other of the common heresiologists; and that they who speak of them say nothing of their paganism, however our author came to blunder upon it.

His account of the Cœlicolæ is much such another as the former: "Cœlicolæ, or worshippers of heaven, an heretical sect in the fifth century; at which time they were condemned by the Rescripts of Honorius the emperor." It is hard, again, that he could not have referred his readers to the same place of my book, or his own epitome, where they might have found a much better account of them. But this gentleman was to magnify his own Index, and make his readers believe, that he had done great feats and wonders in discovering the tenets of ancient heretics, where I had been silent, or but lightly touched upon them; though by these instances the reader will now be able to judge of the perfection and excellency of his performance.

I will give but one instance more of this kind out of many that might be added. In speaking of the Ethnophrones, he says, "They were heretics of the seventh century, who taught that some pagan superstitions were to be retained together with Christianity." But why did he not inform his reader what these pagan superstitions were? Is there no author that speaks particularly of them? The learned reader may please to take this account from me in the words of Damascen. de Hæresibus, p. 585. Ethnophrones cum gentium instituta sequantur, in cæteris sunt Christiani. Hi natales dies, fortunam, fatum, omnem astronomiam, et astrologiam, omnemque divinationem et auspicia probant: auguria, expiationes, et placationes, sortes, prodigiorum et portentorum inspectiones, veneficia, aliasque ejusdem generis impias fabulas adhibent: iisdemque quibus gentes, utuntur institutis. Dies etiam festos quosdam Græcorum probant: dies denique, et menses, et annos, et tempora observant et notant. In short, they were the same with those superstitious Christians, who followed the forbidden heathen arts of divination, magic, and enchantment, judicial astrology, calculation of natiivities, augury, soothsaying, divination by lots, observation of days and accidents, and the observation of heathen festivals, of whom I have so largely and particularly treated in two whole chapters, Book XVI. chap. 4 and 5, where I speak of the discipline and laws of the church made against them. And yet this gentleman will bear his readers in hand, that he has given a perfect account of those ancient sects and heresies, which I only occasionally and lightly touch upon.

2. The second charge I have against his Index is more weighty, that many of his accounts of heresies and heretics are very false, and highly injurious to the character and memory of great, and good, and excellent men, whom he makes heretics, when they were really noble confessors and brave defenders of the catholic faith. For proof of this I will not insist upon the characters he gives of Melito, bishop of Sardes, or of Nicholas the deacon; but only observe, that a prudent writer might have softened his character of each. For though Valesius* bears hard upon Melito, and says, with our author, That he asserted God to be corporeal, in a book which he wrote, περὶ Θεοῦ ἐνσωμάτου, which Valesius translates, De Deo corporeo: yet other learned persons† think this to be a mistake; since Θεὸς ἐνσωμάτος does not signify a corporeal God, but God incarnate, or made flesh, or dwelling in the body; which is a quite different thing from God's being corporeal in his Divine nature. And therefore, since thus much might justly have been said, by way of apology, for Melito, our author should not have been so severe upon him, as to style him a heretic of the first ages, who held, that God was corporeal; but have alleged in his favour what so many learned men have said in justification of him; especially considering what both Polycrates‡ in Eusebius, and Tertullian§ in St. Jerom, say of him, That he was a man filled with the Holy Ghost, and generally believed to be a prophet among Christians.

The same apology might have been made, and in justice should have been made, for Nicholas, one of the seven deacons. For though some of the ancients lay the doctrine of the Nicolaitans to his charge; yet, as I show in one of the preceding Books,|| a great many others, particularly Clemens Alexandrinus, Eusebius, Theodoret, and St. Austin, excuse him, and say, The doctrine was none of his, but only taken up by those who pretended to be his followers, grounded upon some mistaken words of his, which had no such meaning.

* Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 26.

† Cave, Histor. Literar. vol. 1. p. 43. Du Pin, in the Life of Melito. Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Ἐνσωμάτωσις.

‡ Ap. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 24.

§ Tertul. ap. Hieron. de Scriptor. cap. 24.

|| Book XXII. chap. 1. sect. 2.

But I pass over this to our author's account of the Acephali; "Who," he says, "were a headless kind of heretics, who owned neither bishop, priest, nor sacrament, like our modern Quakers." I know not what grounds our author had for this, for he never cites any particular writer throughout his whole Index; but I know Alexander Rosse said the same before him, and he is one of this gentleman's learned authors. I know also that some popish writers* object it to the Lutherans, that they are like the old Acephali, because they have no bishops for their leaders; and I am apt to think Alexander Rosse took it, right or wrong, from some of those popish writers. But Alexander has the misfortune to contradict himself; for he says in the very same breath, That Severus, bishop of Alexandria, (he meant Antioch,) was author of this sect of Acephali, under Anastasius the emperor, anno 462. And that they were called also Theodosians, from Theodosius their chief patron, and bishop of Alexandria. Strange indeed! that they should have bishops for their authors and patrons, and yet be without bishop, priest, or sacrament among them! Our author was aware of this rock, and had the wit to avoid it; and therefore here he fairly and wisely dropped his guide, and left him to shift for himself with his contradictions; telling us the first part of the story, but not the latter, which would have spoiled his parallel between the Acephali and the Quakers. But how would he make out, if he was pressed hard to it, that the Acephali had no bishops, or were named Headless, from the want of such heads among them? For my part, I never met with any ancient writer that gave this account of them. Liberatus says,† They were called Acephali, because they would not receive the doctrine of Cyril of Alexandria, nor follow him as their head, nor yet any other. But these were bishops, who would neither take Cyril patriarch of Alexandria, nor John patriarch of Antioch, for their head, and were therefore called Acephali, because they would follow neither patriarch as their leader. For as those bishops were called Autocephali, who had no patriarch above them, but were a sort of patriarchs themselves, and independent of any other; so those bishops who were subject to patriarchs, and withdrew their obedience from them, were called Acephali, because they were no heads or patriarchs themselves, and yet refused to be subject to any other. Patriarchs were then heads of the bishops, as bishops were heads of the people; and these are quite different things; for bishops to be called Acephali, because they rejected their patriarch, and people to be called Acephali, because they had neither bishop, nor priest, nor sacrament among them. I am not fond of defending ancient heretics, but I think all men ought to have justice done them, and not be charged with more heresies than they were really guilty of. It is allowed on all sides, that these Acephali were Eutychians, and enemies of the council of Chalcedon; and as such, Leontius ‡ also writes against them; but he says not a word of their being without bishops, priests, or sacraments; and therefore it lies upon our author to produce some ancient voucher, better than Alexander Rosse, for the charge he brings against them.

I insist not on his little grammatical error in his account of the Saccophori, "Who," he says, "were a branch of the Enkratites, so called because they carried a long bag, to make the people believe they led a penitent life." They were indeed a particular sect of the Manichees, who are condemned under that name in several laws of the Theodosian Code,§ where the several branches of the Manichees are proscribed under the distinguishing names of Solitarii, Eneratita, Apotactita, Hydroparastate, and Saccophori, which names they assumed to shelter themselves against the severity of former laws made against the Manichees under the name of Manichees only. But now these Manichean Saccophori were not so called from carrying a long bag, but from wearing sackcloth, and affecting to appear with it in public. Saccus indeed will signify a sack or a bag, as well as sackcloth; but what has a long bag to do with a penitent life? It is fitter to describe a philosopher than a penitent: but sackcloth and a penitent life will consist very well together. However, the church did not allow any to affect this garb, though some monks, like the Manichees, were very fond of it, and loved to appear publicly with chains or crosses about their necks, and walked bare-foot, and wore sackcloth out of mere singularity and affectation: who are therefore often severely censured for these things by the ancients, Epiphanius, St. Austin, St. Jerom, Palladius, and Cassian, as I have showed more fully in another place: || but I never heard of any, either monks or heretics, censured for carrying a long bag, as an indication of a penitent life; and I am of opinion, this gentleman, when he considers it again, will reckon this such another slip as Index Hæreticus; which are but small failings in comparison of what I have now further to object against his Index, which turns catholics into heretics in several instances both of former and later ages.

* See Mason's Defence of the Ordination of Ministers beyond Seas, p. 129. Oxon. 1641.

† Liberat. Breviar. cap. 9. Hos esse puto authores Acephalorum, qui neque Cyrillum habent caput, neque quem sequantur ostendunt.

‡ Leont. de Sectis. Action. 7. Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 1. p. 522.

§ Cod. Theod. Lib. 16. Tit. 5. de Hæreticis, Leg. 7, 9, 11.

|| Book VII. chap. 3. sect. 6.

Among the ancients, he does great injustice to Eustathius, the famous bishop of Antioch. For in giving an account of the Eustathian heretics, he says, "The Eustathians were the spawn of the Sabellian heresy, and had their name from Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, who was deposed in a council held in his own city, about the middle of the fourth century, for holding those principles." I take no notice of his parochronism, in saying that he was deposed in the council of Antioch about the middle of the fourth century; for though we cannot well call the year 327, or 329, when that council was held, the middle of the fourth century; yet this is but a small mistake, into which he might easily be led by Baronius, or the corrupt copies of Athanasius and St. Jerom, which place that council in the reign of Constantius, instead of Constantine, as the best critics, Valesius,* Gothofred,† Pagi,‡ and Dr. Cave,§ are fully agreed; and as appears plainly from all the historians, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Philostorgius. But the thing I complain of is this, that he makes this Eustathius a Sabellian, and his followers a spawn of the Sabellian heresy. Whereas, in truth, he was the great defender of the catholic faith against the Arian heresy in the council of Nice: the council itself translated him from Beræa to Antioch; and he was the first man that opened the council, with a panegyric oration to Constantine: as this author, forgetting himself, fairly owns in his Account of the Eight General Councils, p. 476. Athanasius gives him this character, That he was a noble confessor, and orthodox in the faith, τιν πιστων εὐσεβῆς, and exceeding zealous for the truth.|| How then could he be a Sabellian, unless Sabellianism was the true faith, and Athanasius a Sabellian also? To open this matter a little further, and undeceive this gentleman, and his readers also: this Eustathius was only abused in his character out of spite and malice by the Arians, who were his implacable enemies, because he was a resolute defender of the Nicene faith against them. They therefore endeavoured to make him odious, by falsely charging him with Sabellianism, and several other crimes, upon the strength of which calumnies they deposed him in one of their own councils at Antioch. Socrates¶ and Sozomen say expressly, that this council of Antioch was an Arian council that deposed Eustathius, upon a pretence, that he was more a defender of the Sabellian doctrine than of the Nicene faith: which was a usual trick of the Arians, whereby they endeavoured to undermine Athanasius also. Now, this being only a mere calumny and slander of so great a man, imposed upon him by his professed enemies, the Arians, it does not become any one, who takes upon him to give unlearned readers an account of the ancient heresies, to fix this character upon him, without giving some authority, or at least an intimation, that he was deposed only in an Arian council. I do not suppose this gentleman had any ill design in what he wrote about this matter; but he was either imposed upon by some modern historian, or did not sufficiently consider what he found delivered by ancient writers: which should make him the more cautious for the future what guides he follows, and learn to write with judgment, when he takes upon him the office of an historian for such as cannot contradict him.

He commits the same fault in giving an account of the Essenes, "Who," he says, "were a sect of Christian heretics at Alexandria, in the time of St. Mark." Now, there seems to be a little more of wilful mistake in this; for he could not be ignorant, whilst he was transcribing my Origines, that I had alleged the authority of Epiphanius, Eusebius, and St. Jerom, to show that they believed them to be the orthodox church, and not a sect of Christian heretics, at Alexandria, in the time of St. Mark; and he himself, in his epitome, refers his readers to these authorities also. I said, further, (which he leaves out,) that some learned modern writers, such as Valesius, Scaliger, and Dallæus, question whether they were Christians; whilst Bishop Beveridge and others maintain the common opinion. But all agree that they were not a sect of Christian heretics; however this author came to despise all authority, both ancient and modern, in fixing that character upon them; for if they were heretics, they belonged to the Jews, and not to the Christians.

In his accounts of modern heretics (which he might have spared in a book of Ecclesiastical Antiquities) he is much more injurious to the reader, as well as to the pious memory of great numbers of many excellent men, and to the protestant cause in general, when he puts the Albigenses, the Hussites or Bohemians, the Lollards, the Waldenses, and the Wicklevites, all into his black list of heretics; ascribing to them such monstrous opinions as they were certainly never guilty of, but only stood falsely charged with them by the implacable malice of their Romish adversaries, who treated them just as the Arians did Athanasius and Eustathius in former ages. It might have become a protestant heresiologist and historian, either to have omitted these names, or at least to have told his readers what excellent vindications and apologies

* Vales. Annot. ad Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. 3. cap. 59.

† Gothofred. Dissert. in Philostorg. lib. 2. cap. 7.

‡ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 327. n. 3. et 340. n. 18.

§ Cave, Histor. Literar. vol. i. p. 139.

|| Athanas. Epist. ad Solitarios, t. 1. p. 812.

¶ Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 24.

 Sozom. lib. 2. cap. 19.

have been written by the most learned protestant authors of the two last ages, to clear their character of those black and odious imputations, which their adversaries falsely and industriously threw upon them. If he knew nothing of these vindications, he was very ill qualified to act the part of an historian in this case: if he did know them, he was more unpardonable still, in concealing from his readers what in all justice both to them, and the church, and the memory of the saints, who were so traduced, he ought carefully to have laid before them. If he had thought fit to have looked into my Scholastical History of Baptism, as carefully as he has done into the Origines, he might there have found the venerable names of some of those worthy men, who have done justice to the protestant cause, in vindicating those witnesses of the truth from the false aspersions that are cast upon them. For his and the truth's sake, I will once more transcribe them, with a little addition, and more particular reference to the books and places containing those vindications.

Crankanthorp, Defensio Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ contra Spalatensem, cap. 18. p. 100.

Usserius de Christianarum Ecclesiarum Successione et Statu, cap. 10. quæ est de Albigensium et aliorum qui Ecclesiæ Pontificiæ adversati sunt, Historia.

Albertinus de Eucharistia, lib. 3. p. 976. ubi agit de Wicklevistis, Waldensibus, Lollardis, Taboritis sive Bohemis.

Sir Samuel Morland, History of the Evangelical Churches of the Valleys of Piedmont. Lond. 1658. Fol.

Dr. Allix, History of the Albigenses. Lond. 1692. 4to. 2 vols.

Joachim Hesterberg de Ecclesia Waldensium. Argent. 1668. 4to.

Paul Perrin, History of the Albigeois and Vaudois. Lond. 1624. 4to.

Balthasar Lydius, Waldensia, sive Conservatio Veræ Ecclesiæ demonstrata ex Confessionibus Taboritarum et Bohemorum, 2 vols. Roterod. 1616. 8vo.

Cave, Historia Literaria. In Conspectu sæculi Waldensis sive Duodecimi.

Dr. Tho. James's Apology for John Wickliffe, showing his Conformity with the now Church of England. Oxon. 1608. 4to.

Dr. Henry Maurice's Vindication of the Prim. Church, p. 374.

Ratio Disciplinæ Fratrum Bohemorum. Hagæ. 1660.

Hen. Wharton, Appendix ad Cave Hist. Literar. p. 50. in Vita Joan. Wicklef. p. 50.

The Life of Wickliffe, by a late author. Lond. 8vo.

Comenii Historia Persecutionum Ecclesiæ Bohemicæ. Lug. Bat. 1647. 8vo.

It. Historia Ecclesiæ Slavonicæ. &c.

Anton. Leger, Histoire Vaudois des Eglises des Vallées de Piedmont. Lug. Bat. 1669. Fol.

Waldensium Confessio contra claudicantes Hussitas. Basil. 1566. 8vo. See also in the Fasciculus Rerum, &c. tom. 1.

Conrad. Danhaucus, Ecclesia Waldensium Orthodoxiæ Lutheranæ Testis et Socia. Argent. 1659. 4to.

Sam. Maresius, Dissertatio Historico-Theologica de Waldensibus. Groning. 1660. 4to.

Ægid. Stauchius, Historico-Theologica Disquisitio de Waldensibus. Witenberg. 1675. 4to.

Pet. Wesenbeccius, De Waldensibus et Principum Protestantium Epistolis huc pertinentibus. 1603. 4to.

Joan. Lasicius, Veræ Religionis Apologia. Spiræ. 1582.

Now, is it possible, among such a number of fine discourses and elaborate pieces upon this subject, a person who writes the account of heresies, should never have met with or heard of any apologies that were made in the behalf of these men; but he must needs take his accounts crudely, as delivered by their professed enemies? If the account of Rainerius, their adversary, but an ingenuous popish writer, be taken, it does them abundantly more justice than this author. For though he calls them a sect, yet he says, it was an ancient sect; for some said, it had continued from the time of Pope Sylvester; and others, from the time of the apostles: and whereas all other sects were accompanied with horrible blasphemies against God, which would make a man tremble; this of the Leonists had a great show of piety; they lived uprightly before men, and believed all things aright of God, and all the articles contained in the creed: only they blasphemed and hated the church of Rome. Were these the Waldenses, "That rejected episcopacy, and the Apostles' Creed, and all holy orders, and the power of the magistrate, and approved of adulterous embraces, and practised promiscuous copulation," as our author represents them, styling them, by way of contempt, "the religion-mongers, and pious reformers of the twelfth century?" If our author were put to apologize for himself, he would lay all the blame upon Alexander Rosse: for he is his learned author from whom he transcribed. And Alexander tells us ingenuously, he had his accounts from Baronius, Genebrard, Sanders, Gualterus, Bellarmine, Viegas, Florimundus Raimundus, Prateolus, Gregory de Valentia, and such other writers, who were noted papists, and inveterate enemies of the Waldensian and protestant religion. And should an author, who writes about heresies, have given his accounts, designed for the use of protestant readers, out of such authors, when he might have had recourse to one or more of such a number of excellent protestant writers, who have cleared up the character of the Waldenses, and vindicated their memory out of their own writings and confessions of faith, which are the most certain evidences of their religion? It is amazing to think how any ingenuous writer, who pretends to the least knowledge of books and learning, should give such a black character of those excellent confessors and witnesses of the truth, without suggesting the least tittle of what so many learned men have said, or what may be said, in their vindication. I will not suspect our author of any sinister designs of advancing popery; but I will be bold to say, he could hardly have taken a more effectual way, had he designed to do it, than by instilling into the minds of those who can look no further than his accounts, such an odious character of those men, of whom so many thousands laid down their lives for the cause of true religion, in those very points wherein protestants stand distinguished from papists at this day. I had once an occasion to make this same reflection in a former book * on another writer, who is much superior to our author in learning and ingenuity; and I never heard that he took it unkindly at my hands for so doing; for an historian's business is only to find out truth as well as he can, and then deliver it to others fairly without disguise, or any false colours put upon it. And therefore I hope our author will take occasion to amend this grand error, whenever he has opportunity to write any thing further upon this subject. His time would be much better employed in reading and considering the books of some of those excellent writers I have referred him to, than in collecting a heap of rubbish from Alexander Rosse or any other such injudicious writers.

3. But there is one thing more I must put this author and his readers in mind of: That whilst he bears so hard upon the poor Waldenses, and Albigenses, and Wicklevists, and Hussites, and Lollards, he has not one syllable in all his Index of the grand errors of the Romanists or papists, under any title or denomination whatsoever. He cannot pretend they fell not directly in his way; for he treats of modern sects and heterodoxies as well as ancient. Neither did he want his guide here; for Alexander Rosse has a whole section of fifty pages in his book upon the subject. Or if he had said nothing upon it, yet it might have become a new heresiologist to have taken notice of the errors of the Romanists upon some title or other. Their errors are as considerable and dangerous as most other modern sects; why then have they no place in the Index? Is transubstantiation no error? Is idolatry, in its various species of worshipping saints, angels, images, relics, the host, and the cross, no crime? Is not the Hildebrandine heresy, as our writers style it, that is, the doctrine of deposing kings, an error worth mentioning? nor the pope's pretence to infallibility and universal power over the church, worthy of a protestant's censure? Is it no crime to exempt the clergy from the power of the civil magistrate? nor any wrong done them to impose celibacy upon them? Have the people no injury done them in keeping the Scriptures locked up in an unknown tongue? or being obliged to have Divine service in a language they do not understand? or in being deprived sacrilegiously of one half of the communion? or in having the absolute necessity of auricular confession imposed upon them? Is there no harm in the use of interdicts and indulgences? Are private and solitary masses, and the doctrine of purgatory, with many other errors, such innocent things, that it was not worth an historian's while to give his readers any notice of them, or caution against them? Our author knows, I have fairly combated most of these things, and showed them to be novelties and great corruptions, in the several parts of my Origines, as I had occasion to meet with them. Therefore the least he could have done, had been to refer his readers to those parts of his own epitome, or my Origines, where these things are treated, if he was not minded to give them in one view in his own collections.

But he is as favourable to the anti-episcopal men, or presbyterians, as he is to the papists; for he gives them no place in his catalogue neither. I suppose he was in haste for the press, and considered not that he had made such an omission. But he should now consider, that he who falsely objects it to the Waldenses, that they rejected episcopacy, (which they always carefully maintained,) should not have passed over in silence those men who oppose episcopacy, when he might with justice and truth have charged them with it as their proper heterodoxy, from which their denomination of anti-episcopal, or presbyterian, is taken. But this is not all the defect of his Index.

* Scholiast. Hist. of Baptism, Part I. chap. 1. p. 97.

If this author would have given a perfect catalogue of all the original heresies from the first ages of Christianity, together with the more remarkable heterodoxies which appeared in these later times, he should have inserted many other names, both ancient and modern, which are now omitted in his catalogue. In the first century, the Thebulians, Cleobians, Dositheans, Gorthæans, Merinthians; not to mention Demas, Hermogenes, Hymenæus and Philetus, Alexander the coppersmith, Diotrefhes, and the doctrine of Jezebel, which are noted in Scripture. In the second century, Bassus, a new disciple of Valentinus. In the third century, the Discalceati, Apocaritæ, Dicartitæ, and Solitarii, which were new branches of the Manichees. In the fourth century, the Minæi, Adelphians, Psathyrians, and Lucianists, two new branches of the Arians, Adelophagi, Theoponitæ, Triscilidæ or Triformiani, Hydrotheitæ, Cyrthiani, and Pytheciani, new sects of Arians, Gyrovagi, Homuncionitæ, Ametritæ, Psychopneumones, Adecerditæ, Sarabaitæ or Remboth, Passionistæ, Nyctages, Theophronians, Metagenetæ, Sabbatians or Protopaschites. In the fifth century, the Vigilantians and Massilienses. In the sixth century, the Marcianists, or followers of Marcianus Trapezita, the Tetraditæ, and Severians, with the several branches that sprung from them, the Contobabditæ, Paulians, Theodosians, Damianists, Petrites, Cononites, Corrupticolæ; together with the errors of Peter Moggus and Peter Gnapheus or Fullo, which made a great noise in the history of this age; as did also the practices of Zeno with his Henoticon, and Anastasius against the council of Chalcedon. In the seventh century, Joannes Philoponus and Ethioproscopæ. The eighth century was famous for the disputes between the Iconoclasts and the Iconolatæ, image-worshippers and image-breakers: and the errors of the second council of Nice might have been set forth in a much more advantageous view, had our author been pleased to have acquainted his reader with the brave opposition that was made against it by the council of Frankfort, and other councils and writers of that and the following ages, in his History of the General Councils. The ninth and the tenth ages, Prateolus is pleased to say, was a perfect interregnum of heretics, a cessation and rest of the church for two hundred years and more from all heretical infestation. Others more properly call these the dark and ignorant ages, when the enemy sowed his tares, whilst men were asleep. And Baronius himself cannot forbear upon some accounts to call them infelicissima Romanæ ecclesiæ tempora et omnium luctuosissima, the most unhappy and deplorable times of the Roman church, when weak men were in danger of being scandalized by seeing the abomination of desolation set in the temple. If our author had been as inquisitive as it became him, he might have found the great idol of transubstantiation begun to be formed in the errors of Paschasius Rathbertus in these ages, though not fully completed till some ages after in the council of Lateran; and the seeds of the Hildebrandine heresy springing up in the bold attempts of the popes of these ages against the power of princes, till it came to its full maturity under Hildebrand himself, called Gregory VII.; to mention no more of the popish errors, which our author thought fit wholly to pass over. In the twelfth century he might have found the errors of Durandus de Waldach, and Petrus Abælardus, and Gilbertus Porretanus, and the Coterelli, and the Populicans, to have added to his Index. But above all, the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries would have furnished him with great abundance of more remarkable errors to have filled up his catalogue, instead of the Wicklevites and Hussites, and Waldenses and Albigenses. For now appeared in the thirteenth century the errors of Abbot Joachim, and Petrus Joannes de Oliva, and John de Parma, the author of the infamous book, called Evangelium Æternum, The Everlasting Gospel, which was to supersede and set aside the gospel of Christ, under pretence of introducing the more spiritual gospel of the Holy Ghost. Eimericus has noted seven and twenty errors and blasphemies contained in this book, which the Mendicant friars in those days highly magnified. But our author needed not to have gone so high as Eimericus for them; for Bishop Stillingfleet gives an ample account of them in his Fanaticism of the Church of Rome. As he does also of the errors of Gerardus Segarelli, and the Dulcinists, and Herman of Ferrara, and the book called The Flowers of St. Francis, and another, The Conformities of St. Francis and Christ. To which may be added the errors of Raymundus Lullius, and David Dinantius, and Bugaurius de Monte Falcone, together with the errors of Joannes Guion, and Joannes de Mercuria, and Nicolas de Ultricuria, and Dionysius Soulechat, a Franciscan, and Joannes de Calore, and one Ludovicus, and Guido, an Austin hermit, with some others that were condemned in these ages by Gulielmus Parisiensis and Stephanus Parisiensis, with the concurrence of the university of Paris, and are to be found at the end of some editions of Peter Lombard, with the errors of Peter Lombard himself, under this title, Articuli in quibus Magister Sententiarum communiter non tenetur. Lombard. Sentent. Lugd. 1594. 8vo. Spondanus adds to these, the Condormientes, and Pastorelli, and Guido de Lacha, and the Humiliati, and the Ordo Apostolorum; all which appeared within the compass of the thirteenth century; besides the famous disputes between the Guelphs and Gibelines, which continued in the following ages. In the fourteenth century, there are the errors of Arnaldus Montanerius, and Arnaldus de Villa Nova, Bertoldus de Roback, Martinus Gonsalvus Conchensis, Nicolaus Calaber, Bartholomeus Janovesius, the Bizochi, and Fratres de Paupere Vita, the Pseudapostoli, Joannes de Latone, Joannes Hato, the sect of the Impuri, Raimundus de Terraga, Amadeus Lusitanus; the Albati, who travelled with great admiration for their sanctity over all parts of Europe; the Templars, whose order was extinguished in the council of Vienna; the New Sabellians of Spain, who maintained upon the hypothesis of transubstantiation, that the eucharist was both Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; the errors of Franciscus Ceccus, an Italian astrologer; the wild disputes between the Palamites and Joannes Cantacuzenus on the one side, and Barlaam and Aeyndinus on the other, concerning the light of Mount Tabor; the revelations of St. Bridget and St. Catherine for and against the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary; the disputes about the same matter between the Dominicans and the Franciscans; and the more fierce disputes of those orders concerning the poverty of Jesus Christ; of which Bishop Stillfleet gives an ample account in his Fanaticism of the Church of Rome, and the author of The Mystery of Jesuitism an account no less entertaining: add to these, the errors of Pope John XXII., ninety of which are laid to his charge by our countryman Gulielmus Ockam, for which he himself, with his friends Joannes Parisiensis, Joannes de Poliacio, Petrus de Vincis, Joannes de Janduno, and Marsilius de Padua, with many others, are charged with heresy, being in reality firm to the defence of the imperial power against the papal. A collection of those tracts may be found together in Goldastus Monarchia Imperii Romani, seu de Jurisdictione et Potestate Imperatoris et Papæ, per varios Auctores. 3 vol. Hanov. 1612. Fol.

In the fifteenth century there are the famous disputes between the councils of Constance and Basil on the one side, and the council of Florence on the other, concerning the infallibility and supremacy of the pope above general councils; the error of the council of Constance in taking away the cup from the people; the error of the council of Basil in determining for the immaculate conception. There are also the errors of Augustinus de Roma, Joannes Parvi, Franciscus Georgius Venetus, Laurentius Valla, a reviver of Sabellianism, Nicholas Machiavel, Matthæus Palmerius, Petrus de Aranda, Fanatici Suevenses, Matthias Tiburtinus a Franciscan enthusiast, Tympanista Germanus, and a sect called Opinionists; not to mention Henricus Harphius, whose errors, because they are censured and expurged only by the order of the Roman Index, are of a more doubtful nature. There was also in the beginning of this age, one Vincentius Ferrerius, a Catalonian preacher, who is now cried up as a great saint by Spondanus and Baronius, and other writers of the Roman church: but there was a time when he was condemned as a heretic by Eimericus the inquisitor, for asserting, among other things, that Judas repented unto salvation. To which may be added the errors of Quadrigarius and Munerius, censured by the Sorbonne, anno 1442, and 1470.

The sixteenth century had but a little time before the Reformation was begun by Zuinglius and Luther: yet in this short interval our author might have noted Hermannus Rissuick, and the Fossarii in Bohemia, and Petrus Pomponatius in Italy, who read public lectures against the immortality of the soul. And if he had added, Thomas de Vio, commonly called Cardinal Cajetan, he would have had the authority of Prætolus and Ambrosius Catharin also, who wrote a book particularly against Cajetan, wherein he objects to him above two hundred errors, an extract of which may be found in Flaccius Illyricus de Controversiis Religionis Papisticæ, p. 133. Basil. 1565. 4to.

We are now come to the age of the Reformation, where our author has noted many sects and heterodoxies, but omitted abundance more, that were very considerable. Catharin, who condemned Cajetan, had also his errors noted by others. Sotomajor, in his Index, prohibits some of his books to be read, and orders others to be expurged: but one may question whether that was done for his real errors, or only for his opinions inclining to the protestant side. But his opinion of an intermediate state after the end of this world, in a new earth between heaven and hell, for those who are neither so good as to be admitted into heaven, nor so bad as to be condemned to hell, is an error that might have been worthy our author's observation. He speaks of the Anabaptists, but with a great deal of confusion, whereas others distinguish them into at least fourteen sects, according to their peculiar tenets: the Muncerians, the Apostolici, the Separati, the Cathari, the Silentes, the Enthusiasts, the Liberi, the Adamitæ, the Iditæ, the Augustinians, Beuckeldians, the Melchiorites, the Georgians, and the Mennonists. Some add to these the Pastoricoles, the Nudipedes, the Manifestarii, the Clancularii, the Baculares, the Batemburgici, the Pacifici, the Sanguinari. Our author mentions some of these under their proper titles, but he omits the greatest part of them. And he ought to have distinguished our English Anabaptists from those of other countries, because they abhor many of their opinions. In giving an account of the Anti-trinitarians, he says, they are the spawn of the old Arians and Samosatensians, grafted upon their stock by Michael Servetus. Whereas Servetus was no Arian, nor Samosatene, but a reviver of Sabellianism, in which he was followed by Keckerman and many others, who never met with so severe a censure. The authors of modern Arianism were Valentinus Gentilis, and Georgius Blandrata, and Gregorius Pauli, and Matthæus Gribaldus, and Franciscus David, and Joannes Paulus Alciat, and Joannes Campanus, and Lælius Socinus, uncle to Faustus Socinus, of whom our author should have given a particular account under their several titles. He should also have given some account of the errors of Julius Cæsar Vaninus, and Andreas Cæsalpinus, and Hobbes, who were in the same class with Spinoza. It had also been worth his while to have told his reader what were the singular opinions or heterodoxies of Archer, who, among other blasphemies, maintained publicly in print, That God was the author of sin; for which he was censured by the assembly of divines, and his book burnt by the common hangman, anno 1645. He should also have noted the errors of Jacob Behmen, and Antonietta Bourignon, (against whom Dr. Cockburn wrote,) and Hieronymus Cardanus, and Curcellæus, and Episcopus, and Arminius; and the errors of Grotius, after he fell into his designs of comprehension, and favourable interpretations both of the popish and Socinian tenets, which plainly appear in his later writings: the errors also of the Lord Herbert of Cherbury; the new heresy of the Jesuits, as the Jansenists themselves call it, which asserts the pope to be infallible, not only in matters of faith, but matters of fact; and gives him power to dethrone princes, and absolve subjects from their oaths of allegiance to them: which doctrine every where occurs in the writings of Bellarmine against Barclay and Widdrington, under the name of Sculkenius, and in Becanus, and Mariana, and Suarez, and Lessius, and Azorius, and Emanuel Sa, and hundreds of others, some of whose books together with Baronius have been publicly burnt at Paris and Madrid by the hands of the common hangman. To these might have been added the new doctrine of the Jesuits in morality, largely set forth in the books called, Provincial Letters, and the Jesuits' Morals; chiefly taken out of Escobar, Filliucius, and such other writers. As also the doctrine of probability, taught by Caramuel, which opens a way to licentiousness; for which he stands condemned and branded, even in the Roman Index, under this title, Joannis Caramuelis Apologema pro Antiquissima et Universalissima Doctrina de Probabilitate, prorsus prohibetur. There are also no less than forty-five propositions of the Jesuits' casuistical divinity, whereof this doctrine of probability is one, condemned by two bulls of Alexander VII. at the end of the Roman Index, which would have appeared well in our author's collection. As also the censures of the parliament of Paris and the Sorbonne, upon the Propositions of Santarellus, anno 1626, wherein he asserted the pope's deposing power; the censure of the Sorbonne upon the Jesuits, anno 1661, for asserting, That the pope has the same infallibility as Jesus Christ in matters of fact, as well as right; and the censure of the Sorbonne, anno 1561, upon another author, for asserting, That the pope has power to dispose of the dominions of heretical princes, and absolve their subjects from their oath of allegiance and fidelity. All which may be found in the book called The pernicious Consequences of the New Heresy of the Jesuits. Richerius also gives us the censures of the Sorbonne, upon one Ludovicus Coubont, for asserting, That bishops have not their authority immediately from Jesus Christ, but from the pope; and another upon Ludovicus Cellotius, for maintaining, That general councils have their authority only from the pope; and another upon Francis Guillou, and a fourth upon Jacobus Vernant, for the same assertions; besides the censure of Sanctarellus the Jesuit, which is also there related. Richer. Vindic. Doctrinæ Scholæ. Paris. In another book of Richerius, De Potestate Papæ in Temporalibus, we have the arrests of the parliament of Paris against Tanquerel, and Cardinal Perron, and Bernardinus Castorius, for publishing the infamous bull De Cœna Domini; and against Joannes Castellus, and Florentinus Jacob, and Ravailiac, who murdered Henry IV. of France, upon the deposing principles; as also the arrests against Bellarmine, and Martin Becanus, and Sculkenius, that is, Bellarmine himself again, and Suarez, for their several pernicious books upon the same subject. An account of which would have been a grace to our author's catalogue of modern heterodoxies. Further yet; if he had looked into Bishop Stillingfleet's book of the Divisions of the Roman Clergy, he might there have found, besides the schisms of the popes in former ages, and their contentions with the emperors for temporal power, and the feuds of the monastic orders one with another, a particular account of the Jesuits' opposition to episcopal power and jurisdiction, in the books of Nicholas Smith and Thomas à Jesu; which books were censured, first, by the archbishop of Paris, then by the Sorbonne, and at last by the bishops of France in an assembly of them at Paris. To these he might have added the books which the Jesuits published under the feigned names of Hermannus Loemelius, and Edmundus Ursulanus, and the Jesuits' Censure of the Apostolical Creed, to ridicule the censures of Paris; and how these again were answered by Hallier, and Le Maistre, and Petrus Aurelius, who showed that these doctrines were maintained by the Jesuits: "That the episcopal order was not necessary to the being of a particular church; that episcopacy was not by Divine right; that confirmation might be given without bishops; that the monastical order was more perfect than the episcopal; and that regulars were exempt from the jurisdiction of bishops. And all that was done at Rome against these doctrines, was only to suppress the books on both sides; which the Parisian doctors highly complained of, that such scandalous and seditious books as those of the Jesuits should meet with the same favour at Rome, as the censure of the bishops of France; that their profane and atheistical censure of the Apostles' Creed must have no mark of disgrace put upon it, nor such sayings of theirs, wherein they call the bishops and divines of France by most contumelious names, and say they are the enemies of truth and piety." If our author had looked a little further into Bishop Stillingfleet, he might have found how barbarously they used Don Arnando Guerrero, bishop of the Philippine Islands, because he condemned them in a synod for acting independent of his jurisdiction; and the like usage of the bishop of Angelopolis in America, for the very same reason; and what horrible things are contained in their catechisms which they gave to their new converts in China, which the congregation de Propaganda Fide condemned in seventeen decrees at Rome, anno 1645. The short of their instructions was this: "To speak little of Christ crucified, but to conceal that small and inconsiderable circumstance of the Christian doctrine as much as may be; to use all the same customs that idolaters did, only directing all their worship to Christ and the saints; not to trouble themselves about fasting, penance, confession, and participation of the eucharist, or the severity of repentance and mortification." Are not these as pernicious errors as any that have appeared in these later ages, and were they not fit to be mentioned in an account of modern heterodoxies? Alphonsus de Vargas, a Spaniard, has four books under these titles against them: Relatio ad Principes Christianos de Stratagematis et Sophismis Politicis Societatis Jesu ad Monarchiam Orbis terrarum sibi conficiendam.—Sedis Apostolicæ Censura adversus Novam, Falsam, Impiam, et Hæreticam Societatis Jesu Doctrinam nuper in Hispania publicata.—Jesuitarum Fidei Symbolum velut Canticum novum.—Actio Hæresis in Societatem Jesu.

But our author has passed over many other modern heterodoxies worthy of a reader's information: such as the errors of Dr. John Dee and Kelley concerning conversation with angels, published by Meric Casaubon. Lond. 1659. The errors of Thomas Monetaurius and Christophorus Schaplerus; the Nicodemite, written against by Calvin; Nicholas Drabicius, a German enthusiast; James Brocard, an apocalyptic prophet censured in the protestant synod of Rochelle, 1581; Paul Grebner, a Swedish prophet; Joannes Franciscus Borri; Bernardinus Ochin, Theophilus Aletheus, and the book called Polygamia Triumphatrix, John Milton, Cornelius Vythagius, and other defenders of polygamy and divorces; Paionism, censured by Spanheim in his Elenchus; the errors of Gulielmus Postellus, Pere Simon, the Suenckfeldians, Vincentius Viviani, an Italian fatalist, Conradus Vorstius, and the Weigelians and Paracelsians, called the new prophets of Germany, an account of whose blasphemies may be found in Wendelin's Epistle Dedicatory to his Theology, and in Hoornbeck, Thummius, and Beckman, who have written particular books against them.

To these might have been added very properly an account of our late new prophets in England, who made such a stir not many years ago; and the Masonites, a little before them; together with the Rationals, Latitudinarians, Freethinkers; and Unionists, who pretend that the doctrine of papists and protestants rightly represented are in a manner all one: such were Father Davenport, otherwise called Sancta Clara, and Mr. de Meaux, bishop of Condom, and such other reconcilers and expositors of the faith. The errors also of Toland and Asgil, and the book called The Rights of the Christian Church, might justly enough have found a place in our author's Index. So might also several sects of fanatics in the late confusions between 1640 and 1660: the Vanists, or disciples of Sir Henry Vane; the new Bemenists, headed by Dr. Pordage; the followers of Dr. Gell, Parker, and Gibbon; Lewis du Moulin, the Levellers, and many others who are described in Edward's Gangræna, and Reliquiæ Baxterianæ, and other the like accounts of those times.

Our author, perhaps, will now begin to think himself a little short and deficient in his short account of all the principal heresies since the rise of Christianity; there being so many, both ancient and modern, of which he has given no account, nor so much as named or mentioned. If he says, it was needless; I say so too, with respect to the work he was about: but when he had undertaken it, he should have made good his pretence, and taken care that the book should have answered his title. But perhaps this could not have been done without writing a large volume upon the subject. Then he should have let it all alone, and his epitome would have been both the cheaper and the better for it. His indigent readers might have known what ancient heresies were from St. Austin de Hæresibus more authentically, and also at an easier rate; for it is but a sixpenny book printed by itself at Oxford; and for modern Gospels, and large annotations on the Old and New Testament: but these short expositions I have mentioned are much more needed; and that is enough to recommend the work to a pious undertaker.

The great objection against all these things is, that each of them is too great an undertaking for any single man. I remember to have heard of the same objection made by some against me and my Origines, upon publishing the first volume of them. I bless God, I have lived to confute the objection, and give the world a proof that great and laborious works are not always so frightful as sometimes they are imagined. I have given a little specimen of what the industry of a single person may do, in whom there is neither the greatest capacity nor the strongest constitution. And having made the experiment myself, I can with more decency and freedom recommend these things to others, who are qualified to undertake them. But in saying this, I would not encourage every bold empiric in divinity or history, to set about such works, which they are not any ways qualified for, either for want of knowledge or want of judgment. To all such the poet's direction is much more proper: Sumite materiam vestris, qui scribitis, æquam Viribus, et versate diu quid ferre recusent, Quid valeant humeri. The want of observing which rule does abundantly more harm than good. For such men's writings only serve to confound learning, and leave things in a much worse state than they found them. The world has daily experiment of this, to the prejudice both of good literature and religion. Therefore what I have said by way of encouragement is not to these, but to the truly judicious, the inquisitive, the modest, and the learned, who want nothing but courage proportionable to their understanding, to make them become great instruments of God's glory in doing useful things for the service of his church. This church has never wanted such brave spirits, and I hope never will, to set forth truth with all the advantages of learning, and confound the opposition that is made to it by all the enemies of religion, whether they be the more professed attackers, or the secret underminers of its foundation. The blessing of God be upon all those, who have ability and will to undertake great and useful works for the promotion of piety and religion, and to stand in the gap against all the enemies of truth.

CONTENTS.

BOOK I.

OF THE SEVERAL NAMES AND ORDERS OF MEN IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of those titles and appellations which Christians owned, and distinguished themselves by.

SECT. 1. Christians at first called Jesseans, Therapeute, Electi, &c.—2. Christ called by a technical name, ΙΧΘΥΣ; and Christians, Pisciculi, from that.—3. Christians, why called Gnostici by some authors.—4. Theophori, and Christophori.—5. Sometimes, but very rarely, Christi.—6. Christians great enemies to all party names and human appellations. Christian, the name they chiefly gloried in.—7. Of the name catholic, and its antiquity.—8. In what sense the name ecclesiastics given to all Christians.—9. The Christian religion called Δόγμα, and Christians οἱ τοῦ Δόγματος.—10. Christians called Jews by the heathen.—11. Christ commonly called Chrestus by the heathen; and Christians, Chrestians. 1

CHAPTER II.

Of those names of reproach, which Jews, infidels, and heretics cast upon the Christians.

SECT. 1. Christians commonly called Nazarens by Jews and heathens.—2. And Galileans.—3. And atheists.—4. Greeks and impostors.—5. Magicians.—6. The new superstition.—7. Sibyllists.—8. Biothanati.—9. Parabolarii, and Desperati.—10. Sarmentitii, and Semaxii.—11. Lucifugax natio.—12. Plantina prosapia.—13. Christians called Capitols, Synedrians, and Apostatics, by the Novatians.—14. Psychici, by the Montanists and Valentinians.—15. Allegorists, by the Millenarians.—16. Chronita, by the Aetians; Simplices, by the Manichees; Anthropolatra, by the Apollinarians.—17. Philosarca, and Pilosiota,* by the Origenians.—18. The synagogue of Satan and antichrist, by the Luciferians. 5

CHAPTER III.

Of the several orders of men in the Christian church.

SECT. 1. Three sorts of members of the Christian church, the ηγούμενοι, πιστοί, and κατηχούμενοι; rulers, believers, and catechumens.—2. The name believers strictly taken for the baptized laity, in opposition to the catechumens.—3. Catechumens owned as imperfect members of the church.—4. Heretics not reputed Christians.—5. Penitents and emergents ranked in the same class with catechumens. 9

CHAPTER IV.

A more particular account of the πιστοί, or believers, and their several titles of honour, and privileges above the catechumens.

SECT. 1. Believers otherwise called φωτιζόμενοι, the illuminate.—2. And οἱ μεμορημένοι, the initiated.—3. And τέλειοι, the perfect.—4. Chari Dei, ἄγιοι, &c.—5. The privileges of believers. First, To partake of the eucharist.—6. Secondly, To stay and join in all the prayers of the church.—7. Thirdly, Their sole prerogative to use the Lord's prayer. Whence that prayer was called εὐχή πιστῶν, the prayer of believers.—8. Fourthly, They were admitted to hear discourses upon the most profound mysteries of religion. All which privileges were denied to the catechumens. 11

CHAPTER V.

Of the distinction of believers from the rulers. Where, of the distinction observed in the names and offices of laity and clergy; and of the antiquity of these distinctions.

SECT. 1. Believers otherwise called laici, laymen, to distinguish them from the clergy.—2. The antiquity of this distinction in the names proved against Rigaltius, Salmasius, and Selden.—3. The objection from 1 Pet. v. 3, answered.—4. A distinction in the offices of laity and clergy always observed.—5. Laymen otherwise called βιωτικοί, seculars.—6. Also ιδιώται, private men.—7. What persons properly called clerici.—8. The name clerici sometimes appropriated to the inferior orders.—9. The reason of the name clerici.—10. All the clergy anciently called canonici; and the reason of it.—11. Also τάξις τοῦ βήματος, the order of the sanctuary. 13

* See a note on this word at the end of the Contents.

BOOK II.

OF THE SEVERAL SUPERIOR ORDERS OF THE CLERGY IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the original of bishops; and that they were a distinct order from presbyters in the primitive church.

SECT. 1. What the ancients mean by different orders of bishops and presbyters.—2. The order of bishops always owned to be superior to that of presbyters.—3. The order of bishops reckoned by all ancient writers to be of apostolical and Divine institution.—4. A list or catalogue of bishops ordained by the apostles. 17

CHAPTER II.

Of the several titles of honour given to bishops in the primitive church.

SECT. 1. All bishops at first called apostles.—2. After that, successors of the apostles.—3. Whence every bishop's see called sedes apostolica.—4. Bishops called princes of the people.—5. Præpositi, προεπιτάτες, πρόεδροι, ἑφόροι.—6. Principes sacerdotum, summi sacerdotes, pontifices maximi, &c.—7. Every bishop anciently called papa, father, or pope.—8. Pater patrum, and episcopus episcoporum, a title given to others beside the bishop of Rome.—9. Bishops sometimes called patriarchs.—10. All bishops styled vicars of Christ.—11. And angels of the churches. 21

CHAPTER III.

Of the offices of bishops, as distinct from presbyters.

SECT. 1. A threefold difference between bishops and presbyters, in the discharge of their office and function.—2. First, In the common offices that might be performed by both; the bishop acted by an independent power, but presbyters in dependence upon, and subordination to him.—3. This specified in the offices of baptism and the Lord's supper.—4. And in the office of preaching.—5. Secondly, Some offices never intrusted in the hands of presbyters; such as the office and power of ordination.—6. Instances of ordinations by presbyters disannulled by the church.—7. Some allegations to the contrary examined. Where, of the difference made between the ordinations of schismatical bishops, and those of mere presbyters.—8. A third difference between bishops and presbyters was, that presbyters were always accountable to their bishops, not bishops to their presbyters.—9. Yet bishops' power not arbitrary, but limited by canon in various respects. 25

CHAPTER IV.

Of the power of bishops over the laity, monks, subordinate magistrates, and all persons within their diocese; and of their office in disposing of the revenues of the church.

SECT. 1. No exemption from the jurisdiction of the bishop in the primitive church.—2. All monks subject to the bishop of the diocese where they lived.—3. As also all subordinate magistrates in matters of spiritual jurisdiction.—4. Of the distinction between temporal and spiritual jurisdiction. Bishops' power wholly confined to the latter.—5. The bishop's prerogative in granting the littera formata to all persons.—6. Of the bishop's power in disposing of the revenues of the church. 30

CHAPTER V.

Of the office of bishops, in relation to the whole catholic church.

SECT. 1. In what sense every bishop supposed to be bishop of the whole catholic church.—2. In what respect the whole world but one diocese, and but one bishopric in the church.—3. Some particular instances of private bishops acting as bishops of the whole universal church. 33

CHAPTER VI.

Of the independency of bishops; especially in the Cyprianic age, and in the African churches.

SECT. 1. What meant by the independency of bishops one of another, and their absolute power in their own church.—2. All bishops had liberty to form their own liturgies.—3. And to express the same catholic creed in different forms, as to what concerned method or expression.—4. And to appoint particular days of fasting in their own churches.—5. The independency of bishops most conspicuous in the African churches; proved by several instances out of Cyprian. 35

CHAPTER VII.

Of the power of bishops in hearing and determining secular causes.

SECT. 1. Bishops commonly chosen arbitrators of men's differences in the primitive church.—2. The original of this custom. Where, of the true meaning of those words in St. Paul, τοὺς ἐξεθενημένους ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, 1 Cor. vi. 4.—3. This power of bishops confirmed by the imperial laws.—4. Yet not allowed in capital or criminal causes; nor in any causes, but when the litigants both agreed to take them for arbitrators.—5. Bishops sometimes made their presbyters and deacons, and sometimes laymen, their substitutes in this affair. A conjecture about the original of lay chancellors. 37

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the privilege of bishops to intercede for criminals.

SECT. I. Several instances of bishops interceding for criminals to the secular magistrate.—2. The reasons why they interceded for some criminals, and not others.—3. That they never interceded in civil matters, and pecuniary cases. 39

CHAPTER IX.

Of some particular honours and instances of respect, shewed to bishops by all persons in general.

SECT. 1. Of the ancient custom of bowing the head, to receive the benediction of bishops.—2. Of kissing their hand.—3. The custom of singing hosannas to them sometimes used, but not approved.—4. What meant by the corona sacerdotalis, and the form of saluting bishops per coronam.—5. Whether bishops anciently wore a mitre?—6. Of the titles ἀγιώτατοι, beatissimi, &c., most holy and most blessed fathers, common to all bishops.—7. Bishops distinguished by their throne in the church. 40

CHAPTER X.

Of the age, and some other particular qualifications required in such as were to be ordained bishops.

SECT. 1. Bishops not to be ordained under thirty years of age, except they were men of extraordinary worth.—2. To be chosen out of the clergy of the same church, or diocese, to which they were to be ordained.—3. Some exceptions to this rule, in three special cases.—4. Bishops ordinarily to be such as had regularly gone through the inferior orders of the church.—5. This to be understood of the orders below that of deacon; for deacons were qualified to be ordained bishops, without being made presbyters.—6. In cases of necessity, bishops chosen out of the inferior orders.—7. And in some extraordinary cases, ordained immediately from laymen. The custom of going through all the orders of the church in five or six days' time, a novel practice never used in the primitive ages. 43

CHAPTER XI.

Of some particular laws and customs observed about the ordination of bishops.

SECT. 1. Bishoprics not to remain void above three months.—2. In some places, a new bishop was always chosen before the old was interred.—3. Some instances of longer vacancies, in times of difficulty and persecution.—4. Three bishops ordinarily required to a canonical ordination of a bishop.—5. Yet ordinations by one bishop allowed to be valid, though not canonical.—6. The bishop of Rome not privileged to ordain alone, any more than any other single bishop.—7. Every bishop to be ordained in his own church.—8. The ancient manner of ordaining bishops.—9. One of the forms of prayer used at their consecration.—10. Of their enthronement; their homilæ enthronisticae, and literæ enthronisticae, otherwise called synodicae, and communicatoriae. 46

CHAPTER XII.

Of the rule which prohibits bishops to be ordained in small cities.

SECT. 1. The reason of the law against placing bishops in small cities.—2. Some exceptions to this rule in Egypt, Libya, Cyprus, Arabia, and especially in the provinces of Asia Minor.—3. Reasons which engaged the ancients sometimes to erect bishoprics in small places. 51

CHAPTER XIII.

Of the rule which forbids two bishops to be ordained in one city.

SECT. 1. The general rule and practice of the church to have but one bishop in any city.—2. Yet two bishops sometimes allowed by compromise to end a dispute, or cure an inveterate schism. Where of the famous offer made by the catholic bishops to the Donatists in the collation of Carthage.—3. The opinions of learned men concerning two bishops in a city in the apostolical age, one of the Jews, and the other of the Gentiles.—4. The case of coadjutors. 52

CHAPTER XIV.

Of the chorepiscopi, περιουδευται, and suffragan bishops: and how these differed from one another.

SECT. 1. Of the reason of the name chorepiscopi, and the mistake of some about it.—2. Three different opinions about the nature of this order. The first opinion, that they were mere presbyters.—3. The second opinion, that some of them were presbyters, and some bishops.—4. The third opinion most probable, that they were all bishops.—5. Some objections against this answered.—6. Of the offices of the chorepiscopi. First, they were allowed to ordain the inferior clergy, subdeacons, readers, &c., but not presbyters or deacons, without special licence from the city bishop.—7. Secondly, they had power to minister confirmation.—8. Thirdly, power to grant letters dimissory to the country clergy.—9. Fourthly, they might officiate in the presence of the city bishop.—10. Fifthly, they might sit as bishops and vote in councils.—11. The power of the chorepiscopi not the same in all times and places.—12. Their power first struck at by the council of Laodicea, which set up περιουδευται, or visiting presbyters, in their room. Their power wholly taken away in the Western church in the ninth century.—13. Of the attempt made in England to restore this order under the name of suffragan bishops.—14. That suffragan bishops in the primitive church were not the chorepiscopi, but all the bishops in any province under a metropolitan.—15. Why the suffragan bishops of the Roman province were particularly called by the technical name, libra. 56

CHAPTER XV.

Of the intercessores and interventores in the African churches.

SECT. 1. The reason why some bishops were called by these names in the African church, and what their office was.—2. Their office not to last above one year.—3. No intercessor to be made bishop of the place where he was constituted intercessor. 59

CHAPTER XVI.

Of primates or metropolitans.

SECT. 1. The original of metropolitans, by some derived from apostolical constitution.—2. By others, from the age next after the apostles.—3. Confessed by all to have been long before the council of Nice.—4. Proofs of metropolitans in the second century.—5. By what names metropolitans were anciently called.—6. In Africa they were commonly called senes, because the oldest bishop of the province (excepting the province where Carthage stood) was always the metropolitan by virtue of his seniority.—7. How the African bishops might forfeit their title to the primacy, and lose their right of seniority.—8. A register of ordinations to be kept in the primate's church, and all bishops to take place by seniority, that there might be no disputes about the primacy.—9. Three sorts of honorary metropolitans beside the metropolitans in power. First, the primates ævo.—10. Secondly, titular metropolitans.—11. Thirdly, the bishops of some mother churches, which were honoured by ancient custom.—12. The offices of metropolitans. First, to ordain their suffragan bishops.—13. This power continued to them after the setting up of patriarchs in all places, except in the patriarchate of Alexandria.—14. The power of metropolitans not arbitrary in this respect, but to be concluded by the major vote of a provincial council.—15. Metropolitans themselves to be chosen and ordained by their own provincial synod, and not obliged to go to Rome for ordination.—16. The second office of metropolitans, to decide controversies arising among their provincial bishops, and to take appeals from them.—17. Their third office was to call provincial synods, which all their suffragans were obliged to attend.—18. Fourthly, they were to publish such imperial laws as concerned the church, together with the canons that were made in councils, and to see them executed; for which end they were to visit any dioceses, and correct abuses, as occasion required.—19. Fifthly, All bishops were obliged to have recourse to the metropolitan, and take his formate, or letters of commendation, whenever they travelled into a foreign country.—20. Sixthly, It belonged to metropolitans to take care of vacant sees within their province.—21. Lastly, They were to calculate the time of Easter, and give notice of it to the whole province.—22. How the power of metropolitans grew in after ages.—23. The metropolitan of Alexandria had the greatest power of any other in the world.—24. All metropolitans called apostolici, and their sees sedes apostolicæ. 60

CHAPTER XVII.

Of patriarchs.

SECT. 1. Patriarchs anciently called archbishops.—2. And exarchs of the diocese.—3. Salmasius's mistake about the first use of the name patriarch.—4. Of the Jewish patriarchs, their first rise, duration, and extinction.—5. Of the patriarchs among the Montanists.—6. The name patriarch first used in the proper sense by Socrates and the council of Chalcedon.—7. Four different opinions concerning the first rise of patriarchal power.—8. The opinion of Spalatensis and St. Jerom preferred. Some probable proofs of patriarchal power before the council of Nice, offered to consideration.—9. Patriarchal power confirmed in three general councils successively after the council of Nice.—10. The power of patriarchs not exactly the same in all churches. The patriarch of Constantinople had some peculiar privileges.—11. As also the patriarch of Alexandria had his; wherein they both exceeded the bishop of Rome.—12. The powers and privileges of patriarchs. First, they were to ordain all the metropolitans of the whole diocese, and to receive their own ordination from a diocesan synod.—13. Secondly, They were to call diocesan synods, and preside in them.—14. Thirdly, They might receive appeals from metropolitans and provincial synods.—15. Fourthly, They might censure metropolitans, and their suffragan bishops, if metropolitans were remiss in censuring them.—16. Fifthly, They had power to delegate metropolitans, as their commissioners, to hear ecclesiastical causes in any part of the diocese.—17. Sixthly, They were to be consulted by their metropolitans in all matters of moment. A remarkable instance in the Egyptian bishops.—18. Seventhly, They were to notify and communicate to their metropolitans such imperial laws as concerned the church, in like manner as the metropolitans were to notify to the provincial bishops.—19. Lastly, The absolution of greater criminals was reserved to them.—20. The number of patriarchs throughout the world reckoned to be about fourteen, answerable to the number of capital cities in the several dioceses of the Roman empire; all which at first were absolute and independent of one another, till Rome by usurpation, and Constantinople by law, got some of their neighbours to be subject to them.—21. The patriarch of Constantinople commonly dignified with the title of œcumenical, and his church called the head of all churches; and that he was equal in all respects to the bishop of Rome.—22. What figure the subordinate patriarchs of Ephesus and Cæsarea made in the church; and that they were not mere titular patriarchs, as some in after ages. 67

CHAPTER XVIII.

Of the αὐτοκέφαλοι, or independent bishops.

SECT. 1. All metropolitans anciently styled αὐτοκέφαλοι.—2. Some metropolitans independent after the setting up of patriarchal power, as those of Cyprus, Iberia, Armenia, and the Britannie church.—3. A third sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι, such bishops as were subject to no metropolitan, but only to the patriarch of the diocese. These in the Greek Notitias dignified with the title, though they had not the power of archbishops and metropolitans.—4. Valesius's mistake corrected. 74

CHAPTER XIX.

Of presbyters.

SECT. 1. The meaning of the name presbyter.—2. Apostles and bishops sometimes called presbyters.—3. The original of presbyters, as taken more strictly for the second order in the church.—4. The powers and privileges of presbyters.—5. Presbyters allowed to sit with the bishop on thrones in the church. Whence ὁ ἐκ τοῦ δευτέρου θρόνου, denotes a presbyter, one that sits on the second throne.—6. The form of their sitting in a semicircle, whence they were called, corona presbyterii.—7. Presbyters esteemed a sort of ecclesiastical senate, or council of the church, whom the bishop consulted and advised with upon all occasions.—8. Evidences of this prerogative, out of Ignatius, Cyprian, and others.—9. The power of presbyters thought by some to be a little restrained in the fourth century, and not so great in some places as in the second.—10. Yet still they were admitted to join with the bishop in the imposition of hands upon those that were ordained to their own order.—11. And allowed to sit in consistory with their bishops.—12. As also in provincial councils.—13. And in general councils likewise.—14. An account of the titles of honour given to presbyters, and how they differed from the same titles as applied to bishops.—15. In what sense bishops, presbyters, and deacons called priests.—16. Why priests called mediators between God and men.—17. The ancient form and manner of ordaining presbyters.—18. Of the archipresbyteri. That these were more ancient than the cardinales presbyteri, which some erroneously confound with them.—19. Of the seniores ecclesie. That these were not lay elders in the modern acceptation. 76

CHAPTER XX.

Of deacons.

SECT. 1. Deacons always reckoned one of the sacred orders of the church.—2. Yet not generally called priests, but ministers and Levites.—3. And for this reason the bishop was not tied to have the assistance of any presbyters to ordain them.—4. The first office of deacons, to take care of the vessels and utensils of the altar.—5. Secondly, To receive the oblations of the people, and present them to the priest, and recite publicly the names of those that offered.—6. Thirdly, To read the Gospel in some churches.—7. Fourthly, To minister the cup to the people.—8. But not to consecrate the elements at the altar.—9. Fifthly, Deacons allowed to baptize in some places by the bishop's authority.—10. Sixthly, Deacons to bid prayer in the congregation.—11. Seventhly, Allowed to preach upon some occasions.—12. Eighthly, And to reconcile penitents in cases of extreme necessity.—13. Ninthly, To attend their bishops in councils, and sometimes represent them as their proxies.—14. Tenthly, Deacons empowered to correct men that behaved themselves irregularly in the church.—15. Eleventhly, Deacons anciently performed the offices of all the inferior orders of the church.—16. Twelfthly, Deacons the bishop's sub-almoners.—17. Deacons to inform the bishop of the misdemeanors of the people.—18. Hence deacons commonly called the bishop's eyes and ears, his mouth, his angels and prophets.—19. Deacons to be multiplied according to the necessities of the church. The Roman church precise to the number of seven.—20. Of the age at which deacons might be ordained.—21. Of the respect which deacons paid to presbyters, and received from the inferior orders. 85

CHAPTER XXI.

Of archdeacons.

SECT. 1. Archdeacons anciently of the same order with deacons.—2. Elected by the bishop, and not made by seniority.—3. Commonly persons of such interest in the church, that they were often chosen the bishops' successors.—4. The archdeacon's offices: first, To assist the bishop at the altar, and order the other deacons and inferior clergy to their several stations and services in the church.—5. Secondly, To assist the bishop in managing the church's revenues.—6. Thirdly, To assist him in preaching.—7. Fourthly, In ordaining the inferior clergy.—8. Fifthly, The archdeacon had power to censure the other deacons, but not presbyters, much less the archpresbyter of the church, as some mistake.—9. What meant by the name apantita, and whether it denotes the archdeacon's power over the whole diocese.—10. Why the archdeacon called co-episcopi.—11. The opinions of learned men concerning the first institution of this office and dignity in the church. 94

CHAPTER XXII.

Of deaconesses.

SECT. 1. The ancient names of deaconesses, διάκονοι, πρεσβυτίδες, viduæ, ministrae.—2. Deaconesses by some laws required to be widows.—3. And such widows as had children.—4. To be sixty years of age.—5. And such as had been only the wives of one man.—6. Deaconesses always ordained by imposition of hands.—7. Yet not consecrated to any office of the priesthood.—8. Their offices: 1. To assist at the baptism of women.—9. 2. To be a sort of private catechists to the women-catechumens.—10. 3. To visit and attend women in sickness and distress.—11. 4. To minister to the martyrs in prison.—12. 5. To keep the women's gate in the church.—13. Lastly, To preside over the widows, &c.—14. How long this order continued both in the Eastern and Western church.—15. Another notion of the name diaconissa, in the middle ages of the church, in which it signifies a deacon's wife, as presbytera does a presbyter's wife, and episcopa a bishop's wife. The contrary errors of Gentilletus and Baronius about these corrected. 99

BOOK III.

OF THE INFERIOR ORDERS OF THE CLERGY IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the first original of the inferior orders, and the number and use of them: and how they differed from the superior orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons.

SECT. 1. The inferior orders not of apostolical, but only ecclesiastical institution, proved against Baronius and the council of Trent.—2. No certain number of them in the primitive church.—3. Not instituted in all churches at the same time.—4. The principal use of them in the primitive church, to be a sort of nursery for the hierarchy.—5. None of these allowed to forsake their service, and return to a mere secular life again.—6. How they differed from the superior orders in name, in office, and manner of ordination. 105

CHAPTER II.

Of subdeacons.

SECT. 1. No mention of subdeacons till the third century.—2. Their ordination performed without imposition of hands in the Latin church.—3. A brief account of their offices.—4. What offices they might not perform.—5. The singularity of the church of Rome in keeping to the precise number of seven subdeacons. 108

CHAPTER III.

Of acolythists.

SECT. 1. Acolythists, an order peculiar to the Latin church, and never mentioned by any Greek writer for four centuries.—2. Their ordination and office.—3. The origination of the name.—4. Whether acolythists be the same with the deputati and ceroferarii of later ages? 109

CHAPTER IV.

Of exorcists.

SECT. 1. Exorcists at first no peculiar order of the clergy.—2. Bishops and presbyters, for the three first centuries, the usual exorcists of the church.—3. In what sense every man his own exorcist.—4. Exorcists constituted into an order in the latter end of the third century.—5. Their ordination and office.—6. A short account of the energumens, their names, and station in the church.—7. The exorcists chiefly concerned in the care of them.—8. The duty of exorcists in reference to the catechumens. 110

CHAPTER V.

Of lectors or readers.

SECT. 1. The order of readers not instituted till the third century.—2. By whom the Scriptures were read in the church before the institution of that order.—3. The manner of ordaining readers.—4. Their station and office in the church.—5. The age at which they might be ordained 113

CHAPTER VI.

Of the ostiarii or door-keepers.

SECT. 1. No mention of this order till the third or fourth century.—2. The manner of their ordination in the Latin church.—3. Their office and function. 115

CHAPTER VII.

Of the psalmistæ or singers.

SECT. 1. The singers a distinct order from readers in the primitive church.—2. Their institution and office.—3. Why called ὑποβόλαις.—4. What sort of ordination they had. 116

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the copiatæ or fossarii.

SECT. 1. The copiatæ or fossarii reckoned among the clerici of the primitive church.—2. First instituted in the time of Constantine.—3. Why called decani and collegiati.—4. Their office and privileges. 117

CHAPTER IX.

Of the parabolani.

SECT. 1. The parabolani ranked by some among the clerici.—2. Their institution and office.—3. The reason of the name parabolani.—4. Some laws and rules relating to their behaviour. 118

CHAPTER X.

Of the catechists.

SECT. 1. Catechists no distinct order of the clergy, but chosen out of any other order.—2. Readers sometimes made catechists.—3. Why called ναυτολόγοι by some Greek writers.—4. Whether all catechists taught publicly in the church?—5. Of the succession in the catechetical school at Alexandria. 120

CHAPTER XI.

Of the defensores or syndics of the church.

SECT. 1. Five sorts of defensores noted, whereof two only belonged to the church.—2. Of the defensores pauperum.—3. Of the defensores ecclesiæ, their office and function.—4. Of their quality. Whether they were clergymen or laymen.—5. The ἐκδικοὶ and ἐκκλησιέκδικοὶ among the Greeks the same with the defen- sors of the Latin church.—6. Chancellors and defensors not the same in the primitive church.—7. Whether the defensor's office was the same with that of our modern chancellors? 122

CHAPTER XII.

Of the œconomi, or stewards and guardians of the church.

SECT. 1. The œconomi instituted in the fourth century. The reasons of their institution.—2. These always to be chosen out of the clergy.—3. Their office to take care of the revenues of the church, especially in the vacancy of the bishopric.—4. The consent of the clergy required in the choice of them. 125

CHAPTER XIII.

A brief account of some other inferior officers in the church.

SECT. 1. Of the παραμονάριοι or mansionarii.—2. Of the custodes ecclesiarum, and custodes locorum sanctorum: and how these differed from each other.—3. Of the scenophylaces or ceimeliarchæ.—4. Of the hermeneutæ or interpreters.—5. Of the notarii.—6. Of the apocrisarii or responsales. 126

BOOK IV.

OF THE ELECTIONS AND ORDINATIONS OF THE CLERGY, AND THE PARTICULAR QUALIFICATIONS OF SUCH AS WERE TO BE ORDAINED.

CHAPTER I.

Of the several ways of designing persons to the ministry, in the apostolical and primitive ages of the church.

SECT. 1. Four several ways of designing persons to the ministry. Of the first way, by casting lots.—2. The second way, by making choice of the first-fruits of the Gentile converts.—3. The third way, by particular direction of the Holy Ghost.—4. The fourth way, by common suffrage and election. 129

CHAPTER II.

A more particular account of the ancient manner and method of elections of the clergy.

SECT. 1. The different opinions of learned men concerning the people's power anciently in elections.—2. The power of the people equal to that of inferior clergy in the election of a bishop.—3. This power not barely testimonial, but elective.—4. Evidences of this power from some ancient rules and customs of the church. As, first, that no bishop was ordinarily to be ordained on an orthodox people without their consent.—5. Secondly, This further confirmed from examples of the bishops complying with the voice of the people against their own inclination.—6. Thirdly, From the manner of the people's voting at elections.—7. Fourthly, From the use and office of interventors.—8. Fifthly, From the custom of the people's taking persons and having them ordained by force.—9. Sixthly, From the title of fathers, which some bishops upon this account by way of compliment gave to their people.—10. What power the people had in the designation of presbyters.—11. Whether the council of Nice made any alteration in these matters.—12. Some exceptions to the general rule. First, In case the greatest part of the church were heretics or schismatics.—13. Secondly, In case of ordaining bishops to far distant churches, or barbarous nations.—14. Thirdly, In case an interventor or any other bishop intruded himself into any see without the consent of a provincial synod.—15. Fourthly, In case of factions and divisions among the people.—16. Fifthly, The emperors sometimes interposed their authority, to prevent tumults in the like cases.—17. Sixthly, The people sometimes restrained to the choice of one out of three, that were nominated by the bishops.—18. Lastly, By Justinian's laws, the power of electing was confined to the optimates, and the inferior people wholly excluded.—19. How and when princes and patrons came to have the chief power of elections. 132

CHAPTER III.

Of the examination and qualifications of persons to be ordained in the primitive church. And first, of their faith and morals.

SECT. 1. Three inquiries made about persons to be ordained, respecting, 1. Their faith and learning. 2. Their morals. 3. Their outward quality and condition in the world.—2. The rule and method of examining their faith and learning.—3. The irregular ordination of Synesius considered.—4. A strict inquiry made into the morals of such as were to be ordained.—5. For which reason no stranger to be ordained in a foreign church.—6. Nor any one who had done public penance in the church.—7. No murderer, nor adulterer, nor one that had lapsed in time of persecution.—8. No usurer or seditious person.—9. Nor one who had voluntarily dismembered his own body.—10. Men only accountable for crimes committed after baptism, as to what concerned their ordination.—11. Except any great irregularity happened in their baptism itself. As in clinic baptism.—12. And heretical baptism; both which unqualified men for ordination.—13. No man to be ordained who had not first made all his family catholic Christians.—14. What methods were anciently taken to prevent simoniacal promotions. 140

CHAPTER IV.

Of the qualifications of persons to be ordained, respecting their outward state and condition in the world.

SECT. 1. No soldier to be ordained presbyter or deacon.—2. Nor any slave or freed-man without the consent of his patron.—3. Nor any member of a civil society, or company of tradesmen, who were tied to the service of the commonwealth.—4. Nor any of the curiales or decuriones of the Roman government.—5. Nor any proctor or guardian, till his office was expired.—6. Pleaders at law denied ordination in the Roman church.—7. And enermungens, actors, and stage-players in all churches. 146

CHAPTER V.

Of the state of digamy and celibacy in particular: and of the laws of the church about these, in reference to the ancient clergy.

SECT. 1. No digamist to be ordained, by the rule of the apostle.—2. Three different opinions among the ancients about digamy. First, That all persons were to be refused orders as digamists, who were twice married after baptism.—3. Secondly, Others extended the rule to all persons twice married before baptism.—4. Thirdly, The most probable opinion of those, who thought the apostle by digamists meant polygamists, and such as married after divorce.—5. No vow of celibacy required of the clergy, as a condition of their ordination, for the three first ages.—6. The vanity of the contrary pretences.—7. The clergy left to their liberty by the Nicene council.—8. And other councils of that age. 149

CHAPTER VI.

Of the ordinations of the primitive clergy, and the laws and customs generally observed therein.

SECT. 1. The canons of the church to be read to the clerk, before the bishop ordained him. The reason of making this law.—2. No clerk to be ordained ἀπολελυμένος, without being fixed to some church.—3. Exceptions to this rule very rare.—4. No bishop to ordain another man's clerk without his consent.—5. No bishop to ordain in another man's diocese.—6. The original of the four solemn times of ordination.—7. Ordinations indifferently given on any day of the week for the three first centuries.—8. Usually performed in the time of the oblation at morning service.—9. The church the only regular place of ordination.—10. Ordinations received kneeling at the altar.—11. Given by imposition of hands and prayer.—12. The sign of the cross used in ordination.—13. But no unction, nor the ceremony of delivering vessels into the hands of presbyters and deacons.—14. Ordinations concluded with the kiss of peace.—15. The anniversary day of a bishop's ordination kept a festival. 153

CHAPTER VII.

The case of forced ordinations and re-ordinations considered.

SECT. 1. Forced ordinations very frequent in the primitive church.—2. No excuse admitted in that case, except a man protested upon oath that he would not be ordained.—3. This practice afterward prohibited by the imperial laws and canons of the church.—4. Yet a bishop ordained against his will had not the privilege to relinquish.—5. Re-ordinations generally condemned.—6. The proposal made by Cecilian, bishop of Carthage, to the Donatists, examined.—7. Schismatics sometimes re-ordained.—8. And heretics also upon their return to the church, in some places. 159

BOOK V.

OF THE PRIVILEGES, IMMUNITIES, AND REVENUES OF THE CLERGY IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Some instances of respect which the clergy paid mutually to one another.

SECT. 1. The clergy obliged to give entertainment to their brethren, travelling upon necessary occasions.—2. And to give them the honorary privilege of consecrating the eucharist in the church.—3. The use of the literæ formate, or commendatory letters, upon this occasion.—4. The clergy obliged to end all their own controversies among themselves.—5. What care was taken in receiving accusations against the bishops and clergy of the church. 163

CHAPTER II.

Instances of respect showed to the clergy by the civil government. Where particularly of their exemption from the cognizance of the secular courts in ecclesiastical causes.

SECT. 1. Bishops not to be called into any secular court to give their testimony.—2. Nor obliged to give their testimony upon oath, by the laws of Justinian.—3.

Whether the single evidence of one bishop was good in law against the testimony of many others.—4. Presbyters privileged against being questioned by torture, as other witnesses were.—5. The clergy exempt from the ordinary cognizance of the secular courts in all ecclesiastical causes.—6. This evidenced from the laws of Constantius.—7. And those of Valentinian and Gratian.—8. And Theodosius the Great.—9. And Arcadius and Honorius.—10. And Valentinian III. and Justinian.—11. The clergy also exempt in lesser criminal causes.—12. But not in greater criminal causes.—13. Nor in pecuniary causes with laymen.—14. Of the necessary distinction between the supreme and subordinate magistrates in this business of exemptions. 166

CHAPTER III.

Of the immunities of the clergy in reference to taxes, and civil offices, and other burdensome employments in the Roman empire.

SECT. 1. No Divine right pleaded by the ancient clergy to exempt themselves from taxes.—2. Yet generally excused from personal taxes, or head-money.—3. But not excused for their lands and possessions.—4. Of the tribute called aurum tyronicum, equi canonici, &c., and the clergy's exemption from it.—5. The church obliged to such burdens as lands were tied to before their donation.—6. Of the chrysargyrum or lustral tax, and the clergy's exemption from it.—7. Of the metatum. What meant thereby, and of the clergy's exemption from it.—8. Of the superindicta and extraordinaria. The clergy exempt from them.—9. The clergy sometimes exempt from contributing to the reparation of highways and bridges.—10. Also from the duty called angariae and parangariae, &c.—11. Of the tribute called denarismus, unciae, and descriptio lucrativorum: and the church's exemption from it.—12. The clergy exempt from all civil personal offices.—13. And from sordid offices both predial and personal.—14. Also from curial or municipal offices.—15. This last privilege confined to such of the clergy as had no estates but what belonged to the church, by the laws of Constantine.—16. Constantine's laws a little altered by the succeeding emperors in favour of the church. 171

CHAPTER IV.

Of the revenues of the ancient clergy.

SECT. 1. Several ways of providing a fund for the maintenance of the clergy. First, By oblations; some of which were weekly.—2. And others monthly.—3. Whence came the custom of a monthly division among the clergy.—4. Secondly, Other revenues arising from the lands and possessions of the church.—5. These very much augmented by the laws of Constantine.—6. Whose laws were confirmed, and not revoked, by the succeeding emperors, as some mistake.—7. Thirdly, Another part of church revenues raised by allowances out of the emperor's exchequer.—8. Fourthly, The estates of martyrs and confessors, dying without heirs, settled upon the church by Constantine.—9. Fifthly,

The estates of clergymen dying without heirs and will, settled in like manner.—10. Sixthly, Heathen temples and their revenues sometimes given to the church.—11. As also, seventhly, Heretical conventicles and their revenues.—12. Lastly, The estates of clerks deserting the church to be forfeited to the church.—13. No disreputable ways of augmenting church revenues encouraged. Fathers not to disinherit their children, to make the church their heirs.—14. Nothing to be demanded for administering the sacraments of the church, nor for confirmation, nor for consecrating of churches, nor for interment of the dead.—15. The oblations of the people anciently esteemed one of the most valuable parts of church revenues. 182

CHAPTER V.

Of tithes and first-fruits in particular.

SECT. 1. Tithes anciently reckoned to be due by Divine right.—2. Why not exacted, then, in the apostolical age and those that followed.—3. In what age they were first generally settled upon the church.—4. The original of first-fruits, and manner of offering them. 189

CHAPTER VI.

Of the management and distribution of the revenues of the ancient clergy.

SECT. 1. The revenues of the whole diocese anciently in the hands of the bishop.—2. And by his care distributed among the clergy.—3. Rules about the division of church revenues.—4. In some churches the clergy lived all in common.—5. Alterations made in these matters by the endowment of parochial churches.—6. No alienations to be made of the goods or revenues of the church but upon extraordinary occasions.—7. And that by the joint consent of the bishop and his clergy, with the approbation of the metropolitan or some provincial bishops. 191

BOOK VI.

AN ACCOUNT OF SEVERAL LAWS AND RULES, RELATING TO THE EMPLOYMENT, LIFE, AND CONVERSATION OF THE PRIMITIVE CLERGY.

CHAPTER I.

Of the excellency of these rules in general, and the exemplariness of the clergy in conforming to them.

SECT. 1. The excellency of the Christian rules attested and envied by the heathens.—2. The character of the clergy, from Christian writers.—3. Particular exceptions no derogation to their general good character.—4. An account of some ancient writers, which treat of the duties of the clergy. 195

CHAPTER II.

Of the laws relating to the life and conversation of the primitive clergy.

SECT. 1. Exemplary purity required in the clergy above other men. Reasons for it.—2. Church censures more severe against them than any others.—3. What crimes punished with degradation, viz. theft, murder, perjury, fraud, sacrilege, fornication, and adultery.—4. Also lapsing in time of persecution.—5. And drinking and gaming.—6. And negotiating upon usury. The nature of this crime inquired into.—7. Of the hospitality of the clergy.—8. Of their frugality, and contempt of the world.—9. Whether the clergy were anciently obliged by any law to part with their temporal possessions.—10. Of their great care to be inoffensive with their tongues.—11. Of their care to guard against suspicion of evil.—12. Laws relating to this matter.—13. An account of the agapete and συμβισακτοι, and the laws of the church made against them.—14. Malevolent and unavoidable suspicions to be contemned. . . 197

CHAPTER III.

Of laws more particularly relating to the exercise of the duties and offices of their function.

SECT. 1. The clergy obliged to lead a studious life.—2. No pleas allowed as just apologies for the contrary.—3. Their chief studies to be the Holy Scriptures, and the approved writers and canons of the church.—4. How far the study of heathen or heretical books allowed.—5. Of their piety and devotion in their public addresses to God.—6. The censure of such as neglected the daily service of the church.—7. Their rules about preaching to edification.—8. Of their fidelity, diligence, and prudence in their private addresses and applications.—9. Of their prudence and candour in composing unnecessary controversies in the church.—10. Of their zeal and courage in defending the truth.—11. Of their obligations to maintain the unity of the church; and of the censure of such as fell into heresy or schism. 208

CHAPTER IV.

An account of some other laws and rules, which were a sort of out-guards and fences to the former.

SECT. 1. No clergyman allowed to desert or relinquish his station without just grounds and leave.—2. Yet in some cases a resignation was allowed of.—3. And canonical pensions sometimes granted upon such occasions.—4. No clergyman to remove from one diocese to another without the consent and letters dimissory of his own bishop.—5. Laws against the βακάρριβοι, or wandering clergy.—6. Laws against the translations of bishops from one see to another, how to be limited and understood.—7. Laws concerning the residence of the clergy.—8. Of pluralities, and the laws made about them.—9. Laws prohibiting the clergy to take upon them secular business and civil offices.—10. Laws prohibiting the clergy to be tutors and guardians, how far extended.—11. Laws against their being sureties, and pleading causes at the bar in behalf of themselves or their churches.—12. Laws against their following secular trades and merchandise.—13. What limitations and exceptions these laws admitted of.—14. Laws respecting their outward conversation.—15. Laws relating to their habit.—16. The tonsure of the ancients very different from that of the Romish church.—17. Of the corona clericalis, and why the clergy called coronati.—18. Whether the clergy were distinguished in their apparel from laymen.—19. A particular account of the birrus and pallium.—20. Of the collobium, dalmatica, caracalla, hemphorium, and linea. 219

CHAPTER V.

Some reflections on the foregoing discourse, concluding with an address to the clergy of the present church.

SECT. 1. Reflect. 1. All laws and rules of the ancient church not necessary to be observed by the present church and clergy.—2. Reflect. 2. Some ancient rules would be of excellent use, if revived by just authority.—3. Reflect. 3. Some ancient laws may be complied with, though not laws of the present church.—4. Reflect. 4. Of the influence of great examples, and laws of perpetual obligation.—5. Some particular rules recommended to observation: first, Relating to the ancient method of training up persons for the ministry.—6. Secondly, Their rules for examining the qualifications of candidates for the ministry.—7. Thirdly, Their rules about private address, and the exercise of private discipline.—8. Lastly, Their rules for exercising public discipline upon delinquent clergymen, who were convict of scandalous offences.—9. Julian's design to reform the heathen priests by the rules of the primitive clergy, an argument to provoke our zeal in the present age.—10. The conclusion, by way of address to the clergy of the present church. 232

BOOK VII.

OF THE ASCETICS IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the difference between the first ascetics and monks; and of the first original of the monastic life.

SECT. 1. Ascetics always in the church; monks not so.—2. This difference acknowledged by some ingenious writers in the Romish church.—3. What the primitive ascetics were.—4. When the monastic life first began.—5. In what the ancient ascetics differ from monks.—6. What other names they were called by. 239

CHAPTER II.

Of the several sorts of monks, and their different ways of living in the church.

SECT. 1. Several sorts of monks distinguished by their different ways of living.—2. Some called Ἀναχωρηταί, Anchorets.—3. Others, Cœnobites or Synodites.—4. Others, Sarabaitæ and Remboth.—5. A fourth sort, Stylite, or Pillarists.—6. Of secular monks.—7. All monks originally no more than laymen.—8. In what cases the clerical and monastic life might be conjoined together.—9. The original of canons regular.—10. Of the monks called Acœmeta, or Watchers.—11. Of those called Βοσκοί, or Grazers.—12. Of the Benedictines and Gyronagi in Italy.—13. Of the Apostolics in Britain and Ireland.—14. Of some uncommon names of monks in the ancient church, Hesychasta, Continentes, Silentiarii, Renunciantes, Philothei, Therapeutæ, Celulani, and such like. 242

CHAPTER III.

An account of such ancient laws and rules, as relate to the monastic life, and chiefly that of the Cœnobites.

SECT. 1. The curiales not allowed to turn monks.—2. Nor servants without their master's consent.—3. Nor husbands and wives without mutual consent of each other.—4. Nor children without the consent of their parents.—5. Children, though offered by their parents, not to be retained against their own consent.—6. Of the tonsure and habit of monks.—7. No solemn vow or profession required of them.—8. What meant by their renunciation of the world.—9. Of the difference between the renunciative and the communicative life.—10. All monks anciently maintained by their own labour.—11. Proper officers appointed in monasteries for this purpose, viz. decani, centenarii, patres, &c.—12. The power of the abbots or fathers very great in point of discipline over the rest.—13. Allowed also some peculiar privileges in the church.—14. Yet always subordinate to the power of bishops.—15. The spiritual exercises of monks: first, Perpetual repentance.—16. Secondly, Extraordinary fasting.—17. Thirdly, Extraordinary devotions.—18. Of laws excluding monks from offices both ecclesiastical and civil.—19. No monks anciently encroaching on the duties or rights of the secular clergy.—20. Not allowed at first to dwell in cities, but confined to the wilderness.—21. What exceptions that rule admitted of.—22. Whether monks might betake themselves to a secular life again?—23. Marriage of monks anciently not annulled.—24. What punishments ordinarily inflicted on deserters. 249

CHAPTER IV.

The case and state of virgins and widows in the ancient church.

SECT. 1. Of the distinction between ecclesiastical and monastical virgins.—2. Whether they were under any profession of perpetual virginity.—3. When first made liable to the censures of the church for marrying against their profession.—4. The marriage of professed virgins never declared null.—5. Liberty granted by some laws to marry, if they were consecrated before the age of forty.—6. Of their habit, and form, and manner of consecration.—7. Of some privileges bestowed on them by the imperial laws and custom of the church.—8. Of the name ovis, and nonna, and its signification.—9. Some particular observations relating to the widows of the church. 264

BOOK VIII.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE ANCIENT CHURCHES, THEIR ORIGINAL, NAMES, PARTS, UTENSILS, CONSECRATIONS, IMMUNITIES, &c.

CHAPTER I.

Of the several names and first original of churches among Christians.

SECT. 1. Of the names ecclesia and ἐκκλησιαστήριον, and the difference between them.—2. Of the names dominicium, whence comes dohm; and κυριακόν, whence kirk and church; and domus columbe.—3. Of the distinction between domus Dei, domus Divina, and domus ecclesie.—4. Churches called oratories and houses of prayer.—5. Why called basilicæ and ἀνάκτορα.—6. When first called temples.—7. Sometimes called synodi, concilia, conciabula, and conventicula.—8. Why some churches called martyria, memorie, apostolæa, and propheteia.—9. Why called cæmeteria, mensæ, and aræ.—10. Why casæ, trophæa, and tituli.—11. Of tabernacles and minsters, and some other less usual names of churches.—12. Of the distinction between ecclesia matrix and diocesana.—13. Proofs of churches in the first century, collected by Mr. Mede.—14. Proofs in the second century.—15. Proofs in the third century.—16. The objection from Arnobius and Lactantius answered.—17. Some additional collections on this head, out of Lactantius de Mortibus Persecutorum, and others. 269

CHAPTER II.

Of the difference between churches in the first ages and those that followed; and of heathen temples and Jewish synagogues turned into Christian churches.

SECT. 1. The first churches very simple and plain.—2. Reasons for altering the state of ecclesiastical structures.—3. The munificence particularly of Christian emperors contributed much toward this.—4. As also their orders for converting heathen temples and public halls into churches. 282

CHAPTER III.

Of the different forms and parts of the ancient churches; and first, of the exterior narthex, or outward ante-temple.

SECT. 1. Churches anciently of different forms.—2. And different situation from one another.—3. Commonly divided into three parts, and sometimes four or five in a large acception.—4. Each of these subdivided into other parts. The exterior narthex, or ante-temple, included, first, The πρόστυλον, or vestibulum magnum, the high porch.—5. Secondly, The μεσούλιον, atrium or aræa, the court before the church surrounded with porticos or cloisters.—6. Thirdly, The cantharus or phiale, the fountain in the middle of this court, for washing as they went into the church.—7. Whether the superstitious use of holy water be not a corruption of this ancient custom.—8. The atrium and porticos in the ante-temple made use of for burying the dead, before they were admitted into churches. 285

CHAPTER IV.

Of the interior narthex, and the parts and uses of it.

SECT. 1. Of the lesser πρόστυλα, or porches before the doors of the church.—2. Of the narthex, pronaos, or ferula.—3. The use of it for the catechumens, energumens, and penitents of the second order.—4. Also for Jews, heathens, heretics, and schismatics to hear in.—5. This not the place of the font or baptistry, as in our modern churches.—6. Why it was called narthex, and of the different sorts of nartheces in several churches. 290

CHAPTER V.

Of the naos, or nave and body of the church, and its parts and uses.

SECT. 1. Of the beautiful and royal gates: why so called.—2. The nave of the church usually a square building, called by some the oratory of laymen.—3. In the lowest part of this stood the substrati, or penitents of the third order.—4. And the ambo, or reading desk.—5. Above these the fideles, or communicants, and the fourth order of penitents, called consistentes, had their places.—6. The places of men and women usually separate from each other.—7. Why the places of the women called κατηχόμενα and ὑπερώα.—8. Private cells for meditation, reading, and prayer on the back of these.—9. The place of the virgins and widows distinguished from others.—10. The solea or σωλείον, the magistrate's throne in this part of the church. What meant by the senatorium in some modern churches. 292

CHAPTER VI.

Of the bema, or third part of the temple, called the altar part, or sanctuary, and the parts and uses of it.

SECT. 1. The chancel, anciently called bema, or tribunal.—2. Also ἄγιον, ιερατεῖον, and sacrarium, the holy, or the sanctuary.—3. And θυσιαστήριον, the altar part.—4. And presbyterium and diaconum.—5. Also chorus, or quire.—6. This place separated from the rest by rails, called cancelli, whence comes chancel.—7. And kept inaccessible to the multitude, whence called adyta.

—8. The holy gates, and veils or hangings dividing the chancel from the rest of the church.—9. The upper end of the chancel called apsis, exedra, and conchula bematis. The reason of these names.—10. This anciently the place of the thrones of the bishops and presbyters.—11. And of the altar, or communion table, encompassed with the thrones in a semicircle.—12. The names altar and table indifferently used in the primitive church.—13. In what sense the ancients say, they had no altars.—14. Of the names, holy table, mystical table, &c.—15. Altars generally made of wood till the time of Constantine.—16. But one altar anciently in a church.—17. And sometimes but one in a city, though several churches, according to some authors.—18. Of the ciborium, or canopy of the altar.—19. Of the first use of the peristerion, or silver doves over the altar.—20. When first the figure of the cross set upon the altar.—21. Of the coverings and vessels of the altar. The first original of lamps and tapers burning by day at the altar. The original of incense and censers. The altare portatile and antimensia, modern inventions of later ages. The ῥηπίδια, or flabella, as old as the author of the Constitutions.—22. Of the oblationarium, paratorium, or prothesis.—23. Of the sceuphylacium, or diaconicum bematis. . . . 296

CHAPTER VII.

Of the baptisteries, and other outer buildings, called the exedra of the church.

SECT. 1. Baptisteries anciently buildings distinct from the church.—2. These very capacious, and the reasons of it.—3. Why called φωτιστήρια, places of illumination.—4. Of the difference between a baptistery and a font. And why the font called piscina and κολυμβήθρα.—5. How fonts and baptisteries anciently adorned.—6. Baptisteries anciently more peculiar to the mother church.—7. Of the secretarium, or diaconicum magnum, the vestry of the church.—8. Why this otherwise called receptorium and salutatorium, the greeting-house.—9. Of the decanica, or prisons of the church.—10. Of the mitatorium, or mesatorium.—11. Of the gazophylacium and pastophoria.—12. Of the schools and libraries of the church.—13. In what sense dwelling-houses, gardens, and baths, reckoned to be parts of the church.—14. Of the original of organs, and when they first came to be used in the church.—15. Of the original of bells, and how church assemblies were called before their invention. . . . 308

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the donaria and anathemata, and other ornaments of the ancient churches.

SECT. 1. What the ancients meant by their anathemata in churches.—2. Why one particular kind of these called εκτυπώματα, and when brought first into churches.—3. Churches anciently adorned with portions of Scripture written upon the walls.—4. And with other inscriptions of human composition.—5. Gilding and Mosaic work used in the ancient churches.—6. No pictures or images allowed in churches for the first 300 years.—7. First brought in by Paulinus and his contemporaries, privately and by degrees, in the latter end of the fourth century.—8. The pictures of kings and bishops brought into the church about the same time.—9. But neither the pictures of the living nor the dead designed for worship.—10. No images of God, or the Trinity, allowed in churches till after the second Nicene council.—11. Nor usually statues or massy images, but only paintings and pictures, and those rather symbolical, than any other.—12. Of adorning the churches with flowers and branches. . . . 317

CHAPTER IX.

Of the consecration of churches.

SECT. 1. What the ancients meant by consecration of churches.—2. The first authentic accounts of this to be fetched from the fourth century.—3. The bishop of every diocese the ordinary minister of these consecrations.—4. No church to be built without the bishop's leave.—5. Nor till the bishop had first made a solemn prayer, and fixed the sign of the cross in the place where it was to be built, by the laws of Justinian.—6. No bishop to consecrate a church in another man's diocese, except necessity required it.—7. No necessity of a licence from the bishop of Rome in former ages, for a bishop to consecrate churches in his own diocese.—8. Churches always dedicated to God, and not to saints, though sometimes distinguished by their names for a memorial of them.—9. Churches sometimes named from their founders, or other circumstances in their building.—10. When altars first began to have a particular consecration with new ceremonies distinct from churches.—11. No church to be built or consecrated before it was endowed.—12. Yet bishops not to demand any thing for consecration.—13. Consecrations performed indifferently upon any day.—14. The day of consecration usually celebrated among their anniversary festivals. . . . 324

CHAPTER X.

Of the respect and reverence which the primitive Christians paid to their churches.

SECT. 1. Churches never put to any profane use, but only sacred and religious service.—2. The like caution observed about the sacred vessels and utensils of the church.—3. What difference made between churches and private houses.—4. How some chose rather to die than deliver up churches to be profaned by heretics.—5. The ceremony of washing their hands when they went into the church.—6. The ceremony of putting off their shoes, used by some, but this no general custom.—7. Whether the ancients used the ceremony of bowing toward the altar at their entrance into the church.—8. Kings laid aside their crowns, and arms, and guards, when they went into the house of the King of kings.—9. The doors and pillars of the church and altar often kissed and embraced in token of love and respect to them.—10. Churches used for private meditation and prayer, as well as public.—11. Their public behaviour in the church expressive of great reverence.—12. Churches the safest repository for things of any value, and the securest retreat for men in times of great distress. . . . 330

CHAPTER XI.

Of the first original of asylums, or places of sanctuary and refuge, with the laws relating to them, in Christian churches.

SECT. 1. The original of this privilege to be deduced from the time of Constantine, but not from his laws.—2. At first only the altar and inner fabric of the church the place of refuge; but afterwards any outer buildings or precincts of the church invested with the same privilege.—3. What persons allowed to take sanctuary.—4. What persons and criminals denied this privilege. First, Public debtors.—5. Secondly, Jews that pretended to turn Christians only to avoid paying their debts, or suffering legal punishment for their crimes.—6. Thirdly, Heretics and apostates.—7. Fourthly, Slaves that fled from their masters.—8. Fifthly, Robbers, murderers, conspirators, ravishers of virgins, adulterers, and other criminals of the like nature.—9. A just reflection upon the great abuse of modern sanctuaries, in exempting men from legal punishment, and enervating the force of civil laws.—10. Conditions anciently to be observed by such as fled for sanctuary to the church, otherwise they were not to have the benefit of it. First, No one to fly with arms into the church.—11. Secondly, No one to raise a seditious clamour or tumult as he fled thither.—12. Thirdly, No one to eat or sleep in the church, because of the sacredness of the place, but to have his entertainment in some outward building. 335

BOOK IX.

A GEOGRAPHICAL DESCRIPTION OF THE DISTRICTS OF THE ANCIENT CHURCH, OR AN ACCOUNT OF ITS DIVISION INTO PROVINCES, DIOCESES, AND PARISHES: AND OF THE FIRST ORIGINAL OF THESE.

CHAPTER I.

Of the state and division of the Roman empire, and of the church's conformity to that in modelling her own external polity and government.

SECT. 1. The state of the Roman empire in the days of the apostles.—2. The state of the church made conformable to it.—3. The division of the Roman empire into provinces and dioceses.—4. The same model followed by the church.—5. This evidenced by the civil Notitia of the empire.—6. Compared with the most ancient accounts of the division of provinces in the church.—7. This evidenced further from the rules and canons of the church.—8. Yet the church not tied precisely to use this model, but used her liberty sometimes in varying from it.—9. An account of the ecclesie suburbicarie in the districts of the Roman church.—10. This most probably the true ancient limits of the bishop of Rome's both metropolitane and patriarchal jurisdiction.—11. Some evident proofs of this, showing the churches of Milan, Africa, Spain, France, and Britain, to be independent of the pope's patriarchal power.—12. The contrary exceptions of Schelstrate, relating particularly to the Britannie church, examined and refuted. 341

CHAPTER II.

A more particular account of the number, nature, and extent of dioceses, or episcopal churches, in Africa, Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, Syria, Phœnicia, and other eastern provinces.

SECT. 1. Dioceses anciently called παροικίαι, parœchie.—2. When the name diocese began first to be used.—3. What meant by the προάστεια, or suburbs of a city, which were reckoned part of the city diocese.—4. Dioceses not generally so large in nations of the first ages conversion, as in those converted in the middle ages of the church.—5. A particular account of the extent of dioceses in the African provinces.—6. Of the dioceses of Libya, Pentapolis, and Ægyptus.—7. Of the dioceses of Arabia. And why these more frequently in villages than in other places.—8. Of the dioceses in Palestine, or the patriarchate of Jerusalem.—9. A catalogue of the provinces and dioceses under the patriarch of Antioch.—10. Observations on the dioceses of Cyprus.—11. Of the dioceses of Syria Prima and Secunda.—12. Of the province of Phœnicia Prima and Secunda.—13. Of the province of Theodorias.—14. Of Euphratesia or Comagene.—15. Of Osrhoena and Mesopotamia, or Armenia Quarta.—16. Of Armenia Persica, otherwise called Magna.—17. Of Assyria, Adiabene, and Chaldæa.—18. Of the Immerini in Persia, and the Homerite in Arabia Felix.—19. Of bishops among the Saracens in Arabia.—20. Of bishops of the Axumites, or Indians beyond Egypt. No particular account of dioceses in Iberia, Parthia, or India Orientalis, to be had out of the monuments of the ancient church. 352

CHAPTER III.

A continuation of this account of dioceses in the provinces of Asia Minor.

SECT. 1. Of the extent of Asia Minor, and the number of dioceses contained therein.—2. Of Cappadocia and Armenia Minor.—3. Of Pontus Polemoniæ.—4. Of Helenopontus.—5. Of Paphlagonia and Galatia.—6. Of Honorias.—7. Of Bithynia.—8. Of Hellespontus.—9. Of Asia and Lydia Proconsularis.—10. Of Caria.—11. Of Lycia.—12. Of Pamphylia Prima and Secunda.—13. Of Lycaonia.—14. Of Pisidia.—15. Of Phrygia Pacatiana and Salutaris.—16. Of Isauria and Cilicia.—17. Of Lazica, or Colchis.—18. Of the isle of Lesbos and the Cyclades 371

CHAPTER IV.

A continuation of the former account in the European provinces of Thracia, Macedonia, Greece, Illyricum, &c.

SECT. 1. Of the six provinces of Thrace. First, of Scythia.—2. Of Europa. Where particularly of the diocese of Constantinople in this province.—3. Of Thracia, properly so called.—4. Of Hæmimontis.—5. Of Rhodope.—6. Of Mœsia Secunda.—7. Of the seven provinces of Macedonia and Greece. Of Macedonia Prima and Secunda.—8. Of Thessalia.—9. Of Achaia, or Attica, Peloponnesus, and the isle of Eubœa.—10. Of Epirus Vetus and Epirus Nova.—11. Of the isle of Crete.—12. Of the five provinces in the diocese of Dacia. Of Prevalitana.—13. Of Mœsia Superior.—14. Of Dacia Mediterranea and Dacia Ripensis.—15. Of Dardania and Gothia.—16. Of the six provinces in the diocese of Illyricum Occidentale. Of Dalmatia.—17. Of Savia.—18. Of Pannonia Superior and Inferior.—19. Of Noricum Mediterraneum and Noricum Ripense 380

CHAPTER V.

A particular account of the seventeen provinces of the Roman and Italic dioceses, and of the episcopal dioceses contained in them.

SECT. 1. Of the extent of the diocese of the bishop of Rome.—2. Of dioceses in Tusciana and Umbria.—3. Of the province of Valeria.—4. Of Picenum Suburbicarium.—5. Of Latium and Campania.—6. Of Samnium.—7. Of Apulia and Calabria.—8. Of Lucania and Brutia.—9. Of the isles of Sicily, Melita, and Lipara.—10. Of Sardinia and Corsica.—11. Of Picenum Annonarium and Flaminia.—12. Of Æmylia.—13. Of Alpes Cottiae.—14. Of Liguria.—15. Of Rhetia Prima and Secunda.—16. Of Venetia and Histria. 385

CHAPTER VI.

Of the dioceses in France, Spain, and the British isles.

SECT. 1. Of the ancient bounds and division of Gallia into seventeen provinces. Of Gallia and Septem Provinciæ.—2. Of the dioceses in the province of Alpes Maritimæ.—3. Of Alpes Graiæ, or Pennina.—4. Of Viennensis Prima and Secunda.—5. Of Narbonensis Prima and Secunda.—6. Of Novempopulania.—7. Of Aquitania Prima and Secunda.—8. Of Lugdunensis Prima, Secunda, Tertia, Quarta, and Maxima Sequanorum.—9. Of Belgica Prima and Secunda.—10. Of Germanica Prima and Secunda.—11. The ancient division of the Spanish provinces.—12. Of Tarraconensis.—13. Of Carthaginensis.—14. Of Bœtica.—15. Of Lusitania.—16. Of Gallecia.—17. Of the islands of Majorica, Minorica, &c.—18. The state of the Spanish church evidenced from some of her most ancient councils.—19. Of Ireland and Scotland.—20. Of the British church in England and Wales.—21. This whole account confirmed from some ancient canons of the church.—22. And from the bishop's obligation to visit their dioceses once a year, and confirm children in the country region. 396

CHAPTER VII.

The Notitia, or geographical description of the bishoprics of the ancient church, as first made by the order of Leo Sapiens in the ninth century, compared with some others. 408

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the division of the dioceses into parishes, and the first original of them.

SECT. 1. Of the ancient names of parish churches, parochiæ, dioceses, ecclesiæ diocesanae, tituli, &c.—2. The original of parish churches owing to necessity, and founded upon the apostolical rules of Christian communion.—3. Some of them probably as ancient as the times of the apostles, in the greater cities of the Roman empire.—4. Lesser cities had country parishes even in times of persecution. The original of country parishes in England.—5. The city parishes not always assigned to particular presbyters, but served in common by the clergy of the bishop's church. This otherwise in country parishes which had fixed presbyters from their first institution.—6. Settled revenues not immediately fixed upon parishes at their first division, but paid into the common stock of the bishop's church. When first appropriated revenues began to be settled upon parish churches in the East, in Spain, France, Germany, and the English church. 416

THE CONCLUSION.

Wherein is proposed an easy and honourable method for establishing a primitive diocesan episcopacy, conformable to the model of the smaller sort of ancient dioceses, in all the protestant churches. . . . 420

APPENDIX. 422

BOOK X.

OF THE INSTITUTION OF THE CATECHUMENS, AND THE FIRST USE OF THE CREEDS IN THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the several names of the catechumens, and the solemnity that was used in admitting them to that state in the church. Also of catechising, and the time of their continuance in that exercise.

SECT. 1. The reason of the names, κατηχούμενοι, novitii, tyrones, &c.—2. Imposition of hands and prayer used in the first admission of catechumens.—3. And consignation with the sign of the cross.—4. At what age persons were admitted to be catechumens.—5. How long they continued in that state.—6. The substance of the ancient catechisms, and method of instruction.—7. The catechumens allowed to read the Scriptures. 439

CHAPTER II.

Of the several classes or degrees of catechumens, and the gradual exercises and discipline of every order.

SECT. 1. Four orders or degrees of catechumens among the ancients.—2. First, The ἐξωθούμενοι, or catechumens privately instructed without the church.—3. Secondly, The ἀκροούμενοι, audientes, or hearers.—4. Thirdly, The γόνυ-κλίνοντες, or genu-flectentes and substrati, the kneelers.—5. Fourthly, the competentes or electi, the immediate candidates of baptism.—6. How this last order were particularly disciplined and prepared for baptism.—7. Partly by frequent examinations, from which such as approved themselves had the name of electi, the chosen.—8. Partly by exorcism, accompanied with imposition of hands and the sign of the cross, and insufflation.—9. Partly by the exercises of fasting and abstinence, and confession and repentance, &c.—10. Partly by learning the words of the creed and Lord's prayer.—11. And the form of renunciation of the devil, and covenanting with Christ, with other responses relating to their baptism.—12. What meant by the competentes going veiled before baptism.—13. Of the ceremony called Ephphata, or opening of the ears of the catechumens.—14. Of putting clay upon their eyes. What meant by it.—15. Whether the catechumens held a lighted taper in their hands in the time of exorcism.—16. What meant by the sacrament of the catechumens.—17. How the catechumens were punished, if they fell into gross sins.—18. How they were treated by the church, if they died without baptism.—19. What opinion the ancients had of the necessity of baptism.—20. The want of baptism supplied by martyrdom.—21. And by faith and repentance, in such catechumens as were piously preparing for baptism.—22. The case of heretics returning to the unity of the church: how far charity in that case was thought to supply the want of baptism.—23. The case of persons communicating for a long time without baptism: how far that was thought to supply the want of baptism.—24. The case of infants dying unbaptized: the opinion of the ancients concerning it. 443

CHAPTER III.

Of the original, nature, and names of the ancient creeds of the church.

SECT. 1. Why the creed called symbolum.—2. Why called canon and regula fidei.—3. Why called mathema.—4. Why called γραφὴ and γράμμα.—5. Whether that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, was composed by the apostles in the present form of words.—6. That probably the apostles used several creeds, differing in form, not in substance.—7. What articles were contained in the apostolical creeds. . . . 458

CHAPTER IV.

A collection of several ancient forms of the creed out of the primitive records of the church.

SECT. 1. The fragments of the creed in Irenæus.—2. The creed of Origen.—3. The fragments of the creed in Tertullian.—4. The fragments of the creed in Cyprian.—5. The creed of Gregory Thaumaturgus.—6. The creed of Lucian the martyr.—7. The creed of the Apostolical Constitutions.—8. The creed of Jerusalem.—9. The creed of Cæsarea in Palestine.—10. The creed of Alexandria.—11. The creed of Antioch.—12. The Roman creed, commonly called the Apostles' Creed.—13. The creed of Aquileia.—14. The Nicene creed, as first published by the council of Nice.—15. The creeds in Epiphanius, completing the Nicene creed.—16. The Nicene creed was completed by the council of Constantinople, anno 381.—17. Of the use of the Nicene creed in the ancient service of the church: and when it was first taken in to be a part of the liturgy in the communion office.—18. Of the Athanasian creed. 464

CHAPTER V.

Of the original, nature, and reasons of that ancient discipline of concealing the sacred mysteries of the church from the sight and knowledge of the catechumens.

SECT. 1. The errors and pretences of the Romanists upon this point.—2. This discipline not strictly observed in the very first ages of the church.—3. But introduced about the time of Tertullian, for other reasons than what the Romanists pretend.—4. This proved from a particular account of the things which they concealed from the catechumens. Which were, First, The manner of administering baptism.—5. Secondly, The manner of administering the holy unction, or confirmation.—6. Thirdly, The ordination of priests.—7. Fourthly, The liturgy, or public prayers of the church, such as the prayers for the enermugens, penitents, and the faithful.—8. Fifthly, The manner of celebrating the eucharist.—9. Sixthly, The mystery of the Trinity, the creed, and the Lord's prayer, from the first sort of catechumens.—10. Reasons for concealing these things from the catechumens. First, That the plainness and simplicity of them might not be contemned.—11. Secondly, To conciliate a reverence for them.—12. Thirdly, To make the catechumens more desirous to know them. 477

BOOK XI.

OF THE RITES AND CUSTOMS OBSERVED IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF BAPTISM IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the several names and appellations of baptism in the primitive church.

SECT. 1. The names of baptism most commonly taken from the spiritual effects of it.—2. Hence baptism called indulgentia, indulgence or absolution.—3. And παλιγγενεσία, regeneration; and χρίσμα, the unction.—4. And φωτισμός, illumination.—5. And salus, salvation.—6. From the nature and substance of it, it was called mysterium, sacramentum, and σφραγίς.—7. And character Dominicus, the mark or character of the Lord.—8. Why called the sacrament of faith and repentance.—9. The notation of the names, baptism, tinction, laver. That they do not universally denote immersion.—10. Of some other names given to baptism. The great circumcision, δάρον and χάρισμα, the gift of the Lord. Viaticum, and phylacterium, τελειώσις, μύησις, and symbola. 483

CHAPTER II.

Of the matter of baptism; with an account of such heretics as rejected or corrupted baptism by water.

SECT. 1. Baptism wholly rejected by the heretics called Ascodrute, and Marcosians, and Valentinians, and Quintillians.—2. And by the Archontici.—3. And the Seleucians and Hermians.—4. And Manichees and Paulicians.—5. What opinion the Messalians, or Euchites, had of baptism. 488

CHAPTER III.

Of the ancient form of baptism; and of such heretics as altered or corrupted it.

SECT. 1. The usual form of baptizing in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.—2. This form of words generally thought necessary to be used in baptism.—3. Whether baptism in the name of Christ alone was ever allowed in the church.—4. Of alterations made in the form of baptism. First, By the Tritheists and Priscillianists.—5. Secondly, By the Menandrians. 6. Thirdly, By the Eleeseans.—7. Fourthly, By the Sabellians and Montanists.—8. Fifthly, By the Marcosians.—9. Sixthly, By the Paulianists.—10. Seventhly, By the Eunomians, and others who baptized into the death of Christ.—11. Whether all the Arians were guilty of the same innovation.—12. Whether any additions were made to the form of baptism in the catholic church. 491

CHAPTER IV.

Of the subjects of baptism, or an account of what persons were anciently allowed to be baptized. Where particularly of infant baptism.

SECT. 1. Why the question about the administrators of baptism is here omitted.—2. Who were anciently reckoned the proper subjects of baptism. Where of the corrupt custom of baptizing inanimate things, as bells, in the Roman church.—3. Baptism not to be given to the dead.—4. Nor to the living for the dead. Where of the apostle's meaning, of being "baptized for the dead," I Cor. xv. 29.—5. Proofs of infant baptism from the ancient records of the church.—6. From Clemens Romanus and Hermes Pastor.—7. From Justin Martyr.—8. And the author of the Recognitions, contemporary with Justin Martyr.—9. From Irenæus.—10. And Tertullian.—11. And Origen.—12. And Cyprian, with the council of Carthage under him.—13. Infant baptism not to be delayed to the eighth day, after the example of circumcision. Nor till three years, as Gregory Nazianzen would have had it.—14. Yet in some churches it was deferred to the time of an approaching festival.—15. A resolution of some questions concerning infant baptism. Whether children might be baptized when only one parent was Christian?—16. Whether the children of excommunicated parents might be baptized?—17. Whether exposed children, whose parents were unknown, might be baptized?—18. Whether the children of Jews or heathens might be baptized in any case whatsoever?—19. Whether children born while their parents were heathen might be baptized? 498

CHAPTER V.

Of the baptism of adult persons.

SECT. 1. No adult persons to be baptized without previous instruction, to qualify them to answer for themselves.—2. Yet dumb persons allowed to be baptized in some certain cases.—3. And enervements in cases of extremity.—4. No slave to be baptized without the testimony of his master.—5. Yet baptism to be a voluntary act, and no one to be compelled to receive it by force.—6. What persons were rejected from baptism; with a particular account of some certain trades and vocations, which kept men from it. Such were image-making and stage-playing.—7. Gladiators, charioteers, and other gamesters.—8. Astrologers and practisers of such other curious arts.—9. Frequenters of the public games and theatre.—10. In what case the military life might unqualify men for baptism.—11. Whether persons might be baptized who lived in the state of concubinage.—12. The peculiar error of the Marcionites in rejecting all married persons from baptism. 509

CHAPTER VI.

Of the time and place of baptism.

SECT. 1. Why adult persons sometimes delayed baptism by order of the church.—2. Private reasons for deferring baptism against the rules of the church. First, Supinuity and negligence of salvation.—3. Secondly, An unwillingness to renounce the world, and submit to the severities of religion.—4. Thirdly, A fear of falling after baptism.—5. Fourthly, Superstitious fancies in reference to the time, and place, and ministers of baptism.—6. Fifthly, A pretence of following the example of Christ, who was baptized at thirty years of age.—7. The solemn times appointed for baptism by the church, were Easter, Pentecost, and Epiphany.—8. And in some places the festivals of the apostles and martyrs, and the anniversary days of the dedication of churches prevailed also.—9. No such stated times in the days of the apostles.—10. How far these rules obliging in future ages.—11. Baptism not confined to any place in the apostolical ages.—12. But in after ages confined to the baptisteries of the church.—13. Except in the case of sickness, or with the bishop's licence to the contrary, upon some special occasions. . . 517

CHAPTER VII.

Of the renunciations and professions made by all persons immediately before their baptism.

SECT. 1. Three things required of all persons at their baptism. First, to renounce the devil.—2. The form of this renunciation, and the import of it.—3. The antiquity of this renunciation. By some derived from the apostles.—4. This renunciation made by persons standing with their face toward the west. The reason of this practice, with some other ceremonies.—5. Why this renunciation made three times.—6. The second thing required of men at their baptism, was a vow or covenant of obedience to Christ.—7. This vow of obedience made by turning to the east. And why.—8. The third thing required of the party to be baptized, was a profession of faith in the usual words of the creed.—9. This confession made in the most solemn and public manner.—10. With hands and eyes lifted up to heaven.—11. Repeated three times.—12. And subscribed with their own hands in the books of the church, as some think.—13. The use of all these ceremonies and engagements, to make men sensible of their obligation, and stedfast to their profession.—14. Whether public and particular confession of sins was required of men at their baptism. 525

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the use of sponsors or sureties in baptism.

SECT. 1. Three sorts of sponsors in the primitive church. First, for children.—2. Parents commonly sponsors for their own children.—3. Other sureties not bound to maintain the children for whom they were sponsors.—4. But only to answer for them to the several interrogatories in baptism.—5. And to be guardians of their spiritual life for the future.—6. The second sort of sponsors, for such adult persons as could not answer for themselves.—7. The third sort of sponsors, for all adult persons in general.—8. Whose duty was, not to answer in their names, but only to admonish and instruct them before and after baptism.—9. This office chiefly imposed upon deacons and deaconesses.—10. What persons prohibited from being sponsors.—11. But one sponsor required, and that a man for a man, and a woman for a woman.—12. When first it became a law that sponsors might not marry a spiritual relation.—13. Why the names of the sponsors ordered to be registered in the books of the church. . . 533

CHAPTER IX.

Of the unction and the sign of the cross in baptism.

SECT. 1. Of the first original of unction in baptism.—2. Of the difference between this and chrism in confirmation.—3. The design of this unction, and the reason of it.—4. The sign of the cross frequently used in the ceremonies of baptism. First, in the admission of catechumens; and, secondly, in the time of exorcism.—5. Thirdly, in this unction before baptism.—6. Fourthly, in the unction of confirmation. . . . 539

CHAPTER X.

Of the consecration of the water in baptism.

SECT. 1. The consecration of the water made by prayer.—2. An ancient form of this prayer in the Constitutions.—3. The sign of the cross used in this consecration.—4. The effects and change wrought by this consecration, the same as in the bread and wine in the eucharist.—5. How far these prayers of consecration reckoned necessary in the church. 542

CHAPTER XI.

Of the different ways of baptizing, by immersion, trine immersion, and aspersion in the case of clinic baptism.

SECT. 1. All persons anciently divested in order to be baptized.—2. No exception in this case, either with respect to women or children.—3. Yet matters were so ordered, as that no indecency might be committed.—4. Baptism usually performed by immersion.—5. Yet aspersion allowed in some extraordinary cases.—6. Trine immersion the general practice for several ages. The reasons of this.—7. The original of this practice.—8. When first the church allowed of any alteration in it. 546

BOOK XII.

OF CONFIRMATION, AND OTHER CEREMONIES FOLLOWING BAPTISM, BEFORE MEN WERE MADE PARTAKERS OF THE EUCHARIST.

CHAPTER I.

Of the time when, and the persons to whom, confirmation was administered.

SECT. 1. Confirmation anciently given immediately after baptism, if the bishop were present.—2. And this as well to infants as adult persons. Which is evidenced, first, from some plain testimonies.—3. And, secondly, from the custom of giving the eucharist to infants from many ages.—4. Whence it appears that confirmation was not esteemed a proper sacrament distinct from baptism.—5. No, not when it was separate from baptism, as in the case of heretics who were baptized out of the church.—6. No necessity of giving confirmation to infants now, any more than the eucharist, from the example of the primitive church. 553

CHAPTER II.

Of the minister of confirmation.

SECT. 1. The consecration of chrisam reserved only to the office of bishops by the canons.—2. The use of the chrisam divided between the office of bishops and presbyters.—3. The other ceremony of imposition of hands reserved more strictly to the office of bishops.—4. Yet in some special cases presbyters by commission allowed to minister it also. As, first, when bishops particularly required their presbyters to do it to such as were baptized in the church.—5. Secondly, presbyters might administer it to the enermumens who were baptized at a distance from the bishop's church.—6. And, thirdly, to such as were baptized in heresy or schism, in case they were in danger of death. 557

CHAPTER III.

Of the manner of administering confirmation, and the ceremonies used in the celebration of it.

SECT. 1. The first ceremony of confirmation was the unction of chrisam.—2. The original of this unction.—3. The form and manner of administering it, together with the effects of it.—4. The second ceremony of confirmation was the sign of the cross.—5. The third and most noted ceremony of confirmation, was imposition of hands; and the fourth, prayer joined therewith.—6. The original of the ceremony of imposition of hands.—7. What opinion the ancients had of the necessity of confirmation.—8. How they punished those that neglected it. 562

CHAPTER IV.

Of the remaining ceremonies of baptism following confirmation.

SECT. 1. Persons newly baptized, clothed in white garments.—2. These sometimes delivered to them with a solemn form of words.—3. Worn eight days, and then laid up in the church.—4. The ceremony of lights and tapers. What intended by it. And at whose charge both these were provided.—5. The kiss of peace given to persons newly baptized.—6. And a taste of honey and milk, in token of their new birth.—7. Then they were required to repeat the Lord's prayer.—8. And received into the church with psalmody.—9. And admitted immediately to the communion of the altar.—10. Of the ceremony of washing the feet, retained in some churches.—11. A general reflection upon the whole preceding discourse, with relation to the practice of the present church. 567

CHAPTER V.

Of the laws against rebaptization both in church and state.

SECT. 1. But one baptism, properly so called, allowed by the church.—2. Only the Marcionites allowed baptism to be thrice repeated.—3. What the church did in doubtful cases, not reckoned a rebaptization.—4. Nor when she baptized those who had been unduly baptized before in heresy or schism.—5. Apostates never rebaptized in the catholic church.—6. What heretics rebaptized the catholics.—7. What punishments were inflicted on rebaptizers by the laws of church and state. 573

BOOK XIII.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS RELATING TO DIVINE WORSHIP IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Some necessary remarks upon the ancient names of Divine service, which modern corruptions have rendered ambiguous.

SECT. 1. The partition of this work.—2. Of the missa catechumenorum, or ante-communion service, to which all orders of men were admitted.—3. Of the missa fidelium, or communion service, peculiar to communicants only.—4. The true original and meaning of the ancient name missa, the mass, which in its primitive use denotes every part of Divine service; but no where an expiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead.—5. In what sense Divine service anciently called sacrifice, sacrificium.—6. And sacramenta.—7. And cursus ecclesiasticus.—8. The names λειτουργία, ιερονουγία, ιερά, and μυσταγωγία, most usual in the Greek church.—9. Liturgies sometimes taken for set forms of prayer.—10. Of litanies. This at first a general name of prayers. How and when it came to be appropriated to certain particular forms of worship, called rogations.—11. Of the distinction between greater and lesser litanies.—12. Of their processions. 577

CHAPTER II.

That the devotions of the ancient church were paid to every person of the blessed Trinity.

SECT. 1. Proofs of the worship of Christ, as the Son of God, or second person of the blessed Trinity, in the first century.—2. Proofs of the same in the second century, from the testimony of Pliny, Ignatius, Polycarp, and the Acts of Polycarp, the epistle of the church of Smyrna, Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Lucian, Irenæus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Clemens of Alexandria, Athenogenes, the Acts of Andronicus, Tertullian.—3. Proofs of the worship of Christ in the third century, out of Caius Romanus, the council of Antioch, Dionysius of Alexandria, Origen, Novatian, Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius, the Acts of the Martyrs in Eusebius, the Acts of Felix, Thelica, Emeritus, Glycerius, Olympius, and many others. The force of this argument to prove the Divinity of Christ upon this Christian principle, That Divine honour was to be given to none but God only.—4. The proofs of the worship of the Holy Ghost, from the testimony of Polycarp, Justin Martyr, Lucian, Theophilus, Clemens of Alexandria, Athenogenes, Origen, the author of the Recognitions, under the name of Clemens Romanus. The ancients charged with tritheism by Praxeas and the Sabellians, upon the account of their worshipping the Holy Trinity. The worship of the Holy Ghost proved further from the testimony of Cyprian, Firmilian, and Gregory Thaumaturgus.—5. In what sense all prayers are ordered to be directed to the Father. . . 586

CHAPTER III.

That in the ancient church religious worship was given to no creature, saint or angel, cross, image, or relic, but to God alone.

SECT. 1. This position proved, first, from their general declarations against giving religious worship to any creature.—2. Secondly, from their denying the worship of saints and angels in particular, and condemning it as idolatry.—3. Thirdly, from their charging the practice of it upon heretics and heathens only . . . 599

CHAPTER IV.

That anciently Divine service was always performed in the vulgar tongue, understood by the people.

SECT. 1. This proved, first, From plain testimonies of the ancients asserting it.—2. Secondly, From the people's joining in psalmody and prayer, and making their proper responses in the liturgy.—3. Thirdly, From the frequent exhortations of the fathers to the people, to hear, and read, and pray with understanding.—4. Fourthly, From the references made by the fathers in their sermons to the prayers and lessons in the service of the church.—5. Fifthly, From the Scriptures being translated into all languages from the first foundation of churches.—6. Sixthly, From the use of the order of interpreters in the church.—7. Seventhly, From the custom of having Bibles laid in churches, for the people to read in private.—8. Eighthly, From the general allowance granted to all men to have, and read the Scriptures in their mother tongue. Which privilege was never infringed by any but the heathen persecutors.—9. From the liberty granted to children and catechumens to join in the public prayers and read the Scriptures.—10. From the form and tenor of the ordination of readers in the church. 605

CHAPTER V.

Of the original and use of liturgies, in stated and set forms of prayer, in the primitive church.

SECT. 1. Every bishop at liberty in the first ages to order the form of Divine service in his own church.—2. In after ages the churches of a whole province by consent conformed to the liturgy of the metropolitane church.—3. Why none of the ancient liturgies are now remaining perfect and entire as they were in their first original.—4. What forms were used in the apostles' days. Where of the ancient forms used by the Jews in their temple worship and synagogue service. How our Saviour and his apostles complied with the use of them. What new forms were introduced by the apostles into the Christian service.—5. What evidence there is of the use of set forms in the second century, from the testimony of Pliny, Ignatius, Lucian, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clemens of Alexandria, Tertullian, and the Acts of St. Perpetua and Felicitas.—6. Evidence of set forms in the third century, from the testimony of Hippolytus, Origen, Cyprian, Firmilian, Gregory Thaumaturgus, the council of Antioch, Caius Romanus, Nepos, Dionysius of Alexandria, Athenogenes, and Cornelius bishop of Rome.—7. Evidences of set forms in the fourth century, from the testimony of Arnobius, Lactantius, Eusebius, the forms of Licinius, and Constantine, Athanasius, Juvenus, Pachomius, Flavian bishop of Antioch, Cyril of Jerusalem, Hilary of Poitiers, the council of Laodicea, Epiphanius, Optatus, Basil, Ephrem Syrus, the practice of Arius and Eunomius, St. Ambrose, St. Jerom and St. Austin, the council of Carthage and Milevis. 612

CHAPTER VI.

An extract of the several parts of the ancient liturgy out of the genuine writings of St. Chrysostom, following the order of his works.

SECT. 1. Parts of the liturgy in the first tome.—2. Parts of the liturgy in the second tome of St. Chrysostom's works.—3. Part of the ancient liturgy in the third tome.—4. Parts of the ancient liturgy in the fourth tome of St. Chrysostom's works.—5. In the fifth tome.—6. In the sixth tome.—7. In the seventh tome of his Homilies on St. Matthew.—8. In the eighth tome on St. John and the Acts of the Apostles.—9. In the ninth tome on Romans, on the First and Second to the Corinthians.—10. In the tenth tome. 638

CHAPTER VII.

Of the use of the Lord's prayer in the liturgy of the ancient church.

SECT. 1. The Lord's prayer esteemed by all the ancients a form given by Christ to be used by all his disciples.—2. Accordingly it was used by the primitive church in all her public offices: particularly in the administration of baptism.—3. And in the celebration of the eucharist.—4. And in their morning and evening prayers.—5. And in their private devotions.—6. Whence it had the name of oratio quotidiana, the Christian's daily prayer.—7. And was used by all heretics and schismatics as well as catholics.—8. That it was esteemed a Divine and spiritual form of prayer.—9. And the use of it esteemed a peculiar privilege, allowed only to communicants and perfect Christians. . . 649

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the use of habits, and gesture, and other rites and ceremonies in the ancient church.

SECT. 1. No certain evidences for the use of distinct habits in the apostolical age, or the two following ages.—2. What evidence there is for them in the fourth century.—3. Four postures of devotion spoken of by the ancients. First, Standing, which was particularly enjoined on the Lord's day, and all the time between Easter and Pentecost.—4. Secondly, Kneeling at all other times, especially on the stationary days, and other times of devotion.—5. Thirdly, Bowing down the head, or inclination of the body.—6. Fourthly, Prostration.—7. Sitting not an allowed posture of devotion.—8. Some superstitious practices in devotion noted by Tertullian, as bathing the body, and putting off their cloaks when they went to prayer.—9. That the ancients always prayed uncovered.—10. And lifted up their hands toward heaven, sometimes in the form of a cross.—11. But yet were great enemies to all theatrical gestures.—12. What ceremonies they used at their entrance into the church.—13. That the bishop saluted the people with the form, Pax vobis, at his entrance into the church.—14. And the people gave alms to the poor, who stood before the gates of the church for this purpose.—15. That they worshipped toward the east, with the reasons for this practice. 655

CHAPTER IX.

Of the times of their religious assemblies, and the several parts of Divine service performed in them.

SECT. 1. No certain rule for meeting in public, except upon the Lord's day, in times of persecution, for the two first ages.—2. The original of the stationary days, or church assemblies on Wednesdays and Fridays, and what Divine service was performed on those days.—3. Saturday or the sabbath anciently observed with great solemnity, as a day of public devotion.—4. How they observed the vigils of the sabbath and Lord's day, and other incidental festivals of martyrs.—5. Of the festivals of martyrs, their original, and what Divine service was performed on those days.—6. Solemn assemblies for preaching and other acts of Divine worship, held every day during the whole forty days of Lent, and the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost.—7. Public prayer morning and evening every day in the third century.—8. The original of the canonical hours of prayer. No notice of them for public prayer, but only for private, in the three first ages.—9. What service was allotted to these canonical hours by the church in the fourth century.—10. Of the matutina, or prima, called the new morning service.—11. Of the tertia, or third hour of prayer.—12. Of the sixth hour, or noon-day service.—13. Of the ninth hour, or three in the afternoon. 664

CHAPTER X.

The order of their daily morning service.

SECT. 1. The order of morning service, as described in the Constitutions. This began with the 63rd Psalm.—2. What notice there is of this morning psalm in other writers.—3. Next to the psalm followed the prayers for the catechumens, energumens, competents, and penitents.—4. Then the prayers for the faithful, the peace of the world, and the whole state of Christ's church.—5. What notice we have of these prayers in other writers.—6. After the general prayer for the whole state of the church, followed a short bidding prayer for preservation in the ensuing day.—7. Then the bishop's commendation or thanksgiving.—8. And his imposition of hands or benediction, with the deacon's dismissal of the assembly.—9. Whether the morning hymn was part of the public service every day.—10. Whether the psalms and lessons were read at the daily morning service.—11. The original of the ante-lucan or night assemblies in time of persecution.—12. These continued when the persecutions were over.—13. The order of Divine service, which was performed in them, as described by St. Basil.—14. The account of them out of Cassian.—15. This morning service much frequented by the laity as well as the clergy. 675

CHAPTER XI.

The order of their daily evening service.

SECT. 1. The evening service in most things conformed to that of the morning.—2. But they differed, first, in that a proper psalm (the 141st) was appointed for the evening service. This psalm called the evening psalm by the author of the Constitutions.—3. This psalm mentioned by Chrysostom and other writers under the same denomination.—4. Secondly, they had proper prayers for the evening service.—5. The evening hymn.—6. Whether there were any hymns, or psalms, or lessons read in the evening service, beside the 141st Psalm.—7. The Lord's prayer used in many churches, as the conclusion of the daily morning and evening service. 682

BOOK XIV.

OF THAT PART OF DIVINE SERVICE WHICH THE ANCIENTS COMPRISED UNDER THE GENERAL NAME OF MISSA CATECHUMENORUM, THE SERVICE OF THE CATECHUMENS, OR ANTE-COMMUNION SERVICE ON THE LORD'S DAY.

CHAPTER I.

Of the psalmody of the ancient church.

SECT. 1. That the service of the ancient church on the Lord's day usually began with psalmody.—2. The psalms intermixed with lessons and prayers in some churches.—3. These psalms called by a peculiar name, psalmi responsorii.—4. Some psalms appropriated to particular services.—5. Others sung in the ordinary course as they lay in order, without being appropriated to any time or day.—6. And some appointed occasionally, at the discretion of the bishop or precentor.—7. Prayers in some places between every psalm instead of a lesson.—8. The Gloria Patri added at the end of every psalm in the Western church, but not in the Greek or Oriental church.—9. The psalms sometimes sung by one person only.—10. Sometimes by the whole assembly joining all together.—11. Sometimes alternately by the congregation divided into two parts, and answering verse for verse to one another.—12. Sometimes by a single precentor, repeating the first part of the verse, and the people all joining with him in the close. This was called ὀρχήειν, and ὀπακούειν. What meant by diapsalms, acrotelautics, and acrostics in psalmody.—13. An answer to a popish objection against the people's bearing a part in psalmody.—14. Psalmody always performed in the standing posture.—15. Of the use of plain song, and its commendation among the ancients.—16. Artificial and melodious tuning of the voice allowed in singing, when managed with sobriety and discretion.—17. No objection made against psalms or hymns of human composition, barely as such.—18. But two corruptions severely inveighed against. First, Over-great nice-ness and curiosity in singing, in imitation of the modes and music of the theatre.—19. And secondly, Pleasing the ear without raising the affections of the soul. 687

CHAPTER II.

A particular account of some of the most noted hymns used in the service of the ancient church.

SECT. 1. Of the lesser doxology, or hymn, "Glory be to the Father," &c.—2. Of the great doxology, "Glory be to God on high," &c.—3. Of the Trisagion, or cherubical hymn, "Holy, holy, holy," &c.—4. Of the Hallelujah, and Halleluatic psalms.—5. Of the Hosanna, and Evening Hymn, and Nunc Dimittis, or the Song of Simeon.—6. Of the Benedicite, or Song of the three Children.—7. Of the Magnificat, or Song of the Holy Virgin.—8. When first the creed began to be sung as a hymn in the church.—9. Of the author and original of the hymn, Te Deum.—10. Of the hymns of St. Ambrose.—11. Of the hymns of St. Hilary, Claudianus Mamercus, and others. 695

CHAPTER III.

Of the manner of reading the Scriptures in the public service of the church.

SECT. 1. Lessons of the Scripture sometimes mixed with psalms and hymns, and sometimes read after them.—2. Lessons read both out of the Old and New Testament, except in the church of Rome, where only Epistle and Gospel were read.—3. Proper lessons for certain times and festivals.—4. By whom the Scriptures were anciently read in the church.—5. Whether the Epistle and Gospel were read twice, first to the catechumens, and then to the faithful at the altar.—6. The solemnity and ceremony of reading the lessons. Where first of the salutation, Pax vobis, before reading.—7. This salutation sometimes used by the bishop immediately before the reader began to read.—8. The deacon enjoined silence before the reader began, and required attention: as the reader also did before every lesson, saying, "Thus saith the Lord."—9. At the naming of the Prophet or Epistle the people in some places said, Deo Gratias, and Amen at the end of it.—10. At the reading of the Gospel, all stood up, and said, "Glory be to Thee, O Lord."—11. Lights carried before the Gospel in the Eastern churches.—12. Three or four lessons read out of the Gospels sometimes on the same day.—13. Of longer and shorter lessons, and their distinct use, according to Durantus.—14. What might or might not be read by way of lessons in the church.—15. Those which we now call apocryphal books, were anciently read in some churches, but not in all.—16. And in some churches under the title of canonical Scripture, taking that word in a larger sense.—17. A short account of the translations of Scripture used in the ancient church. 703

CHAPTER IV.

Of preaching, and the usages relating to it in the ancient church.

SECT. 1. All sermons anciently called homilies, disputations, allocutions, tractatus, &c.—2. Preaching the proper office of bishops and presbyters in ordinary cases, and not of deacons.—3. The singular practice of the church of Rome, in having no sermons for several ages, noted out of Sozomen, and Cassiodore, and Valesius.—4. Whether laymen were ever allowed to preach in the ancient church.—5. Women never allowed to preach.—6. Two or three sermons sometimes in the same assembly.—7. Sermons every day in some times and places.—8. Sermons twice a day in many places.—9. Not so frequent in country villages.—10. Of their different ways of preaching. A character of St. Chrysostom and some other preachers.—11. Ex-tempore discourses frequent among the ancients.—12. What meant by preaching by the Spirit.—13. What sort of prayers they used before, and in, and after sermons.—14. The salutation, Pax vobis, The Lord be with you, commonly used before sermons.—15. But the use of Ave Marias before sermons unknown to the ancients.—16. Sometimes their sermons were prefaced with a benediction.—17. Sometimes preached without any text, and sometimes upon more texts than one.—18. Their sermons always upon important subjects. Compared with some of those in the church of Rome.—19. Delivered in a way most affecting and suitable to the capacities of their hearers, with perspicuity, pleasure, and force of argument. This is largely demonstrated out of St. Austin's rules about preaching.—20. That it was no part of the ancient oratory to move the passions by gesticulations and vain images of things, so common in the church of Rome.—21. Of the length of their sermons.—22. Whether every man was obliged to preach his own compositions, or might preach homilies and sermons composed by others.—23. Their sermons commonly concluded with a doxology to the holy Trinity.—24. Their sermons for the most part delivered by the preacher sitting.—25. And heard by the auditors standing in most churches, but not in all.—26. A peculiar custom in the African church, that when the preacher cited any remarkable text, the people repeated it with him, to show that they were attentive, and read and remembered the Scriptures.—27. How the people were used to give public applauses and acclamations to the preacher in the church.—28. And, more Christian-like, express their approbation by tears, and groans, and compunction, and obedience. Which is the best commendation of a preacher and his sermon.—29. Sermons anciently penned by the hearers.—30. Two reflections made by the ancients upon some of their corrupt hearers. First, upon the negligent and profane.—31. And secondly, the intemperate zealots, who placed all religion in a sermon.—32. With what candour they treated those who thought their sermons too long. 715

CHAPTER V.

Of the prayers for the catechumens, energumens, competentes, or candidates of baptism, and the penitents.

SECT. 1. That prayers in the ancient church were not before, but after the sermon.—2. Who might, or might not, be present at these prayers. Infidels and mere hearers obliged to withdraw.—3. Of the prayers for the catechumens. The genuine forms of them out of St. Chrysostom and the Constitutions.—4. What meant by their praying for the angel of peace in this form of prayer.—5. Children in some churches appointed to say this prayer with the rest of the people.—6. What notice we have of this prayer in other ancient writings.—7. Of the prayers for the energumens, or persons possessed by evil spirits. The forms of these prayers out of the Constitutions.—8. An account of them out of St. Chrysostom and other writers.—9. Of the prayers for the competentes, or candidates of baptism.—10. Of the prayers for the penitents.—11. What notice we have of these prayers in St. Chrysostom and other writers.—12. In what part of the church these prayers were made.—13. Whether there were any such distinct prayers for the catechumens and penitents in the Latin church. 746

BOOK XV.

OF THE MISSA FIDELIUM, OR COMMUNION SERVICE.

CHAPTER I.

Of the prayers preceding the oblation.

SECT. 1. Of the prayer called διὰ σιωπῆς, or silent prayer.—2. Of the prayers called διὰ προσφωνήσεως, or bidding prayers.—3. The form of this sort of bidding prayers in the Constitutions, compared with the fragments that occur in Chrysostom, and other writers.—4. Of the invocation, or collect, following the common prayers of the people. 754

CHAPTER II.

Of the oblations of the people, and other things introductory to the consecration of the eucharist.

SECT. 1. Of the customary oblations which the people made at the altar.—2. What persons were allowed to make them, and what not.—3. What oblations might be received at the altar, and what not.—4. The names of such as made oblations of any considerable value rehearsed at the altar.—5. The eucharistical elements usually taken out of the people's oblations: and, consequently, no use of wafers or unleavened bread.—6. The use of wafers instead of bread condemned in their first original.—7. Wine mixed with water commonly used in the ancient church.—8. Of some heretics who made alterations or additions to the elements in the eucharist.—9. And of others who rejected the use of the sacrament altogether. 762

CHAPTER III.

Of the oblation or consecration prayers, and the several parts of them.

SECT. 1. The form of thanksgiving and consecration prayers described out of the Constitutions.—2. This account compared with what is said in other authors. First, as to the form of salutation, "Peace be with you," &c.—3. Of the kiss of peace.—4. Washing the hands before consecration.—5. The deacon's admonition to all non-communicants to withdraw; and to all communicants to come with charity and sincerity.—6. Of the ῥιπίδια, or fans to drive away insects.—7. Of the use of the sign of the cross at the Lord's table.—8. Of the usual preface, called Sursum corda, Lift up your hearts, or preparation to the great thanksgiving.—9. Of the εὐχαριστία, or great thanksgiving, properly so called.—10. Of the use of the hymn Trisagion, or seraphical hymn, "Holy, holy, holy," in this thanksgiving.—11. A particular thanksgiving for the mercies of God in the redemption of mankind by Christ.—12. The form of consecration always composed of a repetition of the words of institution, and prayer to God to sanctify the gifts by his Holy Spirit.—13. After this followed prayer for the whole catholic church.—14. More particularly for the bishops and clergy.—15. For kings and magistrates.—16. For the dead in general.—17. Upon what grounds the ancient church prayed for the dead, saints, martyrs, confessors, as well as all others.—18. A short account of the diptychs, and their use in the ancient church.—19. Next to the dead, prayer made for the living members of that particular church, and every order in it.—20. For those that were in sickness, slavery, banishment, proscription, and all that travelled by sea or land.—21. For enemies and persecutors, heretics and unbelievers.—22. For the catechumens, energumens, and penitents.

—23. For healthful and fruitful seasons.—24. For all their absent brethren.—25. Concluding with a doxology to the whole Trinity.—26. To which the people with one voice answered, Amen.—27. Then followed the creed in such churches as had made it a part of their liturgy.—28. And the Lord's prayer.—29. Absolution of penitents immediately before the Lord's prayer, with occasional benedictions.—30. Benediction after the Lord's prayer.—31. The deacon's bidding prayer after the consecration.—32. Of the form, Sancta Sanctis, and the hymn, Glory be to God on high, hosanna, &c.—33. Of the invitatory psalm sung before the communion.—34. That the consecration anciently was always performed with an audible voice.—35. And with the ceremony of breaking of bread to represent our Saviour's passion. 771

CHAPTER IV.

Of communicants, or persons who were allowed to receive this sacrament, and the manner of receiving it.

SECT. 1. All persons, except catechumens and penitents, obliged to receive the eucharist.—2. When and how this discipline began first to relax.—3. When first the use of eulogia came in, instead of the eucharist, for such as would not communicate.—4. The corruption of private and solitary mass unknown to former ages.—5. Other corruptions countenanced in the Roman church, such as the missa sicca, and nautica, and those called bifaciata and trifaciata, &c.—6. The communion not given to heretics and schismatics, without confession and reconciliation.—7. Yet given to infants and children for several ages.—8. And sent to the absent members of their own and other churches.—9. And to those that were sick, or in prison, or under any confinement, or in penance at the point of death.—10. The eucharist sometimes consecrated in private houses for these purposes.—11. And commonly reserved in the church for the same uses.—12. And also for public use upon some days, when they made no new consecration. This called missa præsanctificatorum. Its use and original.—13. The eucharist sometimes reserved in private by private men, for daily participation.—14. Yet this never allowed in the public service.—15. A novel custom noted, of reserving the eucharist for forty days, and the inconveniences attending it.—16. The eucharist sometimes given to the energumens in the interval of their distemper.—17. All men debarred from it that were guilty of any great or notorious crime, of what rank or degree soever.—18. The question of digamy or second marriage stated. Whether it debarred men at any time from the communion.—19. The corrupt custom of some, who gave the eucharist to the dead, censured by the ancients.—20. Parallel to which is the abuse of burying the eucharist with the dead.—21. The order of communicating.—22. Some rules observed for distinction of places in communicating. 801

CHAPTER V.

A resolution of several questions relating further to the manner of communicating in the ancient church.

SECT. 1. That the people were always admitted to receive the communion in both kinds.—2. That in receiving in both kinds they always received the elements distinctly, and not the one dipped in the other.—3.

That the ancients received sometimes standing, sometimes kneeling, but never sitting.—4. No elevation of the host for Divine adoration in the ancient church for many ages, till the rise of transubstantiation.—5. No adoration of the host before the twelfth or thirteenth century.—6. The people allowed to receive the eucharist into their own hands.—7. The same custom observed in delivering it to women and children.—8. The eucharist usually delivered to the people with a certain form of words, to which they answered, Amen.—9. How Novatian and others abused the communion to wicked purposes.—10. Proper psalms for the occasion usually sung while the people were communicating. 818

CHAPTER VI.

Of their post-communion service.

SECT. 1. The communion service closed with several sorts of thanksgiving. The deacon's bidding prayer or thanksgiving.—2. The bishop's thanksgiving, or commendation of the people to God.—3. The bishop's benediction.—4. The deacon's form of dismissing the people with the short prayer, Go in peace.—5. What account we have of these prayers in other writers besides the Constitutions.—6. These thanksgivings always made in the plural number by and for the whole body of communicants. And so they are still remaining in the Roman mass-book, to the reproach of the great abuse of private and solitary mass. 836

CHAPTER VII.

How the remains of the eucharist were disposed of: and of their common entertainment, called agape, or feast of charity.

SECT. 1. Part of the eucharist anciently reserved for particular uses.—2. The rest divided among the communicants.—3. This division of the consecrated elements a distinct thing from the division of the other oblations.—4. The remains of the eucharist sometimes given to innocent children.—5. And sometimes burnt in the fire.—6. Some part of the other oblations disposed of in a feast of charity, which all the ancients reckon an apostolical rite accompanying the communion.—7. Whether this feast was before or after the communion in the apostles' days.—8. How observed in the following ages; when the eucharist was commonly received fasting, and before this feast, except upon some particular occasions.—9. These love-feasts at first held in the church; but afterward forbidden to be kept in the church by orders of councils.—10. How the Christians were at first abused and calumniated by some of the heathen, but admired and envied by others, upon the account of these feasts of charity. 839

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the preparation which the ancients required as necessary in communicants, to qualify them for a worthy reception.

SECT. 1. A general answer to this question, by referring to the professions of repentance, faith, and holy obedience, made by every Christian in baptism; in the observation of which professions every one was presumed to be qualified for the communion.—2. What failings were deemed consistent with these professions, and a state of grace, and a continual preparation for the communion.—3. What repentance required for such failings.—4. What crimes unqualified men absolutely for the communion, and what sort of repentance was required for them.—5. Ministers not to admit scandalous and notorious sinners to the communion, without satisfactory evidences of their repentance, in such cases as subjected them to the public discipline; in other cases, where the public discipline was not concerned, they were only to admonish them to abstain from communion, but not obliged absolutely to repel them from it.—6. Auricular confession of private sins not necessary to be made to the priest, as an indispensable qualification for the communion.—7. That preparation consists not in coming to communion at certain holy seasons, Easter, Christmas, &c., but in sanctity and purity at all times.—8. What faith they required in communicants.—9. What purity of soul by repentance and obedience. How far fasting useful or necessary to this purpose.—10. The necessity of justice and restitution in a worthy communicant.—11. The necessity of peace and unity.—12. The necessity of charity to the poor.—13. The necessity of forgiving enemies, and pardoning offences.—14. What behaviour required in the act of communicating; and what deportment afterwards. 845

CHAPTER IX.

Of frequent communion, and the times of celebrating it in the ancient church.

SECT. 1. All persons, except penitents under censure, obliged anciently to receive the communion every Lord's day, by the canons of the church.—2. This showed to be the constant practice for the three first ages.—3. The eucharist celebrated on other days beside the Lord's day in many churches.—4. And in some places every day.—5. When first it came to be settled to three times a year.—6. And afterwards to once a year by the council of Lateran.—7. What attempt was made to restore frequent and full communions at the Reformation.—8. Wherein this is still deficient; and what seems yet necessary to be done in order to reduce communion to the primitive standard. 859

BOOK XVI.

OF THE UNITY AND DISCIPLINE OF THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the union and communion observed among catholics in the ancient church.

SECT. 1. Of the fundamental unity of faith and obedience to the laws of Christ.—2. Of the unity of love and charity, as an essential part of Christian obedience.—3. Other sorts of unity necessary to the well-being of the church.—4. Among these was reckoned, first, The necessary use of one baptism, ordinarily to be administered by the hands of a regular ministry.—5. Secondly, Unity of worship, in joining with the church in prayers, and administration of the word and sacraments.—6. Thirdly, The unity of subjection of presbyters and people to their bishop, and obedience to all public orders of the church in matters of an indifferent nature.—7. Fourthly, The unity of submission to the discipline of the church.—8. How different churches maintained communion with one another. First, In the common faith.—9. Secondly, In mutual assistance of each other for defence of the common faith.—10. Thirdly, In joining in communion with each other in all holy offices, as occasion required.—11. Fourthly, In mutual consent to ratify all legal acts of discipline, regularly exercised in any church whatsoever.—12. Fifthly, In receiving unanimously the customs of the universal church, and submitting to the decrees of general councils.—13. Sixthly, In submitting to the decrees of national councils.—14. No necessity of a visible head to unite all parts of the catholic church into one communion.—15. Nor any necessity that the whole church should agree in the same rites and ceremonies, which were things of an indifferent nature.—16. What allowance was made for men, who, out of simple ignorance, brake communion with one another.—17. Of different degrees of unity; and that no one was esteemed to be in the perfect unity of the church, who was not in full communion with her. 867

CHAPTER II.

Of the discipline of the church, and the various kinds of it; together with the various methods observed in the administration of it.

SECT. 1. That the discipline of the church did not consist in cancelling or disannulling any man's baptism.—2. But in excluding men from the common benefits and privileges consequent to baptism.—3. This power originally a mere spiritual power, though in some cases the secular arm was called in to give its assistance.—4. This assistance never required to proceed so far, as for mere error to take away life, or shed blood.—5. The discipline of the church deprived no man of his natural or civil rights; much less the magistrate of his power, or allegiance due to him.—6. But consisted, first, in admonition of the offender.—7. Secondly, In suspension from the communion, called the lesser excommunication.—8. Thirdly, In expulsion from the church, called the greater excommunication, total separation, anathema, and the like.—9. This sort of excommunication commonly notified to other churches.—10. After which he that was excommunicated in one church, was held excommunicate in all churches.—11. And avoided also in civil commerce and outward conversation; and allowed no memorial after death.—12. The grounds and reasons of this practice.—13. No donations or oblations allowed to be received from excommunicate persons.—14. No one to marry with excommunicate heretics, or receive their eulogie, or read their books, but burn them.—15. What meant by delivering unto Satan.—16. What by anathema maranatha. And whether any such forms were in use in the ancient church.—17. Whether excommunication was ever pronounced with execration, or devoting the sinner to temporal destruction. 890

CHAPTER III.

Of the objects of ecclesiastical censures, or the persons on whom they might be inflicted: with a general account of the crimes for which they might be inflicted.

SECT. 1. All members of the church, falling into great and scandalous crimes, made liable to ecclesiastical censures without exception.—2. Women as well as men.—3. The rich as well as the poor. No commutation of penance allowed, nor friendship, nor favour.—4. What privilege some claimed upon the intercession of the martyrs in prison for them; and how this was answered by Cyprian.—5. Magistrates and princes subject to ecclesiastical censures as well as any others.—6. In what cases the greater excommunication was forborne for the good of the church.—7. The innocent never involved among the guilty in ecclesiastical censures. The original and novelty of popish interdicts.—8. The danger of excommunicating innocent persons.—9. No one to be excommunicated without being first heard, and allowed to speak for himself.—10. Nor without legal conviction, either by his own confession, or credible evidence of witnesses, against whom there was no just exception; or such notoriety of the fact as made a man liable to excommunication ipso facto, without any formal denunciation.—11. Excommunication not ordinarily inflicted on minors, or children under age.—12. How persons were sometimes excommunicated after death.—13. The censures of the church not to be inflicted for small offences.—14. What the ancients meant by small offences in this matter, and how they distinguished them from the greater.—15. Excommunication not inflicted for temporal causes.—16. No bishop allowed to use it to avenge any private injury done to himself.—17. No man to be excommunicated for sins only in design and intention.—18. Nor for forced or involuntary actions. 911

CHAPTER IV.

A particular account of those called great crimes. Of transgressions of the first and second commandment. Of the principal of these, viz. idolatry. Of the several species of idolatry, and degrees of punishment allotted to them according to the proportion and quality of the offences.

SECT. 1. The mistake of some about the number of great crimes, in confining them to idolatry, adultery, and murder.—2. The account given of great crimes in the civil law extended much further.—3. In the ecclesiastical law, the account of great crimes extended to the whole decalogue.—4. A particular enumeration of the great crimes against the first and second commandments. Of idolatry, and the several species or branches of it.—5. Of the sacrificati and thurificati, or such as fell into idolatry by offering incense to idols, or partaking of the sacrifices.—6. Of the libellatici. Wherein their idolatry consisted.—7. Of those who feigned themselves mad to avoid sacrificing.—8. Of contributors to idolatry. Of the flamines, munerarii, and coronati. What they were, and how guilty of idolatry.—9. How the office of the duumvirate made men guilty of idolatry, and how it was punished.—10. How actors, and stage-players, and charioteers, and other gamesters, and frequenters of the theatre and the cirque, were charged with idolatry, and punished for it.—11. Idol-makers, their crime and punishment.—12. The idolatry of building heathen temples and altars.—13. Of merchants selling frankincense to the idol temples; and the buyers and sellers of the public victims.—14. Of eating things offered to idols. How and when it stood chargeable with idolatry.—15. Whether a Christian out of curiosity might be present at an idol sacrifice, not joining in the service.—16. Whether he might eat his own meat in an idol temple.—17. Or feast with the heathen on their idol festivals.—18. Of the idolatry of worshipping angels, saints, martyrs, images, &c.—19. Of encouragers of idolatry and connivers at it. And of the contrary extreme in demolishing idols without sufficient authority to do it. 934

CHAPTER V.

Of the practice of curious and forbidden arts, divination, magic, and enchantment: and of the laws of the church made for the punishment of them.

SECT. 1. Of several sorts of divination. Particularly of judicial astrology.—2. Of augury and soothsaying.—3. Of divination by lots.—4. Of divination by express compact with Satan.—5. Of magical enchantment and sorcery.—6. Of amulets, charms, and spells, to cure diseases.—7. Of the prestige, or false miracles wrought by the power of Satan.—8. Of the observation of days and accidents, and making presages and omens upon them. 948

CHAPTER VI.

Of apostacy to Judaism, and paganism; of heresy and schism; and of sacrilege and simony.

SECT. 1. Of such as apostatized totally from Christianity to Judaism.—2. Of such as mingled the Jewish religion and the Christian together.—3. Of such as communicated with the Jews in their unlawful rites and practices.—4. Of such as apostatized voluntarily into heathenism.—5. Of heretics and schismatics, and their punishments both ecclesiastical and civil.—6. A particular account of the civil punishments inflicted on them by the laws of the state.—7. How heretics were treated by the discipline of the church. First, they were anathematized, and cast out of the church.—8. Secondly, Debarred from entering the church by some canons, though not by all.—9. Thirdly, No one to encourage heretics and schismatics by frequenting their assemblies.—10. Fourthly, No one to eat or converse with heretics, or receive their presents, or retain their writings, or make marriages with them, &c.—11. Fifthly, Heretics not allowed to be evidence in any ecclesiastical cause against a catholic.—12. Sixthly, Heretics not allowed to succeed to any paternal inheritance.—13. No heretic to have promotion among the clergy after his return to the church.—14. No one to be ordained, who kept any in his family that were not of the catholic faith.—15. No one to bring his cause before an heretical judge under pain of excommunication.—16. What term of penance imposed upon relenting heretics.—17. How this varied according to the age, and state, and condition of several sorts of heretics.—18. Heresiarchs more severely treated than their followers.—19. And voluntary deserters more severely than they who complied only out of fear.—20. A difference made between such heretics as retained the form of baptism, and such as rejected or corrupted it.—21. No one to be reputed a formal heretic, before he contumaciously resisted the admonition of the church.—22. The like distinctions observed in inflicting the censures of the church upon schismatics, according to the different nature and various degrees of their schism.—23. Of sacrilege. Particularly of diverting things appropriated to sacred uses, to other purposes.—24. Of sacrilege committed in robbing graves.—25. The sacrilege of the ancient traitors, who delivered up their Bibles and sacred utensils to the heathen to be burnt.—26. The sacrilege of profaning the sacraments, and churches, and altars, and the Holy Scriptures, &c.—27. The sacrilege of depriving men of the use of the Scripture, and the word of God, and the sacraments, particularly the cup in the Lord's supper.—28. Of simony in buying and selling spiritual gifts.—29. Of simony in purchasing spiritual preferments.—30. Of simony in ambitious usurpation of holy offices, and intrusion into other men's places and preferments. 959

CHAPTER VII.

Of sins against the third commandment, blasphemy, profane swearing, perjury, and breach of vows.

SECT. 1. The blasphemy of apostates.—2. The blasphemy of heretics and profane Christians.—3. The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. Where is particularly inquired, What notion the ancients had of it; in what sense they believed it unpardonable; and what censures they inflicted on it.—4. Of profane swearing. All oaths not forbidden.—5. But only the custom of vain and common swearing.—6. And swearing by the creatures.—7. And by the emperor's genius, and saints, and angels, &c.—8. Of perjury, and its punishment.—9. Of breach of vows. 978

CHAPTER VIII.

Of sins against the fourth commandment, or violations of the law enjoining the religious observation of the Lord's day.

SECT. 1. Absenting from religious assemblies on the Lord's day, how punished by the laws of the church.—2. Of frequenting some part of the Lord's day service, and neglecting the rest.—3. Fasting on the Lord's day prohibited under pain of excommunication.—4. Frequenting the theatres and other shows and pastimes on this day, how punished. 991

CHAPTER IX.

Of great transgressions against the fifth commandment, viz. disobedience to parents and masters; treason and rebellion against princes; and contempt of the laws of the church.

SECT. 1. Children not to desert their parents under pretence of religion. The censure of such as taught otherwise.—2. Children not to marry without the consent of their parents.—3. Nor slaves without the consent of their masters.—4. The punishment of treason, and disrespect to princes.—5. Contemners of the laws of the church, how censured. 993

CHAPTER X.

Of great transgressions against the sixth commandment; of murder and manslaughter, parricide, self-murder, dismembering the body, exposing of infants, causing of abortion, &c.

SECT. 1. Murder ever reckoned a capital and unpardonable crime by the laws of the state.—2. How punished by the laws of the church.—3. The heinousness of murder when joined with other crimes, as idolatry, adultery, and magical practices.—4. Causing of abortion condemned and punished as murder.—5. The punishment of parricide.—6. Of self-murder.—7. Of dismembering the body.—8. Of involuntary murder by chance, or manslaughter.—9. False witness against any man's life reputed murder.—10. Informers against the brethren in time of persecution, treated as murderers.—11. Exposing of infants reputed murder.—12. If a virgin deflowered by a rape kills herself for grief, the corrupter is reputed guilty of the murder.—13. The lanista, or fencing-masters, reputed accessories to murder, and their calling condemned.—14. Spectators of the murders committed on the stage, accounted accessories to murder also.—15. Famishers of the poor and indigent reputed guilty of murder.—16. And all they by whose authority murder was committed.—17. Enmity, and strife, and quarrelling, punished as lower degrees of murder. 997

CHAPTER XI.

Of great transgressions against the seventh commandment; fornication, adultery, incest, polygamy, &c.

SECT. 1. The punishment of fornication.—2. Of adultery.—3. Of incest.—4. Whether the marriage of cousin-germans was reckoned incest.—5. Of polygamy and concubinage.—6. Of marrying after unlawful divorce.—7. Of second, third, and fourth marriages.—8. Of ravishment.—9. Of unnatural impurities.—10. Of maintaining and allowing harlots.—11. Of writing and reading lascivious books.—12. Frequenting the theatre and stage-plays forbidden upon this account.—13. As also all excess of riot and intemperance for the same reason.—14. And promiscuous bathing of men and women together.—15. And promiscuous and lascivious dancing, wanton songs, &c.—16. As also promiscuous clothing, or men and women interchanging apparel.—17. And suspected vigils, or pernoctations of women in churches under pretence of devotion. 1004

CHAPTER XII.

Of great transgressions of the eighth commandment, theft, oppression, fraud, &c.

SECT. 1. The censure of those heretics who taught the doctrine of renunciation, or necessity of having all things common.—2. Of plagiary or man-stealing.—3. Of malicious injustice.—4. Of simple theft.—5. Of detaining lost goods from the true owner.—6. Of refusing to pay just debts.—7. And what men are bound to by the obligation of promise and contract.—8. Of removing bounds and landmarks.—9. Of oppression.—10. Of the exactions and bribery of judges.—11. Of the exactions of publicans, and collectors of the public revenues, and other officers of the Roman empire.—12. Of the exactions of advocates and lawyers, and apparitors of judges.—13. Of griping usury and extortion.—14. Of forgery.—15. Of calumny with regard to men's estates and fortunes: and the reverse of it, the fraud of adulation and flattery.—16. Of deceitfulness in trust.—17. Of deceitfulness in traffic.—18. Of abetting and concealing of robbers; buying stolen goods, &c.—19. Idleness censured as the mother of robbery.—20. And gaming as an occasion of fraud, and ruin of many poor families, who by this means were reduced to the greatest exigence. 1018

CHAPTER XIII.

Of great transgressions against the ninth commandment, false accusation, libelling, informing, calumny and slander, railing and reviling.

SECT. 1. Of false witness.—2. Of libelling.—3. Of detraction, whispering, and backbiting.—4. Of railing and reviling, or scurrilous and abusive language, and of revealing secrets.—5. Of lying. How far it brought men under the discipline of the church. 1032

CHAPTER XIV.

Of great transgressions against the tenth commandment, envy, covetousness, &c.

SECT. 1. Whether envy brought men under the discipline of the church.—2. Of pride, ambition, and vain-glory.—3. Of covetousness.—4. Of carnal lusts. 1036

BOOK XVII.

OF THE EXERCISE OF DISCIPLINE UPON THE CLERGY IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the difference of ecclesiastical censures inflicted on clergymen and laymen.

SECT. 1. The peculiar notion of communion ecclesiastical, and excommunication ecclesiastical, as applied to the clergy.—2. The clergy usually punished by a removal from their office, but not always subjected to public penance, as men wholly cast out of the communion of the church.—3. Yet in some special cases both penalties inflicted.—4. Of suspension from their revenues.—5. Of suspension from their office.—6. Of deposition or degradation. 1038

CHAPTER II.

Of reducing the clergy to the state and communion of laymen, as a punishment for great offences.

SECT. 1. Lay communion not the same as communion in one kind only.—2. Neither does it signify barely communicating among laymen without the rails of the chancel.—3. But a total degradation, or deprivation of orders, and reduction to the state and condition of laymen.—4. Clergymen thus reduced, seldom allowed to recover their ancient station.—5. Notwithstanding the indelible character of ordination.—6. But sometimes excommunicated, as well as deposed, and denied the communion of laymen.—7. Sometimes removed and corrected by the assistance and authority of the secular power.—8. What meant by the punishment called curie tradi, or delivering up to the secular court. 1040

CHAPTER III.

Of the punishment called peregrina communio, or reducing clergymen to the communion of strangers.

SECT. 1. The several canons wherein this punishment is mentioned.—2. The communion of strangers not the same as lay communion.—3. Nor communion in one kind.—4. Nor communion at the hour of death.—5. Nor the communion of such as were enjoined to go on pilgrimage on earth, which was a piece of discipline unknown to the ancients.—6. Nor any private and peculiar oblation for strangers.—7. But communicating only as strangers travelling without commendatory letters, who might partake of the church's charity, but not of the communion of the altar.—8. This notion confirmed from several parts of ancient history.—9. What sort of penance was necessary to restore such delinquent clergymen to their office and station again. 1044

CHAPTER IV.

Of some other special and peculiar ways of inflicting punishment on the clergy.

SECT. 1. Sometimes the clergy perpetually suspended from their office, yet allowed to retain their title and dignity.—2. Sometimes degraded not totally, but partially, from one order to another.—3. Sometimes deprived of a part of their office, but allowed to exercise the rest.—4. Sometimes deprived of their power over a part of their flock, but allowed it over the rest.—5. Bishops in Africa punished by depriving them of their seniority, and right of succeeding to the primacy, or metropolitanical power.—6. Also by confining them to the communion of their own church.—7. Or by removing them from a greater diocese to a lesser.—8. The clergy in general punished by a loss of their seniority among those of their own order.—9. The inferior clergy punished by rendering them incapable of being promoted to any higher order.—10. The clergy sometimes punished by denying them the public exercise of their office, whilst they were allowed to officiate in private.—11. Of intrusion of offenders into a monastery to do penance in private.—12. Of corporal punishment. How far used as a piece of discipline upon the inferior clergy. 1048

CHAPTER V.

A particular account of the crimes for which clergy-men were liable to be punished with any of the fore-mentioned kinds of censure.

SECT. 1. All crimes that were punished with excommuni-cation in a layman, punished with suspension or deprivation in the clergy.—2. Some crimes rendered an ordination originally void; and for such crimes the clergy were immediately liable to be degraded, from the very moment of their ordination. As, first, for ignorance or heterodoxy in religion.—3. Secondly, for great immorality before their ordination: and for being ordained against any of the known rules of ordination. As, if he were a digamist, or married to a widow, or to one that had been divorced from another man. If he were ordained ἀπολελυμένος, without being fixed to some particular diocese. If he were ordained without letters dimissory against the consent of his own bishop; or without the consent of any of the parties that had a right to vote in his election. If any bishop was or-dained, who had before been degraded from his orders. Or if he was ordained into a full see, where another was regularly ordained before him. If any was an energumen, or under the agitation of an evil spirit, when he was ordained. If any had voluntarily mangled his own body. If any one was ordained, who had never been baptized, or not baptized in due form, or was baptized by heretics, or rebaptized by them. If any made use of the secular powers to gain a promotion in the church. If a bishop ordained any of his own un-worthy kindred. If a bishop clandestinely ordained his own successor without the consent of the metropolitan or a provincial council; or if two bishops clandestinely ordained a bishop without the consent of their fellow bishops and the metropolitan: in all these cases the clergy so ordained were liable to be deposed for trans-gressing the rules of ordination.—4. No remedy al-lowed in this case by doing public penance for offences. For all public penitents were for ever incapable of ordination. And if any such were ordained, they were immediately liable to be deposed and degraded.—5. Some impediments of ordination arising from men's out-ward state and condition in the world, were also some-times occasions of deprivation. As if any soldier was ordained; or any slave or vassal, without the consent of his master; or any member of a civil corporation, or any of the curiales in the Roman government.—6. What crimes might occasion the deprivation of the clergy, or other censures to befall them, in the performance of their office, or rather non-performance of it after ordination. Clergymen to be censured for contempt of the canons in general.—7. More particularly for negligence in their duty.—8. For neglecting to use the public liturgy, Lord's prayer, hymns, &c.—9. For making any alteration in the form of baptism.—10. For not frequenting Divine service daily.—11. For meddling with secular offices.—12. For deserting their own church without licence, to go to another.—13. For officiating after the condemnation of a synod.—14. For appealing from the censure of a provincial synod to any foreign churches.—15. For refusing to end contro-versies before bishops, and flying to a secular tribunal.—16. For suffering themselves to be rebaptized, or reordained.—17. For denying themselves to be clergy-men.—18. For publishing apocryphal books.—19. For superstitious abstinence from flesh, wine, &c.—20. For eating of blood.—21. For contemning the fasts or fes-tivals of the church.—22. For not observing the rule about Easter.—23. For wearing an indecent habit.—24. For keeping hawks or hounds, and following any unlawful diversions.—25. For suspicious cohabitation with strange women.—26. For marrying after ordina-tion.—27. For retaining an adulterous wife.—28. For non-residence.—29. For attempting to hold preferment in two dioceses.—30. For needless frequenting of public inns and taverns.—31. For conversing familiarly with Jews, heretics, or Gentile philosophers.—32. For using over-rigorous severity toward lapsers.—33. For want of charity to indigent clergymen in their necessity.—34. For judging in cases of blood.—35. Crimes for which bishops in particular might be suspended or de-graded. For giving ordinations contrary to the canons.—36. For neglecting to put the laws of discipline in execution.—37. For dividing their diocese, and erect-ing new bishoprics without leave: or for extending their claim to other men's rights beyond their own limits and jurisdiction.—38. For not attending provin-cial councils.—39. For oppressing the people with unjust exactions.—40. For harbouring such as fled from another diocese without leave.—41. Chorepiscopi might be censured for acting beyond their commission.—42. And presbyters for usurping upon the episcopal office.—43. And deacons for assuming offices and privileges above their order and station. 1053

BOOK XVIII.

OF THE SEVERAL ORDERS OF PENITENTS, AND THE METHOD OF PERFORMING PUBLIC PENANCE IN THE CHURCH, BY GOING THROUGH THE SEVERAL STAGES OF REPENTANCE.

CHAPTER I.

A particular account of the several orders of peni-tents in the church.

SECT. 1. Penitents divided into four distinct orders, or stations.—2. The first original of this distinction.—3. Of the first order, called flentes, or mourners.—4. Of the second order, called audientes, or hearers.—5. Of the third order, called prostrators, or kneelers, and penitents in the strictest sense.—6. Of the fourth or-der, called consistentes, or co-standers. 1068

CHAPTER II.

Of the ceremonies used in admitting penitents to do public penance, and the manner of performing pub-lic penance in the church.

SECT. 1. Penitents first admitted to penance by imposi-tion of hands.—2. At which time they were obliged to appear before the bishop with sackcloth and ashes upon their head. This ceremony anciently not con-fined to Ash-Wednesday, or the beginning of Lent, but persons were admitted to penance at any time, as the bishop judged most proper in his own discretion.—3. Penitents obliged to cut off their hair, or go veiled, as another token of sorrow and mourning.—4. Penitents to abstain from bathing and feasting, and other innocent diversions of life.—5. Penitents to observe all the public fasts of the church.—6. Penitents to restrain themselves in the use of the conjugal state.—7. For which reason no married persons were admitted to penance, but by consent of both parties.—8. Penitents not allowed to marry in the time of their penance.—9. Penitents obliged to pray kneeling, whilst others prayed standing, on all festivals and days of relaxation.—10. Penitents obliged to show great liberality to the poor.—11. And to minister and serve the church in burying the dead. 1071

CHAPTER III.

A particular account of the exomologesis, or penitential confession of the ancient church; showing it to be a different thing from the private or auricular confession introduced by the church of Rome.

SECT. 1. The gross mistake of those, who make the exomologesis of the ancient church to signify auricular confession.—2. No necessity of auricular confession ever urged by the ancient church.—3. This proved further from the practice of the ancients in denying all manner of absolution to some relapsing sinners, without excluding them from the mercy and pardon of God, upon confession to him alone.—4. And from above twenty considerations of the like nature.—5. Yet private confession allowed and encouraged in some cases. As, first, For lesser sins, men were advised mutually to confess to one another, to have each other's prayers and assistance.—6. Secondly, In case of injuries done to private persons, men were obliged to confess and ask pardon of the injured party.—7. Thirdly, When they were under any troubles of conscience, they were advised to make private confession to a minister, to have his counsel and direction.—8.

Fourthly, To take his advice also, whether it was proper to do public penance for private offences.—9. Fifthly, When there was any danger of death arising from the laws of the state against certain offences.—10. Sixthly, Private confession was also required in case of private admonition for offences.—11. The office of the penitentiary priest set up in many churches to receive and regulate such private confessions.—12. This office was afterwards abrogated in the East by Nectarius, and men were left to their liberty as to what concerned private confession. 1074

CHAPTER IV.

Of the great rigour, strictness, and severity of the discipline and penance of the ancient church.

SECT. 1. Public penance ordinarily allowed but once to any sort of sinners.—2. Some sinners held under a strict penance all their lives to the very hour of death.—3. Such as were absolved upon a death-bed, were obliged to perform their ordinary penance, if they recovered.—4. Some sinners were denied communion at their last hour.—5. How this may be vindicated and cleared from the charge of Novatianism.—6. This rigour abated in after ages, without any reflection on the preceding practice.—7. What liberty was allowed to bishops in imposing of penance, and exacting proper satisfaction of sinners. Some sinners allowed to do penance twice.—8. Bishops had also power to moderate the term of penance upon just occasion.—9. And this was the true ancient notion of an indulgence.—10. Which was sometimes granted at the intercession of the martyrs, or the instance of the civil magistrate.—11. Bishops had also a power to alter the nature of the penalty in some measure, as well as the term of it.—12. What the ancients mean by the term, legitima pœnitentia.—13. What meant by the phrase, inter hyemantes orare. 1084

BOOK XIX.

OF ABSOLUTION, OR THE MANNER OF READMITTING PENITENTS INTO THE COMMUNION OF THE CHURCH AGAIN.

CHAPTER I.

Of the nature of absolution, and the several sorts of it; more particularly of such as relate to the penitential discipline of the church.

SECT. 1. All church absolution only ministerial, not absolute.—2. Of the grand absolution of baptism. That this was of no use in penitential discipline to persons once baptized.—3. Of the absolution granted by the eucharist.—4. Of absolution declaratory and effective by the administration of the word and doctrine.—5. Of the precatory absolution given by imposition of hands and prayer.—6. Of the judicial absolution of penitents, by restoring them to the peace and full communion of the church. 1095

CHAPTER II.

Of the circumstances, rites, and customs anciently observed in the public absolution of sinners.

SECT. 1. No sinners anciently absolved, till they had performed their regular penance, except in case of imminent death.—2. Penitents publicly reconciled in sackcloth at the altar.—3. Sometimes more publicly before the apsis or reading-desk.—4. Absolution at the altar always given in a supplicatory form by imposition of hands and prayer.—5. Absolution in the indicative form, Ego te absolvo, not used till the twelfth century.—6. In what sense that form may be allowed.—7. Why chrism or unction was sometimes added to imposition of hands in the reconciliation of certain heretics and schismatics to the church.—8. Why some heretics could be reconciled no other way but by a new baptism.—9. What conditions were required of those, who fell from the church into any heresy or schism, when they were reconciled to the church again.—10. Of the time of absolution.—11. How the church absolved some penitents, and received them into communion after death. 1101

CHAPTER III.

Of the minister of ecclesiastical discipline, and particularly of the minister of absolution.

SECT. 1. All the power of discipline primarily lodged in the hands of the bishop.—2. This in many cases committed to presbyters, either by a general or particular commission.—3. And to deacons also.—4. How far, and in what sense, absolution might be said to be given by a layman. 1108

APPENDIX.

Containing two Sermons and two Letters to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Winchester, concerning the nature and necessity of the several sorts of absolution ; showing how far that necessity extends, and where it ceases.

SERMON I.	1112
SERMON II.	1118
LETTER I.	1125
LETTER II.	1128

BOOK XX.

OF THE FESTIVALS OBSERVED IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the distinction to be made between civil and ecclesiastical festivals.

SECT. 1. What meant by the civil festivals.—2. Of the feriæ æstivæ, or thirty days of vacation in the harvest month, and the feriæ autumnales.—3. Of the calends of January.—4. Of the emperors' birthdays.—5. Of the natales urbium, or the two feriæ in memory of the foundation of Rome and Constantinople. 1132

CHAPTER II.

Of the original and observation of the Lord's day among Christians.

SECT. 1. The Lord's day of continued observation in the church from the days of the apostles, under the names of Sunday, the Lord's day, the first day of the week, and the day of breaking bread, &c.—2. All proceedings at law forbidden and suspended on this day, except such as were of absolute necessity or great charity ; as manumission of slaves, &c.—3. All secular business forbidden, except such as necessity or charity compelled men to, as gathering of their fruits in harvest, by some laws.—4. No public games, or shows, or ludicrous recreations on this day.—5. All fasting prohibited on this day, even in the time of Lent.—6. And all prayers offered in the standing posture on the Lord's day, in memory of our Saviour's resurrection.—7. The great care and concern of the primitive Christians in the religious observation of the Lord's day. This demonstrated, first, From their constant attendance upon all the solemnities of public worship.—8. Secondly, From their zeal in frequenting religious assemblies even in times of persecution.—9. Thirdly, From their studious observation of the vigils or nocturnal assemblies preceding the Lord's day.—10. Fourthly, From their attendance upon sermons in many places twice on this day.—11. Fifthly, From their attendance on evening prayers where there was no sermon.—12. Sixthly, From the censures inflicted on those who violated the laws concerning the religious observation of the Lord's day. 1135

CHAPTER III.

Of the observation of the sabbath, or Saturday, as a weekly festival.

SECT. 1. The Saturday, or sabbath, always observed in the Eastern church as a festival.—2. Observed with the same religious solemnities as the Lord's day.—3. But in some other respects the preference was given to the Lord's day.—4. Why the ancient church continued the observation of the Jewish sabbath.—5. Why it was kept as a festival in the Oriental church.—6. And why a fast in the Roman, and some other of the Latin churches. 1147

CHAPTER IV.

Of the festival of Christ's Nativity and Epiphany.

SECT. 1. The nativity of Christ anciently by some said to be in May.—2. By others, fixed to the day of Epiphany, or sixth of January.—3. In the Latin church always observed on the twenty-fifth of December.—4. The original of this festival derived from the apostolical age by some ancient writers.—5. This festival observed with the same religious veneration as the Lord's day.—6. Of Epiphany as a distinct festival.—7. Why this day called by some the second Epiphany, and dies luminum, the day of lights.—8. Celebrated as all other great festivals, and in one respect more noted, as being in the Greek church one of the three solemn times of baptism.—9. Notice usually given on Epiphany concerning the time of Easter in the ensuing year. 1151

CHAPTER V.

Of Easter, or the Paschal festival.

SECT. 1. The Paschal solemnity anciently reckoned fifteen days, the whole week before and the week after Easter Sunday.—2. Great disputes in the church concerning this festival, some observing it on a fixed day every year.—3. Others observing it, with the Jews, on the fourteenth day of the moon, whatever day of the week that happened upon.—4. They who kept it on the Lord's day did not always agree to fix it on the same Lord's day, by reason of their different calculations.—5. But they all agreed to pay a great respect and honour to it, as to the day of our Lord's resurrection.—6. On this day the emperors granted a general release to the prisons, and pardoned all criminals, except some few that were guilty of crimes of a more unpardonable nature.—7. At this time also it was usual more than ordinary for men to show their charity to slaves by granting them their freedom.—8. And to the poor by liberal donations.—9. The whole week after Easter-day celebrated with sermons, communions, &c., as part of the same festival.—10. All public games prohibited during this whole season.—11. And all proceedings at law, except in some special and extraordinary cases.—12. The Sunday after Easter, commonly called Dominica nova, and Dominica in albis, observed with great solemnity as the conclusion of the Paschal festival. 1157

CHAPTER VI.

Of Pentecost, or Whitsuntide.

SECT. 1. Pentecost taken in a double sense among the ancients. First, For the fifty days between Easter and Whitsuntide ; and, secondly, For the single day of Pentecost.—2. During which time the church chiefly exercised herself in reading and meditating upon the Acts of the Apostles, as the great confirmation of our Lord's resurrection.—3. All fasting and kneeling at prayers prohibited at this season, as on the Lord's day.—4. And all public games and stage-plays; but not pleading at law forbidden, or bodily labour.—5. Of Ascension-day, its antiquity and observation.—6. Of Pentecost in the stricter sense, as denoting the festival of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles. 1167

CHAPTER VII.

Of the festivals of the apostles and martyrs.

SECT. 1.—The original of the festivals of martyrs.—2. Why called their natalitia or birthdays.—3. These festivals usually kept at the graves of the martyrs.—4. And mostly confined to those particular churches where the martyrs suffered and lay buried.—5. Usual to read the acts or passions of the martyrs on their proper festivals.—6. And to make panegyric orations upon them.—7. The communion always administered upon these days.—8. And herein a particular commemoration of the martyrs was made, called the oblation or sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving to God for them, and prayer for a general consummation and happy resurrection.—9. The night preceding any of these festivals commonly observed as a vigil, with psalmody and prayers.—10. Common entertainments made by the rich for the use of the poor upon these festivals at the graves of the martyrs, till abuses caused them to be laid aside.—11. What festivals observed in memory of the apostles.—12. The festival of the Holy Innocents.—13. The festival of the Maccabees.—14. Of the general festival of all the martyrs. . . 1171

CHAPTER VIII.

Of some other festivals of a later date and lesser observation.

SECT. 1.—Of the encenia, or feasts of dedications of churches.—2. Of the anniversary festivals of bishops' ordinations.—3. Of festivals kept in memory of any great deliverances or signal mercies vouchsafed by God to his church.—4. Of the feast of the Annunciation.—5. Of the festival called Hypapante, afterward Purification, and Candlemas-day.—6. The original of festivals in honour of confessors and other holy men. 1179

BOOK XXI.

OF THE FASTS IN USE IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of the quadragesimal or Lent fast.

SECT. 1. What this fast was originally, forty days or forty hours.—2. Some probability that at first it was only a fast of forty hours, or the two days from the passion to the resurrection.—3. Great variety in point of time observable in the celebration of this fast in many churches.—4. Lent consisted not of above thirty-six fasting days in any church till the time of Gregory the Great, because all Sundays were universally excepted out of the fast, and all Saturdays except one in all the Eastern churches.—5. Who first added Ash Wednesday and the other three days in the Roman church to the beginning of Lent.—6. Whether the ancients reputed Lent to be an apostolical institution.—7. In what sense some of them say it is a Divine institution.—8. How far allowed to be a tradition or canon apostolical.—9. What were the causes or reasons of instituting the Lent fast. First, The apostles' sorrow for the loss of their Master.—10. Secondly, The declension of Christian piety from its first and primitive fervour.—11. Thirdly, That men might prepare themselves for a worthy participation of the communion at Easter.—12. Fourthly, That catechumens might prepare themselves for baptism.—13. And penitents for absolution at Easter.—14. Lent generally observed by all Christians, though with a great liberty and just allowance to men's infirmities, being in a great measure left to their own discretion.—15. How the Montanists differed from the church about the imposition of fasts.—16. The Lent fast kept with a perfect abstinence from all food every day till evening.—17. Change of diet not accounted a proper fast for Lent, without perfect abstinence till evening.—18. What they spared in a dinner, not spent in evening luxury, but bestowed on the poor.—19. All corporeal punishments forbidden by the imperial laws in Lent.—20. Religious assemblies and sermons every day in Lent.—21. And frequent communions, especially on the sabbath and the Lord's day.—22. All public games and stage-plays prohibited at this season.—23. As also the celebration of all festivals, birthdays, and marriages, as unsuitable to the present occasion.—24. The great week before Easter observed with greater strictness and solemnity.—25. What meant by the fasts, called ὑπερθέσεις, and superpositiones, superpository or additional fasts in this week.—26. Christians more liberal in their alms and charity this week above others.—27. This week a week of rest and liberty for servants.—28. A general release granted at this time by the emperors to all prisoners, both debtors and criminals, some particular cases of criminals only excepted.—29. All processes at law, as well civil as criminal, suspended this whole week before Easter.—30. The Thursday in this week, how observed.—31. Of the Passion day, or the Pasch of our Lord's crucifixion.—32. Of the Saturday, or great sabbath, before Easter. 1183

CHAPTER II.

Of the fasts of the four seasons; of monthly fasts, and the original of Ember weeks and Rogation days.

SECT. 1. The fast of March, or the first month, the same with the Lent fast.—2. The fast of Pentecost.—3. The fast of the seventh month, or the autumnal fast.—4. The Advent or Nativity fast, called the fast of December, or the tenth month.—5. The fast at Epiphany.—6. Of monthly fasts.—7. The original of the four Ember weeks, or ordination fasts.—8. The original of the Rogation fast. 1200

CHAPTER III.

Of the weekly fasts of Wednesdays and Fridays, or the stationary days of the ancient church.

SECT. 1. The original of these fasts.—2. The reasons of their institution.—3. How they differed from the Lent fasts and all others in point of duration.—4. With what solemnity they were observed.—5. How the catholics and Montanists disputed about the observation of them.—6. How the Wednesday fast came to be changed to Saturday in the Western churches. . . 1203

BOOK XXII.

OF THE MARRIAGE RITES OBSERVED IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

A short account of the heretics who condemned or vilified marriage anciently, under pretence of greater purity and perfection; and of such also as gave licence to community of wives and fornication.

SECT. 1. Community of wives first taught by Simon Magus.—2. Afterward by Saturnilus, and the Nicolaitans, and many others.—3. Hence arose the calumny of the Gentiles against the Christians in general, that they practised impurity in their religious assemblies.—4. These doctrines being fetched from the very dregs of Gentilism, and scandalous in the eyes of sober heathens.—5. Marriage condemned as unlawful by Tatian and the Encratites.—6. Also by the Apostolici or Apotactici.—7. By the Manichees, Severians, and Archontici.—8. By the Hieracians, and Eustathians.—9. Who were condemned in the council of Gangra, and those called the Apostolical Canons.—10. The error of the Montanists about second marriages; and of the Novatians also. 1207

CHAPTER II.

Of the just impediments of marriage in particular cases, showing, what persons might or might not be lawfully joined together; and of the times and seasons when the celebration of marriage was forbidden.

SECT. 1. Christians not to marry with infidels, or Jews, or heretics, or any of a different religion.—2. All Christians obliged to acquaint the church with their designs of marriage before they completed it.—3. Not to marry with persons of near alliance, either by consanguinity or affinity, to avoid suspicion of incest.—4. Children under age not to marry without the consent of their parents, or guardians, or next relations.—5. Slaves not to marry without consent of their masters.—6. Persons of superior rank not to marry slaves.—7. Judges of provinces not to marry any provincial woman, during the year of their administration.—8. Widows not to marry again till twelve months after their husband's death.—9. Women not to marry in the absence of their husbands, till they were certified of their death.—10. Guardians not to marry orphans in their minority, till their guardianship was ended.—11. When first the prohibition of spiritual relations marrying one with another came in.—12. Whether a man might marry after a lawful divorce.—13. Whether an adulterer might marry an adulteress, whom he had defiled, after the death of her husband.—14. The celebration of marriage forbidden in Lent. 1211

CHAPTER III.

Of the manner of making espousals preceding marriage in the ancient church.

SECT. 1. How the sponsalia or espousals differed from marriage.—2. Free consent of parties necessary in espousals.—3. The contract of espousals usually testified by gifts, called arræ, or donationes sponsalitiæ, which were sometimes mutually given and received both by the man and woman.—4. These donations to be entered into public acts, and set upon record.—5. The contract further testified by giving and receiving of a ring.—6. And by a solemn kiss, and joining of hands.—7. And by settling of a dowry in writing.—8. And by transacting the whole affair before a competent number of witnesses.—9. How far the obligation of espousals extended.—10. Whether they were simply and absolutely necessary to precede a just and legal marriage. 1223

CHAPTER IV.

Of the manner of celebrating marriage in the ancient church.

SECT. 1. The solemnities of marriage between Christians usually celebrated by the ministers of the church from the beginning.—2. In what cases it might happen to be otherwise.—3. How the primitive practice was revived when it came to be neglected.—4. Other ceremonies used in marriage, as joining of hands and veiling.—5. Untying the woman's hair.—6. Crowning the new-married couple with crowns or garlands.—7. Carrying the bride home to the bridegroom's house; how far necessary in some cases of law.—8. How far the marriage pomp was allowed or disallowed by the ancient fathers. 1229

CHAPTER V.

Of divorces: how far they were allowed or disallowed by the ancient Christians.

SECT. 1. The ancients divided about the sense of fornication. Some taking it only for carnal fornication, and making it the only just cause of divorce.—2. Others took it to imply spiritual fornication, that is, idolatry and apostasy from God, and other crimes of the like nature.—3. This later opinion from the time of Constantine much countenanced by the laws of the state. First, By Constantine himself.—4. Then by Honorius.—5. And Theodosius junior.—6. And Valentinian III.—7. And Anastasius.—8. And Justinian. 1235

BOOK XXIII.

OF FUNERAL RITES, OR THE CUSTOM AND MANNER OF BURYING THE DEAD, OBSERVED IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

Of cemeteries, or burying-places; with an inquiry, how and when the custom of burying in churches first came in.

SECT. 1. A cemetery a common name for a burying-place and a church. How this came to pass.—2. No burying-places in cities or churches for the first three hundred years.—3. But either in monuments erected by the public ways, or in vaults and catacombs in the fields under-ground.—4. Burying in cities and churches prohibited by Christian emperors for several ages after.—5. The first step made toward burying in churches, was the building of churches over the graves of the martyrs in the country, or else translating their relics into the city churches.—6. The next was, allowing kings and emperors to be buried in the atrium, or porch, or outer buildings of the church.—7. Then the people in the sixth century began to be admitted into the church-yards, but not into the church.—8. And in this period of time, kings, bishops, founders of churches, and other eminent persons were by some laws allowed to be buried in churches.—9. The matter at last left to the discretion of bishops and presbyters, who should or should not be buried in churches. Hereditary sepulchres not allowed in the ninth century, but brought in by the pope's decretals. The complaints of the learned against this new custom of burying in churches. 1240

CHAPTER II.

Some further observations concerning the place, and manner, and time of burial.

SECT. 1. Consecration of cemeteries not very ancient.—2. The sacredness of them arising from another reason, and not from their formal consecration.—3. The way of adorning graves different among heathens and Christians.—4. They differed also in the manner of burying; the heathens commonly burning the body, and putting the bones and ashes in urns; but the Christians buried the body whole in the earth, abhorring the heathen custom.—5. Anointing and embalming of bodies much used by Christians; and why more by them than by the heathens.—6. The Christians usually buried by day, the heathens by night. 1247

CHAPTER III.

How they prepared the body for the funeral, and with what religious ceremonies and solemnities they interred it.

SECT. 1. Christians always careful to bury the dead, even with the hazard of their lives.—2. How they prepared the body for burial. First, Closing its eyes and mouth: a decent circumstance observed by all nations.—3. Then washing the body in water.—4. Dressing it in funeral robes, and these sometimes rich and splendid.—5. Watching and attending it in its coffin till the time of the funeral.—6. The exportation of the body performed by near relations, or persons of dignity, or any charitable persons, as the case and circumstances of the party required.—7. Particular orders of men appointed in some great churches, under the names of copiata and parabolani, to take care of the sick, and perform all these offices for the dead.—8. Psalmody the great ceremony used in all processions of funerals among Christians, in opposition to the heathen piping and funeral song.—9. Crowning the coffin with garlands not allowed among Christians, though they scrupled not to carry lights before them.—10. Funeral orations made in the praise of eminent persons.—11. Together with psalmody and the usual service of the church.—12. And sometimes the oblation of the eucharist.—13. With particular prayers for the dead.—14. A corrupt custom of giving the kiss of peace and the eucharist to the dead, corrected by the ancient canons.—15. Almsdeeds commonly added to prayers for the dead.—16. And repeated yearly upon the anniversary days of commemoration of the dead.—17. But this often degenerated into great excesses and abuses, which are complained of as no better than the parentalia of the Gentiles.—18. Decent expressions of moderate sorrow at funerals not disallowed; but the heathenish custom of hiring præfæ, or mourning women, sharply reproved by the ancients.—19. The novendial of the heathen rejected as a superstitious practice.—20. The custom of strewing flowers upon the graves of the dead retained without offence.—21. As also wearing a mourning habit for some time, though thought more commendable to omit it altogether.—22. Some other rites not allowed by the church, as pouring oil upon the dead, and offering a sacrifice of oil and wax as a burnt-offering to God.—23. What sort of persons were denied the privilege of being buried with these solemnities; viz. catechumens dying in neglect or contempt of baptism; self-murderers; criminals executed for their villainies; excommunicated persons, heretics, schismatics, &c. 1253

CHAPTER IV.

An account of the laws made to secure the bodies and graves of the dead from the violence of robbers and sacrilegious invaders, and buyers and sellers of relics, and their worshippers.

SECT. 1. The old Roman laws very severe against robbers of graves, and all abuses and injuries done to the bodies of the dead.—2. This severity continued for the most part under the Christian emperors, with some additional circumstances.—3. No indulgence allowed to robbers of graves by the emperors at the Easter festival.—4. For this crime a woman was allowed by the laws to give a bill of divorce to her husband.—5. One reason tempting men to commit this crime, was the rich adorning of the heathen sepulchres.—6. A more plausible pretence was taken up from the laws, that ordered all heathen altars and images to be destroyed.—7. A third reason was, to get the relics of martyrs to sell and make gain of them.—8. A peculiar custom in Egypt of keeping the bodies embalmed and unburied in their houses above-ground, much reproved by St. Anthony.—9. No religious worship allowed to be given to relics in the ancient church, till after the time of St. Austin. 1266

AFTER these collections were printed off, I had occasion to make one remark upon a word used in the first Book, chap. 2. sect. 17, which because I have no opportunity to mention elsewhere, the reader may please to take it in this place. The name pilosiota, which I say the Origenians used as a term of reproach for the catholics, ought rather to be read pelusioite, from πῆλος, lutum; in which sense it signifies earthly, sensual, carnally-minded men, which were the names the Origenians bestowed upon the orthodox, because they had not the same apprehensions of spiritual and heavenly bodies as they had. St. Jerom gives this explication in express terms, in a passage which has lately occurred to my observation, where he uses * the Greek word πηλοσιώτας, which explains his meaning in other places, and puts the matter beyond all dispute. So that though Baronius from some copies reads it pilosiota, yet the true reading is pelusioite, as the passage cited in the margin does evince.

* Hieron. Com. in Jerem. xxix. p. 407. Quæ cum audiunt discipuli ejus (Origenis) et Grunnianæ familie stercora, putant se Divina audire mysteria: nosque quod ista continentium, quasi pro brutis habent animantibus, et vocant πηλοσιώτας, eò quod in luto istius corporis constituti, non possimus sentire caelestia.

THE
ANTIQUITIES
OF
THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

BOOK I.

OF THE SEVERAL NAMES AND ORDERS OF MEN IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE SEVERAL TITLES AND APPELLATIONS OF CHRISTIANS, WHICH THEY OWNED, AND DISTINGUISHED THEMSELVES BY.

WHEN Christianity was first planted in the world, they who embraced it were commonly known among themselves by the names of disciples, believers, elect, saints, and brethren, before they assumed the title and appellation of Christians. Epiphanius¹ says they were also called Ἰεσσαῖοι, Jesseans; either from Jesse the father of David, or, which is more probable, from the name of the Lord Jesus. He adds, that Philo speaks of them under this appellation, in his book Περὶ Ἰεσσαίων, which he affirms to be no other but Christians, who went by that name in Egypt, whilst St. Mark preached the gospel at Alexandria. This book of Philo's is now extant under another title, Περὶ Βίου Θεωρητικοῦ, Of the Contemplative Life; and so it is cited by Eusebius,² who is also of opinion that it is nothing but a description of the Christians in Egypt, whom he calls Therapeutæ, which signifies either worshippers of the true God, or spiritual physicians, who undertook to cure men's minds of all vicious and corrupt affections. But whether this name was invented by Philo, as most proper to express their way of living, or was then the common name of believers in Egypt, before the name Christian was spread over all the world, Eusebius does not undertake to determine: however, he concludes it was a name given to the Christians; and St. Jerom³ is so positive in it, that for this reason he gives Philo a place in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, telling us that he wrote a book concerning the first church of St. Mark at Alexandria.

Some learned critics of the last age call this whole matter⁴ into question: but their arguments are answered by others⁵ as learned; and therefore I shall enter no further into this dispute, but refer the reader, that is curious, thither for satisfaction. That which I here take notice of further, is only this; that these names, Therapeutæ and Jessæi, were scarce ever used in after ages; but the other names, ἄγιοι, πιστοὶ, ἐκλεκτοὶ, saints, believers, elect, &c., occur frequently in ecclesiastical writers; and signify not any select number of Christians, (as now the words, saints and elect, are often used to signify only the predestinate,) but all Christians in general, who were entered into the communion of the church by the waters of baptism. For so Theodoret⁶ and others explain the word ἄγιοι, saints, to be such as were vouchsafed the honour and privilege of baptism.

¹ Epiphan. Hær. 39. n. 4. ² Euseb. Hist. lib. 2. c. 17.

³ Hieron. de Scriptor. c. 11.

⁴ Scaliger et Valesius in Euseb. lib. 2. c. 17. Dallæus de Jejun. et Quadrages. lib. 2. c. 4.

⁵ Bevereg. Cod. Can. Vind. lib. 3. c. 5. n. 4.

⁶ Theodor. Com. in Philip. i. 1.

And upon this account, because the Christian life took its original from the waters of baptism, and depended upon the observance of the covenant made therein, the Christians were wont to please themselves with the artificial name pisciculi, fishes; to denote, as Tertullian⁷ words it, that they were regenerate, or born again into Christ's religion by water, and could not be saved but by continuing therein. And this name was the rather chosen by them, because the initial letters of our Saviour's names and titles in Greek, Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ Υἱός, Σωτήρ, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, our Saviour, technically put together, make up the name ΙΧΘΥΣ, which signifies a fish, and is alluded to both by Tertullian and Optatus.⁸

Sometimes Christians also style themselves by the name of Gnostics, Γνωστικῶν, men of understanding and knowledge; because the Christian religion was the truest wisdom, and the knowledge of the most Divine and heavenly things. This name was aped and abused by a perverse sort of heretics, who are commonly known and distinguished by the name of Gnostics, because of their great pretences to knowledge and science, falsely so called. Yet this did not hinder, but that the Christians sometimes laid claim to it, as having indeed the only just and proper right to make use of it. For which reason Clemens Alexandrinus,⁹ in all his writings, gives the Christian philosopher the appellation of Γνωστικός. Athanasius¹⁰ calls the ascetics of Egypt, who were of the contemplative life, by the same name, Γνωστικῶν. And Socrates tells us, Evagrius Ponticus wrote a book for the use of these ascetics, which he entitled, The Gnostic, i. e., Rules for the Contemplative Life; some fragments of which are yet extant in Socrates,¹¹ and some others published by Cotelerius, in his Monuments of the Greek Church. In one of these fragments there is mention made of a monk, who is styled Μοναχὸς τῆς Παρεμβολῆς, τῶν Γνωστικῶν ὁ δοκιμώτατος; which the first translators of Socrates, not understanding, render, A monk of great renown, of the sect of the Gnostics, as if he had been one of the Gnostic heretics; whereas, it means no more than a monk of the contemplative life, who inhabited in a village called the Parebole, not far from Alexandria; being one of those ascetics, whom Evagrius and all the rest call by the then known name of Christian Gnostics. See Valesius's note upon Socrates.

Another name, which frequently occurs in the writings of the ancients, is that of Θεοφόροι; which signifies, temples of God, and is as old as Ignatius, who usually gave himself this title; as appears, both from the inscriptions of his epistles, each of which begins, Ἰγνάτιος ὁ καὶ Θεοφόρος, as also from the ancient acts of his martyrdom, where¹² the reason of the name is explained in his dialogue with Trajan; who, hearing him style himself Theophorus, asked what that name meant? To which Ignatius replied, that it meant one that carried Christ in his heart. Dost thou, then, said Trajan, carry him that was crucified in thy heart? Ignatius answered, Yes: for it is written, "I will dwell in them, and walk in them." Anastasius Bibliothecarius indeed gives another reason why Ignatius was called Theophorus; because he was the child whom our Saviour took and set in the midst of his disciples, laying his hands upon him; and therefore the apostles would never presume to ordain him again by imposition of hands after Christ. But, as Bishop Pearson¹³ and others have observed, this was a mere invention of the modern Greeks, from whom Anastasius took it without further inquiry. Much more ridiculous and absurd is the reason which is assigned by Vincentius¹⁴ Bellovacensis, and some others; that Ignatius was so called, because the name of Jesus Christ was found written in golden letters in his heart. Both these fancies are sufficiently refuted by the genuine acts of his martyrdom; which give a more rational account of the name, and such as plainly intimates that it was no peculiar title of Ignatius, but common to him with all other Christians: as, indeed, Bishop Pearson does abundantly prove from several passages of Clemens Alexandrinus, Gregory Nazianzen, Palladius, Eulogius, Theodoret, Cyril of Alexandria, Photius, Maximus, and others. Particularly, Clemens¹⁵ assigns the same reason of the name as Ignatius does; that the Christian is therefore called Θεοφορῶν and Θεοφορούμενος, because, as the apostle says, he is "the temple of God." We sometimes also meet with the name Christophori in the same sense; as in the Epistle of Phileas, bishop of Thmuis, recorded by Eusebius; where, speaking of the martyrs of his own time, he gives them the title of Χριστοφόροι μάρτυρες,¹⁶ because

⁷ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 1. Nos pisciculi secundum ἰχθῦν nostrum Jesum Christum in aqua nascimur; nec aliter quam in aqua permanendo salvi sumus.

⁸ Optat. cont. Parmen. lib. 3. p. 62. Hic est piscis qui in baptismate per invocationem fontalibus undis inseritur, ut quæ aqua fuerat, à pisee etiam piscina vocitetur. Cujus piscis nomen, secundum appellationem Græcam, in uno nomine per singulas literas turbam sanctorum nominum continet ἰχθῦς, quod est latinè, Jesus Christus, Dei Filius, Salvator.

⁹ Clem. Alex. Strom. 1. p. 294. Strom. 2. p. 383. Strom. 6. p. 665. Strom. 7. p. 748.

¹⁰ Athan. ap. Socrat. Hist. Eccl. lib. 4. c. 23.

¹¹ Socrat. ibid.

¹² Acta Ignat. ap. Grabe Spicil. t. 2. p. 10.

¹³ Pearson Vind. Ignat. par. 2. c. 12. p. 397. Cave's Life of Ignatius. Grabe Spicil. t. 2. p. 2.

¹⁴ Vincent. Specul. lib. 10. c. 7.

¹⁵ Clem. Strom. lib. 7. p. 748.

¹⁶ Euseb. lib. 8. c. 10.

they were temples of Christ, and acted by his Holy Spirit.

Sect. 5.
And sometimes,
but very rarely,
Christi. St. Ambrose, in one place, gives them the name of Christi, in a qualified sense; alluding to the signification of the word Christus in Scripture, where it sometimes signifies any one that is anointed with oil, or receives any commission from God by a spiritual unction; in which sense every Christian is the Lord's anointed. And therefore he says, it is no injury¹⁷ for the servant to bear the character of his lord, nor for the soldier to be called by the name of his general; forasmuch as God himself hath said, "Touch not mine anointed," or my Christs, Christos meos, as now the Vulgar translation reads it, Psal. cv. 15. And St. Jerom also, who, in his notes upon the place,¹⁸ observes, that all men are called Christs who are anointed with the Holy Ghost; as the ancient patriarchs before the law, who had no other unction. Yet we do not find that the Christians generally took this name upon them, but rather reserved it to their Lord, as his peculiar name and title.

Sect. 6.
Christians great enemies to all party names, and human appellations. Yet it is very observable, that in all the names they chose, there was still some peculiar relation to Christ and God, from whom they would be named, and not from any mortal man, how great or eminent soever. Party names, and human appellations, they ever professed to abhor. We take not our denomination from men, says Chrysostom;¹⁹ we have no leaders, as the followers of Marcion, or Manichæus, or Arius. No, says Epiphanius,²⁰ the church was never called so much as by the name of any apostle: we never heard of Petrians, or Paulians, or Bartholomæans, or Thaddæans; but only of Christians, from Christ. I honour Peter, says another father,²¹ but I am not called a Petrian; I honour Paul, but I am not called a Paulian: I cannot bear to be named from any man, who am the creature of God. They observe, that this was only the property of sects and heresies, to take party names, and denominate themselves from their leaders. The great and venerable name of Christians was neglected by them, whilst they profanely divided themselves into human appellations; as Gregory Nyssen²² and Nazianzen complain. Thus Basil observes²³ how the Marcionites and Valentini-ans rejected the name of Christians, to be called after the names of Marcion and Valentinus, their leaders. Optatus²⁴ and St. Austin²⁵ bring the same charge against the Donatists. Optatus says, it was the usual question of Donatus to all foreigners, Quid apud vos agitur de parte mea? How go the affairs of my party among you? And the bishops who were his followers, were used to subscribe themselves, Ex parte Donati. Epiphanius observes the same of the Audians,²⁶ Colluthians, and Arians: and he tells us more particularly of Meletius and his followers,²⁷ that having formed a schism, they left the old name of the catholic church, and styled themselves by a distinguishing character, The church of the martyrs, with an invidious design, to cast a reproach upon all others that were not of their party: in like manner, as the Arians style themselves Lucianists²⁸ and Conlucianists, pretending to follow the doctrine of Lucian the martyr.

But the church of Christ still kept to the name of Christian. This was the name they gloried in as most expressive of their unity and relation to Christ. Eusebius²⁹ records a memorable story out of the Epistle of the Churches of Lyons and Vienna, in France, concerning one Sanctus, a deacon of the church of Vienna, who suffered in the persecution under Antonine; that being put to the rack, and examined by the magistrates concerning his name, his country, his city, his quality, whether he were bond or free, his answer to all their questions was, I am a Christian: this, he said, was to him both name, and city, and kindred, and every thing. Nor could the heathen, with all their skill, extort any other answer from him. St. Chrysostom³⁰ gives the like account of the behaviour of Lucian the martyr before his persecutors; and there are some other instances of the same nature, by which we may judge how great a veneration they had for the name Christian.

The importunity of heretics made them add another name to this, viz. Sect. 7.
Of the name catholic, and its antiquity. that of catholic; which was as it were their surname, or characteristic, to distinguish them from all sects, who, though they had party names, yet sometimes sheltered themselves under the common name of Christians. This we learn from Pacian's Epistle³¹ to Sempronian the Novatian heretic, who demanding of him the reason why Christians called themselves catholics, he answers, ¹⁷ Ambros. de Obit. Valentin. t. 3. p. 12. Nec injuriam putes, characteri domini inscribuntur et servuli, et nomine imperatoris signantur milites. Denique et ipse Dominus dixit, Nolite tangere Christos meos.

¹⁸ Hieron. Com. in Psal. civ. Ecce ante legem patriarchæ non uncti regali unguento, Christi dicuntur. Christi autem sunt, qui Spiritu Sancto unctur

¹⁹ Chrysost. Hom. 23. in Act.

²⁰ Epiphanius. Hær. 42. Marcionit. Item Hær. 10.

²¹ Greg. Naz. Orat. 31. p. 506. See also Athan. Orat. 2. contra Arian. Greg. Nyss. de Perfect. Christ. t. 3. p. 276.

²² Nyss. contra Apollin. t. 3. p. 261. Naz. Orat. ad Episcop.

²³ Basil Com. in Psal. xlvi. p. 245.

²⁴ Optat. lib. 3. p. 68. ²⁵ Aug. Ep. 68. ad Januar.

²⁶ Epiph. Hær. 70. Audianor. Id. Hær. 69. Arian.

²⁷ Epiphanius. Hær. 68. Meletian.

²⁸ Theodor. Hist. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 4. Epiphanius. Hær. 69. Arian.

²⁹ Euseb. lib. 5. c. 1.

³⁰ Chrysost. Homil. 46. in Lucian. t. 1. p. 602.

³¹ Pacian. Ep. 1. ad Sempronian. Christianus mihi nomen that it was to discern them from heretics, who went by the name of Christians. Christian is my name, says he, and catholic my surname; the one is my title, the other my character or mark of distinction. Heretics commonly confined religion, either to a particular region, or some select party of men, and therefore had no pretence to style themselves catholics: but the church of Christ had a just title to this name, being called catholic (as Optatus³² observes) because it was universally diffused over all the world. And in this sense the name is as ancient almost as the church itself. For we meet with it in the Passion of Polycarp³³ in Eusebius, in Clemens Alexandrinus,³⁴ and Ignatius.³⁵ And so great a regard had they for this name, that they would own none to be Christians, who did not profess themselves to be of the catholic church. As we may see in the Acts of Pionius the martyr,³⁶ who being asked by Polemo the judge, of what church he was? answered, I am of the catholic church: for Christ has no other.

I must here observe further, that the name of ecclesiastics was sometimes attributed to all Christians in general. For though this was a peculiar name of the clergy, as contradistinct from the laity in the Christian church, yet when Christians in general are spoken of in opposition to Jews, infidels, and heretics, then they have all the name of ecclesiastics, or men of the church; as being neither of the Jewish synagogues, nor of the heathen temples, nor heretical conventicles, but members of the church of Christ. In this sense ἀνδρες ἐκκλησιαστικὸν is often used by Eusebius³⁷ and Cyril of Jerusalem.³⁸ And Valesius³⁹ observes the same in Origen, Epiphanius, St. Jerom, and others.

Sometimes also we find the word Δόγμα put absolutely to signify the Christian religion; as Chrysostom⁴⁰ and Theodoret⁴¹ say St. Paul himself uses the word in his Epistle to the Ephesians, ii. 15. And Estius⁴² assures us it was the common interpretation of all ancient expositors, both Greek and Latin, upon that place. And hence it was that Christians were called sometimes οἱ τοῦ Δόγματος, men of the faith; meaning the faith of Christ. As in the re-script of Aurelian the emperor against Paulus Samosatensis, recorded by Eusebius,⁴³ the bishops of Italy and Rome are styled ἐπίσκοποι τοῦ δόγματος, bishops of the faith, that is, the Christian faith.

The heathens also were used to confound the names of Jews and Christians together; whence, in heathen authors, the name of Jews by mistake is often given to the Christians. Thus Dio, in the Life of Domitian,⁴⁴ speaking of Acilius Glabrio, a man of consular dignity, says he was accused of atheism, and put to death for turning to the Jews' religion; which, as Baronius⁴⁵ and others observe, must mean the Christian religion, for which he was a martyr. So when Suetonius⁴⁶ says, that Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome, because they grew tumultuous by the instigations of Chrestus; it is generally concluded by learned men,⁴⁷ that under the name of Jews, he also comprehends the Christians. In like manner when Spartan⁴⁸ says of Caracalla's play-fellow, that he was of the Jewish religion, he doubtless means the Christian; forasmuch as Tertullian⁴⁹ tells us that Caracalla himself was nursed by a Christian.

The heathens committed another mistake in the pronunciation of our Saviour's name, whom they generally called Chrestus, instead of Christus; and his followers, Chrestians, for Christians: which is taken notice of by Justin Martyr,⁵⁰ Tertullian,⁵¹ Lactantius,⁵² and some others; who correct their mistake, though they have no great quarrel with them upon this account; for both names are of good signification. Christus is the same with the Hebrew Messias, and signifies a person anointed to be a priest or king; and Chrestus being the same with the Greek Χρηστος, implies sweetness and goodness. Whence Tertullian⁵³ tells them, that they were unpardonable for prosecuting Christians merely for their name, because both names were innocent, and of excellent signification.

The Christians therefore did not wholly reject this name, though it was none of their own im-est, catholicus cognomen. Illud me nuncupat, istud ostendit.

³² Optat. lib. 2. p. 46. Cum inde dicta sit catholica, quod sit rationalis et ubique diffusa.

³³ Euseb. lib. 4. c. 15. ³⁴ Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. 7.

³⁵ Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 8.

³⁶ Act. Pionii ap. Baron. an. 254. n. 9. Cujus, inquit Polemo, es ecclesie? Respondit Pionius, Catholicæ: nulla enim est alia apud Christum.

³⁷ Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 7. lib. 5. cap. 27.

³⁸ Cyril Catech. 15. n. 4.

³⁹ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 2. cap. 25.

⁴⁰ Chrys. Hom. 5. in Ephes.

⁴¹ Theod. Com. in Ephes. ii. 15.

⁴² Est. Com. in Ephes. ii. 14. ⁴³ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30.

⁴⁴ Dio in Domit. ⁴⁵ Baron. an. 94. n. 1.

⁴⁶ Sueton. Claud. c. 26. Judæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit.

⁴⁷ Hotting. Hist. Eccl. t. 1. p. 37. Basnag. Exerc. in Baron. p. 139. Selden. de Synedr. lib. 1. c. 8. who cites Lipsius, Petavius, and many others.

⁴⁸ Spartan. in Caracal. c. 1.

⁴⁹ Tertul. ad Scapul. c. 4. Lacte Christiano educatus.

⁵⁰ Just. M. Apol. 2. ⁵¹ Tertul. Apol. c. 3.

⁵² Lact. lib. 4. c. 7.

⁵³ Tertul. ibid. Christianus quantum interpretatio est, de unctione deducitur. Sed et cum perperam Chrestianus pronunciatu à vobis (nam nec nominis certa est notitia penes vos) de suavitate vel benignitate compositum est. Oditur ergo in hominibus innocuis etiam nomen innocuum.

Sect. 10.
Christians called
Jews by the heathen.

Sect. 8.
In what sense the name, ecclesiastics, given to all Christians.

Sect. 11.
Christ by the heathens commonly called Chrestus, and Christians, Chres-tians.

Sect. 9.
The Christian religion called Δόγμα, and Christians
οἱ τοῦ Δόγματος.

posing. As neither did they refuse to be called Jews, in that sense as the Scripture uses the word, to distinguish the people of God from "the synagogue of Satan," Rev. ii. 9. Though, to avoid the subtleties of the Ebionites and Nazarens, who were for blending the ceremonies of the law with the faith of the gospel, they rather chose to avoid that name, and stuck to the name of Christians.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE NAMES OF REPROACH WHICH THE JEWS, INFIDELS, AND HERETICS, CAST UPON THE CHRISTIANS.

Sect. 1.
Christians called Nazarens by the Jews and heathens.

BESIDES the names already spoken of, there were some other reproachful names cast upon them by their adversaries, which it will not be improper here to mention. The first of these was Nazarens, a name of reproach given them first by the Jews, by whom they are styled the sect of the Nazarens, Acts xxiv. 5. There was, indeed, a particular heresy, who called themselves Ναζωραῖοι: and Epiphanius¹ thinks the Jews had a more especial spite at them, because they were a sort of Jewish apostates, who kept circumcision and the Mosaic rites together with the Christian religion: and therefore, he says, they were used to curse and anathematize them three times a day, morning, noon, and evening, when they met in their synagogues to pray, in this dreadful form of execration, Ἐπικαταράσῃαι ὁ Θεὸς τοὺς Ναζωραίους, Send thy curse, O God, upon the Nazarens. But St. Jerom² says this was levelled at Christians in general, who they thus anathematized under the name of Nazarens. And this seems most probable, because, as both St. Jerom³ and Epiphanius himself⁴ observes, the Jews termed all Christians, by way of reproach, Nazarens. And the Gentiles took it from the Jews, as appears from that of Datanus the prætor in Prudentius,⁵ where, speaking to the Christians, he gives them the name of Nazarens.

Some⁶ think the Christians at first were very free to own this name, and esteemed it no reproach, till such time as the heresy of the Nazarens broke out, and then, in detestation of that heresy, they forsook that name, and called themselves Christians, Acts xi. 26. But whether this be said according to the exact rules of chronology, I leave those that are better skilled to determine.

Another name of reproach was that of Galilæans, which was Julian's ordi- Sect. 2.
And Galilæans.

nary style, whenever he spake of Christ or Christians. Thus in his dialogue with old Maris, a blind Christian bishop, mentioned by Sozomen,⁷ he told him by way of scoff, Thy Galilæan God will not cure thee. And again, in his epistle⁸ to Arsacius, high priest of Galatia, The Galilæans maintain their own poor, and ours also. The like may be observed in Soocrates,⁹ Theodoret,¹⁰ Chrysostom,¹¹ and Gregory Nazianzen,¹² who adds, that he not only called them Galilæans himself, but made a law that no one should call them by any other name, thinking thereby to abolish the name of Christians.

They also called them atheists, and their religion, the atheism or impiety, Sect. 3.
Also atheists.

because they derided the worship of the heathen gods. Dio¹³ says, Acilius Glabrio was put to death for atheism, meaning the Christian religion. And the Christian apologists, Athenagoras,¹⁴ Justin Martyr,¹⁵ Arnobius,¹⁶ and others, reckon this among the crimes which the heathens usually lay to their charge. Eusebius says,¹⁷ the name was become so common, that when the persecuting magistrates would oblige a Christian to renounce his religion, they bade him abjure it in this form, by saying, among other things, Ἀθε τοὺς ἀθίους, Confusion to the atheists, Away with the impious, meaning the Christians.

To this they added the name of Greeks and impostors, which is noted Sect. 4.
And Greeks and impostors.

by St. Jerom,¹⁸ who says, wheresoever they saw a Christian, they would presently cry out, Ὁ γραικὸς ἐπιβέτης, Behold a Grecian impostor! This was the character which the Jews gave our Saviour, ὁ πλάσος, that deceiver, Matt. xxvii. 63. And Justin Martyr says,¹⁹ they endeavoured to propagate it to posterity, sending their apostles or emissaries

¹ Epiphanius. Hæc. 29. n. 9.
² Hieron. Com. in Esa. xlix. t. 5. p. 178. Ter per singulos dies sub nomine Nazarenorum maledicunt in synagogis suis.
³ Id. de Loc. Hebr. t. 3. p. 289. Nos apud veteres, quasi opprobrio Nazaræ dicebamus, quos nunc Christianos vocant.
⁴ Epiphanius. ibid.
⁵ Prudent. περὶ στεφάνων. Carm. 5. de S. Vincent. Vos Nazareni assistite, Rudemque ritum spernite.
 Id. Hymno 9. de Rom. Mart.
⁶ Junius Parallel. lib. 1. c. 8. Goodwyn Jew. Rites, lib. 1. c. 8.

⁷ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 4. ⁸ Ap. Sozom. lib. 5. c. 16.
⁹ Socrat. lib. 3. c. 12.
¹⁰ Theodor. lib. 3. c. 7 et 21.
¹¹ Chrys. Hom. 63. t. 5. ¹² Naz. 1. Invectiv.
¹³ Dio in Domitian.
¹⁴ Athen. Legat. pro Christ.
¹⁵ Just. Apol. 1. p. 47.
¹⁶ Euseb. lib. 4. c. 15. ¹⁷ Arnob. lib. 1.
¹⁸ Hieron. Ep. 10. ad Furiam. Ubicumque viderint Christianum, statim illud de Trivio, Ὁ γραικὸς ἐπιβέτης, vocant impostorem.
¹⁹ Justin Dial. c. Tryph. p. 335.

from Jerusalem to all the synagogues in the world, to bid them beware of a certain impious, lawless sect, lately risen up under one Jesus, a Galilæan impostor. Hence Lucian²⁰ took occasion in his blasphemous raiillery to style him the crucified sophister. And Celsus²¹ commonly gives him and his followers the name of γοηται, deceivers. So Asclepiades, the judge in Prudentius,²² compliments them with the appellation of sophisters; and Ulpian²³ proscribes them in a law by the name of impostors.

The reason why they added the name of Greeks to that of impostors, was (as learned men²⁴ conjecture) because many of the Christian philosophers took upon them the Grecian or philosophic habit, which was the περιβόλαιον, or pallium: whence the Greeks were called palliati, as the Romans were called togati, or gens togata, from their proper habit, which was the toga. Now, it being some offence to the Romans, to see the Christians quit the Roman gown to wear the Grecian cloak, they thence took occasion to mock and deride them with the scurrilous names of Greeks, and Grecian impostors. Tertullian's book de Pallio was written to show the spiteful malice of this foolish objection.

Sect. 6. Magicians. But the heathens went one step further in their malice; and because our Saviour and his followers did many miracles, which they imputed to evil arts and the power of magic, they therefore generally declaimed against them as magicians, and under that character exposed them to the fury of the vulgar. Celsus²⁵ and others pretended that our Saviour studied magic in Egypt: and St. Austin²⁶ says, it was generally believed among the heathen, that he wrote some books about magic too, which he delivered to Peter and Paul for the use of his disciples. Hence it was that Suetonius,²⁷ speaking in the language of his party, calls the Christians, genus hominum superstitionis maleficæ, the men of the magical superstition. As Asclepiades, the judge in Prudentius,²⁸ styles St. Romanus the martyr, arch-magician. And St. Ambrose observes, in the passion of St. Agnes,²⁹ how the people cried out against her, Away with the sorceress! away with the enchanter! Nothing being more common than to term all Christians, especially such as wrought miracles,³⁰ by the odious name of sorcerers and magicians.

The new superstition was another name of reproach for the Christian religion. Suetonius gives it that title,³¹ and Pliny and Tacitus add to it³² the opprobrious terms of wicked and unreasonable superstition. By which name also Nero triumphed over it, in his trophies which he set up at Rome, when he had harassed the Christians with a most severe persecution. He gloried that he had purged the country of robbers, and those that obtruded and inculcated the new superstition³³ upon mankind. By this, there can be no doubt, he meant the Christians, whose religion is called the superstition in other inscriptions of the like nature. See that of Diocletian cited in Baronius, anno 304, from Occo. Superstitione Christianorum ubique deleta, &c.

Not much unlike this was that other name which Porphyry³⁴ and some others give it, when they call it the barbarous, new, and strange religion. In the acts of the famous martyrs of Lyons, who suffered under Antoninus Pius, the heathens scornfully insult it with this character. For having burnt the martyrs to ashes, and scattered their remains into the river Rhone, they said they did it to cut off their hopes of a resurrection, upon the strength of which they sought to obtrude³⁵ the new and strange religion upon mankind. But now let us see whether they will rise again, and whether their God can help and deliver them out of our hands.

Celsus gives them the name of Sibyllists,³⁶ because the Christians in their disputes with the heathens sometimes made use of the authority of Sibylla, their own prophetess, against them; whose writings they urged with so much advantage to the Christian cause, and prejudice to the heathen, that Justin Martyr³⁷ says, the Roman governors made it death for any one to read them, or Hystaspes, or the writings of the prophets.

They also reproached them with the appellation of βιθανάτοι, self-murderers, because they readily offered themselves up to Sect. 6. The new superstition.

Sect. 7. Christians why called Sibyllists.

Sect. 8. Biathanati.

²⁰ Lucian. Peregrin.

²¹ Cels. ap. Orig. lib. 1. p. 20.

²² Prudent. περι στεφ. Carm. 10, de Romano Mart. Quis hos sophistas error invexit novus, &c.

²³ Digest. lib. 50. tit. 13. c. 1. Si incantavit, si imprecatus est, si (ut vulgari verbo impostorum utar) si exorcizavit.

²⁴ Kortholt de Morib. Christian. c. 3. p. 23. Baron. an. 56. n. 11.

²⁵ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 1. Arnobius, lib. 1. p. 36.

²⁶ Aug. de Consensu Evang. lib. 1. c. 9.

²⁷ Sueton. Neron. c. 16.

²⁸ Prudent. περι στεφ. Hymn. 10. de S. Romano. Quo usque tandem summus hic nobis magus illudit.

²⁹ Ambr. Serm. 90. in S. Agnen. Tolle magam! Tolle maleficam!

³⁰ See Kortholt de Morib. Christ. c. 4.

³¹ Sueton. Nero. c. 16.

³² Plin. lib. 10. Ep. 97. Nihil aliud inveni, quam superstitionem pravam et immodicam. Tacit. Annal. 15. c. 44. Exitiabilis superstitio.

³³ Inscript. Antiq. ad Calcem Sueton. Oxon. NERONI. CLAUD. CAIS. AUG. PONT. MAX. OB. PROVINC. LATRONIB. ET. HIS. QUI. NOVAM. GENERI. HUM. SUPERSTITION. INCULCAB. PURGAT.

³⁴ Ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. 6. c. 19. Βάρβαρον τόλμημα.

³⁵ Act. Mart. Lugd. ap. Euseb. lib. 5. c. 1. Θρησκείαν ξένην και καινην.

³⁶ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 5. p. 272.

³⁷ Just. Apol. 2. p. 82.

martyrdom, and cheerfully underwent any violent death, which the heathens could inflict upon them. With what eagerness they courted death, we learn not only from the Christian writers³⁸ themselves, but from the testimonies of the heathens³⁹ concerning them. Lucian⁴⁰ says, they not only despised death, but many of them voluntarily offered themselves to it, out of a persuasion that they should be made immortal and live for ever. This he reckons folly, and therefore gives them the name of κακοδαίμονες, the miserable wretches that threw away their lives. In which sense Porphyry⁴¹ also styles the Christian religion, βάρβαρον τόλμημα, the barbarous boldness. As Arrius Antoninus⁴² terms the professors of it, ἰ δαλοὶ, the stupid wretches, that had such a mind to die; and the heathen in Minucius,⁴³ homines deploratæ ac desperatæ factionis, the men of the forlorn and desperate faction. All which agrees with the name biothanati, or bioethanati, as Baronius⁴⁴ understands it. Though it may signify not only self-murderers, but (as a learned critic⁴⁵ notes) men that expect to live after death. In which sense the heathens probably might use it likewise, to ridicule the Christian doctrine of the resurrection; on which, they knew, all their fearless and undaunted courage was founded. For so the same heathen in Minucius endeavours to expose at once both their resolution and their belief: O strange folly, and incredible madness! says he; they despise all present torments, and yet fear those that are future and uncertain: they are afraid of dying after death, but in the mean time do not fear to die. So vainly do they flatter themselves, and allay their fears, with the hopes of some reviving comforts after death. For one of these reasons, then, they gave them the name of biothanati, which word expressly occurs in some of the Acts of the ancient Martyrs. Baronius observes,⁴⁶ out of Bede's Martyrology, that when the seven sons of Symphorosa were martyred under Hadrian, their bodies were all cast into one pit together, which the temple-priests named from them, Ad septem biothanatos, The grave of the seven biothanati.

Sect. 9.
Parabolarii, and desperati. For the same reasons they gave them the names of parabolarii and desperati, the bold and desperate men. The parabolarii or parabolani among the Romans, were those bold, adventurous men, who hired out themselves to fight with wild beasts upon the stage or amphitheatre, whence they had also the name of bestiarii, and confectores. Now, because the Christians were put to fight for their lives in the same manner, and they rather chose to do it than deny their religion, they therefore got the name of paraboli, and parabolani; which, though it was intended as a name of reproach and mockery, yet the Christians were not unwilling to take it to themselves, being one of the truest characters that the heathens ever gave them. And therefore they sometimes gave themselves this name, by way of allusion to the Roman paraboli. As in the passion⁴⁷ of Abdo and Senne in the time of Valerian, the martyrs who were exposed to be devoured by wild beasts in the amphitheatre, are said to enter, ut audacissimi parabolani, as most resolute champions, that despised their own lives for their religion's sake. But the other name of desperati they rejected as a calumny, retorting it back upon their adversaries, who more justly deserved it. Those, says Lactantius,⁴⁸ who set a value upon their faith, and will not deny their God, they first torment and butcher them with all their might, and then call them desperados, because they will not spare their own bodies; as if any thing could be more desperate, than to torture and tear in pieces those whom you cannot but know to be innocent.

Tertullian mentions another name, which was likewise occasioned by their sufferings. The martyrs which were burnt alive, were usually tied to a board, or stake, of about six foot long, which the Romans called semaxis; and then they were surrounded or covered with faggots of small wood, which they called sarmenta. From this their punishment, the heathen, who turned every thing into mockery, gave all Christians the spiteful name of sarmentitii and semarii.⁴⁹

The heathen in Minucius⁵⁰ takes occasion also to reproach them under Sect. 11.
Lucifugax natio. the name of the skulking generation, or the men that loved to prate in corners and the dark. The ground of which scurrilous reflection was only this, that they were forced to hold their religious assemblies in the night to avoid the fury of the persecutions. Which Celsus⁵¹ himself owns, though otherwise prone enough to load them with hard names and odious reflections.

³⁸ See these collected in Pearson, Vind. Ignat. par. 2. c. 9. p. 384.

³⁹ Arrius Antonin. ap. Tertul. ad Scap. c. 4. Tiberian. in Joh. Malela Chronic.

⁴⁰ Lucian. de Mort. Peregrin.

⁴¹ Porphyr. ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. l. 6. c. 19.

⁴² Tertul. ibid.

⁴³ Minuc. Octav. p. 25.

⁴⁴ Baron. an. 138. n. 5.

⁴⁵ Suicer. Thesaur. Ecclesiast. t. 1. p. 690.

⁴⁶ Baron. an. 138. n. 5.

⁴⁷ Acta Abdon. et Sennes ap. Suicer.

⁴⁸ Lact. Instit. lib. 5. c. 9. Desperatos vocant, quia corpori suo minime parcunt, &c.

⁴⁹ Tertul. Apol. c. 50. Licet nunc sarmentitios et semaxios appelletis, quia ad stipitem dimidii axis revincti, sarmentorum ambitu exurimur.

⁵⁰ Minuc. Octav. p. 25. Latebrosa et lucifugax natio, in publicum muta, in angulis garrula.

⁵¹ Origen. cont. Cel. lib. 1. p. 5.

The same heathen in Minucius gives them one scurrilous name more, which it is not very easy to guess the meaning of. He calls them Plautinians,⁵² homines plautinæ prosapie. Rigaltius⁵³ takes it for a ridicule upon the poverty and simplicity of the Christians, whom the heathens commonly represented as a company of poor ignorant mechanics, bakers, tailors, and the like; men of the same quality with Plautus, who, as St. Jerom⁵⁴ observes, was so poor, that in a time of famine he was forced to hire out himself to a baker to grind at his mill, during which time he wrote three of his plays in the intervals of his labour. Such sort of men Cæcilius says the Christians were; and therefore he styles Octavius in the dialogue, homo Plautinæ prosapie, et pistorum præcipuus, a Plautinian, a chief man among the illiterate bakers, but no philosopher. The same reflection is often made by Celsus. You shall see, says he,⁵⁵ weavers, tailors, fullers, and the most illiterate and rustic fellows, who dare not speak a word before wise men, when they can get a company of children and silly women together, set up to teach strange paradoxes amongst them. This is one of their rules, says he again,⁵⁶ Let no man that is learned, wise, or prudent come among us; but if any be unlearned, or a child, or an idiot, let him freely come. So they openly declare, that none but fools, and sots, and such as want sense, slaves, women, and children, are fit disciples for the God they worship.

Nor was it only the heathens that thus reviled them, but commonly every perverse sect among the Christians had some reproachful name to cast upon them. The Novatian party called them Cornelians,⁵⁷ because they communicated with Cornelius, bishop of Rome, rather than with Novatianus, his antagonist. They also termed them apostatics, capitols, synedrians, because⁵⁸ they charitably decreed in their synods to receive apostates, and such as went to the capitol to sacrifice, into their communion again upon their sincere repentance. The Nestorians⁵⁹ termed the orthodox Cyrillians; and the Arians⁶⁰ called them Eustathians and Paulinians, from Eustathius and Paulinus, bishops of Antioch. As also homoousians, because they kept to the doctrine of the μοούσιον, which declared the Son of God to be of the same substance with the Father. The author of the Opus Imperfectum on St. Matthew, under the name of Chrysostom,⁶¹ styles them expressly, Heresis homoousianorum, The heresy of the homoousians. And so Serapion in his conflict with Arnobius⁶² calls them homousianates, which the printed copy reads corruptly homuncionates, which was a name for the Nestorians.

The Cataphrygians, or Montanists, commonly called the orthodox, ψυχικῶδες, carnal; because they rejected the prophecies and pretended inspirations of Montanus, and would not receive his rigid laws about fasting, nor abstain from second marriages, and observe four lents in a year, &c. This was Tertullian's ordinary compliment to the Christians in all his books⁶³ written after he was fallen into the errors of Montanus. He calls his own party the spiritual, and the orthodox, the carnal. And some of his books⁶⁴ are expressly entitled, Adversus Psychicos. Clemens Alexandrinus⁶⁵ observes, the same reproach was also used by other heretics beside the Montanists. And it appears from Irenæus, that this was an ancient calumny of the Valentinians, who styled themselves the spiritual and the perfect, and the orthodox, the secular and carnal,⁶⁶ who had need of abstinence and good works, which were not necessary for them that were perfect.

The Millenaries styled them allegorists, because they expounded the prophecy of the saints reigning a thousand years with Christ, Rev. xx. 4, to a mystical and allegorical sense. Whence Eusebius⁶⁷ observes of Nepos the Egyptian bishop, who wrote for the millennium, that he entitled his book, Ἐλεγχος Ἀλληγοριστῶν, A Confutation of the Allegorists.

Aetius the Arian gives them the abusive name of χοοίται; by which he seems to intimate, that their religion was but temporary, and would shortly have an end; whereas the character was much more applicable to the Arians themselves, whose faith was so lately sprung up in the world; as the author of the dialogues de Trinitate, under the name of Athanasius, who confutes Aetius,⁶⁸ justly retorts upon him.

The Manichees, as they gave themselves the

Sect. 13.
With what names the heretics reproached the orthodox Christians.

⁵² Minuc. p. 37. Quid ad hæc audet Octavius homo Plautinæ prosapie, ut pistorum præcipuus ita postremus philosophorum?

⁵³ Rigalt. in loc.

⁵⁴ Hieron. Chronic. an. I. Olymp. 145.

⁵⁵ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 3. p. 141.

⁵⁶ Ibid. p. 137.

⁵⁷ Eulog. ap. Phot. Cod. 280.

⁵⁸ Pacian. Ep. 2. ad Sympronian.

⁵⁹ Ep. Legat. Schismat. ad suos in Epheso in Act. Con. Ephes. Con. t. 3. p. 746.

⁶⁰ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 21.

⁶¹ Opus Imperf. Hom. 48.

⁶² Conflict. Arnob. et Serap. ad calcem Irenæi, p. 519.

⁶³ Tertul. adv. Prax. c. 1. Nos quidem agnitio Paracleti disjuncta a psychicis. Id. de Monogam. c. 1. Hæretici nuptias auferunt, psychici ingerunt. See also c. 11 and 16.

⁶⁴ De Jejunii adv. Psychicos. De Pudicitia, &c.

⁶⁵ Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. 4. p. 511.

⁶⁶ Iren. lib. 1. c. p. 29. Nobis quidem, quos psychicos vocant, et de sæculo esse dicunt, necessariam continentiam, &c.

⁶⁷ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 24.

⁶⁸ Athan. Dial. 2. de Trinit. t. 2. p. 193.

Sect. 14.
Christians called psychici by the Montanists.

Sect. 15.
Allegorists by the Millenaries.

Sect. 16.
Choroites, by the Arians; simplices, by the Manichees; anthropolatras, by the Apollinarians.

most glorious names of electi, macarii, catharistæ, mentioned by St. Austin;⁶⁹ so they reproached the catholics with the most contemptible name of simplices, idiots; which is the term that Manichæus himself used in his dispute⁷⁰ with Archelaus the Mesopotamian bishop, styling the Christian teachers, simpliciorum magistros, guides of the simple, because they could not relish his execrable doctrine concerning two principles of good and evil.

The Apollinarians were no less injurious to the catholics, in fixing on them the odious name of anthropolatræ, man-worshippers; because they maintained that Christ was a perfect man, and had a reasonable soul and body, of the same nature with ours; which Apollinarius denied. Gregory Nazianzen⁷¹ takes notice of this abuse, and sharply replies to it; telling the Apollinarians, that they themselves much better deserved the name of sarcolatræ, flesh-worshippers; for if Christ had no human soul, they must be concluded to worship his flesh only.

The Origenians, who denied the truth of the resurrection, and asserted that men should have only aerial and spiritual bodies in the next world, made jests upon the catholics, because they maintained the contrary, that our bodies should be the same individual bodies, and of the same nature that they are now, with flesh and bones, and all the members in the same form and structure, only altered in quality, not in substance. For this they gave them the opprobrious names of simplices and philosarcæ,⁷² idiots and lovers of the flesh; carnei, animales, jumenta, carnal, sensual, animals; lutei, earthy; pilosiotæ,⁷³ which Erasmus's edition reads corruptly pelusiotæ, instead of pilosiotæ; which seems to be a name formed from pili, hair; because the catholics asserted, that the body would rise perfect in all its parts, even with the hair itself to beautify and adorn it.

But of all others, the Luciferians gave the church the rudest language; styling her the brothel-house, and synagogue of antichrist and Satan; because she allowed those bishops to retain their honour and places, who were cajoled by the Arians to subscribe the fraudulent confession of the council of Ariminum. The Luciferian in St. Jerom runs out in this manner against the church; and St. Jerom says, he spake but the sense of the whole party, for this was the ordinary style⁷⁴ and language of all the rest.

These are some of those reproachful names, which heretics, concurring with Jews and infidels, endeavoured to fasten upon the Christian church; which I should not so much as have mentioned, but that they serve to give some light to antiquity, and therefore were not wholly to be passed over in a treatise of this nature.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE SEVERAL ORDERS OF MEN IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

HAVING given an account of the several names of Christians, I proceed now to speak of the persons, and several orders of men, in the Christian church. Some divide them into three ranks, others into four, others into five; which yet come much to the same account, when they are compared together. Eusebius reckons but three orders, viz. the ηγούμενοι, πιστοί, and κατηχούμενοι; rulers, believers, and catechumens. There are in every church, says he, three orders of men,¹ one of the rulers or guides, and two of those that are subject to them; for the people are divided into two classes, the πιστοί, believers, and the unbaptized, by whom he means the catechumens. St. Jerom² makes five orders; but then he divides the clergy into three orders, to make up the number; reckoning them thus, bishops, presbyters, deacons, believers, and catechumens. In which account he follows Origen,³ who makes five degrees subordinate to one another in the church;

Sect. 1. Three sorts of members of the Christian church, the ηγούμενοι, πιστοί, and κατηχούμενοι.

Sect. 17. Philosarcæ and pilosiotæ, &c. by the Origenians.

Sect. 18. The synagogue of antichrist and Satan, by the Luciferians.

⁶⁹ Aug. de Hær. c. 46.
⁷⁰ Archel. Disp. adv. Manichæum ad calcem Sozomen. Ed. Vales. p. 197.
⁷¹ Naz. Ep. 1. ad Cledon.
⁷² Hieron. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. t. 2. p. 171. Nos simplices et philosarcas dicere, quod eadem ossa, et sanguis, et caro, id est, vultus et membra, totiusque compago corporis resurgat in novissima die.
⁷³ Id. Ep. 65. ad Pam. et Ocean. de Error. Orig. p. 192. Pelusiotas (leg. pilosiotas) nos appellant, et luteos, animalesque, et carneos, quod non recipiamus ea quæ Spiritus sunt.
⁷⁴ Hieron. Dial. adv. Lucifer. t. 2. p. 135. Asserebat universum mundum esse diaboli: et, ut jam familiare est eis dicere, factum de ecclesia lupanar. — Quod anti-christi magis synagoga, quam ecclesia Christi debeat nuncupari.

¹ Euseb. Demonstr. Evang. lib. 7. c. 2. p. 323. Τρία καθ' ἐκάστην ἐκκλησίαν τάγματα, ἐν μὲν τῷ τῶν ἡγουμένων, δύο δὲ τὰ τῶν ὑποβεβηκότων.
² Hieron. Com. in Esai. xix. p. 61. Quinque ecclesiæ ordines, episcopus, presbyteros, diaconos, fideles, catechumenos.
³ Origen. Hom. 5. in Ezek. Pro modo graduum unusquisque torquetur. Majorem pœnam habet, qui ecclesiæ præsidet et delinquit. Annon magis misericordiam promeretur ad comparationem fidelis, catechumenus? Non magis venia dignus est laicus, si ad diaconum conferatur? Et rursus comparatione presbyteri diaconus veniam plus meretur.

saying, Every one shall be punished according to the difference of his degree. If a bishop or president of the church sins, he shall have the greater punishment. A catechumen will deserve mercy, in comparison of a believer; and a layman, in comparison of a deacon; and a deacon, in comparison of a presbyter. Here are plainly St. Jerom's five orders; first bishops, under the name of presidents of the church, then presbyters, after them deacons, then believers or laymen, and last of all the catechumens.

In all which accounts, these four things are proper to be remarked: 1. That the name, believers, πιστοὶ and fideles, is here taken in a more strict sense only for one order of Christians, the believing or baptized laity, in contradistinction to the clergy and the catechumens, the two other orders of men in the church. And in this sense the words πιστοὶ and fideles are commonly used in the ancient liturgies⁴ and canons, to distinguish those that were baptized, and allowed to partake of the holy mysteries, from the catechumens. Whence came that ancient distinction of the service of the church, into the missa catechumenorum, and missa fidelium,⁵ of which more in its proper place.

2. We may hence observe, that the catechumens, though but imperfect Christians, were in some measure owned to be within the pale of the church. Forasmuch as Eusebius, Origen, and St. Jerom reckon them one of the three orders of the church. And the councils of Eliberis⁶ and Constantinople⁷ give them expressly the name of Christians. Though, as St. Austin⁸ says, they were not yet sons, but servants: they belonged to the house of God, but were not yet admitted to all the privileges of it; being only Christians at large, and not in the most strict and proper acceptance.

And yet this is more than can be said of heretics properly so called. For we may observe, 3. That in the forementioned division, heretics come into no account among Christians. They were not esteemed of, either as catechumens, or believers, but as mere Jews, or pagans; neither having the true faith, nor being willing to learn it. Tertullian⁹ says in general, If they be heretics, they cannot be Christians. And St. Jerom,¹⁰ disputing with a Luciferian, says the same in express terms, that heretics are no Christians; nor to be spoken of, but as we would do of heathens. Lactantius¹¹ specifies in the Montanists, Novatians, Valentinians, Marcionites, Anthropians, Arians, saying, that they are no Christians, who, forsaking the name of Christ, call themselves by other denominations. Athanasius¹² and Hilary¹³ say the same of the Arians, that they are not Christians. Constantine¹⁴ therefore enacted it into a law, that they should not be called Christians, but Porphyrians; from Porphyry, that infamous heathen, whose practice they so much resembled in their impious blasphemies and reproaches of Christ and the Christian religion. And in imitation of this, Theodosius junior¹⁵ made another law to the same effect, against Nestorius and his followers; that they should not abuse the name of Christians, but be called Simonians, from Simon Magus, the arch-heretic. To which we may add that decree of the general council of Sardica, in their synodical epistle¹⁶ against the Arians; where they require all catholics, not only to deny the Arian bishops the title of bishops, but even that of Christians. All which evidently proves, that the ancients put a manifest difference betwixt those who were apostates from the faith, and those who as yet had never made any solemn profession of their faith in baptism: they allowed the catechumens the name of Christians, because they were candidates of heaven; but they judged heretics unworthy of that name, because they corrupted the common faith of Christians, and denied the Lord, by whose name they were called.

4. We may observe in the last place, that there were no Christians, but what might be reduced to some one or other of the three forementioned orders: for the penitents, and energumens, as they called those that were possessed with evil spirits, may be ranked among the catechumens, being commonly treated and disciplined by the church in the

Sect. 2.
Believers here strictly taken for the laity that were baptized.

Sect. 3.
Catechumens owned as imperfect members of the church.

Sect. 4.
Heretics not reckoned among Christians.

Sect. 5.
Penitents and energumens ranked in the same class with catechumens.

⁴ See Con. Nic. Can. 11. Con. Eliber. c. 12, 46, 51. Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 31. Cyril Hierosol. Præf. Catech. n. 2.

⁵ Con. Carth. 4. c. 84. Con. Valent. Hispan. c. 1.

⁶ Con. Elib. Can. 39. ⁷ Con. Const. 1. Can. 7.

⁸ Aug. Tract. 11. in Joh. t. 9. p. 41. Quod signum crucis in fronte habent catechumeni, jam de domo magna sunt, sed fiant ex servis filii. Non enim nihil sunt, quia ad magnam domum pertinent.

⁹ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 37. Si hæretici sunt, Christiani esse non possunt.

¹⁰ Hieron. Dial. c. Lucif. t. 2. p. 135. Hæretici Christiani non sunt.—Igitur præfixum inter nos habemus, de hæretico sic loquendum sicut de Gentili.

¹¹ Lact. Instit. lib. 4. c. 30.

¹² Athan. Orat. 2. adv. Arian. t. 1. p. 316. Ἀρειανῶν οὐκ εἰσὶ χριστιανῶν.

¹³ Hilar. ad Const. Lib. 1. p. 98. Christianus sum, non Arianus.

¹⁴ Const. Imp. Ep. ad Episc. ap. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 9.

¹⁵ Cod. Theod. lib. 16. Tit. 5. de Hæret. c. 66. Damnato portentosa superstitionis auctore Nestorio, nota congrui nominis ejus inuratur gregalibus, ne Christianorum appellatione abutantur: sed quemadmodum Ariani lege divæ memoriæ Constantini ob similitudinem impietatis Porphyriani à Porphyrio nuncupantur; sic ubique participes nefariæ sectæ Nestorii Simoniani vocentur. See the same in the Acts of the General Council of Ephesus, part 3. c. 45. Con. t. 3. p. 1209.

¹⁶ Con. Sardic. Ep. Synod. ap. Theod. lib. 2. c. 6.

same manner as they were, and placed in the same class with them; and the monks and other ascetics may be ranked under the common head of believers, though they had some peculiar marks of distinction in the church. Yet I shall not confine myself to speak of all those precisely in this order, and under these heads, but give each a distinct and proper place in this discourse; speaking here only of believers in general, as they stood distinguished from the catechumens and the clergy of the church, and treating of the rest as occasion shall require in the following parts of this discourse.

CHAPTER IV.

A MORE PARTICULAR ACCOUNT OF THE ΠΙΣΤΟΙ, OR BELIEVERS; THEIR TITLES OF HONOUR AND PRIVILEGES ABOVE THE CATECHUMENS.

THE πιστοί, or fideles, being such as were baptized, and thereby made complete and perfect Christians, were upon that account dignified with several titles of honour and marks of distinction above the catechumens. They were hence called φωτισζόμενοι, the illuminate. So the council of Laodicea¹ terms those that were newly baptized, προσφάτως φωτισθέντας. And Jobius² in Photius, οί φωτισζόμενοι. As St. Paul himself in the Epistle to the Hebrews twice uses the word illuminate, for baptized, in the opinion of most interpreters.³ The reason of the name is given by Justin Martyr, who says⁴ they were so called, because their understandings were enlightened by the knowledge that was consequent to baptism. For all the mysteries of religion were unveiled to the baptized, which were kept secret from the catechumens. And sometimes also baptism was attended with extraordinary illuminations of the Holy Ghost, as in those whom St. Paul caused to be baptized at Ephesus: Acts xix. 6, "They spake with tongues, and prophesied."

2. They were hence also styled, οί μεμνημένοι, which the Latins call initiati, the initiated, that is, admitted to the use of the sacred offices, and knowledge of the sacred mysteries of the Christian religion. Hence came that form of speaking, so frequently used by St. Chrysostom and other ancient writers,⁵ when they touched upon any doctrines or mysteries which the catechumens understood not, ισασιν οί μεμνημένοι, the initiated know what is spoken. St. Ambrose writes a book to these initiati.⁶ Isidore of Pelusius⁷ and Hesychius⁸ call them μυστά, and others μυσαγωγῆτοι: whence the catechumens have the contrary names, ἀμυστοι, ἀμύητοι, and ἀμυσαγωγῆτοι, the uninitiated, or unbaptized.

3. Believers were otherwise called τέλειοι, and τελειούμενοι, the perfect; because they were consummate Christians, who had a right to participate of the holy eucharist; the τὸ τέλειον, as it is frequently called in the canons⁹ of the ancient councils; where ἐπι τὸ τέλειον ἐλθεῖν, and τοῦ τελείου μετέχειν, always signify participation of the holy eucharist, that sacred mystery that unites us to Christ, and gives us the most consummate perfection that we are capable of in this world.

4. Tertullian adds to these the name of chari Dei, the favourites of Heaven; because their prayers and intercessions were powerful with God, to obtain pardon for others, that should address Heaven by them. Therefore, in his instructions to the penitents, he bids them, charis Dei adgeniculari, fall down at the feet of those favourites, and commend their suit to all the brethren, desiring them to intercede with God for them.—Tertul. de Pœnit. c. 9.

All these names (and many others that might be added, which are obvious to every reader, such as saints, and sons of God, &c.) were peculiar titles of honour and respect given only to those who were πιστοί, or believers.

And hence it was, that, corresponding to these names, the fideles had their peculiar privileges in the church, above the catechumens. For, first, it was their sole prerogative to partake of the Lord's table, and communicate with one another in the symbols of Christ's body and blood at the altar. Hither none came, but such as were first initiated by baptism. Whence the custom was, before they went to celebrate the eucharist, for a deacon to proclaim "Ἄγια ἄγιοις, Holy things for holy men: Ye catechumens, go forth,"¹⁰ as the author of the Constitutions, and St. Chrysostom and some others, word it.

2. Another of their prerogatives above catechumens, was, to stay and join with the minister in all the prayers

Sect. 1. Believers otherwise called φωτισζόμενοι, the illuminate.

Sect. 3. And τέλειοι, the perfect.

Sect. 3. Chari Dei, filii Dei, ἄγιοι, &c.

Sect. 5. The privileges of the fideles. 1. To partake of the eucharist.

Sect. 2. And οί μεμνημένοι, the initiated.

Sect. 6. To join in all the prayers of the church.

¹ Con. Laodic. Can. 3.
² Phot. Cod. 222. p. 595 et 598.
³ See Grot. Hamond. Estius in Heb. vi. 4. et x. 32.
⁴ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 94.
⁵ Casaubon, Exerc. 16. in Baron. p. 399, observes this phrase to occur no less than fifty times in St. Chrysostom and St. Austin.

⁶ Ambros. De his qui initiantur mysteriis.
⁷ Isidor. lib. 4. Ep. 162. ισασιν οί μυστά τὸ λεγόμενον.
⁸ Hesych. voce μυστά.
⁹ Con. Ancyran. Can. 4, 5, 6, &c.
¹⁰ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 8 et 12. Chrysost. Hom. in Parab. de Filio Prodig. t. 6. μή τις τῶν κατηχομένων, &c.

of the church; which the catechumens were not allowed to do. For in the ancient service of the church, there were no prayers preceding the communion office; but only such as particularly related, either to the several classes of penitents, or the energumēni, that is, persons possessed with evil spirits, or the catechumens themselves. When these prayers were ended, the catechumens and all others were commanded to withdraw, and then began the communion service at the altar; where none were admitted so much as to be spectators, save those who were to communicate in the eucharist. For to join in prayers and participation of the eucharist were then privileges of the same persons; and no one was qualified for the prayers of the church, that was not qualified for the communion.

Sect. 7.

3. The use of the Lord's prayer another prerogative of the πιστοί; whence it was called εὐχὴ πιστῶν, the prayer of believers.

3. More particularly, the use of the Lord's prayer was the sole prerogative of the πιστοί, or believers. For then it was no crime, or argument of weakness, or want of the Spirit, to use it; but an honour and privilege of the most consummate and perfect Christians. The catechumens were not allowed to say, "Our Father," till they had first made themselves sons by regeneration in the waters of baptism. This is expressly said by St. Chrysostom,¹¹ St. Austin,¹² Theodoret,¹³ and several others. And for this reason, Chrysostom¹⁴ calls it εὐχὴ πιστῶν; and St. Austin,¹⁵ oratio fidelium, the prayer of the regenerate, or believers; because it was their privilege and birthright: it was given to them as their property, he says,¹⁶ and therefore they made use of it; having a right to say, "Our Father, which art in heaven," who were born again to such a Father, by water and the Holy Ghost.

Sect. 8.

4. They were admitted to hear discourses upon the most profound mysteries of religion.

4. Lastly, they were admitted to be auditors of all discourses made in the church, even those that treated of the most abstruse points and profound mysteries of the Christian religion; which the catechumens were strictly prohibited from hearing.

The catechumens were allowed to hear the Scriptures, and the ordinary popular discourses that were made upon them; which was no more than what some councils¹⁷ allow even to Jews and Gentiles; for in those discourses they never treated plainly of their mysteries, but in such a covert way, as the catechumens could not understand them. But when the catechumens were dismissed, then they discoursed more openly of their mysteries before the fideles, whose privilege it was to be the sole auditors of such discourses. This we learn from St. Ambrose;¹⁸ who says, his common discourses to the unbaptized were only upon points of morality; but when they were baptized, then was the time to open to them the mysteries and sacraments of religion: to have discoursed to them of those things before, had been more like exposing mysteries than explaining them. St. Austin speaks to the same purpose, in one of his sermons¹⁹ to the newly baptized: Having now dismissed the catechumens, says he, we have retained you only to be our hearers, because, beside those things which belong to all Christians in common, we are now to discourse more particularly of the heavenly mysteries, or sacraments; which none are qualified to hear, but such as by God's gift are made partakers of them. And therefore ye ought to hear them with the greater reverence, by how much more sublime those doctrines are, which are committed only to the baptized and believing auditors, than those which the catechumens also are wont to hear. Theodoret²⁰ takes notice of the same distinction made in their discourses, according to the difference of their auditors; saying, We discourse obscurely of Divine mysteries before the unbaptized, but when they are departed, we speak plainly to the baptized. From all which it is evident, that the fideles were singled out, as the only proper auditors fit to hear discourses upon the sublime doctrines and mysteries of religion. And in these and the like privileges, consisted their prerogative above the catechumens.

¹¹ Chrysost. Hom. 2. in 2 Cor. p. 740.

¹² Aug. Hom. 29. de Verb. Apost.

¹³ Theodor. Epit. Div. Dogm. c. 28.

¹⁴ Chrysost. Hom. 10. in Colos. p. 1385.

¹⁵ Aug. Enchirid. c. 71.

¹⁶ Aug. Com. in Psal. cxlii. Orabant utique jam fideles, jam apostoli. Nam ista oratio Dominica magis fidelibus datur.

Id. Enchirid. ad Laurent. c. 71. De quotidianis, brevibus, levibusque peccatis——quotidiana oratio fidelium satisfacit. Eorum est enim dicere, Pater noster, qui es in cœlis; qui jam Patri tali regenerati sunt, ex aqua et Spiritu Sancto.

¹⁷ Con. Carthag. 4. Can. 81. Ut episcopus nullum prohibeat ingredi ecclesiam, et audire verbum Dei, sive Gentilem, sive hæreticum, sive Judæum, usque ad missam catechumenorum.

¹⁸ Ambros. de his qui mysteriis initiantur, c. 1. De moralibus quotidianum sermonem habuimus.—Nunc de mysteriis dicere tempus admonet, atque ipsam sacramentorum rationem edere, quam ante baptismum si putassemus insinuandam nondum initiatis, prodidisse potius quam edidisse æstimaremur.

¹⁹ Aug. Serm. 1. ad Neophytos in Append. t. 10. p. 845. Dimissis jam catechumenis, vos tantum ad audiendum retinimus: quia præter illa, quæ omnes Christianos convenit in commune servare, specialiter de cœlestibus mysteriis locuturi sumus, quæ audire non possunt, nisi qui ea donante jam Domino perceperunt. Tanto ergo majore reverentia debetis audire quæ dicimus, quanto majora ista sunt, quæ solis baptizatis et fidelibus auditoribus committuntur; quam illa quæ etiam catechumeni audire consueverunt.

²⁰ Theod. Quæst. 15. in Num.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE DISTINCTION BETWIXT THE LAITY AND CLERGY; AND OF THE ANTIQUITY OF THAT DISTINCTION.

WE have hitherto considered the great body of the Christian church, the fideles, as opposed to the catechumens: we are now to view them in another relation, as contradistinct to the clergy: in which relation they went by other names, such as those of laici, laymen; βιωτικοὶ, seculars; ἰδιῶται, private men. The most common and ancient name was that of laici, which every where occurs in the writings of Origen, Cyprian, and Tertullian, and others of the third century: which is a thing so evident, that the greatest enemies of this distinction, Rigaltius,¹ Salmasius, and Selden, do not pretend to dispute it, but only say, there was originally no such distinction in the church, but that it is a novelty, and owing to the ambition of the clergy of the third century, in which Cyprian and Tertullian lived.

This accusation reflects highly upon St. Cyprian, and other holy martyrs his contemporaries, who were as far from the ambition that is charged upon them, as the authors are from truth that bring the charge. For indeed the distinction was none of their inventing; but derived from the Jewish church, and adopted into the Christian by the apostles themselves. Clemens Alexandrinus,² speaking of St. John, says, that, after his return from banishment in the isle of Patmos, he settled at Ephesus; whence being often invited to visit the neighbouring regions, he ordained them bishops, and set apart such men for the clergy, as were signified to him by the Holy Ghost. Whence it appears, that the name κλήρος, clergy, was always a peculiar title of those that were set apart for the ministry and service of God. And that this distinction came from the Jewish church, is evident from what Clemens Romanus³ says of the Jewish economy; that as the high priest had his office assigned him, and the priests also their proper station, and the Levites their peculiar service; so laymen in like manner were under the obligation of precepts proper for laymen. These instances evidently prove, that a distinction was always observed in these names, laity and clergy, from the first foundation of the Christian church.

There is but one objection of any moment against this, which is taken from the words of St. Peter, where he bids the elders of the church not lord it over God's heritage. The original is, μηδ' ὡς κατακυριεύοντες τῶν κλήρων; which (as some learned critics⁴ observe) may as well signify the possessions of the church, as the people. But admit that it means the people; this is no more than is said of the people of Israel, who are called God's κλήρος, and λαὸς ἐκκληρος, his inheritance, or his clergy, Deut. iv. 20; ix. 29; as both the Jews and Christians were, in opposition to the heathen: notwithstanding which, God had his peculiar κλήρος among his own people, who were his lot or inheritance, and distinguished by that name from the laici, or remaining body of the people. As we have observed before in the name πιστοὶ, fideles, or believers; all persons within the pale of the church were called believers, in opposition to infidels and pagans; but when they would distinguish one order of men in the church from another, then the name believers was given peculiarly to such as were baptized, and the rest were called catechumens: so here, all Christian people are God's κλήρος, his lot, his inheritance, or his clergy; but when his ministers are to be distinguished from the rest of the people in the church, then the name clerici, or clergy, was their appropriate title, and the name of the other, laymen.

And this observation will help to set another sort of persons right, who confound not only the names, but the offices of laity and clergy together; and plead, that originally there was no distinction between them. The name of priesthood, indeed, is sometimes given in common to the whole body of Christian people, 1 Pet. ii. 9; Rev. i. 6; but so it was to the Jewish people, Exod. xix. 6, "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation." Yet every one knows, that the offices of the priests and Levites among the Jews were very distinct from those of the common people, not by usurpation, but by God's appointment. And so it was among Christians, from the first foundation of the church. Wherever any number of converts were made, as soon as they were capable of being formed into an organical church, a bishop, or a presbyter, with a deacon, was ordained to minister to them, as Epiphanius⁵ delivers from the ancient histories of the church. The same may be observed in the forementioned passage of Clemens Alexandrinus, where he says St. John ordained bishops and other clergy, in the churches which he regulated, by the direction of the Holy Ghost. Hence

Sect. 3.
An objection from 1 Pet. v. 3 answered.

Sect. 1.
The fideles otherwise called fines, to distinguish them from the clergy.

Sect. 2.
The antiquity of this distinction proved against Rigaltius, Salmasius, and Selden.

Sect. 4.
A distinction in the offices of laity and clergy always observed.

¹ Rigalt. Not. in Cypr. Ep. 3.
² Clem. Alexand. Quis Dives salvetur, ap. Combefis. Auctar. Noviss. p. 185. et ap. Euseb. lib. 3. c. 23. Κλήρω ἕνα γε τινα κληρώσω τῶν ὑπὸ πνεύματος σημιαινομένων.

³ Clem. Rom. Ep. 1. ad Corinth. n. 40. ὁ λαϊκὸς ἀνθρωπος τοῖς λαϊκοῖς προστάγμασιν δίδεται.
⁴ Dodwel. Dissert. 1. in Cyprian.
⁵ Epiphau. Hær. 75. Aerian. n. 5.

it is that Ignatius so frequently in all his epistles charges the people to do nothing without the bishops,⁶ presbyters, and deacons. Tertullian⁷ says it was customary among heretics to confound the offices of clergy and laity together: they made one a bishop to-day, and another to-morrow; to-day a deacon, and to-morrow a reader; to-day a presbyter, and to-morrow a layman. For laymen among them performed the offices of the priesthood. But this was not the custom of the catholic church. For, as St. Jerom⁸ observes, they reckoned that to be no church which had no priests. They were of no esteem with them, who were both laymen and bishops together. And by this we may judge how ingenuously they deal with St. Jerom and Tertullian, who allege their authorities to prove that every Christian is as much a priest as another. St. Jerom indeed says,⁹ there is a laical priesthood; but then he explains himself to mean no more by that than Christian baptism, whereby we are made kings and priests to God. And Tertullian¹⁰ grants no other priesthood to laymen, save that they may baptize in case of absolute necessity, when none of the ecclesiastical order can be had; which was according to the principles and practice of the primitive church; but does by no means confound the offices of laity and clergy together, unless any one can think cases ordinary and extraordinary all one. The ancient historians, Socrates and Ruffin,¹¹ tell us, that Frumentius and Ædesius, two young men, who had no external call or commission to preach the gospel, being carried captive into India, converted the nation, and settled several churches among them. And the same Socrates¹² and Theodoret say, that the Iberians were first converted by a captive woman, who made the king and queen of the nation preachers of the gospel to their people. Yet a man would argue very weakly, that should hence conclude, that therefore there was no distinction betwixt clergy and laity in the primitive church, or that laymen might preach without a call, and women ordain ministers of the gospel. The author of the Comments upon St. Paul's Epis-ties, under the name of St. Ambrose,¹³ seems to say indeed, that at first all Christ's disciples were clergy, and had all a general commission to preach the gospel and baptize: but that was in order to convert the world, and before any multitude of people were gathered, or churches founded, wherein to make a distinction. But as soon as the church began to spread itself over the world, and sufficient numbers were converted to form themselves into a regular society; then rulers and other ecclesiastical officers were appointed among them, and a distinction made, that no one, no, not of the clergy themselves, might presume to meddle with any office not committed to him, and to which he knew himself not ordained. So that, for aught that appears to the contrary, we may conclude, that the names and offices of laymen and clergy were always distinct from one another from the first foundation of Christian churches.

The laymen were distinguished also by the name of βιωτικοί, seculars, from βίος, which signifies a secular life. And by this title they are discerned not only from the clergy, but also from the ascetics, and those of a more retired life, who bid adieu to the world, and disburdened themselves of all secular cares and business. Thus St. Chrysostom,¹⁴ exhorting all men to read the Scriptures, says, Let no man think to excuse himself by saying, I am a secular, ἀνήρ βιωτικός, it belongs not to me to read the Scriptures, but to those that have retired from the world, and have taken up their abode in the tops of the mountains. And in another place, commenting on those words of St. Paul, "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers," he says, This command is given to the clergy, and to the monks, and not to the seculars only.¹⁵ And so they are styled in the author¹⁶ who goes under the name of Justin Martyr, and others.

In some writers they are termed ἰδιῶται, private men, as being only in a private capacity, and not acting as public ministers. So it was another name to dis-

Sect. 5.
Laymen also called βιωτικοί, seculars.

Sect. 6.
And ἰδιῶται,
private men.

⁶ Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes. n. 6 et 7. Ep. ad Trall. n. 2. Ep. ad Philad. n. 7.

⁷ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 41. Alius hodie episcopus, cras alius: hodie diaconus, qui cras lector: hodie presbyter, qui cras laicus. Nam et laicis sacerdotalia munera injungunt.

⁸ Hieron. Dial. c. Lucifer. t. 2. p. 145. Ecclesia non est quæ non habet sacerdotes. Ibid. Omissis paucis homunculis, qui ipsi sibi et laici sunt et episcopi.

⁹ Hieron. ibid. p. 136. Sacerdotium laici, id est, baptismi. Scriptum est enim, Regnum et sacerdotes nos fecit, &c.

¹⁰ Tertul. Exhort. ad Cast. c. 7. Nonne et laici sacerdotes sumus? Scriptum est, Regnum quoque nos et sacerdotes Deo et Patri suo fecit.—Ubi ecclesiastici ordinis est consensus, et offert et tinguit sacerdos, qui est ibi, solus.

Sed ubi tres, ecclesia est; licet laici.

¹¹ Ruffin. lib. 1. c. 9. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 19.

¹² Socrat. lib. 1. c. 20. Ἀμφότεροι κήρυκες τοῦ Χριστοῦ, &c. Theodor. lib. 1. c. 23.

¹³ Ambros. sive Hilar. Diacon. Com. in Eph. iv. p. 948. Ut cresceret plebs et multiplicaretur, omnibus inter initia concessum est et evangelizare, et baptizare, et Scripturas in ecclesia explanare. At ubi autem omnia loco circumplexa est ecclesia, conventicula constituta sunt, et rectores et cætera officia in ecclesiis sunt ordinata, ut nullus de clero auderet, qui ordinatus non esset, præsumere officium quod sciret non sibi creditum.

¹⁴ Chrys. Hom. 3. in Laz. t. 5.

¹⁵ Chrys. Hom. 23. in Rom. ταῦτα διατάττεται ἐρεῦσι, καὶ μοναχοῖς, οὐχὶ τοῖς βιωτικοῖς μόνον.

¹⁶ Just. M. Resp. ad. Quest. 19. τῶ βιωτικῷ ἀνθρώπῳ, &c.

tinguish them from the clergy, who were in the public office and employment of the church. St. Chrysostom¹⁷ and Theodoret¹⁸ say the word ιδιώτης is so used by St. Paul himself, 1 Cor. xiv. 16, which we translate “unlearned;” but they say it signifies no more than a layman, or one in a private capacity, whether learned or unlearned, who is not a public minister of the church. And so Origen also uses the name ιδιώται, not for persons unlearned, but for laymen, who had power, as well as other Christians, to cast out devils in the name of Christ.¹⁹ And Synesius opposes the names ιδιώται and ιερείς to one another, making²⁰ the one to denote those who ministered in the sacred service of the church, and the other, those who had no such office, but served God only in a private capacity, as laymen. Whence also, speaking of some clergymen who deserved to be degraded, he says²¹ they were to be treated publicly by all, ὡς ἀντικρυς ιδιώται, as mere private men, that is, no longer as clergymen, but laymen. Whence we may collect, that this was a common name for all such as had no public office or ministry in the church.

On the other hand, all persons who had any public employment in the church were called by the common name of clerici; which name at first was given only to the three superior orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, because there were then no other orders in the church. But in the third century many inferior orders were appointed, as subservient to the deacon’s office, such as sub-deacons, acolythists, readers, &c. And then those also had the common name of clerici too, having no further concern with secular affairs, but wholly attending the service of the church. St. Cyprian always gives these the name of clerici;²² as, where he speaks of Optatus a sub-deacon, and Satorus a reader, he styles them both clerici. The ordinations of such he²³ calls ordinationes clericæ. And hence the letters which he had occasion to send to foreign parts by their hands had the name of literæ clericæ.²⁴ Lucian the martyr, and Cyprian’s contemporary, speaks in the same style concerning exorcists and readers.²⁵

The council of Nice itself²⁶ gives the appellation of κλήρος to others besides bishops, presbyters, and deacons. And the third council of Carthage made a canon²⁷ on purpose to confirm the title to them.

Yea, the same council²⁸ seems rather to appropriate the name clerici to the inferior orders, by way of distinction from the superior, first naming bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and then the clerici, or clerks; that is, the inferior orders. And the same is done by St. Ambrose,²⁹ and Hilary³⁰ under his name, more expressly, who speak of the clerici as distinct from the deacons. As also Epiphanius,³¹ who, speaking of those that lapsed in Egypt in the Diocletian persecution, he says, some of them were soldiers, some clerks of divers orders, some presbyters, and some deacons. Where the clerici are spoken of as distinct from presbyters and deacons. And so in the council of Laodicea,³² and many other places.

As to the reason of the name clerici and clerus, St. Jerom³³ rightly observes, that it comes from the Greek κλήρος, which signifies, a lot; and thence, he says, God’s ministers were called clerici, either because they are the lot and portion of the Lord, or because the Lord is their lot, that is, their inheritance. Others³⁴ think some regard was had to the ancient custom of choosing persons into sacred offices by lot, both among Jews and Gentiles; which is not improbable, though that custom never generally prevailed among Christians, as shall be showed hereafter.

There is another name for the clergy, very commonly to be met with in the ancient councils, which is that of canonici, a name derived from the Greek word κανών, which signifies, among other things, the roll or catalogue of every church, wherein the names of all the ecclesiastics were written, and which was as it were the rule of knowing to what church they belonged. In this sense the word κανών is often used by the council of Nice.³⁵ The council of Antioch³⁶ calls it ἄγιος κανών, the sacred roll; the Apostolical Canons,

Sect. 7.
What persons properly called clerici.

Sect. 8.
The name clerici sometimes appropriate to the inferior orders.

Sect. 9.
The reason of the name clerici.

Sect. 10.
All the clergy called canonici.

¹⁷ Chrys. Hom. 35. in 1 Cor. xiv. ιδιώτην δὲ λαϊκὸν λέγει.
¹⁸ Theod. Com. in 1 Cor. xiv. 16. ιδιώτην καλεῖ τὸν ἐν τῷ λαϊκῷ τάγματι τεταγμένον.
¹⁹ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 7. p. 334.
²⁰ Synes. Ep. 54. ad. Theoph. p. 144.
²¹ Synes. Ep. 67. p. 259.
²² Cyp. Ep. 24. al. 29. ed. Ox. Quoniam oportuit me per clericos scribere, &c., fecisse me sciatis lectorem Satorum, et hypodiatonum Optatum.
²³ Id. Ep. 33. al. 38. ²⁴ See Fell. Not. in Cyp. Ep. 23.
²⁵ Lucian. Ep. 17. al. 23. ap. Cyp. Præsentate de clero, et exorcista, et lectore, Lucianus scripsit.
²⁶ Con. Nic. can. 3.
²⁷ Con. Carth. 3. can. 21. Clericorum nomen etiam lectores, et psalmistæ, et ostiarii retineant.

²⁸ Con. Carth. 3. c. 15. Placuit ut episcopi, et presbyteri, et diaconi, vel clerici non sint conductores.
²⁹ Ambr. de Dignit. Sacerd. c. 3. Aliud est quod ab episcopo requirit Deus, aliud quod a presbytero, et aliud quod a diacono, et aliud quod a clerico, et aliud quod a laico.
³⁰ Pseud.-Ambr. in Eph. iv. Nunc neque diaconi in populo prædicant, neque clerici vel laici baptizant.
³¹ Epiph. Hær. 68. Melet.
³² Con. Laodic. can. 20.
³³ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepot. Cleros græcè, sors latinè appellatur: propterea vocantur clerici, vel quia de sorte sunt Domini, vel quia ipse Dominus sors, id est, pars clericorum est.
³⁴ Dodwel. Dissert. I. in Cyp. § 15.
³⁵ Con. Nic. can. 16, 17, 19. ³⁶ Con. Antioch. c. 1.

κατάλογος ἱερατικός,³⁷ the catalogue of the clergy. Which is the same that Sidonius Apollinaris³⁸ calls albus; and the council of Agde,³⁹ by the name of matricula; and St. Austin,⁴⁰ tabula clericorum. Now because the names of all the clergy were enrolled in this catalogue, or canon, they were hence called canonici. As in St. Cyril,⁴¹ κανονικῶν παρβασία signifies the presence of the clergy. And κανονικὸι ψαλταὶ, in the council of Laodicea,⁴² signifies such of the clergy as were ordered to sing in the church. And so generally in the councils of Nice⁴³ and Antioch, οὶ ἐν τῷ κανόνι, is put to denote the clergy of the church. And upon the same account all others, whose names were set down in the church's books, to entitle them to receive maintenance from the church, were called by the same name, canonici, such as the monks, virgins, widows, &c. whom St. Basil⁴⁴ speaks of under this name, as Balsamon and Zonaras understand him.

I pass over many other names of the clergy, which are obvious to every reader; such as that of ecclesiastics, and ἱερατικοὶ, or τάξις ἱερατικῆ, the holy order, &c.; and shall but take notice of one more, which rarely occurs any where but in Gregory Nazianzen, who gives the clergy, especially the superior clergy, the name of τάξις τοῦ βήματος, the order of the sanctuary.⁴⁵ Which name was given them from their privilege of entering into that part of the church where the altar stood, which (as we shall see when we come to speak of churches) was called βῆμα or ἱερατεῖον, the sanctuary. Hither none might come but the clergy, who were therefore called the order of the sanctuary. Whence, in the same author,⁴⁶ τῷ βήματι προσάγειν, signifies to give a man ordination, or make him a clergyman. And ὁ ἀπὸ βήματος, is one of the sacred order,⁴⁷ or one of the clergy.

³⁷ Can. Apostol. c. 13, 14, 15, 50, &c.

³⁸ Sidon. lib. 6. Ep. 8. Nomen lectorum albus nuper excepit.

³⁹ Con. Agathens. can. 2. Rescripti in matricula graduum suum dignitatemque suscipiant.

⁴⁰ Aug. Hom. 50. de Diversis, t. 10. p. 525. Delebo eum de tabula clericorum.

⁴¹ Cyril. Præf. Catech. n. 3.

⁴² Con. Laodic. can. 15.

⁴³ Con. Antioch. can. 2 et 6. Con. Nic. can. 16 et 17.

⁴⁴ Basil. Ep. Canonic. c. 6.

⁴⁵ Naz. Orat. 20. in Laud. Basil. p. 336.

⁴⁶ Id. Orat. 19. de Fun. Patr.

⁴⁷ Naz. Orat. 19. p. 310 et 311. Orat. 20. p. 351.

BOOK II.

OF THE SEVERAL ORDERS OF THE CLERGY IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE ORIGINAL OF BISHOPS; AND THAT THEY WERE A DISTINCT ORDER FROM PRESBYTERS IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

Sect. I.
What the ancients mean by different orders of bishops and presbyters.

WE have hitherto considered the clergy in general, as distinct from the laity, and come now to examine by what names or offices they were distinguished from one another. And here the most ancient distinction that occurs, is that of the superior clergy into the three distinct orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons. That there were no other orders in the church but these three at first, will be evidenced in its proper place, when I come to give an account of the first rise and original of the inferior orders; and that deacons were always a sacred and standing order, will be proved likewise when I speak particularly of them. Here then it remains, that our inquiry be made only into the distinction betwixt the orders of bishops and presbyters. And this, so far as concerns matter of fact and the practice of the church, (which is the thing I have undertaken to give an account of,) will be most fairly and fully resolved, by considering only these three things: 1. That the ancient writers of the church always speak of these as distinct orders. 2. That they derive the original of bishops from Divine authority and apostolical constitution. 3. That they give us particular accounts and catalogues of such bishops as were first settled and consecrated, in the new-founded churches, by the hands of the apostles.

But before I proceed to the proof of these things, I must premise one particular, to avoid all ambiguity; that I take the word order in that sense as the ancients use it, and not as many of the schoolmen do, who, for reasons of their own, distinguish between order and jurisdiction, and make bishops and presbyters to be one and the same order, only differing in power and jurisdiction. This distinction was unknown to the ancients; among whom the words, order, degree, office, power, and jurisdiction, when they speak of the superiority of bishops above presbyters, mean but one and the same thing, viz. the power of the supreme governors of the church, conferred upon them in their ordination, over presbyters, who are to do nothing but in subordination to them. St. Jerom, who will be allowed to speak the sense of the ancients, makes no difference in these words, ordo, gradus, officium, but uses them promiscuously, to signify the power and jurisdiction of bishops above presbyters and the whole church, which is, properly speaking, the very essence of their order. Therefore sometimes he calls them different orders, as in his book against Jovinian,¹ where he says, that both in the Old and New Testament the high priests are one order, the priests another, and the Levites another. So in his Epistles to Rusticus,² and Fabiola,³ where he joins ordo and gradus together. In other places he uses the word gradus only. As in his Epistle to Eustochium,⁴ he calls presbyters priests of the inferior degree; and in his Epistle to Heliodore,⁵ deacons the third degree; and in his Comment upon Micah,⁶ bishops, priests, and deacons, the degrees in the church. At other times he expresses his meaning by the word offices. As where he says,⁷ that bishop, presbyter, and deacon, are not names of men's merits, but of their offices. So that it is all one, according to St. Jerom, whether we say the order, or the degree, or the office, or the power and jurisdiction of a bishop: for all these are intended

¹ Hieron. cont. Jovin. lib. 2. p. 89. In Veteri Testamento et in Novo alium ordinem pontifex tenet, alium sacerdotem, alium Levitæ.

² Id. Ep. ad Rustic. t. 1. p. 46. Singuli ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archipresbyteri, singuli archidiaconi, et omnis ordo ecclesiasticus suis rectoribus nititur.

³ Id. ad Fabiol. de 42. Mansion. Israel. t. 3. p. 44. Ipsos secundi ordinis intelligimus præceptores, Luca evangelista testante, duodecim fuisse apostolos, et septuaginta discipulos minoris gradus.

⁴ Ep. 27. ad Eustoch. Aderant Hierosolymarum et aliarum urbium episcopi, et sacerdotum inferioris gradus, et Levitarum innumerabilis multitudo.

⁵ Ep. 1. ad Heliodor. Non minorem in tertio gradu adhibuit diligentiam, &c.

⁶ Com. in Mic. vii. p. 162. Non hoc dico, quod istiusmodi gradibus in ecclesia non debeatis esse subjecti.

⁷ Cont. Jovin. lib. 1. p. 41. Episcopus, presbyter, et diaconus non sunt meritorum nomina, sed officiorum.—— Si diaconus sanctior episcopo suo fuerit, non ex eo quod inferior gradu est, apud Christum deterior est.

to express the same thing, viz. the authority of bishops over their presbyters and the whole church. And in this sense I use the word order, in this discourse, to express the opinion of the ancients, concerning the different powers of bishops and presbyters in the church.

Now that there was such a distinction always observed in the church, is evident, 1st, From the testimony of the most ancient writers, who speak of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, as distinct degrees in the church, and the two latter as subordinate to the first. The testimonies of Ignatius to this purpose⁸ are so full and evident, that nothing was ever pretended to be said against them, save only that they are not the genuine remains of that ancient author; which has been so often considered and replied to by learned men,⁹ that there is no pretence left to favour such an imagination. The citations are too numerous to be here inserted at large, and therefore I shall only give the reader a specimen in one single testimony, by which he may judge of all the rest. In his Epistle to the Magnesians, he exhorts them¹⁰ to do all things in unity, under the bishop presiding in the place of God, and the presbyters in the place of the apostolical senate, and the deacons to whom is committed the ministry and service of Jesus Christ.

The author of the Acts of the Martyrdom of Ignatius,¹¹ lately published from an ancient Greek copy, speaks exactly in the same manner of these three orders, when he says, that as Ignatius was on his journey to Rome, all the cities and churches of Asia sent to salute him by their bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Not long after these authors lived Pius, bishop of Rome, whose authority I cite, because Blondel¹² allows it to be genuine. This author, in his epistle to Justus of Vienna, gives him the title of bishop,¹³ and speaks of presbyters and deacons under him. In the beginning of the next age we have the testimonies of Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Tertullian, all agreeing in the same thing, that there were then in their own times the different orders of bishops and presbyters in the church. There are here, in the church, says Clemens,¹⁴ the different degrees or progressions of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, in imitation of the angelical glory. Origen takes notice of this distinction above ten times¹⁵ in his works, which those that please may read at large in Bishop Pearson. I shall only recite two passages, one out of his Homilies upon St. Luke, written whilst he was a layman, where he says,¹⁶ that digamy excludes men from all ecclesiastical dignities; for one that is twice married can neither be made bishop, presbyter, nor deacon. Here he calls them different dignities; in the other place¹⁷ he calls them different degrees, saying, Every one shall be punished according to his degree: if the supreme governor of the church offends, he shall have the greater punishment. A layman will deserve mercy in comparison of a deacon, and a deacon in comparison of a presbyter. So that bishops, in his opinion, were then a degree above presbyters and deacons. Tertullian frequently¹⁸ mentions the same distinction, but more especially in his book de Baptismo, where he says,¹⁹ The right of baptizing belongs to the chief priest, who is the bishop; and after him, to presbyters and deacons, yet not without the authority of the bishop, for the honour of the church, in the preservation of which consists the church's peace.

These allegations are sufficient evidences, as to matter of fact, and the practice of the church in the three first ages, that there was then an order of chief priests, or bishops, superior to presbyters, settled and allowed in the Christian church.

If we proceed a little further into this inquiry, and examine from what Sect. 3. The order of bishops of apostolical institution. original this appointment came, whether from ecclesiastical or apostolical institution; which is another question concerning matter of fact, that will in some measure determine the right also; the same authors, with the unanimous consent of all others, declare, that it was no human invention, but an original settlement of the apostles themselves, which they made by Divine appointment. The order of bishops, says Tertullian,²⁰ when it is traced up to its original, will be found to have ⁸ Ignat. Ep. ad Ephes. n. 2, 3, 4. Ep. ad Philad. n. 4, 7, 10. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 8 et 12. Ep. ad Trall. n. 2, 7, 12, 13. Ep. ad Polycarp. n. 6.

⁹ Pearson, Vind. Ignat. Usser. de Epist. Ignat. Voss. Epist. ad Rivet. Coteler. Præf. et Not. in Ignat. Bull. Defens. Fid. Nic. sect. 3. n. 6. p. 290, &c.

¹⁰ Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes. n. 6.

¹¹ Martyr. Ignat. ap. Grabe Spicil. Sæcul. 2. t. 1. p. 12.

¹² Blondel. Apol. p. 18.

¹³ Pius. Ep. 2. ad Just. Vien. Tu vero apud senatoriam Viennam. — Colobio episcoporum vestitus, &c. Presbyteri et diaconi te observent.

¹⁴ Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. 6. p. 667. Ἐνταῦθα κατὰ τὴν ἐκκλησιαστικὴν προκοπὴν ἐπισκόπων, πρεσβυτέρων, διακόνων, &c. Id. Pædag. lib. 3. c. 12. p. 261.

¹⁵ Origen. Hom. 2. in Num. Hom. 2. in Cantic. Hom. 6. in Esai. Hom. 5 et 16. in Ezek. Cóm. in Matt. xix. et xxi. De Orat. ap. Pearson. Vindic. Ignat. par. 1. c. 11. p. 320.

¹⁶ Orig. Hom. 17. in Luc. Ab ecclesiasticis dignitatibus non solum fornicatio sed et nuptiæ repellunt. Neque enim episcopus, nec presbyter, nec diaconus, nec vidua possunt esse digami.

¹⁷ Orig. Hom. 5. in Ezek. Pro modo graduum unusquisque torquebitur, &c.

¹⁸ Tertul. de Monogam. c. 11. De Fuga, c. 11. De Præscript. c. 41.

¹⁹ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 17. Dandi quidem jus habet summus sacerdos, qui est episcopus: dehinc presbyteri et diaconi, non tamen sine episcopi auctoritate, propter ecclesiæ honorem; quo salvo salva pax est.

²⁰ Tertul. adv. Marcion. lib. 4. c. 5. Ordo episcoporum ad originem recensens, in Joannem stabit auctorem.

St. John for one of its authors. This agrees exactly with what Clemens Alexandrinus²¹ has recorded of him, that when he was settled at Ephesus, he went about the neighbouring regions, ordaining bishops, and setting apart such men for the clergy as were signified to him by the Holy Ghost. These were those Asiatic bishops that St. Jerom²² speaks of, who says, that at their request St. John wrote his Gospel against the heresies of Ebion and Cerinthus. Whence it follows, that, according to this account, the order of bishops was settled before the canon of Scripture was concluded. Whence Clemens of Alexandria²³ further observes, that there are many precepts in Scripture appertaining to particular sorts of persons, some to presbyters, some to deacons, and some to bishops also. Irenæus declares himself of the same opinion, that there were bishops as well as presbyters in the apostles' days. For the assembly of Miletus, he says,²⁴ was composed of bishops and presbyters, that were of Ephesus and the neighbouring cities of Asia. And therefore, agreeably to that hypothesis, he always derives the succession of bishops and their original from the apostles. As where he says,²⁵ that Hyginus, bishop of Rome, was the ninth in order of episcopal succession from the apostles.²⁶ And in another place,²⁷ giving an exact catalogue of the twelve bishops of Rome that governed successively in that see to his own time, he says of Linus, the first of them, that he was ordained bishop immediately by the apostles, upon the first foundation of the church; and of Eleutherius, the last of them, that he was the twelfth bishop from the apostles. Tertullian²⁸ insists much upon the same argument, and makes a challenge to all sorts of heretics upon it: Let them show us the original of their churches, and give us a catalogue of their bishops in an exact succession from first to last, whereby it may appear, that their first bishop had either some apostle, or some apostolical man, living in the time of the apostles, for his author or immediate predecessor. For thus it is that apostolical churches make their reckoning. The church of Smyrna counts up to Polycarp, ordained by St. John; the church of Rome, to Clemens, ordained by St. Peter; and so all other churches in like manner exhibit their first bishops ordained by the apostles, by whom the apostolical seed was propagated and conveyed to others. This implies that the apostles, as they founded churches, settled bishops in them; and that this might be proved from the records and archives of every church, the most of which were probably then remaining, when Tertullian made this challenge to all heretics, and appealed to these original records in behalf of the catholic church.

An exact and authentic catalogue of these first foundations, would be a very useful and entertaining thing: but at this distance of time, it is impossible to gratify the world with any such curiosity, whatever pains should be taken about it. Yet there are some scattered remains and fragments to be collected out of the ancient writers, which will sufficiently answer our present design; which is, to evidence that the apostles settled bishops in all churches upon their first plantation.

To begin with the church of Rome: we have already heard Irenæus and Tertullian declaring, that the apostles ordained a bishop there. And the same is asserted by St. Chrysostom,²⁹ and Eusebius,³⁰ and Ruffin,³¹ and St. Jerom,³² and Optatus,³³ and Epiphanius,³⁴ and St. Austin; who says,³⁵ If the order of the bishops succeeding one another be of any consideration, we take the surest and soundest way, who begin to number from St. Peter: for Linus succeeded Peter; and Clemens, Linus; and Anacletus, Clemens, &c.

It is true, there is a little difference in the account which these authors give of the succession; for some reckon Linus first, then Anacletus, then Clemens: others begin with Clemens, and reckon him the first in order from St. Peter. But this is easily recon-

²¹ Clem. Alex. Quis dives salvetur. ap. Combefis. Auctar. Novissim. p. 185. et ap. Euseb. lib. 3. c. 23.

²² Hieron. Catal. Scriptor. Eccles. in Joanne. Novissimus omnium scripsit evangelium, rogatus ab Asia episcopis.

²³ Clem. Alex. Pædag. lib. 3. c. 12. p. 264.

²⁴ Iren. lib. 3. c. 14. In Mileto convocatis episcopis et presbyteris, qui erant ab Epheso et a reliquis proximis civitatibus.

²⁵ Id. lib. 1. c. 28. Hyginus nonum locum episcopatus per successionem ab apostolis habuit.

²⁶ Euseb. lib. 4. c. 11, cites the same out of Irenæus.

²⁷ Iren. lib. 3. c. 3. Fundantes et instruente beati apostoli ecclesiam, Lino episcopatum administrandæ ecclesie tradiderunt. Cited also by Euseb. lib. 5. c. 6.

²⁸ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 32. Edant origines ecclesiarum suarum: evolvant ordinem episcoporum suorum, ita per successiones ab initio decurrentem, ut primus ille episcopus aliquem ex apostolis, vel apostolicis viris, qui tamen cum apostolis perseveraverint, habuerit auctorem et antecessorem.

Hoc enim modo ecclesiæ apostolicæ census suos deferunt: sicut Smyræorum ecclesiæ Polycarpum ab Joanne collocatum refert: sicut Romanorum Clementem a Petro ordinatum edit: proinde utique et cæteræ exhibent, quos ab apostolis in episcopatum constitutos, apostolici seminis traduces habent. See also c. 36. ibid. Polycrat. Epist. ap. Euseb. lib. 5. c. 24. Cyprian. Ep. 52. al. 55. ad Antonian. p. 104. Cum Fabiani locus, id est, locus Petri, et gradus cathedræ sacerdotialis vacaret. Id. Ep. 27. al. 33. ed. Oxon.

²⁹ Chrys. Hom. 10. in 2 Tim.

³⁰ Euseb. lib. 3. c. 4.

³¹ Ruffin. ap. Hieron. Apol. 2. p. 219.

³² Hieron. Catal. Script. in Clemem.

³³ Optat. lib. 2. p. 48.

³⁴ Epiph. Hær. 27.

³⁵ Aug. Ep. 165. Si ordo episcoporum sibi succedentium considerandus est; quanto certius et vere salubriter ab ipso Petro numeramus?—Petro enim successit Linus, Lino Clemens, Clementi Anacletus, &c.

ciled by learned men,³⁶ who make it appear that Linus and Anacletus died whilst St. Peter lived, and that Clemens was ordained their successor by St. Peter also. So that we have two or three persons, by this account, ordained successively bishops of Rome by the hands of the apostles.

Next, for the church of Jerusalem: it is unanimously delivered by all ancient writers, that James, the Lord's brother, was the first bishop thereof. St. Jerom³⁷ says, he was ordained by the apostles immediately after our Lord's crucifixion. Epiphanius³⁸ calls him, therefore, the first bishop; the first who had an episcopal chair, the first to whom Christ committed his own throne upon earth. Chrysostom³⁹ says, he was made bishop by Christ himself: the author⁴⁰ of the Apostolical Constitutions, both by Christ and the apostles. In like manner, Eusebius⁴¹ always speaks of him under that character, as first bishop of Jerusalem, ordained by the apostles. So Hegesippus,⁴² Clemens Alexandrinus,⁴³ and Dionysius,⁴⁴ bishop of Corinth, all cited by Eusebius. To whom we may add St. Austin,⁴⁵ who styles John, bishop of Jerusalem, St. James's successor, and possessor of the chair wherein he sat as first bishop of the place. And it is remarkable, what Clemens, one of the ancientest of these writers, says, that this was designed as a peculiar honour to St. James, in regard that he was the brother of Christ: for though our Saviour usually gave the preference to Peter and John, and James his brother, yet none of those contended about this honour, but chose this James, surnamed Justus, to be bishop of the place; where he lived a saint, and died a martyr.

Some time after his death, as Eusebius⁴⁶ relates from ancient tradition, the apostles and disciples of our Lord, as many as were yet in being, met together with our Saviour's kinsmen (several of which were then alive) to consult about choosing a successor in St. James's room; and they unanimously agreed upon Simeon, son of Cleopas, our Saviour's cousin according to the flesh; thinking him the most fit and worthy person to sit upon the episcopal throne. The same is asserted by Eusebius in other places,⁴⁷ and the author⁴⁸ of the Constitutions under the name of Clemens Romanus.

From Jerusalem, if we pass to Antioch, there again we find Euodius first, and after him Ignatius, ordained bishops by the hands of the apostles. Baronius⁴⁹ and some others fancy, that they sat both at the same time, the one as bishop of the Jews, and the other of the Gentiles; but Eusebius⁵⁰ says expressly, that Euodius was the first, and Ignatius the second, after Euodius was dead. And it is agreed by all ancient writers, that they were both consecrated before St. Peter's death. Of Euodius there can be no question made, if it appears that Ignatius was ordained by the apostles in his room. Now this is most expressly said by Theodoret,⁵¹ that he received the gift of the high priesthood, ἀρχιερωσύνης χάριν, from the hand of the great Peter. In like manner, Chrysostom, in his encomium⁵² upon him, says, he does not only admire him, because he was thought worthy of so high a degree; but that he was ordained to it by those holy men, and had the hands of the blessed apostles laid upon his sacred head. The same is said in effect by Athanasius,⁵³ when he calls him the first bishop of Antioch after the apostles; and Origen,⁵⁴ who calls him the second after St. Peter; and Jerom,⁵⁵ the third: for though they count differently, yet they mean the same thing; that Ignatius was ordained successor to Euodius while the apostles lived, and so might be called either second or third after the apostles, according as St. Peter and Euodius were included, or excluded out of the number.

From Antioch let us go to Smyrna; where we shall find Polycarp, another apostolical bishop, ordained by the apostles. St. Jerom ascribes his ordination⁵⁶ to St. John, whose disciple he was. Irenæus says, he himself knew him; and therefore could not mistake in what he relates of him; which is, that he was ordained bishop by the apostles.⁵⁷ Tertul-³⁶ Cotel. Not. in Const. Apost. lib. 7. c. 46. Pearson, de Success. Rom. Pontif. Dissert. 2. c. 2. Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. 1. in Clem.

³⁷ Hieron. Catal. Script. c. 3. Post passionem Domini, statim ab apostolis Hierosolymorum episcopus ordinatus. Id. Com. in Gal. i. p. 165. Hic Jacobus primus Hierosolymorum episcopus fuit.

³⁸ Epiphanius. Hær. 78. Antidicomar. n. 7. Id. Hær. 29. Nazor. n. 3. Hær. 66. Manich. n. 19.

³⁹ Chrys. Hom. 38. in 1 Cor. xv.

⁴⁰ Const. Apost. lib. 8. c. 35.

⁴¹ Euseb. lib. 2. c. 23. lib. 3. c. 5 et 7. lib. 7. c. 19.

⁴² Hegesip. ap. Euseb. lib. 2. c. 23.

⁴³ Clem. Hypotypos. lib. 6. ap. Euseb. lib. 2. c. 1.

⁴⁴ Dionys. ap. ad Atheniens. ap. Euseb. lib. 4. c. 23.

⁴⁵ Aug. contra Crescon. lib. 2. c. 37. Hierosolymitanam ecclesiam primus apostolus Jacobus episcopatu suo rexit. Id. cont. Liter. Petil. lib. 2. c. 51. Cathedra ecclesie Hierosolymitanæ, in qua Jacobus sedit, et in qua hodie Johannes sedet. See also Cyril. Catechism. 4. n. 17. Catech. 14. n. 13.

⁴⁶ Euseb. lib. 3. c. 11.

⁴⁷ Idem Chronic.

⁴⁸ Const. Apost. lib. 7. c. 46.

⁴⁹ Baron. an. 45. n. 14. an. 71. n. 11. Halloix Vit. Ignat. c. 2. p. 394.

⁵⁰ Euseb. lib. 3. c. 22. ⁵¹ Theod. Dial. 1. t. 4. p. 33.

⁵² Chrysost. Hom. 42. in Ignat. t. 1. p. 501. Ed. Front. Duc.

⁵³ Athan. de Synod. Arim. t. 1. p. 922.

⁵⁴ Orig. Hom. 6. in Luc. Ignatium dico episcopum Antiochiæ post Petrum secundum.

⁵⁵ Hieron. Catal. Scriptor. in Ignat. Tertius post Petrum apostolorum episcopus.

⁵⁶ Hieron. Catal. Script. c. 17. Polycarpus Joannis apostoli discipulus, ab eo Smyrnæ episcopus ordinatus.

⁵⁷ Iren. lib. 3. c. 3. Ab apostolis in Asia, in ea quæ est Smyrnis ecclesia, constitutus episcopus, quem et nos vidimus in prima nostra ætate.

lian⁵⁸ and Eusebius⁵⁹ witness the same; the one saying, that he was ordained by St. John; and the other, by those that had seen the Lord.

Papias was another disciple of St. John,⁶⁰ as both Irenæus and St. Jerom witness; and he was contemporary with Ignatius and Polycarp, and bishop of Hierapolis about the same time; that is, in the beginning of the second century. So that it is probable, he was another of those bishops which St. John ordained in Asia, though we have no express testimony to prove it.

But it is asserted by all ancient writers, that Timothy was ordained bishop of Ephesus by St. Paul. Eusebius,⁶¹ Chrysostom,⁶² Epiphanius,⁶³ Jerom,⁶⁴ Hilary the deacon,⁶⁵ and the author of the Passion of Timothy in Photius,⁶⁶ unanimously attest it. And Theodoret⁶⁷ affirms, moreover, that he was bishop, under the title of an apostle.

Most of the same authors agree in the same evidence for Titus,⁶⁸ that he was made bishop of Crete by St. Paul also. And Chrysostom,⁶⁹ with Eusebius, seems to give both him and Timothy the power of metropolitans; of which more hereafter.

Others say, that Dionysius the Areopagite was made first bishop of Athens. Eusebius⁷⁰ more than once mentions an epistle of Dionysius bishop of Corinth, a very ancient writer of the second century, wherein this is expressly asserted. So that he must be ordained, either by St. Paul himself, as Suidas and others⁷¹ think, or by some other apostle. It is generally agreed, that this Dionysius died some time before St. John, and was succeeded in his bishopric by Publius, and he by Quadratus, whom St. Jerom⁷² calls a disciple of the apostles; which, in all probability, refers to his being tutored by St. John. Now, if Quadratus himself was St. John's disciple, (as he might be, who was bishop in the time of the emperor Hadrian, to whom he presented his apology,) then there might be three bishops successively at Athens, all trained up by the apostles, and two of them consecrated by their hands, or at least with their consent and approbation.

I shall end this catalogue of primitive bishops with what Theodoret⁷³ says of Epaphroditus, that as Timothy and Titus were bishops of Ephesus and Crete under the name of apostles, so Epaphroditus was bishop of Philippi under the same title, which was then the common name of all that were properly bishops: of which I say no more in this place, because I give a more particular account of it in the following chapter.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE SEVERAL TITLES OF HONOUR GIVEN TO BISHOPS IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

FOR further confirmation of what has been asserted in the foregoing chapter, it will not be amiss here to sub-join next a short account of the several titles of honour which were given to bishops in the primitive church. The most ancient of these, is the title of apostles, which, in a large and secondary sense, is thought by many to have been the original name for bishops, before the name bishop was appropriated to their order. For at first they suppose the names bishop and presbyter to have been common names for all of the first and second order; during which time, the appropriate name for bishops, to distinguish them from mere presbyters, was that of apostles. Thus Theodoret¹ says expressly, The same persons were anciently called promiscuously both bishops and presbyters, whilst those who are now called bishops were called apostles. But shortly after, the name of apostles was appropriated to such only as were apostles indeed; and then the name bishop was given to those who before were called apostles. Thus, he says, Epaphroditus was the apostle of the Philippians, and Titus the apostle of the Cretians, and Timothy the apostle of the Asiatics. And this he repeats² in several other places of his writings.

The author under the name of St. Ambrose³ asserts the same thing, that all bishops were called apostles at first. And therefore, he says,⁴ that St. Paul, to distinguish himself from such apostles, calls himself an apostle, not of man, nor sent by man to preach, as those others were, who were chosen and sent by the apostles to confirm the

Sect. 1.
All bishops at first called apostles.

⁵⁸ Tertul. de Præscrip. c. 32.

⁵⁹ Euseb. lib. 3. c. 36. et lib. 4. c. 14.

⁶⁰ Iren. lib. 5. c. 33. Papias Joannis auditor, Polycarpus contubernalis. Hieron. Ep. 29. ad Theodor. It. de Scriptor.

⁶¹ Euseb. lib. 3. c. 4. ⁶² Chrys. Hom. 1. in Philip.

⁶³ Epiph. Hær. 75. Aerian.

⁶⁴ Hieron. Catal. Scriptor. in Timotheo.

⁶⁵ Pseudo-Ambros. Præf. in Tim. It. Com. in 1 Tim. iii.

⁶⁶ Phot. Cod. 254. ⁶⁷ Theodor. Com. in 1 Tim. iii. 1.

⁶⁸ Euseb. et Chrysost. loc. cit. Hieron. de Scriptor. in Tito. Pseudo-Ambros. Præf. in Tit. Theodor. loc. cit.

⁶⁹ Chrys. Hom. 1. in Tit. It. Hom. 15. in 1 Tim.

⁷⁰ Euseb. lib. 3. c. 4. It. lib. 4. c. 23.

⁷¹ Suidas in Voce Dionys. Maxim. Prolog. ad Oper. Dionysii.

⁷² Hieron. de Scriptor. c. 19. Quadratus apostolorum discipulus, Publico Athenarum episcopo ob Christi fidem martyrio coronato, in locum ejus substituitur.

⁷³ Theodor. Com. in 1 Tim. iii. 1.

¹ Theodor. Ibid.

² Theodor. Com. in Phil. i. 1. It. in Phil. ii. 25.

³ Ambros. Com. in Eph. iv. Apostoli episcopi sunt.

⁴ Id. Com. in Gal. i. 1.

churches. Amalarius⁵ cites another passage out of this same author, which speaks more fully to the purpose: They, says he, who are now called bishops, were originally called apostles: but the holy apostles being dead, they who were ordained after them to govern the churches, could not arrive to the excellency of those first; nor had they the testimony of miracles, but were in many other respects inferior to them: therefore they thought it not decent to assume to themselves the name of apostles; but, dividing the names, they left to presbyters the name of the presbytery, and they themselves were called bishops.

This is what those authors infer from the identity of the names, bishop and presbyter, in the first age. They do not thence argue, (as some who abuse their authority have done since,) that therefore bishops and presbyters were all one; but they think that bishops were then distinguished by a more appropriate name, and more expressive of their superiority, which was that of secondary apostles.

Afterward bishops thought it honour enough for them to be styled the apostles' successors. As Cyprian,⁶ and Firmilian,⁷ and the bishops in the council of Carthage⁸ call themselves and others. And St. Jerom⁹ speaks of them in the same style, saying, Wheresoever a bishop is, whether at Rome, or Eugubium; at Constantinople, or at Rhegium; at Alexandria, or at Tanis; they are all of equal merit, their priesthood is the same; they are all successors to the apostles. And both he and St. Austin¹⁰ draw that of the psalmist to this sense; "Instead of thy fathers thou shalt have children, whom thou mayest make princes in all lands:" they say, bishops are the sons of the apostles, and princes and fathers in the church.

And hence it was that anciently every bishop's see was dignified with the title of sedes apostolica, an apostolical see; which in those days was no peculiar title of the bishop of Rome, but given to all bishops in general, as deriving their original and counting their succession from the apostles. The catholic church, says St. Austin,¹¹ is propagated and diffused over all the world by the apostolical sees, and the succession of bishops in them. It is plain, this is not spoken only of the bishop of Rome, but of all other bishops whatsoever. Sidonius Apollinaris¹² uses the same expression, in speaking of a private French bishop, who sat five and forty years, he says, in his apostolical see. And Paulinus¹³ makes no more but the usual compliment to Alypius, when he tells him, that God had deservedly placed him in an apostolical see with the princes of his people.

Where we must also note, that Paulinus speaks in the usual phrase and style of those ancient times, when he calls bishops princes of the people. For that was another usual title that was given them; as appears from Optatus,¹⁴ and several passages in St. Jerom;¹⁵ who, to distinguish them from secular princes, usually styles them principes ecclesie,¹⁶ princes of the church; applying to them that prophecy of Isa. lx. 17, which, according to his translation, is, "I will make thy princes peace, and thy bishops righteousness." Upon which he has this note;¹⁷ That the majesty of the Holy Scripture is to be admired, in that it calls those who were to be bishops in future ages, by the name of princes. In the Greek writers they are styled ἀρχοντες ἐκκλησιῶν, governors and princes likewise; as frequently in Eusebius,¹⁸ Origen,¹⁹ Chrysostom,²⁰ and many others.

In the same sense Cyprian²¹ and Tertullian²² commonly call them presidents, or provosts of the church; which Eusebius²³ and Justin Martyr²⁴ call προιστάτες, and sometimes πρόεδροι,²⁵ and others ἐφοροί,²⁶ inspectors; all which are proper characters of bishops, who have the care, presidency, and inspection of the church.

⁵ Amalar. de Offic. Eccles. lib. 2. c. 13. Qui nunc episcopi nominantur, illi tunc apostoli dicebantur, &c.

⁶ Cypr. Ep. 69. al. 66. ad Florent. Qui apostolis vicaria ordinatione succedunt. Id. Ep. 42. al. 45. ad Cornel. Laborare debemus, ut unitatem a Domino, et per apostolos nobis successoribus traditam, obtinere curemus.

⁷ Firmil. Ep. 55. ap. Cypr. p. 225.

⁸ Con. Carthag. ap. Cypr. in Suffragio Clari a Mascula.

⁹ Hieron. Epist. 85. ad Evagr. It. in Psal. xlv. 16.

¹⁰ Aug. Com. in Psal. xlv. 16. p. 169. Pro apostolis nati sunt filii tibi, constituti sunt episcopi, — Ipsa ecclesia patres illos appellat.

¹¹ Aug. Ep. 42. ad Fratres Madaurens. Christiana societas per sedes apostolorum et successiones episcoporum certa per orbem propagatione diffunditur.

¹² Sidon. lib. 6. Ep. 1. ad Lup. Tricassin. In apostolica sede novem jam decursa quinquennia.

¹³ Paulin. Ep. 45. ad Alypium. Cum principibus populi sui sede apostolica merito collocavit Dominus. See also Tertul. de Præscrip. c. 36. Ipsæ adhuc cathedræ apostolorum suis locis præsentur. — Habes Corinthum. —

Habes Philippos, &c.

¹⁴ Optat. lib. 1. p. 39. Ipsi apices et principes omnium episcopi.

¹⁵ Hieron. Com. in Esa. iii.

¹⁶ Hieron. Com. in Psal. xlv. Principes ecclesie, id est, episcopi. Id. Com. in Esa. v. et Tit. i.

¹⁷ Hieron. Com. in Esa. lx. Scripturæ S. admiranda majestas, quod principes futuros ecclesie episcopus nominavit.

¹⁸ Euseb. Hist. lib. 6. c. 28. lib. 8. c. 1 et 3. It. de Martyr. Palæst. c. 1.

¹⁹ Origen. Hom. 11. in Jerem. Cont. Cels. lib. 3. p. 129.

²⁰ Chrys. de Sacerdot. lib. 3. c. 15. Id. Hom. 3. ad Pop. Antioch. t. 1. p. 48.

²¹ Cypr. Ep. 3, 9, 13, 27, 81. Ed. Oxon. Præpositi.

²² Tertul. Apol. c. 39. Ad Uxor. lib. 1. c. 7. De Cor. Mil. c. 3.

²³ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 3, 8, 10. lib. 7. c. 13. lib. 8. c. 6.

²⁴ Just. Apol. 2. Chrysost. Hom. 3. in Colos.

²⁵ Euseb. lib. 8. c. 2. It. de Martyr. Palæst. c. 2.

²⁶ Philostorg. Hist. lib. 3. c. 6.

Sect. 6.
Principes sacerdotum, pontifices maximi, summi sacerdotes, &c.

And because this presidency was not only over the people, but also over the clergy, they were dignified upon that account with the distinguishing characters of summi sacerdotes, pontifices maximi, and principes sacerdotum, chief priests, and princes of the clergy. The author under the name of St. Ambrose,²⁷ gives the bishop expressly the title of chief priest, and prince of the priests. And so, frequently, the name summus sacerdos is used by St. Jerom: as, where speaking of himself, he says, In the opinion of all men he was thought worthy of the high priesthood; he explains²⁸ himself to mean a bishopric. And in another place,²⁹ the prosperity of the church depends upon the honour of the chief priest. The same title is given to all bishops, by the author³⁰ of the Questions upon the Old and New Testament under the name of St. Austin. Sidonius³¹ calls them summi pontifices; where he speaks only of the bishops of France: And therefore, when Tertullian³² gives the title of pontifex maximus to the bishop of Rome, he does him no greater honour than, in those days, was done to every bishop in the world; and some think he meant not the bishop of Rome in particular, but comprehended all others under that title. As it is certain the council of Agde does, when it orders³³ every metropolitan to call his suffragans, ad ordinationem summi pontificis; which means not, to the ordination of the pope of Rome, but to the ordination of any French bishop within the metropolitan's province or jurisdiction. For then, as we have seen, summus pontifex was the ordinary title of every bishop whatsoever.

Sect. 7.
Every bishop anciently called papa, father, or pope.

And so was the name papa, though now it is become the pretended prerogative and sole privilege of the bishop of Rome. Some historians³⁴ indeed are so vain as to assert confidently, that Cyril of Alexandria was the first bishop in those parts who had the honour of being called papa, and that because he was Pope Celestine's legate in the council of Ephesus. The Arabic writers, Homaidius, and Abubaerus

Habasides, cited by Echellensis and Bishop Pearson,³⁵ deliver a quite contrary story, that the name was first given to the patriarch of Alexandria, and thence carried to Rome: which seems to be said in answer to the Romish pretences. But the truth of the matter is, that it was no peculiar privilege of one patriarch or other, but the common title of all bishops, who were called fathers³⁶ of the church, and fathers³⁷ of the clergy; and papa means no more. Therefore Tertullian, in his book de Pudicitia, c. 13, speaking indefinitely of any Christian bishop who absolves penitents, gives him the name of Benedictus papa. Or if we suppose, as some do, that he speaks particularly of the bishop of Rome, yet there is nothing singular in it; for, at the same time, Dionysius, presbyter of Alexandria, speaking of Heraclas his bishop, gives him the very same title,³⁸ The blessed pope Heraclas. And Arius himself,³⁹ in one of his Epistles, speaks of his bishop Alexander in the same style. St. Jerom gives the title⁴⁰ to Athanasius, Epiphanius, and Paulinus; and writing often to St. Austin, he always inscribes⁴¹ his Epistles Beatissimo papæ Augustino. So among Cyprian's Epistles, those that are written to him are usually inscribed⁴² in the same manner, Cypriano papæ. And the clergy of Rome themselves⁴³ give him the title of Benedictus papa, and Beatissimus and Gloriosissimus papa Cyprianus. It were easy to add many other testimonies out of Epiphanius, and Constantine's Epistles, and the Theodosian Code, and especially Sidonius Apollinaris,⁴⁴ who always gives the French bishops the style of Dominus papa. But in so plain a case I need not insist any longer, especially since a learned Romanist⁴⁵ has undertaken to prove, out of authors as late as Photius and Gregory of Tours, that papa was the common name of all bishops for several ages: who also notes out of Balsamon, that this name was sometimes given to the inferior clergy; who were called papæ pisinni, little fathers; and their tonsure, or crown, thence called παπαλήθρα, the tonsure of the fathers. In comparison of whom, Balsamon⁴⁶ calls presbyters ²⁷ Ambros. Com. in Ephes. iv. In episcopo omnes ordines sunt, quia primus sacerdos est, hoc est, princeps sacerdotum.

²⁸ Hieron. Ep. 99. ad Asellam. Omnium pene judicio dignus summo sacerdotio decernebar.
²⁹ Id. Dial. c. Lucifer. p. 139. Ecclesie salus in summi sacerdotis dignitate pendet.
³⁰ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et N. Test. c. 101. Quid est episcopus nisi primus presbyter, id est, summus sacerdos?
³¹ Sidon. lib. 4. Ep. 11. lib. 7. Ep. 5.
³² Tertul. de Pudicit. c. 1.
³³ Con. Agathens. c. 35.
³⁴ Nicephorus is cited and chastised by Savaro for this. Vid. Savaro, Not. in Sidon. lib. 6. Ep. 1.
³⁵ Pearson, Vind. Ignat. part 1. c. 11. p. 330.
³⁶ Aug. Com. in Psal. xlv. p. 169. Ipsa ecclesia patres illos appellat. Chrysost. Hom. 3. ad Popul. Antioch. t. 1. p. 43.
³⁷ Hieron. Ep. 62. ad Theoph. Episcopi contenti sint honore suo; patres se sciant esse, non dominos. Id. Ep. 2 et 3. ad Nepotian. Com. in Psal. xlv. &c.

³⁸ Dionys. Ep. ad Philemon. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 7. Παρά τοῦ μακαρίου πάπα ἡμῶν Ἡρακλῆ.
³⁹ Arius Ep. ad Euseb. Nicom. ap. Theod. lib. 1. c. 5. et ap. Epiphani. Hæc. 69. Arian.
⁴⁰ Hieron. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. p. 163.
⁴¹ Id. Ep. 17, 18, 25, 30. inter Epist. Augustini.
⁴² Cypr. Ep. 30, 31, 36. Edit. Oxon.
⁴³ Ep. 8. Cleri Rom. ad Cler. Carthag. ibid. Didicimus secessisse Benedictum papam Cyprianum. Ep. 39. Cler. Rom. ad Cypr. Beatissime ac gloriosissime papa.
⁴⁴ Sidon. lib. 6. Epist. 1. Domino papæ Lupi. Lib. 6. Ep. 2. Papæ pragmatio. Lib. 6. Ep. 3. Domino papæ Leontio. And so for twelve Epistles together.
⁴⁵ Savaro, Comment. in Sidon. lib. 6. Ep. 1. p. 379.
⁴⁶ Balsam. Com. in Can. Apost. c. 59. It. in Con. Antioch. can. 10.

and the chorepiscopi, protopapa, and protopapades, chief fathers; speaking in the language of his own times, when the chorepiscopi and presbyters were become all one.

But bishops had still a more honourable title than that of papa; for they were commonly called patres patrum, and episcopi episcoporum, fathers of fathers, and bishops of bishops. The first that had this title was James, bishop of Jerusalem; which made the counterfeit author under the name of Clemens Romanus,⁴⁷ inscribe an epistle (as directed to him) with this title, Clemens Jacobo domino, episcopo episcoporum, &c. To which Sidonius Apollinaris⁴⁸ alludes plainly, when, writing to Lupus, an eminent French bishop, he tells him, he was father of fathers, and bishop of bishops, and another James of his age. By this we understand what Tertullian⁴⁹ means, when, speaking ironically of the catholic bishops, who admitted adulterers into communion again upon their repentance, he says, I hear there is a decree published, and that a preceptory one; the chief pontiff, the bishop of bishops, saith, I forgive the sins of adultery and fornication to all those that repent of them. Some⁵⁰ take this for a peculiar character of the bishop of Rome, and I will not deny, but that Tertullian might intend more especially to reflect upon him: but yet there is nothing singular in the title, which did not belong to other bishops as well as him; as appears from what has been already cited out of Sidonius. To which we may add the testimony of Athanasius,⁵¹ who styles Hosius, The father of bishops. And Gregory Nazianzen⁵² gives the same title to his own father, as St. Jerom⁵³ does to Epiphanius, styling him the father of all bishops. Cotelerius⁵⁴ observes, that Gregory Nyssen is called πατήρ πατέρων, father of fathers, by the second council of Nice; and others⁵⁵ say, Theodosius the emperor gave Chrysostom the same honourable title after death. As to the reason of these names, it is probable some bishops might have them upon the account of personal merit; and others, from the eminency of their sees; as the bishop of Alexandria, to whom Balsamon⁵⁶ gives the title of pater patrum, many ages after. But there was a more general reason why all bishops should be called so, as may be collected from Epiphanius;⁵⁷ who says, that the order of bishops was an order that begat fathers to the church; that is, bishops made bishops by ordination; whereas presbyters could only beget sons, by the power which they had of baptizing. And therefore, though we sometimes find presbyters called fathers, yet we no where find the title of pater patrum given to any of their order. Yet I must here also observe, that several of these titles were never kindly received among the African fathers; because the bishops of Rome began to abuse them, to establish a usurped authority over their neighbours. Therefore, in two African councils held at Carthage, the one⁵⁸ under Cyprian, the other⁵⁹ in St. Austin's time, these titles, episcopus episcoporum, princeps sacerdotum, and summus sacerdos, were discountenanced and forbid, insomuch that the primates themselves were not allowed to use them. But of this more hereafter, when we come to speak of metropolitans.

Gregory Nazianzen in his rhetorical way usually gives bishops the title of patriarchs; by which he means not patriarchs in the proper sense, as the word came afterward to be used in the church, to signify bishops of the larger sees, who had primates and metropolitans under them; but any bishops whatsoever, that were heads of their own family, that is, the church subject to them. Thus he styles his own father patriarch,⁶⁰ though he was but bishop of Nazianzum, a very small city in Cappadocia, under Cæsarea the metropolis. And in his oration⁶¹ before the council of Constantinople, he gives the same title to all other bishops, complaining of the Arian cruelties against them. Have we not had, says he, our ancient bishops, or, to speak more properly, our patriarchs, publicly murdered by them? In another place, complaining of the corrupt promotions and practices of some bishops of his age, he thus takes his leave of them,⁶² Valete; insolentes estote: patriarchatus per sortes inter vos distribuite. Farewell: go on in your insolence: divide the patriarchal dig-

⁴⁷ Pseudo-Clem. Ep. 1. ad Jacob.

⁴⁸ Sidon. lib. 6. Ep. 1. Tu pater patrum, et episcopus episcoporum, et alter sæculi tui Jacobus.

⁴⁹ Tertul. de Pudicit. c. 1. Audio etiam edictum esse propositum, et quidem preceptorium, pontifex scilicet maximus, episcopus episcoporum dicit, ego et mechiae et fornicationis delicta pœnitentia defunctis dimitto.

⁵⁰ Baron. an. 142. n. 4. an. 216. n. 4. Georg. Ambianus Observ. in Tertul. t. 3. p. 633.

⁵¹ Athan. Epist. ad solit. vit. agentes, t. 1. p. 837.

⁵² Naz. Orat. 19. de Fun. Patr. p. 314.

⁵³ Hieron. Ep. 61. p. 167.

⁵⁴ Coteler. Not. in Ep. Clem. p. 605.

⁵⁵ Nicephor. lib. 14. c. 43.

⁵⁶ Balsam. Resp. ad Interrogat. Marci ap. Leunclav. Jus

Gr. Rom. t. 1. lib. 5. p. 362. Κύριος Μάρκος πατέρων πατήρ ὑπάρχων, &c.

⁵⁷ Epiphani. Hæc. 75. Arian. Πατέρων γεννητικὴ τάξις. Πατέρας γὰρ γεννᾷ τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ.

⁵⁸ Con. Carthag. ap. Cypr. p. 229. Neque enim quisquam nostrum episcopum se episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico terrore ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit.

⁵⁹ Con. Carth. 3. c. 26. Ut primæ sedis episcopus non appelletur princeps sacerdotum, aut summus sacerdos, aut aliquis hujusmodi, sed tantum primæ sedis episcopus.

⁶⁰ Naz. Orat. 19. p. 312. Orat. 20. de Laud. Basil. p. 342. Orat. 41. p. 675.

⁶¹ Orat. 22. p. 525.

⁶² Naz. Cygn. Carm. de Episcopis, t. 2. p. 308.

nities among you: translate yourselves from see to see: set up some, pull down others. Where it is evident, he speaks not of patriarchs properly so called, but only of some ambitious spirits among the bishops, who turned all things into confusion, and did what they pleased with the preferments of the church. Gregory Nyssen uses the same term for bishops, in his funeral oration upon Meletius, which he made in the council of Constantinople, where he gives all the bishops then in council the title of patriarchs. Behold⁶³ these patriarchs: all these are the sons of our Jacob; meaning Meletius, whom he calls Jacob for his age, and the rest patriarchs, in allusion to the twelve patriarchs who were Jacob's children. Thus bishops were commonly styled, till such times as the name patriarch became the appropriate title of the most eminent bishops, such as Rome, Constantinople, &c. And even some ages after that, De Marca⁶⁴ observes, that Athalaricus and the rest of the Gothish kings in Italy gave the name of patriarchs to all bishops within their dominions.

It must not here be forgotten, that all bishops anciently were styled also vicars of Christ, and had as much interest in that name as he that has since laid so much claim to the title. The author of the Questions⁶⁵ under the name of St. Austin, says expressly, that every bishop is the vicar of God. Cyprian says the same in several of his Epistles,⁶⁶ that every bishop is vice Christi, Christ's vicar, or vicegerent. And this is his meaning in that noted passage to Cornelius, where he says,⁶⁷ All heresies and schisms take their original from hence, that men do not submit to God's priest, and consider that there ought to be but one bishop in a church at a time, and one judge as the vicar of Christ. This is spoken of every individual bishop throughout the world, as Rigaltius⁶⁸ freely owns; and they grossly mistake Cyprian's meaning, and abuse his authority, who apply it only to the bishop of Rome. St. Basil⁶⁹ extends the title to all bishops; and so does the author under the name of St. Ambrose,⁷⁰ who is supposed to be Hilary, a deacon of the church of Rome; which would have been an unpardonable oversight in him, had it not been then the custom of the world to give all others this title as well as the bishop of Rome.

I shall but take notice of one title more given to bishops, which is that of angels of the churches; a name which some authors⁷¹ suppose to be used by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xi. 10, where he says, women ought to be covered in the church because of the angels; that is, bishops, says Hilary the deacon, in the place last mentioned. And so the same author understands that of St. John, Rev. i. 20, "the seven stars are the angels"⁷² of the seven churches." Which is also the interpretation of St. Austin⁷³ and Epiphanius,⁷⁴ who say, that by angels we are not there to understand the celestial angels, (as Origen thought, who assigns a guardian angel⁷⁵ to every church,) but the bishops or governors of those seven churches. Hence, in after ages, bishops were called angels of the churches: as Socrates⁷⁶ terms Serapion, who was bishop of Thmuis, the angel of the church of Thmuis: and the author of the Short Notes⁷⁷ upon Timothy, under the name of St. Jerom, says of every bishop, that he is the angel of God Almighty. In this sense Dr. Hammond⁷⁸ observes out of a Saxon MS., that in our own language anciently bishops were called God's bydels, that is, messengers or officers, as he explains it from Sir Henry Spelman's Glossary, in the word bedellus. And thus much of those ancient titles of honour, which were given to all bishops indifferently in the primitive church.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE OFFICES OF BISHOPS AS DISTINCT FROM PRESBYTERS.

I COME NOW to consider the episcopal office and function itself: where,

Sect. I.
A three-fold difference between ⁶³ Greg. Nyss. Orat. de Fun. Melet. t. 3. p. 589.

⁶⁴ Marca Dissert. de Primatib. n. 20. p. 112.

⁶⁵ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test. c. 127. Antistitem Dei puriorem cæteris esse oportet.—Est enim vicarius ejus.

⁶⁶ Cypr. Ep. 63. ad Cæcil. Ille sacerdos vice Christi vere fungitur, qui id quod Christus fecit imitatur.

⁶⁷ Ep. 55. al. 59. ad Cornel. p. 129. Neque enim aliunde hæreses obortæ sunt, aut nata sunt schismata, quam inde quod sacerdoti Dei non obtemperatur, nec unus in ecclesia ad tempus sacerdos, et ad tempus judex vice Christi cogitatur.

⁶⁸ Rigalt. in loc. Ecce autem episcopos ævo jam Cypriani vicarius Christi.

⁶⁹ Basil. Constit. Monach. c. 22. t. 2. p. 792.

⁷⁰ Ambr. Com. in 1 Cor. xi. 10. Episcopus personam habet Christi.—Vicarius Domini est, &c. The author of the Constitutions, lib. 2. c. 26, styles the bishop Θεὸν ἐπίγειον.

⁷¹ Ambrosiaster, ibid. Angelos episcopos dicit, sicut docetur in Apocalypsi Joannis.

⁷² Pseudo-Ambros. in 1 Cor. xi. 10.

⁷³ Aug. Ep. 162. Divina voce laudatur sub angeli nomine præpositus ecclesie.

⁷⁴ Epiph. Hær. 25. Nicolait.

⁷⁵ Orig. Hom. 20. in Num. t. 1. p. 251. So also Andreas Cæsariens. Ἄγγελοι φύλακες. Com. in Apoc. 1. 20.

⁷⁶ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 23.

⁷⁷ Hieron. Com. in 1 Tim. iii.

⁷⁸ Ham. Annot. on Rev. i. 20.

bishops and presbyters in the discharge of their office and function.

to do justice to antiquity, it is necessary for me to observe a threefold distinction between bishops and presbyters in the discharge of ecclesiastical offices. For, 1st, In the common offices, which were ordinarily intrusted in the hands of presbyters, such as preaching, baptizing, administering the eucharist, &c., there was this obvious difference betwixt a bishop and a presbyter, that the one acted by an absolute and independent power; the other, in dependence upon, and subordination to his bishop, by whose authority and directions, under God, he was to be governed, and do nothing without his consent, or against it: so that though there was no difference in the things that were done, yet there was an essential difference in the power of doing them. This is an observation not commonly made, but it is of very great use, both for establishing the just bounds of episcopal and presbyterial power, and clearing the practice of the primitive church. 2dly, Some offices were never intrusted in the hands of presbyters, nor allowed, if performed by them, such as the ordination of bishops, presbyters, &c. 3dly, Bishops always retained the power of calling their presbyters to an account, and censuring them for their misdemeanours in the discharge of their office; which presbyters could not do by their bishop, being always subject and subordinate to him as their superior. These things cleared and set in a fair light, will give us a just account of the office of a bishop, as distinct from that of a presbyter, in the primitive church.

First, then, we are to observe, that in such ordinary and common offices as might be performed by both, bishops and presbyters acted by a different power; the bishop was the absolute, independent minister of the church, and did whatever he did by his own authority, solely inherent in himself; but the presbyters were only his assistants, authorized to perform such offices as he intrusted them with, or gave them commission and directions to perform, which they still did by his authority, and in dependence upon, and subordination to him as their superior, and might do nothing against his will, or independent of him. This is clear from many passages in Ignatius, Cy-

Sect. 2.

1. In the common offices which might be performed by both, the bishop acted by an independent power, but presbyters in dependence upon, and subordination to him.

prian, and the canons of the ancient councils, which all agree in this, that nothing is to be done without the bishop; that is, without his knowledge, without his consent, directions, or approbation. Thus Ignatius,¹ in his Epistle to the church of Smyrna; Let no one perform any ecclesiastical office without the bishop. Which he explains both there and elsewhere² to mean, without his authority and permission. So in the council of Laodicea³ it is expressed the same way; The presbyters shall do nothing without the consent of the bishop. The councils of Arles⁴ and Toledo⁵ say, without his privity or knowledge. And the Apostolical Canons⁶ give a reason for all this; Because the bishop is the man to whom the Lord's people are committed, and he must give an account of their souls.

This rule they particularly apply to the offices of baptism and the Lord's supper. A presbyter might ordinarily administer both these sacraments; but not against the will of his bishop, or in opposition and contradiction to him, but by his consent and authority, in a due subordination to him as his superior. It is not lawful, says Ignatius,⁷ either to baptize or celebrate the eucharist without the bishop; but that which he allows, is well-pleasing to God. He does not say, that none but a bishop might administer these sacraments, but that none was to do it without his allowance and approbation. And that is plainly the meaning of Tertullian⁸ and St. Jerom,⁹ when they say, that presbyters and deacons have no power to baptize, without the command and authority of the bishop or chief priest; and that this is for the honour of the church, and the preservation of peace and unity. St. Ambrose¹⁰ asserts the same, that though presbyters do baptize, yet they derive their authority from their superior.

The like observation may be made upon the office of preaching. This¹¹ was in the first place the bishops' office, which they commonly discharged themselves, especially in the African churches. Which is the reason we so often meet with the phrase, tractante episcopo, the bishops preaching, in the writings¹² of St. Cyprian: for then it was so much the office and custom of bishops to preach, that no presbyter was permitted to preach in their presence, till the time

Sect. 3.
This specified in the offices of baptism and the Lord's supper.

Sect. 4.
And in the office of preaching.

¹ Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 8. Μηδεις χωρις του επισκοπου τι πρασσω των ανηκοντων εις την εκκλησιαν.

² Id. Ep. ad Polycarp. n. 4. Μηδεν ανευ γνωμης σου γινεσσω.

³ Con. Laodic. can. 56. " ανευ γνωμης του επισκοπου.

⁴ Con. Arelat. 1. can. 19. Ut presbyteri sine conscientia episcoporum nihil faciant.

⁵ Con. Tolet. 1. can. 20. Sine conscientia episcopi nihil penitus presbyteri agere presumant.

⁶ Can. Apost. c. 39.

⁷ Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 8.

⁸ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 17. Dandi jus quidem habet summus sacerdos, qui est episcopus: dehinc presbyteri et diaconi; non tamen sine episcopi auctoritate, propter ecclesiae honorem, quo salvo salva pax est.

⁹ Hieron. Dial. cont. Lucifer. p. 139. Inde venit, ut sine jussione episcopi, neque presbyter neque diaconus jus habeant baptizandi.

¹⁰ Ambros. de Sacram. lib. 3. c. 1. Licet presbyteri fecerint, tamen exordium ministerii a summo est sacerdote.

¹¹ Vid. Can. Apost. c. 58.

¹² Cypr. Ep. 52, 56, 83. Ed. Oxon. It. Pontius Vit. Cypr. ibid.

of St. Austin, who whilst he was a presbyter was authorized by Valerius his bishop to preach before him: but that, as Possidius,¹³ the writer of his Life, observes, was so contrary to the use and custom of the African churches, that many bishops were highly offended at it, and spake against it; till the consequence proved, that such a permission was of good use and service to the church; and then several other bishops granted their presbyters power and privilege to preach before them. So that it was then a favour for presbyters to preach in the presence of their bishops, and wholly at the bishops' discretion whether they would permit them or not; and when they did preach, it was potestate accepta, by the power and authority of the bishops that appointed them. In the Eastern churches presbyters were more commonly employed to preach, as Possidius¹⁴ observes, when he says Valerius brought the custom into Africa from their example. And St. Jerom intimates as much, when he complains¹⁵ of it as an ill custom only in some churches to forbid presbyters to preach. Chrysostom preached several of his elaborate discourses at Antioch whilst he was but a presbyter, and so did Atticus¹⁶ at Constantinople. And the same is observed to have been granted to the presbyters¹⁷ of Alexandria, and Cæsarea, in Cappadocia,¹⁸ and Cyprus, and other places. But still it was but a grant of the bishops, and presbyters did it by their authority and commission. And whenever bishops saw just reason to forbid them, they had power to limit or withdraw their commission again; as both Socrates¹⁹ and Sozomen²⁰ testify, who say, that at Alexandria presbyters were forbidden to preach, from the time that Arius raised a disturbance in the church. Thus we see what power bishops anciently challenged and exercised over presbyters in the common and ordinary offices of the church; particularly for preaching, bishops always esteemed it their office, as much as any other. Such a vast difference was there between the practice of the primitive church and the bishops of Rome in after ages; when, as Blondel observes out of Surius, there was a time when the bishops of Rome were not known to preach for five hundred years together! Inasmuch, that when Pius Quintus made a sermon, it was looked upon as a prodigy, and was indeed a greater rarity than the Seculares Ludi were in old Rome.

See Blondel, Apolog. p. 58, and Surius, Comment. Rer. in Orbe gestar.

But to return to the bishops of the primitive church. There were other offices, which they very rarely intrusted in the hands of presbyters; and if ever they granted them commission to perform them, it was only in cases of great necessity; such were the offices of reconciling penitents, confirmation of neophytes, consecration of churches, virgins and widows, with some others of the like nature; of which I shall speak nothing more particularly here now, because they will come more properly under consideration in other places. But there was one office which they never intrusted in the hands of presbyters, nor ever gave them any commission to perform; which was the office of ordaining the superior clergy, bishops, presbyters, and deacons. The utmost that presbyters could pretend to in this matter, was to lay on their hands together with the bishop in the ordination of a presbyter, whilst the bishop by his prayer performed the office of consecration. Thus much is allowed them by one of the councils of Carthage,²¹ which yet expressly reserves the benediction or ordination prayer to the bishop only. In the ordination of bishops they had no concern at all; which was always performed by a synod of bishops, as shall be showed more particularly when we come to speak of the rites and customs observed in their ordinations. Here in this place it will be sufficient to prove in general, that the power of ordinations was the prerogative of bishops, and that they never communicated this privilege to any presbyters. St. Jerom's²² testimony is irrefragable evidence in this case. For in the same place where he sets off the office of presbyters to the best advantage, he still excepts the power of ordination. What is it, says he, that a bishop does more than a presbyter, setting aside the business of ordination? St. Chrysostom²³ speaks much after the same manner, where he advances the power of presbyters to the highest. Bishops and presbyters, says he, differ not much from one another. For presbyters are admitted to preach and govern the church; and the same qualifications that the apostle requires in bishops, are required in presbyters also. For bishops are superior to them only in the power of ordination, and have that one thing more than they. In another place²⁴ he proves that

Sect. 5.
2. The office and power of ordination never intrusted in the hands of presbyters.

¹³ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 5. Eidem presbytero potestatem dedit coram se in ecclesia evangelium prædicandi, ac frequentissime tractandi, contra usum quidem ac consuetudinem Africanarum ecclesiarum. Unde etiam ei nonnulli episcopi detrahebant. — Postea bono præcedente exemplo, accepta ab episcopis potestate, presbyteri nonnulli coram episcopis populo tractare cœperunt verbum Dei.
¹⁴ Ille in Orientalibus ecclesiis id ex more fieri sciens, obtruncantium non curabat linguas, &c. Possid. ibid.
¹⁵ Pessimæ consuetudinis est in quibusdam ecclesiis tacere prebyteros, et præsentibus episcopis non loqui, &c.

¹⁶ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 2. ¹⁷ Theodor. lib. i. c. 2.
¹⁸ Socrat. lib. 5. c. 22. ¹⁹ Socrat. ibid.
²⁰ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 17.
²¹ Con. Carth. 4. can. 3. Presbyter cum ordinatur, episcopo eum benedicente, et manum super caput ejus tenente, etiam omnes presbyteri, qui presentes sunt, manus suas juxta manum episcopi super caput illius teneant.
²² Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. Quid enim facit, excepta ordinatione, episcopus, quod presbyter non facit?
²³ Chrys. Hom. 11. in 1 Tim. iii. 8.
²⁴ Id. Hom. 1. in Philip. i.

Timothy was a bishop, because the apostle speaks of his power to ordain, bidding him lay hands suddenly on no man. And he adds both there and elsewhere,²⁵ that the presbytery which ordained Timothy was a synod of bishops, because mere presbyters had no power to ordain a bishop. I might here produce all those canons of the ancient councils, which speak of bishops ordaining,²⁶ but never of presbyters; which rule was so precisely observed in the primitive church, that Novatian himself would not presume to break it, but sent for three bishops²⁷ from the farthest corners of Italy, rather than want a canonical number of bishops to ordain him. I only add that observation of Epiphanius,²⁸ grounded upon the general practice of the church, that the order of bishops begets fathers to the church, which the order of presbyters cannot do, but only beget sons by the regeneration of baptism.

I know some urge the authority of St. Jerom,²⁹ to prove that the presbyters of Alexandria ordained their own bishop, from the days of St. Mark to the time of Heraclas and Dionysius; and others think the same words prove that he had no new ordination at all: but they both mistake St. Jerom's meaning, who speaks not of the ordination of the bishop, but of his election; who was chosen by the presbyters out of their own body, and by them placed upon the bishop's throne; which in those days was no more than a token of his election, and was sometimes done by the people; but the ordination came after that, and was always reserved for the provincial bishops to perform, as shall be showed hereafter.

But it may be inquired, what was the practice of the church in case any presbyters took upon them to ordain? Were their ordinations allowed to stand good, or not? I answer, they were commonly reversed and disannulled. As in the known case of Ischyras,³⁰ who was deposed by the synod of Alexandria, because Colluthus, who ordained him, was no more than a presbyter, though pretending to be a bishop: and in the case of those presbyters who were reduced to the quality of laymen by the council of Sardica,³¹ because Eutychianus and Musæus, who ordained them, were only pretended bishops. The council of Seville in Spain³² went a little further; they deposed a presbyter and two deacons, because the bishop only laid his hands upon them, whilst a presbyter pronounced the blessing or consecration prayer over them. And some other instances might be added of the like nature, which show that then they did not allow bishops so much as to delegate or commission presbyters to ordain in their name, but reserved this entirely to the episcopal function.

The common pleas which some urge to the contrary, derogate nothing from the truth of this observation. For whereas it is said, 1. That the chorepiscopi were only presbyters, and yet had power to ordain; that seems to be a plain mistake; for all the chorepiscopi of the ancient church were real bishops, though subordinate to other bishops; as I shall show more particularly hereafter, when I come to speak of their order. 2. It is said, that the city presbyters had power to ordain by the bishop's licence; and that this was established by canon in the council of Ancyra.³³ But this is grounded only upon a very ambiguous sense, if not a corrupt reading of that canon. For all the old translators render it much otherwise, that the city presbyters shall do nothing³⁴ without the licence and authority of the bishop, in any part of the parish or diocese belonging to his jurisdiction. Which agrees with what I have cited before out of the council of Laodicea; and several other canons, which make presbyters dependent upon their bishops in the ordinary exercise of their function. (See before, Sect. 2. of this chapter.) And some Greek copies³⁵ read it, ἐν ἐτέρῃ παροικίᾳ, which seems to signify that presbyters shall not officiate in another diocese without letters dimissory from their own bishop.

3. It is urged further, that Novatus, a presbyter of Carthage, ordained Felicissimus a deacon. But this seems to be no more than procuring him to be ordained by some bishop. For Cyprian says he made Novatian³⁶ bishop of Rome after the same

Sect. 6.
Ordinations by presbyters disannulled by the church.

²⁵ Hom. 13. in 1 Tim. iv. 14. οὐ γὰρ δι' ἀποστόλων ἐπίσκοπον ἐχειροτόνουν.

²⁶ See Con. Nic. c. 19. Con. Antioch. c. 9. Con. Chalced. c. 2 et 6. Con. Carth. 3. c. 45. Can. Apost. c. 1.

²⁷ Cornel. Ep. ad Fabium, ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

²⁸ Epiph. Hær. 75. Aerian.

²⁹ Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. Alexandria a Marco evangelista usque ad Heraclam et Dionysium episcopos, presbyteri semper unum ex se electum, in excelsiori gradu collocatum episcopum nominabant; quomodo si exercitus imperatorem faciat.

³⁰ Athan. Apol. 2. p. 732. Epist. Cler. Mareot. ibid. p. 781.

³¹ Con. Sard. can. 20.

³² Con. Hispal. 2. can. 5. Relatum est nobis de quibusdam clericis, quorum dum unus ad presbyterum, duo ad

Levitarum ministerium sacraerentur, episcopus oculorum dolore detentus fertur manum suam super eos tantum imposuisse, et presbyter quidam illis contra ecclesiasticum ordinem benedictionem dedisse, &c. Hi gradum sacerdotii vel Levitici ordinis, quem perverse adepti sunt, amittunt.

³³ Con. Ancy. can. 13.

³⁴ Id. ex versione Dionysii exigui: Sed nec presbyteris civitatis, sine præcepto episcopi, amplius aliquid imperare, nec sine autoritate literarum ejus in unaquaque parochia aliquid agere.

³⁵ Cod. Can. edit. Ehinger.

³⁶ Cypr. Ep. 49. al. 52. ad Cornel. p. 97. ed. Oxon. Quoniam pro magnitudine sua debeat Carthaginem Roma præcedere, illic majora et graviora commisit. Qui istic adversus ecclesiam diaconum fecerat, illic episcopum fecit.

manner as he had done Felicissimus, deacon at Carthage. But now it is certain he did not ordain Novatian, but only was instrumental in procuring three obscure Italian bishops to come and ordain him. And in that sense he might ordain Felicissimus too. But admit it were otherwise, it was only a schismatical act, condemned by Cyprian and the whole church.

4. It is pleaded out of Cassian, that Paphnutius, an Egyptian abbot, ordained one Daniel a presbyter. But if Cassian's words be rightly considered, he says no such thing, but only³⁷ that Paphnutius first promoted him to be made a deacon before several of his seniors, and then, intending to make him his successor, he also preferred him to the dignity of a presbyter. Which preference, or promotion, does not at all exclude the bishop's ordination. It may reasonably signify the abbot's choice, which he had power to make; but it cannot so reasonably be interpreted that he ordained him, since this was contrary to the rules and practice of the church. And considering where and when Paphnutius lived, in the midst of Egypt, among a hundred bishops, in the fifth century, it is not likely he would transgress the canons in so plain a case. Therefore I cannot subscribe to a learned man,³⁸ who says, Nothing is more plain and evident, than that here a presbyter ordained a presbyter, which we no where read was pronounced null by Theophilus, then bishop of Alexandria, nor any others at that time. I conceive, the contrary was rather evident to them, and therefore they had no reason to pronounce it null, knowing it to be a just and regular ordination.

5. I remember but one instance more in ancient church history (for modern instances I wholly pass by) that seems to make any thing for the ordination of presbyters; and that is in the answer given by Pope Leo to a question put to him by Rusticus Narbonensis, whether the ordination of certain persons might stand good, who were only ordained by some pseudo-episcopi, false bishops, who had no legal and canonical right to their places? To this he answers,³⁹ that if the lawful bishops of those churches gave their consent to their ordination, it might be esteemed valid and allowed; otherwise to be disannulled. But here it is to be considered, that these pseudo-episcopi were in some sense bishops, as being ordained, though illegally, to their places: for they seem to be such as had schismatically intruded themselves into other men's sees, or at least obtained them by some corrupt and irregular practices. Now, the church did not always rescind and cancel the acts of such bishops, but used a liberty either to reverse and disannul the ordinations made by them, or otherwise to confirm and ratify them, as she saw occasion. Therefore, though the general council⁴⁰ of Constantinople deposed all such as were ordained by Maximus, who had simoniacally intruded himself into Gregory Nazianzen's see at Constantinople; yet the Novatian clergy were admitted by the council of Nice,⁴¹ though ordained by schismatical bishops; and the African councils⁴² allowed the ordinations of the Donatist bishops, though they had long continued in schism, and given schismatical orders to others also. Which shows that the primitive church made some difference between orders conferred by schismatical bishops, and those conferred by mere presbyters. I inquire not now into the grounds and reasons of this, but only relate the church's practice. From which upon the whole matter it appears, that this was another difference betwixt bishops and presbyters, that the one had power to ordain, but the other were never authorized or commissioned to do it.

Besides this, there was a third difference between bishops and presbyters in point of jurisdiction: bishops always retained to themselves the power of calling presbyters to an account, and censuring them for their miscarriages in the discharge of their office; but presbyters had no power to censure their bishops, or set up an independent power in opposition to their authority and jurisdiction. When Felicissimus and Augendus set up a separate communion at Carthage against Cyprian, threatening to excommunicate all that communicated with him, Cyprian gave orders to his deputies (being himself then in banishment) to execute first their own sentence upon them, and let them, for their contempt of him and the church,⁴³ feel the power of excommunication; which was accordingly done by his delegates, as appears from their answer to him.⁴⁴ In another place, writing to Rogatian, a bishop who made complaint to Cyprian and the synod, of an unruly deacon, he tells him, it was his singular modesty to refer the case to them, when he might by virtue of his own episcopal authority himself have punished the delinquent;⁴⁵

Sect. 8.
A third difference between bishops and presbyters: presbyters accountable to their bishops, not bishops to their presbyters.

³⁷ Cassian. Collat. 4. c. 1. A beato Paphnutio solitudinis ejusdem presbytero, et quidem cum multis junior esset ætate, ad diaconii est prælati officium.—Optansque sibi successorem dignissimum providere, superstes eum presbyterii honore provexit.

³⁸ Stilling. Irenic. par. 2. c. 7. n. 8. p. 380.

³⁹ Leo, Ep. 92. ad Rustic. c. 1. Si qui autem clerici ab istis pseudo-episcopis in eis ecclesiis ordinati sunt, quæ ad proprios episcopos pertinebant, et ordinatio eorum cum consensu et judicio præsentium facta est, potest rata haberi, &c.

⁴⁰ Con. Constant. can. 4.

⁴¹ Con. Nic. c. 8.

⁴² Collat. Carthag. 1. Die, c. 16.

⁴³ Cypr. Ep. 38. al. 41. p. 80. Cum Felicissimus comminatus sit, non communicaturos in monte (al. morte) secum, qui nobis communicarent: accipiat sententiam quam prior dixit; ut absentum a se nobis sciat.

⁴⁴ Ep. 39. al. 42. ad Cypr. Abstinuimus communicatione Felicissimum et Augendum, &c.

⁴⁵ Cypr. Ep. 65. al. 3. ad Rogatian. Tu quidem pro solita tua humilitate fecisti, ut malles de eo nobis conqueri, cum pro against whom, if he persisted in his contempt, he should use the power which belonged to his order, and either depose or suspend him. Nothing can be more plain and evident, than that in Cyprian's time all bishops were invested with this power of censuring delinquents among the clergy. And any one that looks into the councils of the following age, will find nothing more common, than canons which both suppose and confirm this power. As when the Apostolical Canons say,⁴⁶ That no presbyter, or deacon, excommunicated by his own bishop, should be received by any other; that supposes all bishops to have power to inflict ecclesiastical censures upon their clergy. The like may be seen in the canons of the council of Nice,⁴⁷ which allows an appeal in such a case to a provincial synod; and the council of Sardica,⁴⁸ which orders the metropolitan to hear and redress the grievance: so also in the councils of Antioch,⁴⁹ Chalcedon,⁵⁰ and many others.

Yet it must be owned, that according to the discipline and custom of those times, bishops seldom did any thing of this nature, without the advice and consent of their presbyters, who were their assessors, and (as it were) the ecclesiastical senate and council of the church: of which I shall give a more particular account, when I come to speak of the honour and privileges of the order of presbyters. And here it is to be further noted out of the preceding canons, That if any clergyman thought himself injured by his bishop, he had liberty to appeal⁵¹ either to the metropolitan, or a provincial synod: and in some places, the better to avoid arbitrary power, the canons provided, That no bishop should proceed to censure a presbyter, or deacon, without the concurrence of some neighbouring bishops to join with him in the sentence. The first council of Carthage⁵² requires three to censure a deacon, and six to censure a presbyter. The second council of Carthage⁵³ requires the same number, according to all correct editions of it: for Crab's edition is palpably false; and yet Blondel⁵⁴ lays hold of that corruption, to prove that presbyters and deacons were to be judges of their own bishop; which makes the canon speak mere nonsense, and appoints the bishop to judge himself also. The true reading of the canon is this: The criminal cause of a bishop shall be heard by twelve bishops; the cause of a presbyter, by six; the cause of a deacon, by three joined with his own bishop. This obliges every bishop to take other bishops into commission with him in criminal causes, but does not authorize presbyters and deacons to sit as judges upon their own bishop. Which may be further evidenced from another canon⁵⁵ of the next council of Carthage; which speaks of a legal number of bishops to judge a presbyter, or deacon; and assigns six for a presbyter, and three for a deacon, as the former canons appointed. But for the inferior clergy, there was no such restraint laid upon the bishop, that I can find; but he alone, by the same canon,⁵⁶ is allowed to hear their causes, and end them. Only they had liberty to appeal, as all others, in case of injury done them, to the metropolitan, or a provincial synod; which the Nicene council,⁵⁷ and many others, appoint to be held once or twice a year for that very purpose; That if any clergyman chanced to be unjustly censured by the passion of his bishop, he might have recourse to a superior court, and there have justice done him. This is the true state and account of the power of bishops over their clergy, as near as I can collect it out of the genuine records of the ancient church.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE POWER OF BISHOPS OVER THE LAITY, MONKS, SUBORDINATE MAGISTRATES, AND ALL PERSONS WITHIN THEIR DIOCESE: AND OF THEIR OFFICE IN DISPOSING OF THE REVENUES OF THE CHURCH.

THE next thing to be considered is, the power of bishops over the people; which, upon inquiry, will be found to extend itself over all persons, of what rank or quality soever, within their diocese, or the episcopatus vigore et cathedræ auctoritate haberes potestatem, qua posses de illo statim vindicari.—Quod si ultra te contumeliis suis provocaverit, funderis circa eum potestate honoris tui, ut eum vel deponas vel abstineas. See also Cyp. Ep. 10. al. 16. ed. Oxon.

⁴⁶ Canon. Apost. c. 31.

⁴⁷ Con. Nic. can. 5.

⁴⁸ Con. Sard. can. 13, 14.

⁴⁹ Con. Antioch. can. 3 et 4.

⁵⁰ Chalced. can. 9.

⁵¹ See for the liberty of appeals: Con. Carthag. 2. c. 8. Carthag. 4. c. 29 et 66. Antioch. c. 12. Vasion. c. 5. Venetic. can. 9.

⁵² Con. Carthag. 1. can. 11. Si quis aliquam causam habuerit, a tribus vicinis episcopis, si diaconus est, arguatur: presbyter a sex.

⁵³ Con. Carth. 2. can. 10. Placet ut causa criminalis episcopi a duodecim episcopis audiatur; causa presbyteri a sex; causa vero diaconi a tribus cum proprio episcopo.

⁵⁴ Blondel, Apol. p. 137. And Crab thus reads it corruptly: Episcopus a duodecim episcopis audiatur, et a sex presbyteris, et a tribus diaconibus cum proprio suo episcopo.

⁵⁵ Con. Carth. 3. c. 8. Si presbyteri vel diaconi fuerint accusati, adjuncto sibi ex vicinis locis legitimo numero collegarum—in presbyteri nomine sex, in diaconi tribus, ipsorum causas discutiant.

⁵⁶ Ibid. c. 8. Reliquorum clericorum causas solus episcopus loci agnoscat et finiat.

⁵⁷ Con. Nic. can. 5.

Sect. 9.
Yet bishops' power not arbitrary, but limited by canon in various respects.

Sect. 1.
No exemptions from the jurisdiction of the bishop in the primitive church.

bounds and limits of their jurisdiction. The extent of dioceses themselves, and the reasons why some were much greater than others, I do not here consider; but reserve that for a more proper place, to be treated of when we come to speak of churches. What I observe in this place is, that all orders of men within the diocese were subject to the bishop; for privileges to exempt men from the jurisdiction of their diocesan, were things unknown to former ages. Ignatius makes bold to say,¹ that as he that honours his bishop is honoured of God; so he that does any thing covertly in opposition to him, is the servant of Satan. And Cyprian defines the church² to be a people united to its bishop, a flock adhering to its pastor. Whence the church may be said to be in the bishop, and the bishop in the church; and if any are not with their bishop, they are not in the church.

Particularly, we may observe of all ascetics, and monks, and hermits; that the laws, both ecclesiastical and civil, subjected them to the bishop of the place where they lived. For ecclesiastical laws, we have two canons in the council of Chalcedon³ to this purpose; the first of which prescribes, that all monks, whether in city or country, shall be subject to the bishop, and concern themselves in no business (sacred or civil) out of their own monastery; except they have his licence and permission, upon urgent occasion, so to do. And if any withdraw themselves from his obedience, the other canon pronounces excommunication against them. The same injunctions may be read in the councils of Orleans,⁴ Agde,⁵ Lerida,⁶ and others; which subject the abbots as well as monks to the bishop's care and correction. Justinian confirms all this by a law in the Code; which says,⁷ all monasteries are to be reckoned under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the territories where they are; and that the abbots themselves are part of their care. In one of his Novels,⁸ the election of abbots is put into the bishop's hands. And by other laws,⁹ no new cells, or monasteries, were to be erected, but by the consent and licence of the bishop, to whose jurisdiction they belonged. It is therefore a very just reflection, which Bede, and some others¹⁰ from him, make upon the state of the Scottish church; that things were in a very unusual and preposterous order, when, instead of abbots being subject to the bishops, the bishops were subject to a single abbot. This was ordine inusitato, as Bede¹¹ rightly observes; for there was no such practice allowed in the primitive church.

^{Sect. 2.}
All monks subject to the bishop of the diocese where they lived.

In those days, the authority of bishops was so highly esteemed, and venerable in the eyes of all men, that even the subordinate magistrates themselves were subject to their spiritual discipline and correction. The prefects and governors of cities and provinces were obliged to take their communicatory letters along with them to the bishop of the place, whither the government sent them; and whilst they continued in their office there, they were to be under the bishop's care; who, if they transgressed against the public discipline of the church, was authorized by the imperial laws to punish them with excommunication. This we learn from a canon of the first council of Arles;¹² which was called by Constantine himself, who ratified its canons, and gave them, as it were, the force of imperial sanctions. And by virtue of this power, they sometimes unsheathed the spiritual sword against impious and profane magistrates, and cut them off from all communion with the church. Of which we have an instance in Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais,¹³ excommunicating Andronicus the governor, for his cruelties and blasphemies; and many other such examples, which will be mentioned when we come to treat particularly of the discipline of the church. As to what concerns the bishop's power to inspect and examine the acts and decrees of subordinate magistrates; Socrates¹⁴ assures us it was practised by Cyril of Alexandria, in reference to Orestes, the præfectus Augustalis of Egypt; though, as he intimates, it was some grievance to him to be under his inspection.

But it must be owned and spoken to the glory of those primitive bishops, that they challenged no power, as of right belonging to them, but only that which was spiritual. They did not as yet lay claim to both swords, much less endeavour to wrest the temporal sword out of the magistrate's hand, and dethrone princes under pretence of excommunica-

^{Sect. 3.}
As also all subordinate magistrates in matters of spiritual jurisdiction.

^{Sect. 4.}
Of the distinction between temporal and spiritual jurisdiction; bishops' power wholly confined to the latter.

¹ Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 9. ὁ λάθρα ἐπισκόπου τι πράσσω, τῷ διαβόλῳ λατρεύει.

² Cypr. Epist. 69. al. 66. ad Papiam. p. 168. Ecclesia plebs sacerdoti unita, et pastori suo grex adhærens. Unde scire debes episcopum in ecclesia esse, et ecclesiam in episcopo; et si qui cum episcopo non sint, in ecclesia non esse, &c.

³ Con. Chalced. can. 4 et 8.

⁴ Con. Aurel. I. c. 19.

⁵ Agathens. can. 38.

⁶ Ilerdens. c. 3.

⁷ Cod. Just. lib. 1. tit. 3. de Episcop. Leg. 40.

⁸ Justin. Novel. 5. c. 9.

⁹ Con. Chalced. can. 4. Con. Agath. c. 58.

¹⁰ Pearson, Vind. Ignat. part I. c. 11. p. 333.

¹¹ Bed. Hist. Gent. Anglor. lib. 3. c. 4. Cujus juri et omnis provincia, et ipsi etiam episcopi ordine inusitato debeant esse subjecti.

¹² Con. Arelat. 2. c. 7. De præsidibus—ita placuit, ut cum promoti fuerint, literas accipiant ecclesiasticas communicatorias: ita tamen ut in quibuscunque locis gesserint, ab episcopo ejusdem loci cura de illis agatur; at cum cœperint contra disciplinam publicam agere, tunc demum a communione excludantur. Similiter et de his fiat, qui rempublicam agere volunt.

¹³ Synes. Ep. 58. ad Episcopos, p. 198.

¹⁴ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 13.

tion. The ancient bishops of Rome themselves always professed obedience and subjection to the emperor's laws; which I shall not stand here to prove, since it has so frequently and so substantially been done by several of our learned writers:¹⁵ and it is confessed by the more ingenuous of the Romish writers¹⁶ themselves, that Gregory VII. was the first pope that pretended to depose Christian princes. The ancient bishops of the church laid no claim to a coercive power over the bodies or estates of men; but if ever they had occasion to make use of it, they applied themselves to the secular magistrate, for his assistance. As in the case of Paulus Samosatensis, who kept possession of the bishop's house, after he was deposed from his bishopric by the council of Antioch. The fathers in that council having no power to remove him, petitioned the emperor Aurelian against him;¹⁷ who, though a heathen, gave judgment on their side, and ordered his officers to see his sentence put in execution. And thus the case stood, as to the power of bishops, for some ages after under Christian emperors: insomuch that Socrates¹⁸ notes it as a very singular thing in Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, that he undertook by his own power to shut up the Novatian churches, seizing upon their plate and sacred utensils, and depriving their bishop Theopemptus of his substance. This was done παρὰ τῆς ἱερατικῆς τάξεως, beyond any ordinary power that bishops were then invested with; and though in after ages they attained to this power, yet it was not by any inherent right of their order, but by the favour and indulgence of secular princes. It must here also be further noted, that it was ever esteemed dishonourable for bishops, so much as to petition the secular power against the life of any man, whom they had condemned by spiritual censures. And therefore, when Ithacius and some other Spanish bishops prevailed with Maximus to slay the heretic Priscillian, St. Martin and many other pious bishops petitioned against it, saying, It was enough to expel heretics from the churches:¹⁹ and when they could not prevail, they showed their resentments of the fact against the author of it, refusing to admit Ithacius, the sanguinary bishop, to their communion. So great a concern had those holy men to keep within the bounds of their spiritual jurisdiction!

And it may be observed, that the authority of bishops was never greater in the world, than when they concerned themselves only in the exercise

Sect. 5.
An account of the littere formatæ, and the bishop's prerogative in granting them to all persons.

of their own proper spiritual power. For then they had a universal respect paid them by all sorts of men; insomuch that no Christian would pretend to travel, without taking letters of credence with him from his own bishop, if he meant to communicate with the Christian church in a foreign country. Such was the admirable unity of the church catholic in those days, and the blessed harmony and consent of her bishops among one another! These letters were of divers sorts, according to the different occasions or quality of the persons that carried them. They are generally reduced to three kinds; the epistolæ commendatoriæ, communicatoriæ, and dimissoriæ. The first were such as were granted only to persons of quality, or else persons whose reputation had been called in question, or to the clergy who had occasion to travel into foreign countries. The second sort were granted to all who were in the peace and communion of the church; whence they were also called pacifiçæ, and ecclesiasticæ, and sometimes canonicæ. The third sort were such as were only given to the clergy, when they were to remove from their own diocese, and settle in another; and they were to testify that they had their bishop's leave to depart; whence they were called dimissoriæ, and sometimes pacifiçæ likewise. All these went under the general name of formatæ; because they were written in a peculiar form, with some particular marks and characters, which served as special signatures to distinguish them from counterfeits. I shall not stand now to give any further account of them here, but only observe, that it was the bishop's sole prerogative to grant them; and none might presume to do it, at least, without his authority and commission. The council of Antioch²⁰ allows country bishops to write them; but expressly forbids presbyters the privilege. And whereas, in times of persecution, some confessors, who were of great esteem in the church, would take upon them to grant such letters by their own authority, and in their own names; the councils of Arles²¹ and Eliberis²² forbade them to do it; and ordered all persons who had such letters, to take new communicatory letters from the bishop. Baronius,²³ and the common editors of the councils who follow him, mistake these letters for the libels which the confessors were used to grant to the lapsi, to have them admitted into the communion of the church again: but Albaspinus²⁴ corrects this mistake; and rightly observes, that those councils speak not of such libels as were given to ¹⁵ See Bishop Morton's Grand Impost. of the Church of Rome, c. 11. Joh. Roffens. de Potest. Papæ in Temporal. lib. 2. c. 2.

¹⁶ Otho Frisingens. Chron. lib. 6. c. 35. Greg. Tholosan. de Repub. lib. 26. c. 5.

¹⁷ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30.

¹⁸ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 7.

¹⁹ Sulp. Sever. lib. 2. p. 119. Maximum orare, ut sanguine infelicitum abstineret: satis superque sufficere, ut epis-copali sententia hæretici judicati ecclesiis pellerentur.

²⁰ Con. Antioch. can. 8.

²¹ Con. Arlat. l. c. 9. De his, qui confessorum literas offerunt, placuit, ut sublatis eis literis, alias accipiant communicatorias.

²² Con. Elib. c. 25.

²³ Baron. an. 142. Loaysa Not. in Con. Elib. c. 25.

²⁴ Albaspin. Not. in Con. Elib. c. 25.

the lapsi, but of such as were given to all Christians who had occasion to travel into foreign countries; which it belonged to the bishops to grant, and not to the confessors, whatever authority they might otherwise have obtained by their honourable confession of Christ in time of persecution. The council of Eliberis²⁵ takes notice of another abuse of this nature, and corrects it; which was, that some women of famous renown in the church, clergymen's wives, as Albaspiny thinks, or rather the wives of bishops, would presume both to grant and receive such letters by their own authority; all which the council orders to be sunk, as being dangerous to the discipline and communion of the church, and an encroachment upon the bishop's power, to whom alone it belonged to grant them. For by all ancient canons, this privilege is reserved entirely to bishops, and this set their authority very high in the church, for no one, either clergy or laity, could communicate in any church beside his own without these testimonials from his bishop; as may be seen in the councils of Carthage,²⁶ and Agde,²⁷ and many others.

I have but one thing more to observe concerning the power of bishops over the church, and that is, their authority and concern in disposing of the revenues of the church. I intend not here to enter upon the discourse of ecclesiastical revenues, (which has its proper place in this work hereafter,) but only to suggest now, that it was part of the bishop's office and care to see them managed and disposed of to the best advantage. The councils of Antioch²⁸ and Gangra²⁹ have several canons to this purpose, that all the incomes and oblations of the church shall be dispensed at the will and discretion of the bishop, to whom the people, and the souls of men, are committed. Those called the Apostolical³⁰ Canons, and Constitutions³¹ speak of the same power. And Cyprian³² notes, that all who received maintenance from the church had it episcopo dispensante, by the order and appointment of the bishop. He did not indeed always dispense with his own hands, but by proper assistants, such as his archdeacon, and the aconomus, which some canons³³ order to be one of the clergy of every church; but these officers were only stewards under him, both of his appointing, as St. Jerom³⁴ observes, and also accountable to him as the supreme governor of the church. Whence Possidius takes notice of the practice of St. Austin; that though neither seal nor key was ever seen in his hand, but some of his clergy were always his administrators, yet he had his certain times to audit their accounts; so that all was still his act, though administered and dispensed by the hands of others. And this was agreeable to the primitive rule and practice of the apostles, to whose care and custody the peoples' oblations, and things consecrated to God, were committed: they chose deacons to be their assistants, as bishops did afterwards, still retaining power in their own hands to direct and regulate them in the disposal of the public charity, as prime stewards of God's revenue, and chief masters of his household.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE OFFICE OF BISHOPS, IN RELATION TO THE WHOLE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

WE have hitherto considered the office and power of bishops over the clergy and people of their own particular churches: but there is yet a more eminent branch of their pastoral office and care behind, which is, their superintendency over the whole catholic church; in which every bishop was supposed to have an equal share, not as to what concerned external polity and government, but the prime, essential part of religion, the preservation of the Christian faith. Whenever the faith was in danger of being subverted by heresy, or destroyed by persecution, then every bishop thought it part of his duty and office to put to his helping hand, and labour as much for any other diocese as his own. Dioceses were but limits of convenience, for the preservation of order in times of peace; but the faith was a more universal thing, and when war was made upon that, then the whole world was but one diocese, and the whole church but one flock, and every pastor thought himself obliged to feed his great Master's sheep according to his power, whatever part of the world they were scattered in. In this sense, every bishop was a universal pastor and bishop of the whole world, as having a common care and concern for the whole church of Christ. This is what St. Austin told Boniface,¹ bishop of

Sect. 6.
Of the bishop's power in disposing of the revenues of the church.

Sect. 1.
In what sense every bishop supposed to be bishop of the whole catholic church.

²⁵ Con. Elib. c. 81.

²⁶ Con. Carth. 1. can. 7. Clericus vel laicus non communicet in aliena plebe sine literis episcopi sui.

²⁷ Agath. can. 52. Epaun. c. 6. Laodic. c. 41. Milevit. c. 20. Con. Antioch. c. 7.

²⁸ Con. Antioch. c. 24 et 25. ²⁹ Con. Gangr. c. 7 et 8.

³⁰ Canon. Apost. c. 31 et 31.

³¹ Const. Apostol. lib. 2. c. 25.

³² Cyp. Ep. 38. al. 41. Just. Mart. Apol. 2.

³³ Con. Chalced. c. 26.

³⁴ Hieron. Ep. 1. ad Nepotian. Sciat episcopus, cui commissa est ecclesia, quem dispensationi pauperum, curaque præficiat.

¹ Aug. cont. Epist. Pelag. in Præfat. ad Bonifac. Communis est nobis omnibus, qui fungimur episcopatus officio (quamvis ipse in eo celsiore fastigio præmineas) specula pastoralis.

Rome, that the pastoral care was common to all those who had the office of bishop; and though he was a little higher advanced toward the top of Christ's watch-tower, yet all others had an equal concern in it. St. Cyprian testifies,² for the practice of his own time, that all bishops were so united in one body, that if any of the body broached any heresy, or began to lay waste and tear the flock of Christ, all the rest immediately came in to its rescue; for though they were many pastors, yet they had but one flock to feed, and every one was obliged to take care of all, the sheep of Christ, which he had purchased with his blood. In this sense Gregory Nazianzen³ says of Cyprian, that he was a universal bishop, that he presided not only over the church of Carthage and Africa, but over all the regions of the west, and over the east, and south, and northern parts of the world also. He says the same of Athanasius;⁴ that in being made bishop of Alexandria, he was made bishop of the whole world. Which agrees with St. Basil's observation⁵ concerning him; that he had the care of all churches, as much as that which was peculiarly committed to him. Chrysostom⁶ in like manner styles Timothy, bishop of the universe: and in compliance with this customary character, the author under the name of Clemens Romanus,⁷ gives St. James bishop of Jerusalem the title of governor of all churches, as well as that of Jerusalem. Chrysostom⁸ says, St. Paul had the whole world committed to his care, and every city under the sun; that he was the teacher⁹ of the universe, and presided¹⁰ over all churches: which he repeats in many places of his writings. Nor was this prerogative so peculiar to the apostles, but that every bishop (in some measure) had a right and title to the same character.

Hence came that current notion, so frequently to be met with in Cyprian, of but one bishopric in the church; wherein every single bishop had his share in such a manner, as to have an equal concern in the whole: Episcopatus unus est, cujus a singulis in solidum pars tenetur.¹¹ There is but one bishopric in the church, and every bishop has an undivided portion in it. He does not say, it was a monarchy, in the hands of any single bishop; but a diffusive power, that lay in the whole college of bishops,¹² every one of which had a title to feed the whole church of God, and drive away heresy out of any part of it. In this sense, the bishop of Eugubium's power extended as far as the bishop of Rome's; the bishop of Rhegium was as much bishop of the whole church, as Constantinople; and Tanis equal to Alexandria: for in St. Jerom's language,¹³ they were all ejusdem meriti, and ejusdem sacerdotii; of the same merit, and equal in their priesthood, which was but one. In things that did not appertain to the faith, they were not to meddle with other men's dioceses, but only to mind the business of their own: but when the faith or welfare of the church lay at stake, and religion was manifestly invaded; then, by this rule of there being but one episcopacy, every other bishopric was as much their diocese as their own; and no human laws or canons could tie up their hands from performing such acts of their episcopal office in any part of the world, as they thought necessary for the preservation of religion.

For the better understanding the church's practice in this point, I shall illustrate it in two or three particular instances. It was a rule in the primitive church, that no bishop should ordain in another's diocese, without his leave: and though this was a sort of confinement of the episcopal power to a single diocese, yet for order's sake it was generally observed. But then it might happen, that in some cases there might be a necessity to do otherwise: as in case the bishop of any diocese was turned heretic, and would ordain none but heretical clergy, and persecute and drive away the orthodox; in that case, any catholic bishop, as being a bishop of the universal church, was authorized to ordain orthodox men in such a diocese, though contrary to the common rule; because this was evidently for the preservation of the faith, which is the supreme rule of all, and therefore that other rule must give way to this superior obligation. Upon this account, when the church was in danger of being overrun with Arianism, the great

Sect. 3.
Some particular instances of private bishops acting as bishops of the whole universal church.

Sect. 2.
In what respect the whole world but one diocese, and but one bishopric in the church.

² Cyp. Ep. 68. al. 67. ad Steph. p. 178. Idcirco copiosum corpus est sacerdotum, concordie mutue glutino atque unitatis vinculo copulatum, ut si quis ex collegio nostro hæresin facere, et gregem Christi lacerare et vastare tentaverit, subveniant cæteri.—Nam etsi pastores multi sumus, unum tamen gregem pascimus, et ove universas, quas Christus sanguine suo et passione quæsitivit, colligere et fovere debemus.

³ Greg. Naz. Orat. 18. in Laud. Cyp.

⁴ Naz. in Laud. Athan. Or. 21. p. 377. τῆς οἰκουμένης πάσης ἐπιστασίαν πιστεύεται.

⁵ Basil. Ep. 52. ad Athanas.

⁶ Chrys. Hom. 6. adv. Jud. t. 1. p. 512. τὴν τῆς οἰκουμένης προστασίαν ἐγκεχειρισμένος.

⁷ Pseudo-Clem. Ep. ad Jacob. ap. Coteler. Patr. Apost.

t. 1. p. 611. Clemens Jacobo—Regenti Hebræorum sanctam ecclesiam in Hierosolymis; sed et omnes ecclesias, quæ ubique Dei providentia fundatæ sunt.

⁸ Chrys. Hom. 17. in illud, Salute Priscillam. t. 5. p. 211. τὴν οἰκουμένην ἅπασαν ἐγκεχειρισμένος, &c.

⁹ Id. Hom. 6. in Terræmotum et Lazar. t. 5. p. 107. τῆς οἰκουμένης διδάσκαλος.

¹⁰ Id. Hom. 17. in Priscillam. p. 248.

¹¹ Cyp. de Unit. Eccl. p. 108.

¹² Id. Ep. 52. al. 55. ad Antonian. p. 112. Episcopatus unus, episcoporum multorum concordie numerositate diffusus, &c. In the same Epistle he often mentions the collegium sacerdotale. It. Epist. 59 et 68.

¹³ Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr.

Athanasius, as he returned from his exile, made no scruple to ordain in several cities¹⁴ as he went along, though they were not in his own diocese. And the famous Eusebius of Samosata, did the like in the times of the Arian persecution under Valens. Theodoret¹⁵ says, he went about all Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, in a soldier's habit; ordaining presbyters and deacons, and setting in order whatever he found wanting in the churches. He ordained bishops also in Syria and Cilicia, and other places; whose names Theodoret¹⁶ has recorded. Now all this was contrary to the common rules, but the necessities of the church required it; and that gave them authority in such a case to exert their power, and act as bishops of the whole catholic church. Epiphanius made use of the same power and privilege in a like case; ordaining Paulinianus, St. Jerom's brother, first deacon, and then presbyter, in a monastery out of his own diocese in Palestine; against which, when some of his adversaries objected, that it was done contrary to canon, he vindicated¹⁷ his practice upon the strength of this principle; that in cases of pressing necessity, such as this was, where the interest of God was to be served, every bishop had power to act in any part of the church: for though all bishops had their particular churches to officiate in, and were not ordinarily to exceed their own bounds; yet the love of Christ was a rule above all: and therefore men were not barely to consider the thing that was done, but the circumstances of the action, the time, the manner, the persons for whose sake, and the end for which it was done. Thus Epiphanius apologizes for the exercise of his episcopal power in the diocese of another man. Now, from all this it appears, that every bishop was as much a universal bishop, and had as much the care of the whole church, as the bishop of Rome himself; there being no acts of the episcopal office, which they could not perform in any part of the world, when need required, without a dispensation, as well as he. All that he enjoyed above others, was only the rights of a metropolitan, or a patriarch, and those confined by the canons to a certain district; of which more hereafter in their proper place.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE INDEPENDENCY OF BISHOPS, ESPECIALLY IN THE CYPRIANIC AGE, AND IN THE AFRICAN CHURCHES.

THERE is one thing more must be taken notice of, whilst we are considering the proper office of bishops, which is, the absolute power of every bishop in his own church, independent of all others. For the right understanding the just limits of this power, we are to distinguish between the substantial and the ritual part of religion. For it was in the latter chiefly that bishops had an absolute power in their own church, being at liberty to use what indifferent rites they thought fit in their own church, without being accountable for their practice to any other. In matters of faith, indeed, when they corrupted the truth by heretical doctrines, or introduced any rituals that were destructive of it, there they were obnoxious to the censure of all other bishops; and every individual of the whole catholic college of bishops (as has been noted in the last chapter) was authorized to oppose them: but in such indifferent rites as were lawful to be used in the church, every bishop was allowed to choose for himself, and his own church, such as he thought fit and expedient in his own wisdom and discretion.

Sect. 1.
What meant by the independency of bishops one of another, and their absolute power in their own church.

Thus, for instance, though there was but one form of worship throughout the whole church, as to what concerned the substance of Christian worship; yet every bishop was at liberty to form his own liturgy in what method and words he thought proper, only keeping to the analogy of faith and sound doctrine. Thus Gregory Nazianzen observes of St. Basil, that among other good services which he did for the church of Cæsarea, whilst he was but a presbyter in it, one was¹ the composing of forms of prayer, which by the consent and authority of his bishop Eusebius were used by the church. And this is thought not improbably by some² to be the first draught of that liturgy, which bears his name to this day. The church of Neo-Cæsarea in Pontus, where St. Basil was born, had a liturgy peculiar to themselves, which St. Basil³ speaks of in one of his Epistles. Chrysostom's liturgy, which he composed

Sect. 2.
All bishops had liberty to form their own liturgies.

¹⁴ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 24.

¹⁵ Theod. lib. 4. c. 13.

¹⁶ Theod. lib. 5. c. 4.

¹⁷ Epiphan. Ep. ad Joan. Hierosol. Ob Dei timorem hoc sumus facere compulsi: maximè cum nulla sit diversitas in sacerdotio Dei, et ubi utilitati Dei providetur. Nam etsi singuli ecclesiarum episcopi habent sub se ecclesias, quibus curam videntur impendere, et nemo super alienam mensuram extenditur; tamen præponitur omnibus charitas Christi, in qua nulla simulatio est: nec considerandum quid factum sit, sed quo tempore, et quo modo, et in quibus, et quare factum sit.

¹ Naz. Orat. 20. in Laud. Basil. p. 340. εὐχῶν διατάξεις, καὶ εὐκοσμίας τῷ βήματος.

² Billius, Not. in loc. Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. 1. p. 194.

³ Basil, Ep. 63. ad Neocæsar.

for the church of Constantinople, differed from these. The Ambrosian form differed from the Roman, and the Roman from others. The Africans had peculiar forms of their own, differing from the Roman, as appears from some passages cited by Victorinus Afer and Fulgentius, out of the African liturgies, which Cardinal Bona⁴ owns are not to be found in the Roman.

The like observation may be made upon the creeds used in divers churches.

There was but one rule of faith, as Tertullian⁵ calls it, and that fixed and unalterable, as to the substance, throughout the whole church. Yet there were different ways of expressing it, as appears from the several forms still extant, which differ something from one another. Those in Irenæus,⁶ in Cyprian,⁷ and Tertullian,⁸ are not exactly in the same method nor form of words. The creed of Eusebius⁹ and his church of Cæsarea differed from that of Jerusalem, upon which Cyril¹⁰ comments; and that of Cyril's, from that in St. James's¹¹ liturgy. And to omit abundance more that might here be mentioned, the creed of Aquileia recited by Ruffin¹² differs from the Roman creed, which is that we commonly call the Apostles' creed. Now, the reason of all this difference could be no other but this, that all bishops had power to frame the creeds of their own churches, and express them in such terms as suited best their own convenience, and to meet with the heresies they were most in danger from: as Ruffin observes that the words, invisible and impassible, were added to the first article in the creed of Aquileia, in opposition to the Patripassian or Sabellian heretics, who asserted that the Father was visible and passible in human flesh, as well as the Son. And it is evident the bishops of other churches used the same liberty, as they saw occasion.

It were easy to confirm this observation by many other instances of the like nature; but I shall only name one more, which is the power every bishop had to appoint particular days of fasting in his own church. This we learn from St. Austin's answer to Casulanus about the Saturday fast. Casulanus was very much troubled and perplexed about it, because he observed in Africa some churches keep it a fast, and others a festival; nay, sometimes in the same church men were divided in their practice, and one part dined on that day, whilst another fasted. Now, to remove Casulanus his scruple, St. Austin gives him this answer:¹³ That the best way in this case was, to follow those who were the rulers of every church. Therefore, if he would take his advice, he should never resist his bishop in this matter, but do as he did without doubt or scruple. Which plainly implies, that it was then in every bishop's power to order or not order this fast in his own church, as he saw most convenient.

And indeed these privileges of bishops, and their absolute and independent power in all such matters, were no where more fully reserved to them, than in the African churches, from the time of Cyprian, who frequently makes mention of this independent power; which extended not only to mere rituals, but to several momentous points of discipline; such as the case of rebaptizing heretics, admitting adulterers to the communion of the church again, and the question about the validity of clinic baptism. In these points Cyprian's opinion and practice differed from others of his fellow bishops: but yet he assumed no power of censuring those that acted differently from what he did, nor separated from their communion upon it; but left every one to give an account of his own practice to God the Judge of all. For the case of rebaptizing such as were baptized by heretics, he was entirely for it, as is sufficiently known to all; but he was not so zealous for it, as to exercise any judicial power of deposing or excommunicating those who practised otherwise; but declares he left every bishop to his liberty, to act according to his judgment, and answer for what he did to God alone. To this purpose he expresses himself in his letter to Pope Stephen,¹⁴ and that to Jubaianus,¹⁵ but most fully in his speech delivered at the opening of the great council of Carthage, which met to consider this very question. Let us every one now, says he, give our opinion of this matter; ¹⁶ judging no man, nor repelling any from our communion, that shall

Sect. 3.
And express the same creed in different forms.

Sect. 5.
The independency of bishops most conspicuous in the African churches.

Sect. 4.
And appoint particular days of fasting in their own churches.

⁴ Bona, Rer. Liturgic. lib. 1. c. 7. n. 3.

⁵ Tertul. de veland. Virg. c. 1. Regula fidei una omnino est, sola immobilis et irreformabilis. &c.

⁶ Iren. lib. 1. c. 2.

⁷ Cypr. Ep. 70. ad Episc. Numid. p. 190. It. Ep. 76. al. 69. ad Magnum. p. 183. ed. Oxon.

⁸ Tertul. ibid.

⁹ Euseb. Ep. ad Cæsariens. ap. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 8.

¹⁰ Cyril. Hierosol. Catech. 4.

¹¹ Liturg. Jacobi. Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 7.

¹² Ruffin. in Symbol. Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem, invisibilem, et impassibilem.

¹³ Aug. Ep. 86. ad Casulan. Mos eorum mihi sequendus videtur, quibus eorum populorum congregatio regenda commissa est. Quapropter si consilio meo acquiescis: episcopo

tuo in hac re noli resistere, et quod facit ipse, sine ullo scrupulo vel disceptatione sectare.

¹⁴ Cypr. Ep. 72. ad Steph. p. 197. Qua in re nec nos vim cuiquam facimus, aut legem damus, cum habeat in ecclesie administratione voluntatis suae arbitrium liberum unusquisque præpositus, rationem actus sui Domino redditurus.

¹⁵ Ep. 73. ad Jubaian. p. 210.

¹⁶ Con. Carth. ap. Cypr. p. 229. Superest ut de hac ipsa re singuli quid sentiamus, proferamus; neminem judicantes, aut a jure communionis aliquem, si diversum senserit, amoventes. Neque enim quisquam nostrum episcoporum se episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico terrore ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit; quando habeat omnis episcopus pro licentia libertatis et potestatis suæ, arbitrium proprium; tamque judicari ab alio non possit, quam nec think otherwise. For no one of us makes himself bishop of bishops, or compels his colleagues by tyrannical terror to a necessity of complying; forasmuch as every bishop, according to the liberty and power that is granted him, is free to act as he sees fit; and can no more be judged by others, than he can judge them. But let us all expect the judgment of our Lord Jesus Christ, who only hath power both to invest us with the government of his church, and to pass sentence upon our actions. Thus far Cyprian, in full and open council, declares for the independent power of every bishop, tacitly reflecting upon the bishop of Rome, who pretended to excommunicate those who differed in opinion and practice from him, which Cyprian condemns as a tyrannical way of proceeding.

For the next point, that is, the case of admitting adulterers to communion again, Cyprian says his predecessors in Africa were divided upon the question; but they did not divide communion upon it: for though some bishops admitted adulterers to penance, and others refused to do it, yet they did not censure each other's practice, but preserved peace and concord among themselves,¹⁷ leaving every one to answer to God for his actions. I know indeed some learned persons¹⁸ interpret this liberty of the African bishops so, as to make it mean no more than a liberty to follow their own judgment, till such times as the church should determine the matter in dispute, by making some public decree about it. But I must own, I cannot but think Cyprian meant something more, because he pleads for the same liberty even after the decrees of a plenary council; as we have seen in his preface to the council of Carthage.

As to the third question, about the validity of clinic baptism, that is, whether persons who were only sprinkled with water in their beds in time of sickness, and not immersed or washed all over the body in baptism, were to be looked upon as complete Christians; Cyprian for his own part resolves it in the affirmative. But yet, if any bishops were otherwise persuaded, that it was not lawful baptism, and upon that ground gave such persons a new immersion, he professes¹⁹ that he prescribes to none, but leaves every one to act according to his own judgment and discretion. This was that ancient liberty of the Cyprianic age, of which I have discoursed a little more particularly in this place, because it shows us what was then the uncontested power and privilege of every bishop in the African church, which is not so commonly understood in these latter ages.

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE POWER OF BISHOPS IN HEARING AND DETERMINING SECULAR CAUSES.

We have hitherto considered such offices of the episcopal function, as Sect. 1. Bishops commonly chosen arbitrators of men's differences in the primitive church. belonged to all bishops by the laws of God and the canons of the church.

Besides these there was one office more, imposed upon them by custom, and the laws of the state; which was the hearing and determining secular causes, upon the continual applications and addresses that people made to them. For such was the singular character and repute of bishops, and such the entire confidence men generally reposed in them for their integrity and justice, that they were commonly appealed to, as the best arbitrators of men's differences, and the most impartial judges of the common disputes that happened among them. Sidonius Apollinaris¹ often refers to this custom: and Synesius calls it² part of his own episcopal office and function. St. Ambrose testifies for himself³ that he was used to be appealed to upon such occasions; and St. Austin⁴ says of him, that he was often so much employed in hearing causes, that he had scarce time for other business. And this was St. Austin's case also, who frequently complains of the burden⁵ that lay upon him in this respect. For not only Christians, but men of all sects applied to him: insomuch that, as Possidius⁶ notes in his Life, he often spent all the morning, and sometimes the whole day, fasting and hearing their causes; which, though it was a great fatigue to him, yet he was willing to bear it, because it gave him frequent opportunities of instilling the principles of truth and virtue into the minds of the parties that applied themselves to him.

And it is to be observed, that though there be no express text in the New Testament, that commands bishops to be judges in secular causes, yet St. Sect. 2. The original of this custom. What meant by the word ἐπιθετυνένοι in St. Paul, 1 Cor. vi. 4.

ipse potest judicare. Sed expectemus universi iudicium Domini nostri Jesu Christi, qui unus et solus habet potestatem et præponendi nos in ecclesiæ suæ gubernatione, et de actu nostro iudicandi.

¹⁷ Cyp. Ep. 52. al. 55. ad Antonian. p. 110.

¹⁸ Bishop Fell, Not. in loc. citat.

¹⁹ Cyp. Ep. 76. al. 69. ad Magnum. p. 186. Qua in parte nemini verecundia et modestia nostra præjudicat, quo minus unusquisque quod putat, sentiat, et quod senserit, faciat. It. p. 188. Nemini præscribentes, quo minus statuat quod putat unusquisque præpositus: actus sui rationem Domino redditurus.

¹ Sidon. lib. 3. Ep. 12. lib. 6. Ep. 2 et 4.

² Synes. Ep. 105. p. 399.

³ Ambros. Ep. 24. ad Marcellum.

⁴ Aug. Confess. lib. 6. c. 3.

⁵ Aug. Ep. 110 et 147. It. de Opere Monach. c. 29.

⁶ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 19.

Austin was of opinion, that St. Paul, in prohibiting men to go to law before the unbelievers, did virtually lay this obligation upon them. For he says once and again,⁷ that it was the apostle that instituted ecclesiastical judges, and laid the burden of secular causes upon them. By which he means, that the apostle gave a general direction to Christians to choose arbitrators among themselves; and that custom determined this office particularly to the bishops, as the best qualified by their wisdom and probity to discharge it. And this is very agreeable to St. Paul's meaning, 1 Cor. vi. 4, as some very learned and judicious critics⁸ understand him. For though all the common translations render the words, ἔξουθενημένους ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, persons that are least esteemed in the church; yet Dr. Lightfoot observes, that they may as well signify persons of the greatest esteem. For the original word, ἔξουθενημένοι, signifies only private judges, or arbitrators of men's own choosing; such as were in use among the Jews, who called them ιδῶται, and non-authentici, not because they were of the meanest and most contemptible of the people, but because they were the lowest rank of judges, and not settled as a standing court by the sanhedrim, but chosen by the litigants themselves to arbitrate their causes. Such private judges the apostle directs the Christians to choose in the church, and refer their controversies to them: which is not any injunction to choose judges out of the poorest, and meanest, and most ignorant of the people, but rather the contrary, persons that were well qualified by their wisdom and authority to take upon them to be judges, and end controversies among their brethren. Now because none were thought better qualified in these respects than bishops, the office of judging upon that account was commonly imposed upon them, and they in decency and charity could not well refuse it. This seems to be the true original of this part of the episcopal office and function.

But what was thus begun by custom, while the civil governors were heathens, was afterward confirmed and established by law, when the emperors became Christians. Eusebius⁹ says, Constantine made a law to confirm all such decisions of bishops in their consistories, and that no secular judges should have any power to reverse or disannul them; forasmuch as the priests of God were to be preferred before any other judge. And Sozomen¹⁰ adds, that he gave leave to all litigants to refer their causes to the determination of bishops, whose sentence should stand good, and be as authentic as if it had been the decision of the emperor himself: and that the governors of every province and their officers should be obliged to put their decrees in execution. There is a law now added at the end of the Theodosian Code, which some take for this very law of Constantine mentioned by these authors. Selden himself reckons¹¹ it a genuine piece; but I think Gothofred's arguments are stronger to prove it spurious. For it grants bishops such a power, as neither Eusebius nor Sozomen mention, and all other laws contradict: viz. That if either of the contending parties, the possessor,¹² or the plaintiff, was minded to bring the cause before a bishop, either when it was before a secular court, or when it was determined, he might do it, though the other party was against it. Whereas all laws and history are against this practice: for no cause was to be brought before a bishop, except both parties agreed by way of compromise to take him for their arbitrator. In this case the bishop's sentence was valid, and to be executed by the secular power, but not otherwise. So that either this was not the genuine law of Constantine, to which Eusebius and Sozomen refer, or else it was revoked and contradicted by all others. Gothofred produces a great many contrary laws. I shall content myself with a single instance.

In the Justinian Code¹³ we have two laws of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius about the same matter, which may serve to explain the law of Constantine. For there any bishops are allowed to judge, and their judgment is ordered to be final, so as no appeal should be made from it; and the officers of the secular judges are appointed to execute the bishop's sentence. But then there are these two limitations expressly put in: first, that they shall only have power to judge, when both parties agree by consent to refer their causes to their arbitration. And, secondly, where the causes are purely civil, and not criminal causes, where perhaps life and death might be concerned. For in such causes, the clergy were prohibited by

^{Sect. 3.}
This power of bishops confirmed by the imperial laws.

^{Sect. 4.}
Yet not allowed in criminal causes; nor in any causes, but when the litigants both agreed to take them for arbitrators.

⁷ Aug. Ser. 24. in Psal. cxviii. Constituit talibus causis ecclesiasticos apostolus cognitores, in foro prohibens iurare Christianos. Id. de Oper. Monach. c. 29. Quibus nos molestiis affixit apostolus, &c.

⁸ Lightfoot, et Lud. de Dieu, in 1 Cor. vi. 4.

⁹ Euseb. de Vit. Constant. lib. 4. c. 27.

¹⁰ Sozom. lib. 1. c. 9.

¹¹ Selden, Uxor Hebr. lib. 3. c. 28. p. 564.

¹² Extravag. de Elect. Judicii Episcop. ad Calcem Cod. Theod. t. 4. p. 303. Quicumque litem habens, sive possessor, sive petitor erit, inter initia litis, vel decursis temporum curricula, sive cum negotium peroratur, sive cum jam cœperit promi sententia, iudicium eligit sacrosanctæ legis antistitis, ilico sine aliqua dubitatione, etiamsi alia pars refragatur, ad episcopum cum sermone litigantium dirigitur. Vid. Gothofred. Comment. in loc.

¹³ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 4. Leg. 7. Si qui ex consensu apud sacre legis antistitem litigare voluerint, non vetabuntur. Sed experientur illius in civili duntaxat negotio, more arbitri sponte residentis iudicium. Ibid. Leg. 8. Episcopale iudicium ratum sit omnibus, qui se audiri a sacerdotibus elegerint; eamque eorum iudicationi adhibendam esse reverentiam jubemus, quam vestris deferri necesse est potestatis, a quibus non licet provocare, &c.

the canons of the church,¹⁴ as well as the laws of the state, from being concerned as judges. Therefore bishops never suffered any criminal causes to come before them, except such as were to be punished with ecclesiastical censures.

But they had commonly civil causes more than enough flowing in upon them. So that they were forced sometimes to let part of this care devolve upon some other person, whose integrity and prudence they could confide in. This was commonly one of their clergy, a presbyter or a principal deacon. St. Austin, when he found the burden of this affair begin to press too hard upon him, substituted Eradius his presbyter¹⁵ in his room. And the council of Taragone speaks not only of presbyters, but deacons also,¹⁶ who were deputed to hear secular causes. And Socrates says,¹⁷ Sylvanus, bishop of Troas, took the power wholly out of the hands of his clergy, because he had found some of them faulty in making an unlawful gain of the causes that were brought before them; for which reason he never deputed any one of them to be judge, but made some layman his delegate, whom he knew to be a man of integrity, and strict lover of justice. I leave the learned to inquire, whether lay chancellors in the church had not their first rise and original from some such occasion as this, whilst bishops deputed laymen to hear secular causes in their name, still reserving the proper spiritual and ecclesiastical power entirely to themselves.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE PRIVILEGE OF BISHOPS TO INTERCEDE FOR CRIMINALS.

I HAVE observed in the foregoing chapter, that bishops were never allowed to be judges in capital or criminal causes, because they were not to be concerned in blood: they were to be so far from having any thing to do in the death of any man, that custom made it almost a piece of their office and duty to save men from death, by interceding to the secular magistrates for criminals that were condemned to die. St. Ambrose often made use of this privilege, as the author of his Life observes; frequently addressing himself to Macedonius,¹ and Stilico,² and other great ministers of the age, in behalf of poor delinquents, to obtain pardon for them. St. Austin did the same for the Circumcellions, when they were convicted and condemned for murdering some of the catholic clergy: he wrote two pathetic letters³ to the African magistrates, Marcellinus Comes, and Apringius, desiring that their lives might be spared, and that they might only be punished with close custody and confinement, where they might be set to work, and have time allowed them for repentance. The council of Sardica⁴ seems to speak of it as the duty of all bishops, to intercede for such as implored the mercy of the church, when they were condemned to be transported or banished, or any the like punishment. And the custom was become so general, that it began to be considered as a condition in the election of a bishop, whether he were qualified to discharge this part of his office as well as others. Sidonius Apollinaris⁵ instances in such a case, where it was made an objection by the people against the election of a certain bishop, that being a man of a monkish and retired life, he was fitter to be an abbot than a bishop: he might intercede, they said, indeed with the heavenly Judge for their souls, but he was not qualified to intercede with the earthly judges for their bodies. He was not a man of address, which they then thought necessary to discharge this part of the office of a bishop. They might perhaps judge wrong, as those in St. Jerom⁶ did, who pretended that clergymen ought to give splendid entertainments to the secular judges, that they might gain an interest in them; whom St. Jerom justly reproves, telling them, that any judge would pay a greater reverence to a pious and sober clergyman, than to a wealthy one, and would respect him more for his holiness than his riches. However, this shows what was then the common custom, and how great an interest bishops generally had in the secular magistrate, who seldom rejected any petitions of this nature. Socrates notes, that even some of the Novatian bishops enjoyed this privilege, as Paulus⁷ of Constantinople, and Leontius⁸ of Rome, at whose intercession Theodosius the emperor pardoned Symmachus, who had been guilty of treason, in making a panegyric upon Maximus the tyrant, but was, after his death, fled for sanctuary to a Christian church.

Sect. 1.
Of the great power and interest of bishops in interceding to the secular magistrates.

¹⁴ Concil. Tarracon. can. 4. Habeant licentiam iudicandi, exceptis criminalibus negotiis.

¹⁵ Aug. Ep. 110.

¹⁶ Con. Tarracon. c. 4. Nullus episcoporum, presbyterorum, vel clericorum, die Dominico propositum cujuscunque, causæ negotium audeat iudicare.

¹⁷ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 37.

¹ Paulin. Vit. Ambros. p. 8.

² Ibid. p. 12.

³ Aug. Ep. 159 et 160.

⁴ Con. Sardic. can. 7.

⁵ Sidon. lib. 7. Ep. 9. p. 443. Hic qui nominatur, inquit, non episcopi, sed potius abbatis complet officium: et intercedere magis pro animabus apud cœlestem, quam pro corporibus apud terrenum iudicem potest.

⁶ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Novatian. p. 15. Quod si obtenderis te facere hæc, ut roges pro miseris atque subjectis: iudex sæculi plus deferet clerico continenti, quam diviti, et magis sanctitatem tuam venerabitur quam opes.

⁷ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 17.

⁸ Id. lib. 5. cap. 14.

We may here observe, that crimes in themselves of a very heinous nature, such as treason and murder, were sometimes pardoned at their request. But we are not to imagine that bishops at any time turned patrons for criminals, to the obstruction of public justice, (which would have been to have cut the sinews of government,) but only in such cases, where pardon would manifestly be for the benefit and honour both of the church and commonwealth; or else where the crimes themselves had some such alleviating circumstances, as might incline a compassionate judge to grant a pardon. As when St. Ambrose interceded with Stilico for the pardon of some poor deluded wretches, whom Stilico's own servant by forgery had drawn into an error: their ignorance might reasonably be pleaded in their behalf. And when St. Austin petitioned for favour to be showed to the Circumcellions, it was, he thought, for the honour of the church, to free her from the suspicion and charge of revenge and cruelty, which the Donatists were so ready to cast upon her. And therefore he desired Apringius⁹ the proconsul to spare them for the sake of Christ and his church, as well as to give them time to see their error and repent of it.

It must further be noted from St. Ambrose, that bishops, though they themselves were sometimes chosen judges in civil causes, yet never interceded for any man in such causes to the secular judges. And he gives a very good reason¹⁰ for it: Because, in pecuniary causes, where two parties are concerned, a bishop could not intercede for one party, but the other would be injured, and have reason to think he lost his cause by the interest and favour of the intercessor inclining to the adverse party. For which reason, there are no examples of their interceding in such cases.

CHAPTER IX.

OF SOME PARTICULAR HONOURS AND INSTANCES OF RESPECT SHOWED TO BISHOPS BY ALL PERSONS IN GENERAL.

Sect. 1.
Of the ancient custom of bowing THERE are several other privileges belonging to bishops in common with the rest of the clergy; such as their exemption from burdensome offices, and some sort of taxes, and the cognizance of the secular courts in some cases; of which I shall say nothing particularly here, because they will be considered when we treat of the privileges of the clergy in general. But there are two or three customs, which argued a particular respect paid to bishops, and therefore I must not here wholly pass them over. One of these was the ancient custom of bowing the head before them, to receive their blessing; a custom so universally prevailing, that the emperors themselves did not refuse to comply with it. As may appear from that discourse of Hilary¹ to Constantius; where he tells him, he entertained the bishops with a kiss, with which Christ was betrayed; and bowed his head to receive their benediction, whilst he trampled on their faith. This plainly refers to the custom we are speaking of. And by it we may understand the meaning of Theodoret, when he says,² the emperor Valentinian gave orders to the bishops, who were met to make choice of a bishop of Milan, that they should place such a one on the bishop's throne, of that eminency for life and doctrine, that the emperors themselves might not be ashamed to bow their heads to him. The same custom is more plainly hinted at by St. Chrysostom, in one of his Homilies³ to the people of Antioch; where speaking of Flavian their bishop, who was gone to the emperor to procure a pardon for them, he says, Flavian was a prince, and a more honourable prince than the other; forasmuch as the sacred laws made the emperor submit his head to the hands of the bishop. He speaks of no other submission, but only this, in receiving the bishop's benediction: for in other respects, the priests in those days were always subject to the emperors. He that would see more proofs of this custom, may consult Valesius, who⁴ has collected a great many passages out of other authors relating to it. I shall only add here that rescript of Honorius and Valentinian, which says, Bishops were the persons to whom all the world bowed the head; Quibus omnis terra caput inclinat.

Such another customary respect was paid them, by kissing their hand; which seems to have accompanied the former ceremony. For St. Ambrose joins them both together,⁵ saying, that kings and princes did not disdain to bend and bow their necks to the

⁹ Aug. Ep. 160. Illi impio ferro fuderunt sanguinem Christianum: tu ab eorum sanguine etiam juridicum gladium cohibe propter Christum.——Tu inimicis ecclesiae viventibus relaxa spatium pœnitendi.

¹⁰ Ambros. de Offic. lib. 3. c. 9. In causis pecuniariis intervenire non est sacerdotis, &c.

¹ Hilar. adv. Constant. p. 95. Osculo sacerdotes excipis, quo et Christus est proditus: caput benedictioni summittis, ut fidem calcas.

² Theod. lib. 4. c. 6. ὅπως αὐτῷ τὰς ἡμετέρας ὑποκλίνομεν κεφαλὰς.

³ Chrys. Hom. 3. ad Pop. Antioch. t. 1. p. 48.

⁴ Vales. Not. in Theod. lib. 4. c. 6.

⁵ Ambros. de Dignit. Sacerd. c. 2. Quippe cum videas the head, to receive the benediction of bishops.

Sect. 2.
The reasons why bishops interceded for some criminals and not others.

Sect. 3.
They never interceded in civil matters and pecuniary cases.

Sect. 2.
Of kissing their hand.

knees of the priests, and kiss their hands; thinking themselves protected by their prayers. Paulinus says,⁶ the people paid this respect commonly to St. Ambrose. And Chrysostom, speaking of Meletius, bishop of Antioch, says,⁷ At his first coming to the city, the whole multitude went out to meet him, and as many as could come near him, laid hold on his feet, and kissed his hands. They that please to see more of this custom, may consult Sidonius Apollinaris,⁸ and Savaro's learned Notes⁹ upon him; who cites Ennodius, and several other authors to the same purpose.

St. Jerom¹⁰ mentions another custom, which he condemns as doing too great an honour to merè mortal men; which was, the people's singing hosannas to their bishops, as the multitude did to our Saviour at his entrance into Jerusalem. Valesius¹¹ cites a passage out of Antoninus's Itinerary, to the same purpose; where the form of words is, Blessed be ye of the Lord, and blessed be your coming; hosanna in the highest. Some also understand Hegesippus¹² in the same sense; where, speaking of the preaching of James, bishop of Jerusalem, he says, The people that were converted by his discourse cried out, "Hosanna to the Son of David." Scaliger understands this as spoken to James himself: but others¹³ take it for a doxology, or acclamation to Christ, whom they glorified upon the testimony that James had given him: and this seems to be the truer sense of that place; however, in the other acceptation, there is nothing contrary to custom in it, as appears from what has been said. I do not insist upon what St. Jerom, in another place,¹⁴ says further of this bishop of Jerusalem; that he was a man of such celebrated fame among the people, for his great sanctity, that they ambitiously strove to touch the hem of his garment: for this honour was not paid him as a bishop, but as a most holy man; who was, indeed, according to the character given him by Hegesippus and Epiphanius, a man of singular abstinence and piety, and one of the miracles of the age he lived in. So that this was a singular honour done to him, for his singular holiness and virtue.

But to proceed with the common honours paid to bishops. Another instance of respect may be observed in the usual forms of addressing them: for when men spake to them, they commonly pre-faced their discourse with some title of honour, such as that of Precor coronam, and Per coronam vestram; which we may English, Your honour and dignity; literally, Your crown. This form often occurs in Sidonius Apollinaris, Ennodius, St. Jerom,¹⁵ and others. St. Austin says, both the catholics¹⁶ and Donatists used it, when they spake to the bishops of either party; giving them very respectful titles, and entreating, or rather adjuring, them, per coronam, that they would hear and determine their secular causes.

The use of this form of speech then is plain, but the reason of it is not so evident. Savaro,¹⁷ and some others, fancy it respected the ancient figure of the clerical tonsure; by which the hair was cut into a round from the crown of the head downwards. Others think it came from the ornament which bishops wore upon their head; and that they will needs have to be a crown or mitre. Whereas, it does not appear that bishops had any such ornament in those days. I know, indeed, both Valesius¹⁸ and Petavius¹⁹ are very confident that all bishops (from the very first) had an appendant badge of honour in their foreheads, which they say was the same with the petalum, or golden plate, which the Jewish high priests wore: and it cannot be denied, but that as ancient an author as Polycrates,²⁰ mentioned both by Eusebius and St. Jerom, says, that St. John was a priest, wearing a petalum: and Epiphanius²¹ says the same of James, bishop of Jerusalem. But this was not spoken of them as Christian

Sect. 4.
What meant by the corona sacerdotalis, and the form of saluting bishops per coronam.

Sect. 5.
Whether bishops anciently wore a mitre, or any the like ornament?

regum colla et principum submitti genibus sacerdotum, et exosculatis eorum dexteris, orationibus eorum credant se communiti.

⁶ Paulin. Vit. Ambros. p. 2 et 3.

⁷ Chrys. Hom. 45. in Melet. t. 1. p. 593.

⁸ Sidon. lib. 8. Ep. 11. Sancti Gallicini manu osculata. Id. lib. 7. Ep. 11.

⁹ Savaro, Not. in Sidon. lib. 8. Epist. 11. p. 532.

¹⁰ Hieron. in Matt. xxi. t. 9. p. 62. Videant ergo episcopi, et quantumlibet sancti homines, cum quanto periculo dici ista sibi patiantur, &c.

¹¹ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 2. c. 23.

¹² Hegesip. ap. Euseb. lib. 2. c. 23. Πολλῶν δοξαζόντων ἐπὶ τῇ μαρτυρίᾳ τοῦ Ἰακώβου, καὶ λεγόντων, ὡσαννὰ τῷ υἱῷ Δαβὶδ.

¹³ Grabe, Spicileg. Sæc. 2. p. 207, translates it thus: Multi hoc Jacobi testimonio confirmati glorificabant (Jesus) dicentes, Savanna Filio David.

¹⁴ Hieron. Com. in Gal. i. Jacobus episcopus Hierosolymorum primus fuit, cognomento Justus; vir tantæ sanctitatis et rumoris in populo, ut fimbriam vestimenti ejus certatim cuperent attingere.

¹⁵ Sidon. lib. 6. Ep. 3. Auctoritas coronæ tuæ, &c. Id. lib. 7. Ep. 8. ad Euphron. De minimis rebus coronam tuam maximisque consulerem. Ennod. lib. 4. Ep. 29. ad Symmac. Lib. 5. Ep. 17. ad Marcellinum. Lib. 9. Ep. 27. ad Aurelian. Hieron. Ep. 26. ad August. inter Ep. Aug. Precor coronam tuam.

¹⁶ Aug. Ep. 147. ad Procleian. Episc. partis Donati. Honorant nos vestri, honorant vos nostri. Per coronam nostram nos adjurant vestri; per coronam vestram vos adjurant nostri.

¹⁷ Savaro, Not. in Sidon. lib. 6. Ep. 3. Baron. an. 58. n. 134.

¹⁸ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 5. c. 24.

¹⁹ Petav. Not. in Epiph. Hær. 78. n. 14.

²⁰ Polycrat. ap. Euseb. lib. 5. c. 24.

²¹ Epiphanius. Hær. 29. n. 1. It. Hær. 78. n. 14.

bishops, but on presumption of their having been Jewish priests, and of the family of Aaron. Valesius himself cites a MS. Passion of St. Mark, which sets the same ornament on his head, and gives this very reason for it: It is reported, says he, that St. Mark, according to the rites of the carnal sacrifice, wore the chief priest's petalum among the Jews: which gives us plainly to understand,²² says that author, that he was one of the tribe of Levi, and of the family of Aaron. So he did not take this for the ornament of a Christian bishop, but a Jewish priest; and that opens the way for us to understand what the other authors meant by it, however Valesius chanced not to observe it. Now, if it cannot be proved, that bishops anciently wore any such ornament as this, it will much less follow that they wore a royal crown, or mitre, as Spondanus²³ asserts they did, and thence deduces the custom of addressing them Per coronam; therein deserting his great master Baronius, who assigns another reason for it. After all, it seems most probable that it was no more than a metaphorical expression, used to denote the honour and dignity of the episcopal order: though I do not deny that the clerical tonsure was sometimes called corona; but that was not peculiar to bishops, but common to all the clergy.

It will not be improper to add, while we are upon this point, that it was usual in men's addresses to bishops, or in speaking of them, to mention their names with some additional titles of respect, such as θεοφιλέστατοι, and αγιώτατοι, most dear to God, and most holy fathers: which titles occur frequently in the emperor's rescripts in the civil law,²⁴ and were of such common use in those times, that Socrates (when he comes to the sixth book of his history, which treats of his own times) thinks himself obliged to make some apology²⁵ for not giving the bishops that were then living these titles. Which I the rather note, because of the vanity of some, who reckon the title, most holy father, the pope's sole prerogative; and to correct the malice of others, who will not allow a protestant bishop to receive that title, without the suspicion and imputation of popery. As if St. Austin and St. Jerom had been to blame, because the one wrote, and the other received, epistles always thus inscribed, Do- mino vere sancto, et beatissimo papæ Augustino. See St. Austin's Epist. 11, 13, 14, 17, 18, 21, where St. Jerom and others give him those honourable titles.

There is one thing more that must not be omitted, because it was the common honour and privilege of all bishops, to be distinguished in the church by a chair, or seat, which was commonly called their throne. Thus Eusebius²⁶ calls the bishop of Jerusalem's seat, θρόνον ἀποστολικόν, the apostolical throne, because St. James, bishop of Jerusalem, first sat in it. And for the same reason Gregory Nazianzen²⁷ calls the bishop of Alexandria's seat, the throne of St. Mark. It was otherwise called βῆμα, and θρόνος ὑψηλός, the high throne, because it was exalted something higher than the seats of the presbyters, which were on each side of it, and were called the second thrones, as we shall see hereafter, when we come to speak of presbyters. All that I shall observe further here concerning this throne of the bishops is, that though it be sometimes called the high and lofty throne, especially by those writers²⁸ who speak in a rhetorical strain, yet that is only meant comparatively in respect of the lower seats of presbyters; for otherwise, it was a fault in any bishop to build himself a pompous and splendid throne in imitation of the state and grandeur of the secular magistrates. This was one of the crimes which the council of Antioch,²⁹ in their Synodical Epistle against Paulus Samosatensis, laid to his charge, that he built himself a high and stately tribunal, not as a disciple of Christ, but as one of the rulers of the world, making a secretum to it, in imitation of the secular magistrates, whose tribunals had a place railed out from the rest, and separated by a veil, which they called the secretum, and the ambitious bishop gave his the same name, by which, and some other such like practices, he raised the envy and hatred of the heathens against the Christians, as they there complain of him. It was then the great care of the Christian church, to observe a decorum in the honours which she bestowed upon her bishops, that they might be such as might set them above contempt, but keep them below envy; make them venerable, but not minister to vanity, or the outward pomp and ostentation of secular greatness.

Sect. 7.
Bishops distinguished by their throne in the church.

Sect. 6.
Of the titles ἀγιώτατοι, sanctissimi, &c.

²² Auctor. MS. Passion. S. Marc. ap. Vales. ibid. B. Marcum juxta ritum carnalis sacrificii, pontificalis apicis petalum in populo gestasse Judæorum, illustrium virorum Syngraphæ declarant: ex quo manifestè datur intelligi, de stirpe cum Levitica, imo pontificis Aaron sacræ successionis, originem habuisse.

²³ Spondan. Epitom. Baron. an. 58. n. 51.

²⁴ Justin. Novel. 8, 40, 42, 67, 86, &c. Concil. Chalced. Act. 10.

²⁵ Socrat. Procem. ad lib. 6. ²⁶ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 19 et 32.

²⁷ Naz. Orat. 21. in Laud. Athanas. t. 1. p. 377.

²⁸ Naz. Somnium de Eccl. Anastas. Sublimi throno insidere mihi videbar. Id. Orat. 20. in Laud. Basil. p. 342 ἐπὶ τὸν ὑψηλὸν τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς θρόνον, &c.

²⁹ Ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30.

CHAPTER X.

OF THE AGE, AND SOME PARTICULAR QUALIFICATIONS REQUIRED IN SUCH AS WERE TO BE ORDAINED BISHOPS.

Sect. 1.
Bishops not to be ordained under thirty years of age, except they were men of extraordinary worth.

THOSE qualifications of bishops, which were common to them with the rest of the clergy, shall be spoken of hereafter: here I shall only take notice of a few that were more peculiar to them. Such as, first, their age; which, by the canons, was required to be at least thirty years. The council of Neocæsarea¹ requires thirty in presbyters, which is a certain argument that the same age was requisite in a bishop. The council of Agde² more expressly limits their age to that time, requiring all metropolitans to insist upon it in their ordination. The reasons given by these councils are, because our Saviour himself did not begin to teach before he was thirty years old, and because that is the perfect age of man. Therefore, though a man was otherwise never so well qualified, the council of Neocæsarea says, he shall wait, and not be ordained so much as presbyter before that time. But whether this rule was always observed from the days of the apostles may be questioned, for there is no such rule given by the apostles in Scripture. That which goes under their name in the Constitutions,³ requires a bishop to be fifty years old before he is ordained, except he be a man of singular merit and worth, which may compensate for the want of years. This shows, that the custom of the church varied in this matter, and that persons of extraordinary qualifications were not always tied to be of such an age. Timothy was ordained young, as may be collected from what the apostle says to him, 1 Tim. iv. 12, "Let no man despise thy youth." The history of the church affords many other such instances. Eusebius⁴ says, Gregory Thaumaturgus, and his brother Athenodorus, were both ordained bishops very young; ἔτι νέους ἄμφω. St. Ambrose⁵ says the same of Acholius, bishop of Thessalonica; that he was young in years, but of mature age in respect of his virtues. And Socrates⁶ gives the like account of Paulus, bishop of Constantinople. Theodoret⁷ observes also of Athanasius, that he was but young when he attended his bishop Alexander at the council of Nice; and yet within five months after, he was chosen his successor at Alexandria. Which probably was before he was thirty years old: for the council of Nice was not above twenty years after the persecution under Maximian; and yet Athanasius was so young, as not to remember the beginning of that persecution, anno 303, but only as he heard it from his fathers. For when he speaks of it, he says,⁸ he learned of his parents, that the persecution was raised by Maximian, grandfather to Constantius. So that if we compute from that time, we can hardly suppose him to be thirty years old, when he was ordained bishop, anno 326. It is agreed by all authors,⁹ that Remigius, bishop of Rhemes, was but twenty-two years old when he was ordained, anno 471. And Cotelierius,¹⁰ after Nicephorus, says, St. Eleutherius, an Illyrian bishop, was consecrated at twenty. Ignatius gives a plain intimation, that Damas, bishop of the Magnesians, was but a very young bishop; though he does not expressly mention his age. He calls his ordination,¹¹ νεωτερικὴν τάξιν, a youthful ordination; and therefore cautions the people not to despise him for his age, but to reverence and give place to him in the Lord. Salmasius¹² and Ludovicus Capellus miserably pervert this passage, and force a sense upon it, which the author never so much as dreamt of: they will needs have it, that by the words νεωτερικὴν τάξιν, Ignatius means the novelty of episcopacy in general, that it was but a new and late institution: which is not only contrary to the whole tenor and design of all Ignatius's epistles, but to the plain sense of this passage in particular; which speaks nothing of the institution of episcopacy, but of the age of this bishop, who was but young when he was ordained.

Now, from all this it appears, that though there was a rule in the church, requiring bishops to be thirty years old when they were ordained; yet it was frequently dispensed with, either in cases of necessity, or in order to promote persons of more extraordinary worth and singular qualifications: Yet such dispensations, as qualify boys of eleven or twelve years old to be made bishops, are nowhere to be met with in the primitive church; though the history of the papacy affords frequent instances of such promotions; as those that please may see in a catalogue of them, collected by Dr. Reynolds and Mr. Mason,¹³ two learned writers of our church.

¹ Con. Neocæs. can. 11.

² Concil. Agathen. c. 17. Presbyterum vel episcopum ante triginta annos, id est, antequam ad viri perfecti ætatem perveniat, nullus metropolitanorum ordinare præsumat. See also Con. Tolet. 4. c. 18 et 19.

³ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 1. ⁴ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 30.

⁵ Ambr. Ep. 60. ad Anysium. Benedictus processus juvenitatis ipsius, in qua ad summum electus est sacerdotium, maturo jam probatus virtutum stipendio.

⁶ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 6. Ἀνδρα νέον μὲν τὴν ἡλικίαν, προ- βεβηκότα δὲ ταῖς φρεσίν.

⁷ Theod. lib. 1. c. 25. νέος μὲν ὦν τὴν ἡλικίαν.

⁸ Athan. Ep. ad Solitar. t. 1. p. 853.

⁹ Hincmar. Vit. Remig. Baron. an. 471. p. 298.

¹⁰ Cotelier. Not. in Const. Apost. lib. 2. c. 1. Niceph. lib. 3. c. 29.

¹¹ Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes. n. 3.

¹² Vid. Pearson, Vindic. Ignat. Præf. ad Lector.

¹³ Vid. Rainoldi Apolog. Thes. n. 26. Mason of the Consecrat. of Bishops, lib. 1. c. 5.

Sect. 2.
Bishops to be chosen out of the clergy of the church to which they were ordained.

But to return to the bishops of the primitive church: another qualification in a bishop, anciently very much insisted on, was, that he should be one of the clergy of the same church over which he was to be made bishop. For strangers, who were unknown to the people, were not reckoned qualified by the canons. This is plainly implied by Cyprian,¹⁴ when he says, the bishop was to be chosen in the presence of the people; who had perfect knowledge of every man's life and actions, by their conversation among them. St. Jerom observes, that this was the constant custom of Alexandria,¹⁵ from St. Mark, to Dionysius and Heraclas, for the presbyters of the church to choose a bishop out of their own body. And therefore Julius¹⁶ makes it a strong objection against Gregory, whom the Arians obruded on the church of Alexandria in the room of Athanasius; that he was a perfect stranger to the place; neither baptized there, nor known to any: whereas, the ordination of a bishop ought not to be so uncanonical; but he should be ordained by the bishops of the province in his own church, and be ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ ἱερατείου, ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ κλήρου, one of the clergy of the church to which he was ordained. The ancient bishops of Rome were all of the same mind, so long as they thought themselves obliged to walk by the laws of the church: for Celestine,¹⁷ and Hilary,¹⁸ and Leo,¹⁹ insist upon the same thing, as the common rule and canon of the church. And we find a law as late as Charles the Great, and Ludovicus Pius, to the same purpose. For in one of their Capitulars²⁰ it is ordered, that bishops shall be chosen out of their own diocese, by the election of the clergy and the people. Though, as Baluzius²¹ notes, this law did not extend to very many dioceses: for by this time, the French kings had the disposal of all bishoprics in their dominions, (except some few churches, which by special privilege retained the old way of electing,) and they did not bind themselves to nominate bishops always out of the clergy of that church which was vacant, but used their liberty to choose them out of any other; as now it is become the privilege and custom of kings and princes almost in all nations: which is the occasion of the difference betwixt the ancient and modern practice in this particular. For while the ancient way of elections continued, the general rule was for every church to make choice of one of her own clergy to be her bishop, and not a stranger.

Yet in some extraordinary cases this rule admitted of legal exceptions; particularly in these three cases: 1.

Sect. 3.
Some exceptions to this rule.

When it was found for the benefit of the church to translate bishops from one see to another. In this case, though the bishop was a stranger, yet his translation being canonical, was reckoned no violation of this law. 2. When the church could not unanimously agree upon one in their own body, then, to pacify their heats and end their controversies, the emperor or a council proposed one of another church to their choice, or promoted him by their own authority. Upon this ground Nectarius, Chrysostom, and Nestorius, all strangers, were made bishops of Constantinople. It was to end the disputes that arose in the church, which was divided in their elections, as Socrates and Sozomen²² give an account of them. 3. Sometimes men's extraordinary merit gave them preference, though strangers, before all the members of the church to which they were chosen. As St. Ambrose²³ observes of Eusebius Vercellensis, that he was chosen, posthabitis civibus, before all that were citizens or bred in the place, though none of the electors had ever seen him before, but only heard of his fame and character: and there are many other instances of the like nature. But excepting some such cases as these, the rule was generally observed, to choose no one bishop of any place, who was not known to the people, and a member of the same church before.

Another qualification required in a bishop was, that he should arise gradually to his honour, and not come to the throne per saltum; but first pass

Sect. 4.
Bishops to go through the inferior orders of the church.

through some, if not all, the inferior orders of the church. The council of Sardica has a canon²⁴ very full to this purpose: If any rich man, or pleader at the law, desire to be made a bishop, he shall not be ordained, till he has first gone through the offices of reader, deacon, and presbyter; that behaving himself worthily in each of these offices, he may ascend gradually to the height of the episcopal function: and in every one of these degrees he shall continue some considerable time; that his faith, and good conversation, and constancy, and moderation may be known. The same rule is prescribed by the ¹⁴ Cypr. Ep. 68. al. 67. ad Frat. Hispan. p. 172. Episcopus deligatur plebe presente, que singulorum vitam plenissimè novit, et uniuscujusque actum de ejus conversatione perspexit.

¹⁵ Hieron. Epist. 85. ad Evagr. Alexandrie a Marco evangelista usque ad Heraclam et Dionysium episcopos, presbyteri semper unum ex se electum, in excelsiori gradu collocatum episcopum nominabant.

¹⁶ Jul. Ep. ad Oriental. ap. Athan. Apol. 2. t. 1. p. 749.

¹⁷ Celestin. Ep. 2. ad Episc. Narbon. c. 4 et 5.

¹⁸ Hilar. Pap. Epist. 1. ad Ascan. Tarracon. c. 3.

¹⁹ Leo, Ep. 81. ad Anastas. c. 6.

²⁰ Capitular. Karoli et Ludov. lib. i. c. 18. Episcopi per electionem cleri et populi, secundum statuta canonum, de propria diocesi eligantur.

²¹ Baluz. Not. ad Concilia Gall. Narbon. p. 34. It. Not. ad Gratian. Dist. 63. c. 31. p. 467.

²² Socrat. lib. 6. c. 2. lib. 7. c. 29. Sozom. lib. 8. c. 2.

²³ Ambros. Ep. 82. ad Eccl. Vercel.

²⁴ Concil. Sardic. can. 10.

council of Bracara²⁵ and some others. And that it was the ancient practice of the church, appears from what Cyprian says²⁶ of Cornelius, that he was not made bishop of Rome all of a sudden, but went gradually through all the offices of the church, till his merits advanced him to the episcopal throne. Theodoret²⁷ commends Athanasius upon the same account: and Gregory Nazianzen²⁸ speaks it to the honour of St. Basil, with some reflection on several bishops of his age, that he did not as soon as he was baptized leap into a bishopric, as some other ambitious persons did, but rise to his honour by degrees. He adds, that in military affairs this rule was generally observed; every great general is first a common soldier, then a captain, then a commander: and it would be happy for the church, says he, if matters were always so ordered in it. By this time it seems this rule was frequently transgressed, without any reason or necessity; but only by the ambition of some who affected the office of bishop, yet were not willing to undergo the inferior offices that were preparative to it.

Sect. 5.
Deacons might be ordained bishops, though never ordained presbyters.

But I must observe, that it was not always necessarily required that a man should be ordained presbyter first in order to be made a bishop: for deacons were as commonly made bishops as any other. Cæcilian was no more than archdeacon of Carthage,²⁹ when he was ordained bishop, as we learn from Optatus. And both Theodoret³⁰ and Epiphanius³¹ say, that Athanasius was but a deacon, when he was made bishop of Alexandria. Liberatus observes the same³² of Peter Moggus and Esaias, two other bishops of Alexandria: as also of Agapetus³³ and Vigilus, bishops of Rome. Soerates³⁴ and Theodoret³⁵ relate the same of Felix, bishop of Rome, who was ordained in the place of Liberius. Eusebius³⁶ takes notice of one of his own name, a deacon of Alexandria, who was made bishop of Laodicea. And Socrates³⁷ says, Chrysostom made Heraclides, one of his own deacons, bishop of Ephesus, and Scrapion bishop of Heraclea. And that this was a general practice, and agreeable to canon, appears also from a letter of Pope Leo, where, speaking of the election of a metropolitan, he says³⁸ he ought to be chosen either out of the presbyters, or out of the deacons of the church.

Sometimes in cases of necessity bishops were chosen out of the inferior orders, subdeacons, readers, &c. Liberatus says, Silverius, who was competitor with Vigilus for the bishopric of Rome, was but a subdeacon.³⁹ And St. Austin himself, when he erected his new bishopric at Fussala, being disappointed of the person whom he intended to have had consecrated bishop, offered one Antonius a reader to the primate to be ordained bishop in his room; and the primate without any scruple immediately ordained him; though, as St. Austin⁴⁰ testifies, he was but a young man, who had never showed himself in any other office of the church beside that of reader.

Sect. 6.
Bishops in cases of necessity chosen out of the inferior orders.

There want not also several instances of persons, who were ordained bishops immediately of laymen, when God by his particular providence seemed to point them out as the fittest men, in some certain junctures, to be employed in his service. Thus it was in the known case of St. Ambrose, who was but newly baptized when he was ordained bishop, as both Paulinus⁴¹ and all the historians testify. When the people of Milan were so divided in the election of a bishop, that the whole city was in an uproar, he, being prætor of the place, came in upon them to appease the tumult, as by virtue of his office he thought himself obliged to do; and making an eloquent speech to them, it had a sort of miraculous effect upon them; for they all immediately left off their dispute, and unanimously cried out, they would have Ambrose to be their bishop. Which the emperor understanding, and looking upon it as a providential call, he ordered him to be baptized, (for he was yet but a catechumen,) and in a few days after to be ordained their bishop. St. Cyprian was another instance of the like providential dispensation. For Pontius⁴² says in his Life, that he was chosen bishop by the judgment of God and the favour of the people, though he was but a neophyte, or newly baptized. Socrates⁴³ and and Sozomen⁴⁴ say the same of Nectarius, Gregory

Sect. 7.
And in some extraordinary cases ordained immediately from laymen.

²⁵ Concil. Bracar. 1. c. 39. Per singulos gradus eruditus, ad sacerdotium veniat.

²⁶ Cypr. Ep. 52. al. 55. ad Antonian. p. 103. Non iste ad episcopatum subito pervenit, sed per omnia ecclesiastica officia promotus, et in divinis administrationibus Dominum sæpe promeritus, ad sacerdotii sublime fastigium cunctis religionis gradibus ascendit.

²⁷ Theod. lib. 1. c. 25.

²⁸ Naz. Orat. 20. in Laud. Basil. p. 335.

²⁹ Optat. lib. 1. p. 41.

³⁰ Theodor. lib. 1. c. 25.

³¹ Epiphanius. Hær. 69. Arian.

³² Liberat. Breviar. c. 16 et 18.

³³ Liberat. ibid. c. 21 et 22.

³⁴ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 37.

³⁵ Theod. lib. 2. c. 17.

³⁶ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 11.

³⁷ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 11. lib.

³⁸ Leo, Ep. 84. c. 6. Ex presbyteris ejusdem ecclesiæ, vel ex diaconibus eligatur.

³⁹ Liberat. Brev. c. 22. ⁴⁰ Aug. Ep. 261. ad Cælestin.

⁴¹ Paulin. Vit. Ambros. p. 3. Ruffin. lib. 2. c. 11. Theod. lib. 4. c. 6 et 7. Socrat. lib. 4. c. 30. Sozom. lib. 6. c. 24.

⁴² Pont. Vit. Cypr. p. 2. Judicio Dei et plebis favore ad officium sacerdotii et episcopatus gradum adhuc neophytus, et ut putabatur novellus electus est.

⁴³ Socrat. lib. 5. c. 8.

⁴⁴ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 8. τῆν μυστικὴν ἐσθῆτα ἔτι ἡμφιεσμένος, &c.

Nazianzen's successor at Constantinople, that he was chosen bishop by the second general council, whilst he had his mystical garments on him, meaning those white garments, which the newly baptized were used to wear. Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea in Pontus, St. Basil's predecessor, was not baptized, but only a catechumen, when he was chosen bishop, as Nazianzen himself⁴⁵ informs us. And Eucherius was but a monk, that is, a layman, when he was chosen and ordained bishop of Lyons, as Baronius⁴⁶ says, from Hilarius Arelatensis in the Life of Honoratus. Chrysostom⁴⁷ seems to say the same of Philogonius, bishop of Antioch, when he reports of him, that he was taken from the court of judicature, and carried from the judge's bench to the bishop's throne, ἀπὸ βήματος δικαστικοῦ ἐπὶ βῆμα ἱερὸν. In all these instances there seems to have been the hand of God and the direction of Providence, which supersedes all ordinary rules and canons: and therefore these ordinations were never censured as uncanonical or irregular, though contrary to the letter of a common rule; because the rule itself was to be understood with this limitation and exception, as one of the ancient canons⁴⁸ explains itself, and all others that relate to this matter; saying, One that is newly converted from Gentilism, or a vicious life, ought not presently to be advanced to a bishopric: for it is not fit, that he who has yet given no proof of himself, should be made a teacher of others; unless it be so ordered by the grace and appointment of God himself, εἰ μὴ πού κατὰ θείαν χάριν τοῦτο γένοιτο. For in this case there could be no dispute; the will of God being superior to all human canons whatsoever. And therefore, though the same limitation be not expressed in other canons, yet it is evident that they are always to be understood with this exception. Upon which account, it was not reckoned any breach of canon to make a layman bishop, when Providence seemed first to grant a dispensation, by directing the church to be unanimous in the choice of such a person. They did not in such cases make a layman receive one order one day, and another the next, and so go through the several orders in the compass of a week, but made him bishop at once, when need required, without any other ordination. The contrary custom is a modern practice, scarce ever heard of till the time of Photius, anno 858, who, to avoid the imputation of not coming gradually to his bishopric, was on the first day made a monk, on the second a reader, on the third a subdeacon, on the fourth a deacon, on the fifth a presbyter, and on the sixth a patriarch, as Nicetas David,⁴⁹ a writer of that age, informs us in the Life of Ignatius. Spalatenis⁵⁰ observes the same practice to be continued in the Romish church, under pretence of complying with the ancient canons; though nothing can be more contrary to the true intent and meaning of them; which was, that men should continue some years in every order, to give some proof of their behaviour to the church, and not pass cursorily through all orders in five or six days' time; which practice, as it does not answer the end of the canons, so it is altogether without precedent in the primitive church.

CHAPTER XI.

OF SOME PARTICULAR LAWS AND CUSTOMS OBSERVED ABOUT THE ORDINATION OF BISHOPS.

WHEN any bishopric became void by the death or cession of its bishop, then, forasmuch as bishops were looked upon as a necessary constituent part of the church, all imaginable care was taken to fill up the vacancy with all convenient speed. In the African churches a year was the utmost limits that was allowed for a vacancy; for if within that time a new election was not made, he that was appointed administrator of the church during the vacancy, whose business it was to procure and hasten the election, was to be turned out of his office, and a new one put in his room, by a canon of the fifth council¹ of Carthage, which is also confirmed in the African Code.² But in other places this was limited to a much shorter time. For by a canon of the general council of Chalcedon,³ every metropolitan is obliged to ordain a new bishop in the vacant see within the space of three months, under pain of ecclesiastical censure, unless some unavoidable necessity forced him to defer it longer.

At Alexandria the custom was to proceed immediately to election as soon as the bishop was dead, and before he was interred. Epiphanius⁴ hints at this custom, when he says, they were used to make no delay after the decease of a bishop, but chose one presently, to preserve peace among the people, that they might not run into factions about the choice of a successor. But Liberatus is a little more particular in describing the circumstances of it. He says,⁵ it was customary for the successor to

Sect. 1.
Bishoprics not to be void above three months.

Sect. 2.
In some places a new bishop was chosen before the old one was buried.

⁴⁵ Naz. Orat. 19. de Laud. Patr. t. 1. p. 308.

⁴⁶ Baron. an. 441. p. 9.

⁴⁷ Chrys. Hom. 31. de S. Philogon. t. 1. p. 397.

⁴⁸ Canon. Apost. c. 80.

⁴⁹ Nicet. Vit. Ignat. Concil. t. 8. p. 1199.

⁵⁰ Spalat. de Repub. lib. 3. c. 4. n. 19. p. 430.

¹ Con. Carth. 5. can. 8.

² Cod. Can. Eccl. Afric. can. 75.

³ Con. Chalced. can. 25.

⁴ Epiphani. Hær. 69. Arian. n. 11. μὴ χρονίζειν μετὰ τελευτῆν τῶ ἐπισκόπου, &c.

⁵ Liberat. Breviar. c. 20. Consuetudo quidem est Alex-watch over the body of the deceased bishop, and to lay his right hand upon his head, and to bury him with his own hands, and then take the pall of St. Mark, and put it upon himself, and so sit in his throne. To these authorities we may add that of Socrates, who says,⁶ that Cyril of Alexandria was enthroned the third day after the death of Theophilus: and he intimates, that the same thing was practised in other places; for Proclus, bishop of Constantinople,⁷ was enthroned before Maximian his predecessor was interred, and after his enthronement he performed the funeral office for him. And this was done at the instance and command of the emperor Theodosius, that there might be no dispute or tumult raised in the church about the election of a bishop.

Yet, notwithstanding this care and diligence of the church in filling up vacant sees, it sometimes happened, that the election of bishops was deferred to a much longer season. For in Africa, at the time of the collation of Carthage, there were no less than threescore bishoprics void at once, which was above an eighth part of the whole. For the whole number of bishops was but four hundred and sixty-six, whereof two hundred and eighty-six were then present at the conference, and one hundred and twenty were absent by reason of sickness or old age; besides which, there were sixty vacant sees, which were unprovided of bishops at that time, as the catholics told the Donatists,⁸ who pretended to vie numbers with them, though they were but two hundred and seventy-nine. What was the particular reason of so many vacancies at that juncture, is not said; but probably it might be the difficulty of the times, that catholic bishops could not there be placed, where the Donatists had gotten full possession. Or, perhaps it might be the negligence of the people, who contented themselves with administrators during the vacancy, and would not admit of a new bishop. The council of Macriana, mentioned by Fulgentius Ferrandus,⁹ takes notice of this dilatory practice in some churches, and censures it by a canon, which orders the administrators, who were always some neighbouring bishops, to be removed; and condemns such churches to continue without administrators, till they sought for a bishop of their own. Another reason of long vacancies in some times and places, was the difficult circumstances the churches lay under in time of persecution. For the bishops were the men chiefly aimed at by the persecutors. And therefore, when one bishop was martyred, the church sometimes was forced to defer the ordination of another, either because it was scarce possible to go about it in such times of exigency, or because she was unwilling to expose another bishop immediately to the implacable fury of a raging adversary, and bring upon herself a more violent storm of persecution. The Roman clergy¹⁰ give this for their reason to Cyprian, why, after the martyrdom of Fabian, they did not immediately proceed to a new election. The state of affairs, and the difficulty of the times, was such as would not permit it. Baronius¹¹ reckons the time of this vacancy a year and three months, but others,¹² who are more exact in the calculation, make it a year and five months; by either of which accounts, it was above a year beyond the time limited by the canons. But this was nothing in comparison of that long vacancy of the bishopric of Carthage, in the time of the Arian persecution under Gensericus and Hunericus, two heretical kings of the Vandals, which Victor Uticensis¹³ says was no less than twenty-four years, during all which time the church of Carthage had no bishop. But these were difficulties upon the church, and matters of force, not her choice: for in times of peace she always acted otherwise, and did not think such extraordinary instances fit precedents to be drawn into example; much less to be drawn into consequence and argued upon, as some¹¹ have done, that therefore the church may be without bishops, because she subsisted in some extraordinary vacancies without them, when she could not have them: which argument would hold as well against any other order as that of bishops, did but they who urge this argument rightly consider it.

But to return to the ordination of bishops: at the time appointed for ordination, the metropolitan was used to send forth his circular letters, and summon all the bishops of the province to meet at the place where the new bishop was to be ordained, and assist at his consecration. The presence of them all was required, if they could conveniently attend; if not, they were to send their consent in writing: in andriæ, illum, qui defuncto succedit, excubias super defuncti corpus agere, manumque dexteram ejus capiti suo imponere, et sepulto manibus suis, accipere collo suo beati Marci pallium, et tunc legitime sedere.

⁶ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 7.

⁷ Id. lib. 7. c. 40.

⁸ Aug. Brevic. Collat. primæ Diei. c. 14. Sane propter cathedras, quas episcopis vacuas apud se esse dixerint, responsum est a catholicis, sexaginta esse quibus successores episcopi nondum fuerant ordinati.

⁹ Ferrand. Brev. Can. c. 23. ap. Justel. t. 1. p. 449. Ut interventores episcopi convenient plebis quæ episcopum non habent, ut episcopum accipiant; quod si accipere neglexerint, remoto interventore sic remaneant, quam diu sibi episcopum quærant.

¹⁰ Ep. 31. al. 30. ap. Cyprian. p. 58. Post excessum nobilissimæ memoriæ viri Fabiani, nondum est episcopus propter rerum et temporum difficultates constitutus.

¹¹ Baron. an. 253. n. 6. an. 254. n. 46.

¹² Pearson, Annal. Cypr. an. 250. n. 3. et an. 251. n. 6.

¹³ Victor. de Persecut. Vandal. lib. 2.

¹¹ Blondel. Apol.

Sect. 3.
Some instances of longer vacancies in times of difficulty and persecution.

Sect. 4.
Three bishops required to the ordination of a bishop.

which case three bishops, with the assistance or consent of the metropolitan, were reckoned a sufficient canonical number to perform the ceremony of consecration. St. Cyprian¹⁵ speaks of it as the general practice of the church in his time, to have all the bishops of the province present at any such ordination. And Eusebius¹⁶ particularly takes notice of the ordination of Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, who succeeded Narcissus, that he was ordained μετὰ κοινῆς τῶν ἐπισκόπων γνώμης, with the common consent of the bishops of his province. The council of Chalcedon¹⁷ calls this a canonical ordination, when the metropolitan, with all or most of his provincial bishops, ordain the bishops of their own province, as the canons have appointed. And the general council of Constantinople¹⁸ justified the ordinations of Flavian bishop of Antioch, and Cyril of Jerusalem, as canonical in this respect, because they were ordained by the bishops of their provinces synodically met together. This was the ancient rule of the council of Nice, which requires the assistance of all the bishops of the province, if they could conveniently attend the ordination:¹⁹ but forasmuch as that, either through urgent necessity, or by reason of their great distance, it might happen that all of them could not be present, it is added, that in that case three bishops should be sufficient to ordain, provided the metropolitan and the rest sent their consent in writing. But under three the canons did not generally allow of. The first council of Arles²⁰ and the third of Carthage²¹ require three besides the metropolitan. And the second council of Arles²² does not allow the metropolitan to be one of the three, but saith expressly, that he shall take the assistance of three provincial bishops beside himself, and not presume to ordain a bishop without them. It is true, those called the Apostolical Canons²³ and Constitutions²⁴ allow the ordination that is performed by two bishops only: but this is contrary to all other canons; which are so far from allowing two bishops to ordain by themselves, that the council of Orange²⁵ orders both the ordaining bishops and the ordained to be deposed:

and the council of Riez²⁶ actually deposed Armenarius for this very thing, because he had not three bishops to ordain him. All churches indeed did not punish such ordinations with the same severity, but in all places they were reckoned uncanonical. When Paulinus ordained Evagrius, bishop of Antioch, Theodoret²⁷ takes notice that this was done against the laws of the church, because he was ordained by a single person, and without the consent of the provincial bishops. And Synesius²⁸ says the same of the ordination of Siderius, bishop of Palæbisca, that it was irregular, because he neither had the consent of the bishop of Alexandria, his metropolitan, nor three bishops to ordain him. It was to avoid this censure of irregularity, that Novatian, when he set himself up to be bishop of Rome against Cornelius, sent for three bishops out of the farthest corner of Italy to come and ordain him,²⁹ lest it should be objected against him, that he had not a canonical ordination. And upon this account, when Pelagius the First was to be ordained bishop of Rome, because three bishops could not be procured, a presbyter³⁰ was taken in to make up the number. In all which the general practice of the church is very clearly seen and descried.

Yet it must be observed, that though this was the common rule and practice of the church, yet it was not simply and absolutely of the essence of ordination. For the church many times admitted of the ordinations of bishops that were consecrated only by one or two bishops. The council of Orange,³¹ which orders both the ordaining bishops and the ordained to be deposed, in case two bishops only ordained a bishop with his consent, decrees notwithstanding, that if a bishop was ordained by any sort of violence against his will, though only by two bishops, in that case his ordination should stand good, because he was passive in the thing, and not consenting to the breach of the canons. And without this passivity there are several instances of ordinations by two bishops only, the validity of which we do not find disputed. Pe-

Sect. 5.
Yet ordinations by one bishop allowed to be valid, though not canonical.

¹⁵ Cypr. Ep. 68. al. 67. ad Frat. Hispan. p. 172. Quod apud nos quoque et fere per provincias universas tenetur, ut ad ordinationes rite celebrandas, ad eam plebem, cui præpositus ordinatur, episcopi ejusdem provincie proximi quique convenient, et episcopus deligatur plebe præsentē, &c.

¹⁶ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 11.

¹⁷ Con. Chalced. Act. 16. C. t. 4. p. 817.

¹⁸ Ep. Synod. ap. Theodor. lib. 5. c. 9.

¹⁹ Con. Nic. can. 4. Ἐπίσκοπον προσήκει μάλιστα μὲν ὑπὸ πάντων τῶν ἐν τῇ ἐπαρχίᾳ καθίστασθαι.

²⁰ Con. Arelat. 1. c. 20. Si non potuerint septem, sine tribus fratribus non presument ordinare.

²¹ Con. Carth. 3. can. 19. Forma antiqua servabitur, ut non minus quam tres sufficiant, qui fuerint a metropolitano directi ad ordinandum episcopum. See also Con. Carth. 6. c. 4.

²² Con. Arelat. 2. c. 5. Nec episcopus metropolitanus sine tribus episcopis comprovincialibus presumat episcopum ordinare.

²³ Can. Apost. c. 1. Ἐπίσκοπος χειροτονεῖσθω ὑπὸ ἐπισκόπων δύο ἢ τριῶν.

²⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 27. ²⁵ Con. Arausic. 1. can. 21.

²⁶ Con. Reiens. can. 2. Ordinationem quam canones irritam definiunt, nos quoque vacuandam esse censuimus: in qua prætermissa trium præsentia, nec expetitis comprovincialium literis, metropolitani quoque voluntate neglecta, prorsus nihil quod episcopum faceret ostensum est.

²⁷ Theod. lib. 5. c. 23.

²⁸ Synes. Ep. 67.

²⁹ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43. ex Epist. Cornel.

³⁰ Lib. Pontifical. Vit. Pelag. Dum non essent episcopi, qui eum ordinarent, inventi sunt duo episcopi, Joannes de Perusio, et Bonus de Ferentino, et Andreas presbyter de Ostia, et ordinaverunt eum.

³¹ Con. Arausic. 1. c. 21.

lagius, bishop of Rome, was reckoned a true bishop, though, as we have just now heard, he had but two bishops and a presbyter to ordain him. Dioscorus of Alexandria was consecrated likewise by two bishops only, and those under ecclesiastical censure; as we learn from an epistle of the bishops of Pontus³² at the end of the council of Chalcedon; yet neither that council, nor any others, ever questioned the validity of his ordination, unless perhaps those Pontic bishops did, who call it nefandam atque imaginariam ordinationem. Siderius, bishop of Palæbisea, was ordained by one bishop; yet Athanasius not only allowed his ordination and confirmed it, but finding him to be a useful man, he afterward advanced him, as Synesius says,³³ to the metropolitan see of Ptolemais. Paulinus, bishop of Antioch, ordained Evagrius his successor, without any other bishop to assist him: which, though it was done against canon, yet Theodoret assures us,³⁴ that both the bishops of Rome and Alexandria owned Evagrius for a true bishop, and never in the least questioned the validity of his ordination. And though they afterwards consented to acknowledge Flavian, at the instance of Theodosius, to put an end to the schism; yet they did it upon this condition, that the ordinations of such as had been ordained by Evagrius, should be reputed valid also: as we learn from the letters of Pope Innocent,³⁵ who lived not long after this matter was transacted.

Sect. 6.
The bishop of Rome not privileged to ordain alone, any more than any other single bishop.

Hence it appears, that the ordination of a bishop made by any single bishop was valid, if the church thought fit to allow it. Nor had the bishop of Rome any peculiar privilege in this matter above other men, though some pretend to make a distinction. There is indeed an ancient canon alleged in the collection of Fulgentius Ferrandus, out of the council of Zella and the letters of Siricius, which seems to make a reserve in behalf of the bishop of Rome: for it says,³⁶ One bishop shall not ordain a bishop, the Roman church excepted. But Cotelerius³⁷ ingeniously owns this to be a corruption in the text of Ferrandus, foisted in by the ignorance or fraud of some modern transcriber, who confounded two decrees of Siricius into one, and changed the words sedes apostolica primatis into sedes apostolica Romana. For in the words of Siricius³⁸ there is no mention made at all of the Roman church, but it is said, that no one shall ordain without the consent of the apostolical see; that is, the primate or metropolitan of the province; and that one bishop alone shall not ordain a bishop, because that is arrogant and assuming, and looks like giving an ordination by stealth, and is expressly forbidden by the Nicene council. So that in these times the bishops of Rome were under the direction of the canons, and did not presume to think they had any privilege of ordaining singly, above what was common to the rest of their order.

The next thing to be taken notice of in this affair is, that every bishop, by the laws and custom of the church, was to be ordained in his own church, in the presence of his own people. Which is plainly intimated by Cyprian,³⁹ when he says, that to celebrate ordinations aright, the neighbouring bishops of the province were used to meet at the church where the new bishop was to be ordained, and there proceed to his election and ordination. And this was so generally the practice of the whole church, that Pope Julius⁴⁰ made it an objection against Gregory of Alexandria, who was obtruded on the church by the Eusebian party in the room of Athanasius, that he was ordained at Antioch, and not in his own church, but sent thither with a band of soldiers; whereas, by the ecclesiastical canon, he ought to have been ordained, ἐπ' αὐτῆς τῆς ἐκκλησίας, in the church of Alexandria itself, and that by the bishops of his own province. This rule was very nicely observed in the African churches, where it was the constant custom for the primate (whose office it was to ordain bishops) to go to the church where the new bishop was to be settled, and ordain him there. Of this we have several instances in St. Austin, who himself was ordained in his own church at Hippo⁴¹ by the primate of Numidia: and having divided his diocese, and erected a new bishopric at Fussala, and elected a bishop, he sent for the primate, though living⁴² at a great distance, to come to the place and ordain him there.

Sect. 7.
Every bishop to be ordained in his own church.

³² Concil. tom. 4. p. 960. Ordinationem suam a damnatis episcopis, et hoc duobus, accepit, cum regulæ patrum — vel tres episcopos corporaliter adesse in hujusmodi dispensationibus omnino prospiciant.

³³ Synes. Ep. 67.

³⁴ Theod. lib. 5. c. 23.

³⁵ Innoc. Ep. 14. ad Bonifac. Ecclesia Antiochena ita pacem postulavit et meruit, ut et Evagrianos suis ordiibus ac locis, intemerata ordinatione, quam acceperant a memorato, susciperet.

³⁶ Ferrand. Brev. Canon. c. 6. Ut unus episcopus episcopum non ordinet, excepta ecclesia Romana. Concilio Zellensi. Ex Epistola Papæ Siricii.

³⁷ Coteler. Not. in Constit. Apost. lib. 3. c. 20.

³⁸ Siric. Ep. 4. c. 1. Ut extra conscientiam sedis apos-tolicæ, hoc est, primatis, nemo audeat ordinare. It. c. 2. Ne unus episcopus episcopum ordinare præsumat propter arrogantiam, ne furtivum præstitum beneficium videatur. Hoc enim et a synodo Nicæna constitutum est atque definitum.

³⁹ Cypr. Ep. 68. al. 67. ad Frat. Hispan. p. 172. Ad ordinationes rite celebrandas, ad eam plebem, cui præpositus ordinatur, episcopi ejusdem provinciæ proximi quique convenient, &c.

⁴⁰ Jul. Ep. ad Oriental. ap. Athanas. Apol. 2. t. 1. p. 749.

⁴¹ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 8.

⁴² Aug. Ep. 261. Propter quem ordinandum, sanctum senem, qui tunc primatum Numidiæ gerebat, de longinquo ut veniret rogans, literis impetravi.

As to the manner and form of ordaining a bishop, it is thus briefly described by one of the councils⁴³ of Carthage: when a bishop is ordained, two bishops shall hold the book of the Gospels over his head, and whilst one pronounces the blessing or consecration prayer, all the rest of the bishops that are present shall lay their hands upon his head. The ceremony of laying the Gospels upon his head, seems to have been in use in all churches. For the author of the Apostolical Constitutions⁴⁴ (a Greek writer, who is supposed to relate the customs of the third century) makes mention of it, only with this difference, that instead of two bishops, there two deacons are appointed to hold the Gospels open over his head, whilst the senior bishop, or primate, with two other bishops assisting him, pronounces the prayer of consecration. This ceremony of holding the Gospels over his head, is also mentioned by St. Chrysostom,⁴⁵ and the author of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, under the name of Dionysius, who says it was a peculiar ceremony, used only in the ordination of a bishop.

The author of the Constitutions recites one of the ancient forms of prayer, the close of which is in these words:⁴⁶ "Grant to him, O Lord Almighty, by thy Christ, the communication of the Holy Spirit; that he may have power to remit sins according to thy commandment, and to confer orders according to thy appointment, and to loose every bond according to the power which thou gavest to the apostles; that he may please thee in meekness and a pure heart, constantly, blameless, and without rebuke; and may offer unto thee that pure unbloody sacrifice, which thou, by Christ, hast appointed to be the mystery or sacrament of the new covenant, for a sweet-smelling savour, through Jesus Christ thy holy Son, our God and Saviour, by whom be glory, honour, and worship to thee, in the Holy Spirit, now and for ever. Amen." It is not to be imagined that one and the same form was used in all churches: for every bishop having liberty to frame his own liturgy, as there were different liturgies in different churches, so it is most reasonable to suppose the primates or metropolitans had different forms of consecration, though there are now no remains of them in being, to give us any further information.

The consecration being ended, the bishops that were present conducted the new-ordained bishop to his chair or throne, and there placing him, they all saluted him with a holy kiss in the Lord. Then the Scriptures being read, (according to custom, as part of the daily service,) the new bishop made a discourse or exposition upon them, which was usually called sermo entronisticus, from the time and circumstances in which it was spoken. Such was that famous homily of Meletius, bishop of Antioch, mentioned by Epiphanius⁴⁷ and Sozomen, for which he was immediately sent into banishment by Constantius. Socrates frequently takes notice of such homilies made by bishops⁴⁸ at their instalment; and Liberatus,⁴⁹ speaking of Severus of Antioch, mentions his exposition made upon that occasion, calling it, expositio in entronismo. It was usual also for bishops, immediately after their instalment, to send letters to foreign bishops to give them an account of their faith and orthodoxy, that they might receive letters of peace and communion again from them; which letters were therefore called literæ entronisticæ, or συλλαβαὶ ἐνθρονιστικαὶ, as Evagrius⁵⁰ terms them, speaking of the circular letters which Severus, bishop of Antioch, wrote to the rest of the patriarchs upon that occasion. These were otherwise called communicatory letters, κοινωνικὰ συγγράμματα, as the council of Antioch, that deposed Paulus Samosatensis, terms them: for the fathers in that council having ordained Domnus in the room of Paul, gave notice thereof to all churches, telling them that they signified it to them for this reason, that they might write to Domnus, and receive κοινωνικὰ συγγράμματα,⁵¹ communicatory letters from him: which, as Valesius⁵² rightly notes, do not mean there those letters of communion which bishops were used to grant to persons travelling into foreign countries; but such letters as they wrote to each other upon their own ordination, to testify their communion mutually with one another. These letters are also called synodica by Liberatus,⁵³ who says, this custom of every new bishop's giving intimation of his own promotion to those of his own order, was so necessary, that the omission of it was interpreted a sort of refusal to hold communion with the rest of the world, and a virtual charge of heresy upon them.

⁴³ Con. Carth. 4. c. 2. Episcopus cum ordinatur, duo episcopi ponant et teneant evangeliorum codicem super caput et verticem ejus, et uno super eum fundente benedictionem, reliqui omnes episcopi qui adsunt, manibus suis caput ejus tangant.

⁴⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 4.

⁴⁵ Chrys. de Laudib. Evang. cited by Habertus, p. 79. Dionys. Eccles. Hierarch. c. 5. par. 3. sect. 1. p. 361.

⁴⁶ Constit. lib. 8. c. 5.

⁴⁷ Epiphan. Hær. 73. Sozom. lib. 4. c. 28.

⁴⁸ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 43. lib. 7. c. 29.

⁴⁹ Liberat. Breviar. c. 19.

⁵⁰ Evagr. lib. 4. c. 4.

⁵¹ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30.

⁵² Vales. Not. in loc.

⁵³ Liberat. Breviar. c. 17. Quia literas synodicas non direxisset, &c.

Sect. 8.
The ancient form of ordination of bishops.

Sect. 10.
Of their entronement,
homilies entronisticæ,
et literæ entronisticæ.

Sect. 9.
A form of prayer used at their consecration.

CHAPTER XII.

OF THE RULE WHICH PROHIBITS BISHOPS TO BE ORDAINED IN SMALL CITIES.

BEFORE I end this discourse about bishops, I must give an account of two rules more respecting their ordination. The first of which was, That bishops should not be placed in small cities or villages: which law was first made by the council of Sardica, with a design to keep up the honour and dignity of the episcopal order; as the reason is given in the canon made about it; which says, It shall not be lawful to place a bishop in a village, or small city,¹ where a single presbyter will be sufficient: for in such places, there is no need to set a bishop; lest the name and authority of bishops be brought into contempt. Some add to this the fifty-seventh canon of the council of Laodicea, which forbids the placing of bishops in villages, and in the country,² appointing visitors to be constituted in their room: but this canon speaks not of absolute bishops, but of the chorepiscopi, who were subject to other bishops, of which I shall treat particularly hereafter. However, there is no dispute about the Sardican canon; for the reason annexed explains its meaning, that it prohibits universally the ordination of bishops in small cities and country places.

But it may be observed, that this rule did never generally obtain: for both before and after the council of Sardica, there were bishops both in small cities and villages. Nazianzum was but a very small city; Socrates³ calls it πόλις εὐτελής, a little one: and upon the same account Gregory Nazianzen⁴ styles his own father, who was bishop of it, μικροπόλιτης, a little bishop, and one of the second order. Yet he was no chorepiscopus, but as absolute a bishop in his own diocese, as the bishop of Rome or Alexandria. Geræ, near Pelusium, was but a small city, as Sozomen notes;⁵ yet it was a bishop's see. Theodoret observes the same of Dolicha, where Maris was bishop,⁶ that it was but a very little city, πολικὴ μικρά, he calls it: and he says the like of Cucusus⁷ in Armenia, the place whither Chrysostom was banished: yet as small a city as it was, Chrysostom⁸ found a bishop there, who treated him very civilly and respectfully in his exile. Synesius makes mention of the bishop of Olbia in one of his epistles,⁹ and at the same time tells us the place was but a village; for he calls the people δῆμος κομήτης, a country people. So he says in another epistle,¹⁰ that Hydrax and Palæbisea had for some time each of them their own bishop; though they were but villages of Pentapolis, formerly belonging to the diocese of Erythra, to which they were some time after annexed again. In Sozomen's time, among the Arabians and Cypri-ans, it was a usual thing to ordain bishops not only in cities but villages, as also among the Novatians and Montanists in Phrygia, all which he affirms¹¹ upon his own knowledge. Some think Dracontius was such a bishop, because Athanasius¹² styles his bishopric χώρας ἐπισκοπήν: but whether this means that he was an absolute bishop, or only a chorepiscopus, as others think, is not very easy to determine. As neither what kind of bishops those were which the council of Antioch,¹³ in their Synodical Epistle against Paulus Samosatensis, calls country bishops, for perhaps they might be only chorepiscopi, or dependent bishops, as Valesius conjectures. But this cannot be said of those mentioned by Sozomen, nor of the other instances I have given out of Synesius, and the rest of the forecited authors, from whose testimonies it plainly appears that there were bishops in very small cities, and sometimes in villages, notwithstanding the contrary decree of the Sardican council. It is also very observable, that in Asia Minor, a tract of land not much larger than the isle of Great Britain, (including but two dioceses of the Roman empire,) there were almost four hundred bishops, as appears from the ancient Notitia's of the church. Whence it may be collected, that Cucusus and Nazianzum were not the only small cities in those parts, but that there were many other cities and dioceses of no very great extent in such a number.

One thing that contributed much to the multiplication of bishoprics, and that caused them to be erected sometimes in small places, was, that in the primitive church every bishop, with the consent of his metropolitan, or the approbation of a provincial council, had power to divide his own diocese, and ordain a new bishop in some convenient part of it, for the good of the church, whenever he found his diocese too large, or the places to lie at too great a distance, or the multitude of converts to increase, and make the care and encumbrance of his diocese become too great a burden for him. This was the reason why St. Austin¹⁴ erected a new bishopric at Fussala,

¹ Con. Sardic. Can. 6. Μὴ ἰξεῖναι δὲ ἀπλῶς καὶ τῶν ἐπίσκοπον κώμῃ τινί, ἢ βραχέια πόλει.
² Concil. Laodic. c. 57. ³ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 11 et 26.
⁴ Naz. Orat. 19. de Laud. Patr. t. 1. p. 310.
⁵ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 19. πόλις μικρά. ⁶ Theod. lib. 5. c. 4.
⁷ Theod. lib. 2. c. 5. et lib. 5. c. 34.
⁸ Chrys. Ep. 125. ad Cyriacum. ⁹ Synes. Ep. 76.
¹⁰ Id. Ep. 67. Κώμαι δὲ ἀτὰρ πενταπόλεως.

¹¹ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 19. Ἔστιν ὅπη καὶ ἐν κόμαις ἐπίσκοποι ἱεροῦνται, ὡς παρὰ Ἀραβίους καὶ Κυπρίους ἐγγων, &c.
¹² Athanas. Epist. ad Dracont. t. 1. p. 954.
¹³ Ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30. Ἐπισκόπους τῶν ὁμόρων ἀγγρῶν τε καὶ πόλεων.
¹⁴ Augustin. Epist. 261. ad Cælestin. Quod ab Hippone memoratum castellum millibus quadraginta sejungitur, cum in eis regendis, et eorum reliquiis licet exiguis colligendis

a town in his own diocese, about forty miles from Hippo. It was a place where great numbers had been converted from the schism of the Donatists, and some remained to be converted still; but the place lying at so great a distance, he could not bestow that care and diligence, either in ruling the one, or regaining the other, which he thought necessary; and therefore he prevailed with the primate of Numidia, to come and ordain one Antonius to be bishop there. And this was consonant to the rules of the African church, which allowed new bishoprics to be erected¹⁵ in any diocese where there was need, if the bishop of the diocese and the primate gave their consent to it; or, as Ferrandus¹⁶ has it in his collection, if the bishop, the primate, and a provincial council, by their joint consent and authority, gave way to it. By virtue of these canons, during the time of the schism of the Donatists, many new bishoprics were erected in very small towns in Africa; as appears from the Acts of the Collation of Carthage, where the catholics and Donatists mutually charge each other with this practice; that they divided single bishoprics sometimes into three or four, and made bishops in country towns and villages to augment the numbers of their parties. Thus, in one place, we find Petilian the Donatist¹⁷ complaining, that the catholics had made four bishops in the diocese of Januarius, a Donatist bishop, to outdo them with numbers. And in another place, Alypius the catholic orders it to be entered¹⁸ upon record, that a great many Donatist bishops there mentioned, were not ordained in cities, but only in country towns, or villages. To which Petilian¹⁹ replies, that the catholics did the same; ordaining bishops in country towns, and sometimes in such places where they had no people: his meaning is, that in those places all the people were turned Donatists, and for that very reason the catholic bishops thought themselves obliged to divide their dioceses, and ordain new bishops in small towns; that they might outdo the Donatists, both in number and zeal, and more effectually labour in reducing the straying people back again to their ancient communion with the catholic church. This was the practice of Africa, and this their reason for erecting so many small bishoprics in those times of exigency: they had always an eye to the benefit and edification of the church.

Gregory Nazianzen highly commends St. Basil's piety and prudence for the like practice. It happened in his time, that Cappadocia was divided into two provinces, and Tyana made the metropolis of the second province, in the civil account: this gave occasion to Anthimus, bishop of Tyana, to lay claim to the rights of a metropolitan in the church; which St. Basil opposed, as injurious to his own church of Cæsarea, which, by ancient custom and prescription, had been the metropolis of the whole province. But Anthimus proving a very contentious adversary, and raising great disturbance and commotions about it, St. Basil was willing to buy the peace of the church with the loss of his own rights; so he voluntarily relinquished his jurisdiction over that part of Cappadocia, which Anthimus laid claim to: and, to compensate his own loss in some measure, he erected several new bishoprics in his own province; as, at Sasima, and some other such obscure places of that region. Now, though this was done contrary to the letter of a canon, yet Nazianzen extols the fact upon three accounts. First, because hereby a greater care was taken of men's souls.²⁰ Secondly, by this means every city had its own revenues. And lastly, the war between the two metropolitans was ended. This, he says, was an admirable policy, worthy the great and noble soul of St. Basil, who could turn a dispute so to the benefit of the church, and draw a considerable advantage out of a calamity, by making it an occasion to guard and defend his country with more bishops. Whence we may collect, that in Nazianzen's opinion, it is an advantage to the church to be well stocked with bishops; and that it is no dishonour to her to have bishops in small towns, when necessity and reason require it.

CHAPTER XIII.

OF THE RULE WHICH FORBIDS TWO BISHOPS TO BE ORDAINED IN ONE CITY.

ANOTHER rule generally observed in the church, was, that in one city there should be but one bishop, though it was large enough to admit of many

Sect. 1.
The general rule and practice of the church, to have but one bishop in a city.

—me viderem latius quam oportebat extendi, nec adhibendæ sufficerem diligentia, quam certissima ratione adhiberi debere cernebam, episcopum ibi ordinandum constituendumque curavi.

¹⁵ Concil. Carth. 2. c. 5. Si accedente tempore, crescente fide, Dei populus multiplicatus desideravit proprium habere rectorem, ejus videlicet voluntate, in cujus potestate est diocesis constituta, habeat episcopum. It. Con. Carth. 3. c. 42.

¹⁶ Ferrand. Breviar. Canon. c. 13. Ut episcopus non ordinetur in diocesi, quæ episcopum nunquam habuit, nisi cum voluntate episcopi ad quem ipsa diocesis pertinet, ex concilio tamen plenario et primatis auctoritate.

¹⁷ Collat. Carth. 1. c. 117. Petilianus episcopus dixit, In una plebe Januarii collegæ nostri præsentis, in una diocesi, quatuor sunt constituti contra ipsum; ut numerus scilicet augetur.

¹⁸ Ibid. c. 181. Alypius dixit, Scriptum sit istos omnes in villis vel in fundis esse episcopos ordinatos, non in aliquibus civitatibus.

¹⁹ Ibid. c. 182. Petilianus episcopus dixit: Sic etiam tu multos habes per omnes agros dispersos: imo crebros ubi habes, sane et sine populis habes.

²⁰ Naz. Orat. 20. de Laud. Basil. t. 1. p. 356.

presbyters. In the time of Cornelius, there were forty-six presbyters¹ in the church of Rome, seven deacons, as many sub-deacons, and ninety-four of the inferior orders of the clergy: and the body of the people, at a moderate computation, are reckoned by some² to be about fifty thousand; by others,³ to be a far greater number; yet there was but one bishop over all these. So that when Novatian got himself ordained bishop of Rome, in opposition to Cornelius, he was generally condemned over all the world, as transgressing the rule of the catholic church. Cyprian⁴ delivers it as a maxim upon this occasion; that there ought to be but one bishop in a church at a time, and one judge as the vicegerent of Christ. Therefore he says⁵ Novatian was no bishop, since there could not be a second after the first; but he was an adulterer,⁶ and a foreigner, and ambitious usurper of another man's church, who had been regularly ordained before him. And so he was told not only by Cyprian,⁷ but a whole African council at once; who, in return to Novatian's communicatory letter, which (according to custom) he wrote to them upon his ordination, sent him this plain and positive answer: That he was an alien; and that none of them could communicate with him, who had attempted to erect a profane altar, and set up an adulterous chair, and offer sacrilegious sacrifice against Cornelius the true bishop; who had been ordained by the approbation of God, and the suffrage of the clergy and people. There were, indeed, some confessors at Rome, who at first sided with Novatian: but Cyprian⁸ wrote a remonstrating letter to them, wherein he soberly laid before them the sinfulness of their practice. And his admonition wrought so effectually on some of the chief of them, that not long after they returned to Cornelius, and publicly confessed their fault in these words: We acknowledge our error; we have been imposed upon and deluded by treacherous and deceitful words; for though we seemed to communicate with a schismatical and heretical man, yet our mind was always sincerely in the church. For we are not ignorant,⁹ that as there is but one God, one Christ the Lord, and one Holy Spirit; so there ought to be but one bishop in a catholic church. Pamelius¹⁰ and others, who take this for a confession of the bishop of Rome's supremacy, betray either gross ignorance, or great partiality for a cause: for though this was spoken of a bishop of Rome, yet it was not peculiar to him, but the common case of bishops in all churches. Ignatius, and all the writers after him, who have said any thing of bishops, always speak of a single bishop in every church. And though Origen¹¹ seems to say otherwise, that there were two bishops in every church; yet, as he explains his own notion, his meaning is the same with all the rest: for he says, the one was visible, the other invisible; the one an angel, the other a man. So that his testimony (though there be something peculiar in his notion) is a further confirmation of the church's practice.

The writers of the following ages do so frequently mention the same thing, that it would be as tedious as it is needless to recite their testimonies.¹² Therefore I shall only add these two things: First, That the council of Nice repeats and confirms this ancient rule. For in the eighth canon, which speaks of the Novatian bishops that return to the catholic church, it is said, that any bishop may admit to officiate as presbyters in the city, or as chorepiscopi in the country, but not as city bishops, for this reason, ὥστε μὴ ἐν τῇ πόλει δύο ἐπίσκοποι ὄσιν, that there may not be two bishops in one city. Secondly, That in fact the people were generally possessed with the opinion of the absolute unlawfulness of having two bishops sit together: inasmuch that Theodoret tells us,¹³ when Constantius proposed to the Roman people to have Liberius and Felix sit as copartners, and govern the church in common, they unanimously agreed to reject the motion, crying out, One God, one Christ, one bishop.

Yet it must be observed, that as the great end and design of this rule was to prevent schism, and preserve the peace and unity of the church; so, on the other hand, when it mani-

Sect. 2.
Yet two bishops sometimes allowed, by compromise, to end a dispute, or cure an inveterate schism.

¹ Cornel. Ep. ad Fabium. ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

² Bishop Burnet, Letter 4. p. 207.

³ Basnag. Exerc. ad Annal. Baron. an. 44. p. 532.

⁴ Cypr. Epist. 55. al. 59. ad Cornel. p. 129. Unus in ecclesia ad tempus sacerdos, et ad tempus iudex vice Christi.

⁵ Id. Epist. 52. al. 55. ad Antonian. p. 104. Cum post primum secundus esse non possit, quisquis post unum, qui solus esse debeat, factus est, non jam secundus ille, sed nullus est.

⁶ Ibid. p. 112. Nisi si episcopus tibi videtur, qui episcopo in ecclesia a sedecim coepiscopis facto, adulter atque extraneus, episcopus fieri a desertoribus per ambitum nititur.

⁷ Cypr. Ep. 67. al. 68. ad Steph. p. 177. Se foris esse cœpisse, nec posse a quoquam nostrum sibi communicari; qui, episcopo Cornelio in catholica ecclesia de Dei iudicio, et cleri ac plebis suffragio ordinato, profanum altare erigere, adulteram cathedram collocare, et sacrilega contra verum sacerdotem sacrificia offerre tentaverit.

⁸ Cypr. Ep. 44. al. 46. ad Nicostrat. et Maxim.

⁹ Cornel. Ep. 46. al. 49. ad Cyprian. Nec enim ignoramus unum Deum esse, unum Christum Dominum, quem confessi sumus, unum Spiritum Sanctum, unum episcopum in catholica ecclesia esse debere.

¹⁰ Pamel. Not. in loc.

¹¹ Orig. Hom. 13. in Luc. Per singulas ecclesias bini sunt episcopi, alius visibilis, alius invisibilis. — Ego puto inveniri simul posse et angelum et hominem bonos (leg. binos) ecclesiæ episcopos.

¹² See Chrysost. Epist. 125. ad Cyriac. et Hom. 1. in Philip. Jerom. Epist. 4. ad Rustic. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. Com. in Tit. ii. Pseudo-Hieron. Com. in 1 Tim. iii. Hilar. Diac. Com. in Phil. i. 1. It. in 1 Cor. xii. 28. et in 1 Tim. iii. 12. Pacian. Ep. 3. ad Sempronian. Socrat. lib. 6. c. 22. Sozom. lib. 4. c. 14 et 15. Theod. lib. 3. c. 4.

¹³ Theod. lib. 2. c. 14.

festly appeared, that the allowing of two bishops in one city, in some certain circumstances and critical junctures, was the only way to put an end to some long and inveterate schism, in that case there were some catholic bishops, who were willing to take a partner into their throne, and share the episcopal power and dignity between them. Thus Meletius, bishop of Antioch, made the proposal to Paulinus his antagonist, who, though he was of the same faith, yet kept up a church divided in communion from him.¹⁴ I shall relate the proposal in the words of Theodoret.¹⁵ Meletius, says he, the meekest of men, thus friendly and mildly addressed himself to Paulinus: Forasmuch as the Lord hath committed to me the care of these sheep, and thou hast received the care of others, and all the sheep agree in one common faith, let us join our flocks, my friend, and dispute no longer about primacy and government: but let us feed the sheep in common, and bestow a common care upon them.¹⁶ And if it be the throne that creates the dispute, I will try to take away this cause also. We will lay the holy Gospel upon the seat, and then each of us take his place on either side of it. And if I die first, you shall take the government of the flock alone: but if it be your fate to die before me, then I will feed them according to my power. Thus spake the divine Meletius, says our author, lovingly and meekly; but Paulinus would not acquiesce, nor hearken to him.

We meet with another such proposal made to the Donatist bishops, by all the catholic bishops of Africa assembled together, at the opening of the famous conference of Carthage. There they offered them freely before the conference began, that if they would return to the unity and communion of the church, upon due conviction, they should retain their episcopal honour and dignity still:¹⁶ and because this could not be done, as the circumstances and case of the church then were, without allowing two bishops for some time to be in the same city, it was further proposed, that every catholic bishop should take the other to be his copartner, and share the honour with him; allowing him to sit with him in his own chair, as was usual for bishops to treat their fellow bishops that were strangers; and also granting him a church of his own, where he might be capable of returning him the like civility: that so they might pay mutual respect and honour to each other, and take their turns to sit highest in the church, till such times as one of them should die; and then the right of succession should be always in a single bishop, as it was before. And this, they say, was no new thing in Africa: for, from the beginning of the schism, they that would recant their error, and condemn their separation, and return to the unity of the church, were by the charity of catholics always treated in the same courteous manner. From hence it is plain, that this had been the practice of Africa for above one whole century; and the present bishops proposed to follow the example of their predecessors, in making this concession to the Donatists, in order to close up and heal the divisions of the church. But they add, that forasmuch as this method might not be acceptable to all Christian people, who would be much better pleased to see only a single bishop in every church, and, perhaps, would not endure the partnership of two, which was an unusual thing; they therefore proposed, in this case, that both the bishops should freely resign, and suffer a single bishop to be chosen by such bishops as were singly possessed of other churches. So that at once they testify both what was the usual and ordinary rule of the church, to have but one bishop in a city, and also how far they were willing to have receded, in order to establish the peace and unity of the church in that extraordinary juncture. I have been the more easily tempted to recite this passage at large, not only because it is a full proof of all that has been asserted in this chapter, but because it gives us such an instance of a noble, self-denying zeal and charity, as is scarce to be paralleled in any history; and shows us the admirable spirit of those holy bishops, among whom St. Austin was a leader.

Some very learned persons¹⁷ are further of opinion, that this rule about one bishop in a city, did not take place in the apostolical age: for they think that, before the perfect incorporation and coalition of the Jews and Gentiles into one body, there were two bishops in many cities, one of

¹⁴ Theod. lib. 5. c. 3.

¹⁵ Εἰ δὲ ὁ μέσος θάκος τῶν ἔριων γενεῖ, ἐγὼ καὶ ταύτην ἔξελάσαι πειράσομαι· ἐν γὰρ τούτῳ τὸ θεῖον προτεθεικῶς εὐαγγέλιον, ἐκατέρωθεν ἡμᾶς καθῆσθαι παρεγγύω.

¹⁶ Collat. Carth. l. die, c. 16. Sic nobiscum teneant unitatem, ut non solum viam salutis inveniant, sed nec honorem episcopatus amittant.——Poterit quippe unusquisque nostrum, honoris sibi episco copulato, vicissim sedere eminentius, sicut peregrino socio juxta consistente collega. Hoc cum alternis Basilicis utrisque conceditur, uterque ab alterutro honore mutuo prævenitur: quia ubi præceptio charitatis dilataverit corda, possessio pacis non fit angusta, ut uno eorum defuncto, deinceps jam singuli singuli, pristino more, succedant. Nec novum aliquid fiet: nam hoc ab ipsius separationis exordio, in eis qui damnato nefariæ discessionis errore, unitatis dulcedinem vel sero sapuerunt, catholica dilectio custodivit. Aut si forte Christiani populi singulis delectantur episcopis, et duorum consortium, inusitata rerum facie, tolerare non possunt: utrique de medio secedamus; et ecclesiis in singulis, damnata schismatis causa, in unitate pacifica constitutis, ab his qui singuli in ecclesiis singulis inveniuntur, unitati factæ per longa necessaria singuli constituentur episcopi.

¹⁷ Pearson, Vind. Ignat. par. 2. c. 13. p. 414. Hammond, Dissert. 5. adv. Blondel, c. 1.

Sect. 3.
The opinions of learned men concerning two bishops in a city in the apostolic age, one of the Jews, and the other of the Gentiles.

the Jews, and another of the Gentiles. Thus they think it was at Antioch, where Euodius and Ignatius are said to be bishops ordained by the apostles; as also Linus and Clemens at Rome, the one ordained by St. Peter bishop of the Jews, and the other by St. Paul bishop of the Gentiles. Epiphanius seems to have been of this opinion; for he says,¹⁸ Peter and Paul were the first bishops of Rome: and he makes it a question whether they did not ordain two other bishops to supply their places in their absence. In another place¹⁹ he takes occasion to say, that Alexandria never had two bishops, as other churches had: which observation, Bishop Pearson thinks, ought to be extended to the apostolical ages; as implying that St. Mark, being the only preacher of the gospel at Alexandria, left but one bishop his successor, but in other churches sometimes two apostles gathered churches, and each of them left a bishop in his place. Yet this does not satisfy other learned persons,²⁰ who are of a different judgment, and think that though the apostles had occasion to ordain two bishops in some cities, yet it was not upon the account of different churches of Jews and Gentiles, but in the ordinary way of succession: as Ignatius was ordained at Antioch after the death of Euodius, and Clemens at Rome after the death of Linus. I shall not pretend to determine on which side the right lies in so nice a dispute,²¹ but leave it to the judicious reader, and only say, that if the former opinion prevails, it proves another exception to the common rule of having but one bishop in a city; or rather shows what was the practice of the church before the rule was made.

To these we may add a third exception in a case that is more plain, which was that of the coadjutors. These were such bishops as were ordained to assist some other bishops in case of infirmity or old age, and were to be subordinate to them as long as they lived, and succeed them when they died. Thus, when Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem, was disabled by reason of his great age, (being a hundred and twenty years old,) Alexander was made his coadjutor. Eusebius²² and St. Jerom both say it was done by revelation; but they do not mean, that Narcissus needed a revelation to authorize him to take a coadjutor, but only to point out to him that particular man: for Alexander was a stranger, and a bishop already in another country, so that without a revelation he could not have been judged qualified for this office; but being once declared to be so, there was no scruple upon any other account, but by the unanimous consent²³ of all the bishops in Palestine, he was chosen to take part with Narcissus in the care and government of the church. Valesius²⁴ reckons this the first instance of any coadjutor to be met with in ancient history, but there are several examples in the following ages. Theotecnus, bishop of Cæsarea, made Anatolius his coadjutor, designing him to be his successor, so that for some time they²⁵ both governed the same church together. Maximus²⁶ is said by Sozomen to be bishop of Jerusalem together with Macarius. Orion, bishop of Palæbiscæ, being grown old, ordained Siderius his coadjutor and successor, as Synesius²⁷ informs us. So Theodoret²⁸ takes notice that John, bishop of Apamea, had one Stephen for his colleague. And St. Ambrose²⁹ mentions one Senecio, who was coadjutor to Bassus. In the same manner Gregory Nazianzen was bishop of Nazianzum together with his aged father. Baronius indeed³⁰ denies that ever he was bishop of Nazianzum, but St. Jerom³¹ and all the ancient historians, Socrates,³² Sozomen,³³ Ruffin,³⁴ and Theodoret³⁵ expressly assert it; though some of them mistake in calling him his father's successor: for he was no otherwise bishop of Nazianzum, but only as his father's coadjutor. He entered upon the office with this protestation, that he would not be obliged to continue bishop there any longer than his father lived, as he himself acquaints us in his own Life,³⁶ and other places; so that after his father's death he actually resigned, and getting Eulalius to be ordained in his room, he betook himself to a private life.³⁷ All which evidently proves that he was not his father's successor, but only his coadjutor. I will but add one instance more of this nature, which is the known case of St. Austin, who was ordained bishop of Hippo whilst Valerius was living, and sat with him³⁸ for some time as his coadjutor; which he did by the consent of the primate ¹⁸ Epiphanius. Hæc. 27. Carpocrat. n. 6.

¹⁹ Idem, Hæc. 68. Meletian. n. 6.

²⁰ Cotelier. Not. in Constitut. Apost. lib. 7. c. 46.

²¹ Bishop Pearson himself altered his opinion. See his Dissert. 2. de Successione Rom. Pontif. c. 3.

²² Euseb. lib. 6. c. 11.

²³ Hieron. de Script. Eccl. in Alexandro. Cunctis in Palæstina episcopis in unum congregatis, adnidente quoque ipso vel maxime Narcisso. Hierosolymitanæ ecclesiæ cum eo gubernaculum suscepit.

²⁴ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 6. c. 11.

²⁵ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 32. ἀμφω τῆς αὐτῆς προούστησαν ἐκκλησίας.

²⁶ Sozom. lib. 2. c. 20.

²⁷ Synes. Ep. 67.

²⁸ Theod. lib. 5. c. 4.

²⁹ Ambr. 79. ad Theophil. Fratri nostro et coepiscopo Basso in consortium regendæ ecclesiæ datus est Senecio.

³⁰ Baron. an. 371. n. 106.

³¹ Hieron. de Script. Eccl. Gregorius primum Sasimorum, deinde Nazianzenus episcopus, &c.

³² Socrat. lib. 4. c. 26.

³³ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 8.

³⁴ Ruffin. lib. 2. c. 9.

³⁵ Theodor. lib. 5. c. 8.

³⁶ Naz. Carm. de Vita sua. It. Orat. 8. ad Patr.

³⁷ Naz. Ep. 42. ad Greg. Nyss.

³⁸ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 8. Paulin. Ep. 46. ad Român. Aug. Ep. 31 et 110.

of Carthage, and the primate of Numidia, who ordained him. Possidius says, he had some scruple upon him at first, because he looked upon it as contrary to the custom of the church; but being told that it was a thing commonly practised both in the African and transmarine churches, he yielded with some reluctancy to be ordained. These instances are evident proof, that it was not thought contrary to the true sense of the canon, in case of infirmity or old age, to have coadjutors in the church: though, it is true, St. Austin was of opinion that his own ordination was not regular, when afterward he came to know the Nicene canon, which he did not know before; and for this reason he would not ordain²⁹ Eradius bishop whilst he himself lived, though he had nominated him with the consent of the church to be his successor. But all men did not understand the canon in this strict and rigorous sense that St. Austin did, as absolutely forbidding two bishops to be in a church at the same time in all cases whatsoever, but only when there was no just reason, and the necessities of the church did not require it: but if there was a reasonable cause to have more bishops than one, as when a bishop was unable to execute his office, or in any the like case, the canon did not oblige, as appears from the instances that have been mentioned, and several others that might be added to them.

CHAPTER XIV.

OF THE CHOREPISCOPI, ΠΕΡΙΟΔΕΥΤΑΙ, AND SUFRAGAN BISHOPS: AND HOW THESE DIFFERED FROM ONE ANOTHER.

Sect. 1.
Of the reason of the name chorepiscopi, and the mistake of some about it. As the bishops, when they were disabled by old age or infirmity, ordained themselves coadjutors in the city; so, when their dioceses were enlarged by the conversion of pagans in the country and villages at a great distance from the city church, they created themselves another sort of assistants in the country, whom they called chorepiscopi; who were so named, not because they were ex choro sacerdotum, as a Latin writer¹ by mistake derives the word, but because they were τῆς χώρας ἐπίσκοποι, country bishops, as the word properly signifies, and not presbyters of the city regions, as Salmasius understands it.

Now, though the name does in some measure determine their quality, yet Sect. 2.
Three different opinions about the nature of this order: 1st. That they were mere presbyters. great dispute has been among learned men concerning the nature of this order. Among the schoolmen and canonists, it is a received opinion, that they were only presbyters; as may be seen in Turrian,² Estius,³ Antonius Augustinus,⁴ and Gratian,⁵ who are followed not only by Salmasius,⁶ but by Spalatensis,⁷ Dr. Field,⁸ and Dr. Forbes,⁹ the last of which brings several arguments to prove that they were mere presbyters, and never had any episcopal ordination.

Others think there were two sorts Sect. 3.
A 2nd opinion, that some of them were presbyters, and some of them bishops. of chorepiscopi, some that had episcopal ordination, and others that were simple presbyters: which is the opinion of Cabassutius,¹⁰ Peter de Marca¹¹ and Bellarm.¹² They allow that in some cases it happened that the chorepiscopi were bishops, because they were ordained bishops before they were made chorepiscopi. And thus much is certainly true: for in the primitive church, sometimes bishops were ordained to a place, but not received, either through the perverseness of the people, or by reason of persecution, or the like cause: and such bishops (whom the ancient writers¹³ and canons term σχολαῖοι and σχολάζοντες ἐπίσκοποι, vacant bishops) not being permitted to officiate in their own church, were admitted to act as chorepiscopi under any other bishop that would entertain them. The council of Nice¹⁴ made the like provision for such of the Novatian bishops as would return to the catholic church; that the bishop of the place should admit them either to the office of a city presbyter, or a chorepiscopus; that there might not be two bishops in one city. And so it was determined likewise by the same council¹⁵ in the case of the Meletian bishops, that upon their return to the unity of the church, they should be allowed to officiate in subordination to the bishops of the catholic church. Now, it is plain that all such chorepiscopi as these were properly bishops, because they were originally ordained bishops before they came to act in the quality of country bishops under others. But for all the rest, De Marca thinks they were only presbyters.

²⁹ Aug. Ep. 110. Quod reprehensum est in me, nolo reprehendi in filio meo. Erit presbyter ut est, quando Deus voluerit futurus episcopus.

¹ Raban. Maur. de Instit. Sacerd. lib. 1. c. 5. Salmas. de Primat. c. 1.

² Turrian. Not. in can. 54. Con. Nic. Arabic.

³ Est. in 4. Sent. dist. 21. sect. 39.

⁴ Ant. August. Epit. Jur. Can. lib. 6. tit. 1. c. 8, 11, 13.

⁵ Grat. Dist. 6. c. 4, 5. ⁶ Walo Messalin. c. 5. p. 315.

⁷ Spalat. de Repub. par. 1. lib. 2. c. 9. n. 17, 18, 19.

⁸ Field, of the Church, lib. 5. c. 29.

⁹ Forb. Iren. lib. 2. c. 11. prop. 14. p. 249.

¹⁰ Cabassut. Notit. Concil. c. 8. p. 45.

¹¹ Pet. de Marca, de Concord. lib. 2. c. 13.

¹² Bellarm. de Cleric. lib. 1. c. 17.

¹³ Socrat. H. E. lib. 4. c. 7. Conc. Antioch. can. 16.

¹⁴ Conc. Nic. can. 8.

¹⁵ Conc. Nic. Ep. Synod. ap. Socrat. II. E. lib. 1. c. 9.

Both these opinions (which differ little from one another) are rejected by Bishop Barlow,¹⁶ Dr. Hammond,¹⁷ Dr. Beverege,¹⁸ Dr. Cave,¹⁹ and even by Mr. Blondel²⁰ himself, who, though by some reckoned among those of the contrary opinion, has a long dissertation against De Marca, to prove that all the chorepiscopi mentioned in the ancient councils were properly bishops. And there needs no fuller proof of this than what Athanasius says in his Second Apology, where he puts a manifest distinction betwixt presbyters and the chorepiscopi. For speaking of the irregular promotion of Ischyras, who was made bishop of the region of Mareotis by the Eusebian faction, he says, Mareotis was only a region of Alexandria, and that all the churches of that precinct were immediately subject to the bishop of Alexandria, and never had either bishop or *chorepiscopus*²¹ among them, but only presbyters fixed each in their respective villages or churches. This, as Blondel²² well observes, shows evidently that the chorepiscopi were not the same with presbyters, however the forger of the Decretal Epistles, under the name of Pope Leo and Damasus, would have persuaded the world to believe so.

But why then does the council of Neocæsarea²³ say that the chorepiscopi were only an imitation of the seventy? I answer, because they were subject to the city bishops, as the seventy elders were subject to Moses, or the seventy disciples to the apostles. For whatever the council means by the seventy, it cannot be proved thence that the chorepiscopi were mere presbyters.

But it is said, that they could not be bishops, because the ordination of bishops was to be performed by three bishops, with the consent of the metropolitan and the provincial bishops; whereas the council of Antioch²⁴ says, that a chorepiscopus was ordained by one bishop only, the bishop of the city to whose jurisdiction he belonged. To this the reply is easy, that this was one principal difference between the city bishops and country bishops, who differed both in the manner of their ordination, and in their power; for the one was subordinate to the other. Therefore, those canons which require three bishops to impose hands in the ordination of a bishop, speak only of such bishops as were to be absolute and supreme governors of their own diocese, and not of such who were subordinate to them, whom the city bishops might ordain at their own discretion, yet so as to stand accountable to a provincial synod.

The office of these chorepiscopi was, to preside over the country clergy, and inquire into their behaviour, and make report thereof to the city bishop; as also to provide fit persons for the inferior service and ministry of the church. And to give them some authority, they had certain privileges conferred on them. As, 1. They might ordain readers, subdeacons, and exorcists for the use of the country churches. St. Basil²⁵ requires of his chorepiscopi, that they should first acquaint him with the qualification of such persons, and take his licence to ordain them. But the council of Antioch²⁶ gives them a general commission to ordain all under presbyters and deacons, without consulting the city bishop upon every such promotion. And for presbyters and deacons, they might ordain them too, but not δίχα τοῦ ἐν τῇ πόλει ἐπισκόπου, without the special leave of the city bishop, under whose jurisdiction both they and the country were. And this is the meaning of the council of Ancyra,²⁷ which says, the chorepiscopi shall not have power to ordain presbyters or deacons: which we must interpret by the explication given in the council of Antioch, that they should not be authorized to do it without the particular direction of the city bishop, but by his leave they might.

2. They had power to minister confirmation to such as were newly baptized in country churches. This is expressly provided by the council of Riez²⁸ in the case of Armentarius, whom they reduced to the quality of a chorepiscopus, but still allowed him the privilege of confirming neophytes; which argues that confirmation might then be administered by the hands of the chorepiscopi in country churches.

3. They had power to grant letters dimissory, or, as they were otherwise called, canonical and irenical letters, to the country clergy, who desired to remove from one diocese to another. Thus I understand that canon of the council of Antioch²⁹ which says, Country presbyters shall not grant canonical letters, κανονικὰς ἐπιστολάς, or send letters to any neighbouring bishop; but the chorepiscopi may grant ειρηνικὰς, letters dimissory, or letters of peace.

Sect. 4.
The 3rd opinion, that they were all bishops, the most probable.

Sect. 5.
Some objections against this answer.

¹⁶ Barlow's Letter to Bishop Usher, in Ush. Let. 222. p. 520.

¹⁷ Ham. Dissert. 3. cont. Blondel, c. 8.

¹⁸ Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2. Not. in Conc. Ancy. can. 13.

¹⁹ Cave, Prim. Christ. par. 1. c. 8. p. 224.

²⁰ Blondel, Apol. p. 95, &c.

²¹ Athan. Apol. 2. t. 1. p. 802.

²² Blondel, Apol. p. 127. Non unum cum presbyteri chorepiscopus fuisse, aut eandem formam gestasse, prout decretalium suppositori somniare visum est.

²³ Conc. Neocæsar. can. 14. χωρεπίσκοποι εἰσι μὲν εἰς τύπον τῶν ἰερωμένων.

²⁴ Concil. Antioch. can. 10.

²⁵ Basil. Epist. 181.

²⁶ Conc. Antioch. can. 10.

²⁷ Conc. Ancy. can. 13.

²⁸ Conc. Reiens. c. 3.

²⁹ Conc. Antioch. can. 8.

Sect. 6.
The chorepiscopi allowed to ordain the inferior clergy, but not presbyters or deacons, without special licence from the city bishop.

Sect. 7.
They had power to confirm.

Sect. 8.
And power to grant letters dimissory to the clergy.

Sect. 9.
They had power to officiate in the presence of the city bishop.

4. They had liberty to officiate in the city church, in the presence of the bishop and presbyters of the city, which country presbyters had not. For so the council of Neocæsarea determined in two canons to this purpose:³⁰ "The country presbyters shall not offer the oblation, nor distribute the bread and wine in time of prayer in the city church, when the bishop and presbyters are present: but the country bishops, being in imitation of the seventy, as fellow labourers, for their care of the poor, are admitted to offer."

5. They had the privilege of sitting and voting in synods and councils: of which there are several instances still remaining in the acts of the ancient councils. In the first Nicene council³¹ Palladius and Seleucius subscribe themselves chorepiscopi of the province of Cœlosyria: Eudæmon, chorepiscopus of the province of Cilicia: Gorgonius, Stephanus, Euphronius, Rhodon, Theophanes, chorepiscopi of the province of Cappadocia: Hesy chius, Theodore, Anatolius, Quintus, Aquila, chorepiscopi of the province of Isauria: Theustinus and Eulalius, of the province of Bithynia. So again in the council of Neocæsarea,³² Stephanus and Rudus, or Rhodon, two of the same that were in the council of Nice, subscribed themselves chorepiscopi of the province of Cappadocia. And in the council of Ephesus,³³ Cæsarius, chorepiscopus of Alce.

But here I must observe, that the power and privileges of the chorepiscopi varied much, according to the difference of times and places. For when the synod of Riez, in France, anno 439, had deposed Armentarius from his bishopric, because he was uncanonically ordained, they allowed him the privilege of being a chorepiscopus, after the example of the Nicene fathers, but limited him as to the exercise of his power. For though they gave him authority to confirm neophytes, and consecrate virgins, and celebrate the eucharist in any country church with preference to any presbyter of the region; yet, first, They denied him the privilege of consecrating the eucharist in the city church,³⁴ which, by the thirteenth canon of the council of Neocæsarea, was allowed to other chorepiscopi. Secondly, They confined him to a single church in the exercise of his chorepiscopal power; whereas others had power over a whole region. Thirdly, They forbade him to ordain any of the inferior clergy even in his own church, which other chorepiscopi were allowed to do by the thirteenth canon of the council of Ancyra. And hence it appears, that, as their power was precarious, and depending upon the will of councils and city bishops, from whom they received it; so by this time their authority began to sink apace in the church.

The council of Laodicea gave them the first blow, anno 360. For there it was decreed,³⁵ that for the future no bishops should be placed in country villages, but only περιοδευται, itinerant or visiting presbyters; and for such bishops as were already constituted, they should do nothing without the consent and direction of the city bishop. In the council of Chalcedon we meet with some such presbyters expressly styled περιοδευται, as Alexander³⁶ and Valentinus,³⁷ each of which has the title of presbyter and περιοδευτης. And so in the fifth general council at Constantinople,³⁸ one Sergius, a presbyter, has the same title of περιοδευτης, curator or visitor of the Syrian churches: yet still the order of the chorepiscopi was preserved in many places. For not only mention is made of them by Gregory Nazianzen and St. Basil³⁹ in the fourth century, but also by Theodoret,⁴⁰ who speaks of Hypatius and Abramius, his own chorepiscopi; and in the council of Chalcedon, in the fifth century, we find the chorepiscopi sitting and subscribing in the name of the bishops that sent them. But this was some diminution of their power; for in former councils they subscribed in their own names, as learned men⁴¹ agree: but now their power was sinking, and it went on to decay and dwindle by degrees, till at last, in the ninth century, when the forged Decretals were set on foot, it was pretended that they were not true bishops, and so the order, by the pope's tyranny, came to be laid aside in the western church.

Some attempt was made in England, at the beginning of the Reformation, to restore these under the name of suffragan bishops. For as our Histories inform us,⁴² by an act of the 26th of Henry VIII., anno 1534, several towns were appointed for suffragan sees, viz. Thetford, Ipswich, Colchester, Dover, Guildford, Southampton, Taunton, Shaftesbury, Molton, Marlborough, Bedford, Leicester, Gloucester, Shrewsbury, Bristol, Penrith, Bridgewater, Nottingham, Grantham, Hull, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Penrith, Berwick, St. Germans in Cornwall, and the Isle of Wight. These suffragans were to be consecrated by the archbishop

Sect. 12.
Their power first struck at by the council of Laodicea, which set up περιοδευται in their room.

Sect. 11.
The power of the chorepiscopi not the same in all times and places.

Sect. 13.
Of the attempt to restore the chorepiscopi in England, under the name of suffragan bishops

³⁰ Con. Neocæs. can. 13 et 14.

³¹ Con. Nic. 1. in Subscription.

³² Con. Neocæs. in Subscription.

³³ Con. Ephes. Act. 1.

³⁴ Conc. Reiens. can. 3.

³⁵ Con. Laod. can. 57.

³⁶ Con. Chalced. Act. 4.

³⁷ Ibid. Act. 10.

³⁸ Con. CP. sub Menna, Act. 1. p. 563.

³⁹ Nazian. Ep. 88. Theodoro. Basil. Ep. 181.

⁴⁰ Theod. Ep. 113. ad Leon.

⁴¹ Blondel, Apol. p. 113. Bevereg. Not. in Con. Ancyra. c. 13.

⁴² Burnet, Hist. of Reformation. vol. 1. p. 157.

and two other bishops, and by the act to have the same episcopal power as suffragans formerly had within this realm: but none of them either to have or act any thing properly episcopal, without the consent and permission of the bishop of the city, in whose diocese he was placed and constituted. Now, any one that compares this with the account that I have given of the ancient chorepiscopi, will easily perceive that these suffragans were much of the same nature with them. But then I must observe, that this was a new name for them: for anciently suffra-

Sect. 14.
Suffragan bishops different from the chorepiscopi in the primitive church.

gan bishops were all the city bishops of any province under a metropolitan, who were called his suffragans, because they met at his command to give their suffrage, counsel, or advice in a provincial synod. And in this sense the word was used in England at the time when Linwood wrote his Provinciale, which was not above a hundred years before the Reformation, anno 1430. In his comment upon one of the constitutions of John Peckham, archbishop of Canterbury, which begins with these words, Omnibus et singulis coepiscopis suffraganeis nostris, To all and singular our fellow bishops and suffragans, upon the word suffragans he has this note:⁴³ "They were called suffragans, because they were bound to give their suffrage and assistance to the archbishop, being summoned to take part in his care, though not in the plenitude of his power." Whence it is plain, that in his time suffragan bishops did not signify chorepiscopi, or rural bishops, but all the bishops of England, under their archbishops or metropolitans. Thus it was also in other churches: the seventy bishops who were immediately subject to the bishop of Rome, as their primate or metropolitan, were called his suffragans, because they were frequently called to his synods; as the reason of the name is given in an ancient Vatican MS. cited by Baronius.⁴⁴

And here it will not be amiss to observe, whilst we are speaking of suffragan bishops, that these seventy bishops, who were suffragans to the bishop of Rome, were by a peculiar technical name called libra; which name was given them for no other reason, but because of their number seventy. For the Roman libra, as antiquaries⁴⁵ note, consisted of seventy solidi, or so many parts; and therefore the number seventy in any other things, or persons, thence took the name of libra: as the seventy witnesses which are introduced deposing

Sect. 15.
The suffragan bishops of the Roman province called by a technical name, libra.

against Marcellinus, in the council of Sinuessa, that they saw him sacrifice, are by the author of those acts⁴⁶ termed libra occidua, for no other reason, as Baronius⁴⁷ conceives, but because they were seventy in number. And Grotius⁴⁸ gives the same reason for affixing this title on the seventy bishops, who were assessors or suffragans to the bishop of Rome; they were, as one might say, his libra, or ordinary provincial council.

CHAPTER XV.

OF THE INTERCESSORES AND INTERVENTORES IN THE AFRICAN CHURCHES.

THERE is one appellation more given to some bishops in the African councils, which must here be taken notice of, whilst we are speaking of bishops; which is the name intercessor and interventor; a title given to some bishops upon the account of a pro-tempore office which was sometimes committed to them. In the African churches, and perhaps in others also, upon the vacancy of a bishopric, it was usual for the primate to appoint one of the provincial bishops to be a sort of procurator of the diocese, partly to take care of the vacant see, and partly to promote and procure the speedy election of a new bishop. And from this he had the name of intercessor and interventor.

Sect. 1.
Why some bishops called intercessors in the African churches.

The design of this office was manifestly to promote the good of the church; but it was liable to be abused two ways. For the intercessor by this means had a fair opportunity given to ingratiate himself with the people, and promote his own interest among them, instead of that of the church; either by keeping the see void longer than was necessary; or, if it was a wealthier or more honourable place than his own, by getting himself chosen into it. To obviate any such designs, the African fathers in the fifth council of Carthage made a decree, that no intercessor should continue in his office for above a year; but if he did not procure a new bishop to be chosen within that time, another intercessor should be sent in his room: and the more effectually to cut off all abuses, and prevent corruption, they enacted it also

Sect. 2.
The office of an intercessor not to last above a year.

⁴³ Linwood, Provinc. lib. 1. tit. 2. c. 1. Suffraganeis. Sic dietis, quia archiepiscopo suffragari et assistere tenentur, &c.

⁴⁴ Baron. an. 1057. n. 23. Præter septem collaterales episcopos erant alii episcopi, qui dicuntur suffraganei Romani pontificis, nulli alii primati vel archiepiscopo subjecti, qui, frequenter ad synodos vocarentur.

⁴⁵ Brerewood de Ponder. et Pret. c. 15.

⁴⁶ Concil. Sinuess. ap. Crab. t. 1. p. 190. Hi omnes electi sunt viri, libra occidua, qui testimonium perhibent, videntes Marcellinum thurificasse.

⁴⁷ Baron. an. 302. n. 92.

⁴⁸ Grot. in Luc. x. 1. Romanis episcopis jam olim 70 episcopi ad assessores libra dicti, quod libra Romana tot solidos contineret.

Sect. 3.
No intercessor to be made bishop of the place where he was constituted intercessor.

into a law,⁴⁹ that no intercessor should be capable of succeeding himself in the vacant see, whatever motions or solicitations were made by the people in his behalf. So extremely cautious were these holy African fathers to prevent abuses in matters of this nature.

CHAPTER XVI.

OF PRIMATES, OR METROPOLITANS.

Sect. 1.
Some derive the original of metropolitans from apostolical constitution.

THE same reasons which first brought in chorepiscopi and coadjutors, as subordinate to bishops in every city church, made the bishops of every province think it necessary to make one of themselves superior to all the rest, and invest him with certain powers and privileges for the good of the whole, whom they therefore named their primate, or metropolitan, that is, the principal bishop of the province. Bishop Usher¹ derives the origin of this settlement from apostolical constitution. So also Bishop Beverege,² Dr. Hammond,³ Peter de Marca, and some others. And there are several passages in Eusebius and Chrysostom which seem to favour this. For Eusebius says,⁴ Titus had the superintendency of all the churches in Crete: and Chrysostom in like manner,⁵ that the apostle committed to him the whole island, and gave him power to censure all the bishops therein. He says the same of Timothy,⁶ that he was intrusted with the government of the church in the whole region or province of Asia. And it is certain the Cyprian bishops, in the council of Ephesus,⁷ pleaded the privileges of their metropolitan to be as ancient as the apostles.

Sect. 2.
Others, from the age next after the apostles.

But it may be doubted, whether the apostles made any such general settlement of metropolitans in every province; and the records of the original of most churches being lost, it cannot be certainly proved they did. De Marca⁸ thinks, that though the apostles gave a model or specimen in Timothy and Titus, yet they left it to following ages to finish and complete it. Dr. Cave says⁹ it commenced not long after the apostolic age, when sects and schisms began to break in apace, and controversies multiplying between particular bishops, it was found necessary to pitch upon one in every province, to whom the umpirage of cases might be referred, and by whom all common and public affairs might be directed. Perhaps it took its rise from that common respect and deference, which was usually paid by the rest of the bishops, to the bishop of the civil metropolis in every province; which advancing into a custom, was afterward made into a canon by the council of Nice.

This is certain, that the Nicene council speaks of metropolitans as settled by ancient custom long before, when it ushers in the canon about them with, Ἀρχαία ἔθνη κρατεῖτω, Let ancient customs be continued,¹⁰ and then goes on to speak of the custom in Egypt, which was for the bishop of Alexandria to have power over all the churches of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; which was metropolitical, if not patriarchal, power. Epiphanius¹¹ mentions the same: speaking of Alexander and Peter, bishops of Alexandria, before the council of Nice, he says, they had ἐκκλησιαστικὴν διοίκησιν, the administration of ecclesiastical affairs throughout all Egypt, Thebais, Mareotes, Libya, Ammoniac, Mareotis, and Pentapolis. And Athanasius,¹² speaking of Dionysius, who was bishop of Alexandria above sixty years before this council, says, he also enjoyed this power, having the care of the churches of Pentapolis and Libya, when Sabellius broached his heresy, and that he wrote letters of admonition to several bishops of those parts, who began to be infected with his heresy. These are undeniable evidences that the bishops of Alexandria were not first invested with metropolitical power by the council of Nice, but only confirmed in those rights which, by ancient custom and prescription, they had long enjoyed. And this was also the case of other churches.

The council of Eliberis in Spain¹³ speaks of a primæ cathedræ episcopus, a primate or bishop of the first see; and those called the Apostles' Canons (which were the Canons of the Greek church in the third century) mention a πρωτος, or chief bishop, in every province, whom the rest were to look upon as their head,¹⁴ and do nothing without him. And it appears from several of Cyprian's epistles,¹⁵ that ⁴⁹ Con. Carth. 5. can. 8. Placuit, ut nulli intercessori licitum sit, cathedram cui intercessor datus est, quibuslibet populorum studiis, vel seditionibus retinere: sed dare operam, ut intra annum eisdem episcopum provideat. Quod si neglexerit, anno expleto, interventor alius tribuatur.

¹ Usser. de Orig. Episc. et Metrop.

² Beverege. Cod. Can. Vind. lib. 2. c. 5. n. 12.

³ Ham. Pref. to Titus. It. Dissert. 4. cont. Blondel, c. 5.

⁴ Euseb. H. E. lib. 3. c. 4. τῶν ἐπὶ Κρήτης ἐκκλησιῶν ἐπισκοπήν ἐιληχέναι.

⁵ Chrys. Hom. 1. in Tit. νήσον ὀλόκληρον—καὶ τοσοῦτον ἐπισκόπων κρίσιν ἐπέτρεψεν.

⁷ Con. Ephes. Act. 7.

⁸ Marca de Concord. lib. 6. c. 1. n. 9.

⁹ Cave, Anc. Ch. Gov. p. 92.

¹⁰ Con. Nicen. can. 6.

¹¹ Epiphani. Hær. 68. n. 1. et Hær. 69. n. 3.

¹² Athan. de Sentent. Dionys. t. 1. p. 552.

¹³ Con. Eliber. an. 305. can. 58.

¹⁴ Can. Apost. c. 23.

¹⁵ Cypr. Ep. 42. ad Corneli. Per provinciam nostram the bishop of Carthage had a presidency over all the other African bishops, and power to send his mandates among them. And St. Austin speaks of the primate of Numidia, as well as the primate of Carthage, before the schism of the Donatists, and says, they gave that for one reason of their schism,¹⁶ that the primate of Numidia was not called to elect and consecrate the primate of Carthage. And therefore, as both the same St. Austin¹⁷ and Optatus¹⁸ take notice, the Donatists pretending that the ordination of Cæcilian, bishop of Carthage, was not valid, because not performed by a primate, sent for Secundus Tigitanus, who was then primate of Numidia, to ordain Majorinus in his room. Now, as all this was transacted several years before the council of Nice, so it proves that primates were in Africa antecedent to the establishment of that council.

If we ascend higher yet, and look into the second century, there are some footsteps of the same power, though not so evident as the former. Lyons, in France, was a metropolis in the said account, and Irenæus, who was bishop of it, is said to have the superintendency of the Gallican paræciæ, or dioceses, as Eusebius¹⁹ words it. Philip, bishop of Gortyna, in Crete, is styled, by Dionysius²⁰ of Corinth, bishop of all the Cretian churches. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, presided in council over all the bishops of Asia;²¹ Palmas, bishop of Amastris, over the bishops of Pontus, and Theophilus,²² of Cæsarea, with Narcissus, of Jerusalem, over the rest of the bishops of Palestine.

These are the common proofs, which are ordinarily alleged in this case. Yet I shall freely own, that the three last of them do not cogently prove the thing in dispute. For presiding in council does not necessarily infer metropolitanical power; because they might preside as senior bishops, as Eusebius says expressly one of them did, viz. Palmas, bishop of Amastris, ὡς ἀρχαιότατος προυτέτακτο, he presided as the most ancient bishop among them. Which seems to be noted by Eusebius not without good reason; for Heraclæa, and not Amastris, was the civil metropolis of Pontus. Blondel, from this passage, concludes, that at this time the senior bishops in all places were the metropolitans. But this does not sufficiently appear to have been the custom any where else but in the African churches, of which I shall presently give an account: for the other instances that have been given, seem rather to make it evident, that the bishops of the civil metropolises were generally the primates or metropolitans in the church also.

It is true, indeed, none of these are expressly called metropolitans; for that name scarcely occurs in any ancient record before the council of Nice: but they were at first termed πρωτοί, and κεφαλαί, chief bishops, and heads of the province, as the Apostolical Canon styles them.²³ After ages gave them other names, as that of archbishops, at Alexandria²⁴ and other places, till that name became appropriate to the patriarchs. The council of Sardica²⁵ styles them, ἐξάρχου τῆς ἐπαρχίας, exarchs of the province. St. Austin sometimes calls them principes,²⁶ princes: and Pope Hilary,²⁷ monarchs. But these being titles of secular grandeur, and savouring too much of absolute sovereignty and dominion, were expressly prohibited by the third council of Carthage, which ordered that no superior bishop should be called high priest,²⁸ or prince of the priests, but only primæ sedis episcopus, primate, or senior bishop. Hence it was that those bishops, who, in other parts of the world, were called metropolitans, in Africa had commonly the name of primates; though we sometimes meet with the name metropolitan²⁹ in the African councils also.

But these primates, in Africa, are frequently called patres and senes. As, in the African code, Xantippus, primate of Numidia, is once and again styled senex Xantippus.³⁰ And St. Austin, writing to him, inscribes his epistle Patri et consacerdoti seni Xantippo.³¹ And thus in many other epistles,³² writing to the primates, or speaking of them, he gives them the name of senes. And there was a peculiar reason for giving them this name in Africa. For here the primacy was not fixed, as in other places, to the civil metropolis, but always went along with the oldest bishop of the province, who succeeded to this dignity by virtue of his seniority, whatever place he lived in. In other parts of the world, the bishop of the civil metropolis was com-

Sect. 5.
By what names metropolitans were anciently called.

Sect. 4.
Proofs of metropolitans in the second century.

Sect. 6.
Primates in Africa called senes, because the oldest bishop was always metropolitan.

hæc eadem collegis singulis in notitiam perferentes, ab his quoque fratres nostros cum literis dirigendos esse mandavimus. See also Ep. 40. ad Pleb. Carthag. Ep. 45. ad Cornel.

¹⁶ Aug. Brevic. Collat. tert. die, c. 16.
¹⁷ Aug. Cont. Parmen. lib. 1. c. 3. Venientes cum primato suo tunc Secundo Tigitano, &c.
¹⁸ Optat. lib. 1. p. 41.
¹⁹ Euseb. H. E. lib. 5. c. 23. Τῶν κατὰ Γαλλίαν παροικίων, ὡς Εἰρηναῖος ἐπισκόπει.
²⁰ Dionys. Ep. ap. Euseb. lib. 4. c. 23.
²¹ Enseb. lib. 5. c. 24. ²² Enseb. lib. 5. c. 23.

²³ Canon. Apost. c. 37. ²⁴ Epiph. Hæc. 68 et 69.
²⁵ Con. Sard. can. 6.
²⁶ Aug. Brevic. Collat. tert. die, c. 16. Non expectavim Cæcilianus, ut princeps a principe ordinaretur.
²⁷ Hilar. Ep. ad Leont. Arelatens. ap. Baron. an. 462. In provincia quæ ad monarchiam tuam spectat, &c.
²⁸ Con. Carth. 3. can. 25. Ut primæ sedis episcopus non appelleretur princeps sacerdotum, aut summus sacerdos, aut aliquid hujusmodi, sed tantum primæ sedis episcopus.
²⁹ Con. Car. 3. can. 39. Carth. 4. can. 1.
³⁰ Cod. Can. Eccl. Afr. c. 91 et 101. ³¹ Aug. Ep. 236.
³² Aug. Ep. 149, 152, 235, 261, &c.

monly metropolitan in the church also: and so it was ordered to be by several canons both of the eastern and western churches. The council of Antioch³³ bids all bishops observe, that the bishop of the metropolis has the care of the whole province, because all men that have business or controversies to be decided, resort from all parts to the metropolis. And the council of Turin³⁴ upon this foot determined a dispute about primacy betwixt the two bishops of Arles and Vienna; decreeing that he that could prove his city to be the metropolis, should be the primate of the whole province. The council of Chalcedon has two canons,³⁵ appointing those cities to be metropolises in the church, which were so in the civil division of the empire. And the council of Trullo³⁶ has one to the same purpose.

But in the African churches it was otherwise: for they were governed by rules and canons of their own; and their rule was, to let the primacy remove from city to city, and still go along with the senior bishop, without any regard to the civil metropolis, except only at Carthage, where the bishop was a fixed and standing metropolitan for the province of Africa, properly so called. But in Numidia and Mauritania this honour was movable; as may appear from this one instance. Constantina was the civil metropolis of Numidia, as we learn both from the ancient notitia of the empire, and one of the canons³⁷ of the African code, which expressly styles it so: yet the primacy was so far from being settled here, that we never so much as find that the bishop of Constantina was at any time the primate; but in Constantine's time, Secundus Tigisitanus³⁸ was primate of Numidia; in St. Austin's time, Megalio bishop of Calama was primate, who by virtue of his office³⁹ ordained St. Austin bishop; afterwards Xantippus of Tagasta⁴⁰ succeeded by virtue of his seniority, whence he is always styled in St. Austin⁴¹ and the African councils,⁴² senex Xantippus. This is sufficient to show, that the primacy in Africa was not confined to the civil metropolis, but was always conferred upon the senior bishop, whose seniority was reckoned from the time of his consecration. Some there are who pretend to say, that these African primates, notwithstanding this, were subject to the bishops of the civil metropolises, who were properly the metropolitans. But there is no ground for this opinion, and it is justly exploded by De Marca⁴³ and others, who have occasionally touched upon this subject.

It is true indeed, by the African discipline, a bishop might lose his primogeniture, and so forfeit his title to the primacy; as is evident from a passage in St. Austin,⁴⁴ which speaks of such a punishment inflicted upon one Priscus, a Mauritanian bishop, who for some misdemeanor was denied this privilege, though he still kept his bishopric: but in such cases, the primacy did not devolve to the bishop of the civil metropolis, but to the next in order, who could prove himself senior by consecration.

And because disputes sometimes arose about seniority; to prevent these, several good orders were made by the African fathers relating to this matter. As, first, that a matricula, or archivus, as they called it, should be kept both in the primate's church,⁴⁵ and in the metropolis of the province, for bishops to prove the time of their ordination by.

Then, secondly, every bishop was to have his letters of ordination subscribed by his ordainers, and dated with the year and day of his consecration.⁴⁶ Thirdly, all bishops were to take place according to seniority, and so sit and vote, and have their names subscribed in council; which was a rule not only in Africa,⁴⁷ but in all other churches, being enacted by several councils,⁴⁸ and inserted into the civil law⁴⁹ by Justinian the emperor. But they were the more nice in observing this in Africa, where the primacy went by seniority, lest the neglect of it should have bred confusion among them. Insomuch that St. Austin⁵⁰ blames Victorinus, (who pretended to be primate of Numidia,) only because in his tractoria, or letter of summons to a provincial council, he wrote the names of the Numidian bishops in a confused order, and put Austin's name before many of

Sect. 7.
How African bishops might forfeit their title to the primacy.

Sect. 8.
A register of ordinations to be kept in the primate's church. And all bishops to take place by seniority, &c.

³³ Con. Antioch. can. 9.

³⁴ Con. Taurin. can. 2. Qui ex iis comprobaverit suam civitatem esse metropolim, is totius provinciae honorem primatus obtineat.

³⁵ Con. Chalced. can. 12 et 17.

³⁶ Con. Trull. can. 38.

³⁷ Cod. Can. Eccl. Afr. c. 86.

³⁸ Aug. cont. Parmen. lib. 1. c. 3. Ep. 68. ad Januar.

³⁹ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 8. Adveniente ad ecclesiam Hippo-nensem tunc primate Numidiæ Megalio Calamensi episcopo.

⁴⁰ Con. Milev. 1. in Cod. Afr. can. 81. Xantippus primæ sedis Numidiæ episcopus. Aug. Ep. 217. Collega noster Xantippus Tagastensis dicit, quod eum primatus ipse contingat, &c.

⁴¹ Aug. Ep. 236.

⁴² Cod. Can. Afr. c. 91, 101.

⁴³ Marca, Dissert. de Primat. n. 3. Albaspin. Not. in Op-at. lib. 1. p. 121. Stillingfleet, Hist. of Separ. par. 3. sect. 9. p. 253. Fell, Not. in Con. Carth. ap. Cypr. p. 230.

⁴⁴ Aug. Ep. 261.

⁴⁵ Con. Milev. in Cod. Can. Afr. c. 86.

⁴⁶ Con. Milev. can. 14. Placuit ut quicumque ab episcopis ordinantur, literas accipiant ab ordinatoribus suis, manu eorum subscriptas, continentibus consulem et diem, ut nulla altercatio de posterioribus vel anterioribus oriatur.

⁴⁷ Con. Milev. c. 13. Posteriores anterioribus deferant, &c. Vit. Fulgentii, cap. 20. Inter episcopos, tempore ordinationis inferior, ultimus sedebat.

⁴⁸ Con. Bracar. l. can. 24. Con. Tolet. 4. can. 4. Secundum ordinationis suæ tempora resideant.

⁴⁹ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. tit. 4. c. 29. Episcopi tempore ordinationis prælati, &c.

⁵⁰ Aug. Ep. 217. ad Victorin.

his seniors: which was a thing, he says, equally injurious to them, and invidious to himself. So cautious was he of doing any thing that might seem to trench upon this rule, for fear of breeding confusion in the government of their churches.

Sect. 9.
Three sorts of honorary primates, besides the primate in power.
1. Primates ævo.

I must here take notice further, that besides the primacy of power, there was in most provinces also a primacy of honour; whence some bishops had the name and title of primates, who had not the jurisdiction. And these were of three sorts: 1. The primates ævo, the oldest bishop in each province next to the metropolitan. These had no power above others, except when the metropolitan was some way disabled, or unqualified for discharging his office by irregularity or suspension: then his power of course devolved to the senior bishop of the province. And this, I conceive, was the reason why the bishop of Amastris⁵¹ presided in council over the bishops of Pontus, when yet Heraclea, and not Amastris, was the metropolis of the province.

The second sort of honorary primates were the titular metropolitans, which were the bishops of such cities as had the name and title of civil metropoles bestowed on them by some emperor, without the power and privileges, which were still retained to the ancient metropolis of the province. Thus Marcian the emperor dignified the city Chalcedon with the title of a metropolis, and the honour was confirmed to the bishop by the council of Chalcedon⁵² itself, only with a salvo jure to the rights of Nicomedia the old metropolis: from that time therefore the bishop of Chalcedon styled himself metropolitan of Bithynia, as may be seen in the Acts⁵³ of the Sixth General Council. The same honour was done to the city and bishop of Nice, in the council of Chalcedon⁵⁴ likewise. So that here were three metropolitans in one province, but one only had the power; the privileges of the other two were only honorary, to sit and vote in council next to their metropolitan. Yet this gave such bishops an opportunity to exalt themselves, and sometimes they so far encroached upon the rights of the first metropolitan, as to draw off his suffragans, and divide the province with him. Thus it was with the bishop of Nice, who before the time of the sixth general council, had got a synod of suffragans under him. For so Photius subscribed himself in that council⁵⁵ bishop of Nice, and metropolitan of Bithynia for himself and the synod that was under him.

Besides these there were a third sort of primates, who, though they were neither bishops of titular metropoles, nor the oldest bishops of the province, yet took place of all the rest, by a general deference that was paid to them, out of regard to the eminency of their see, being some mother church, or particularly honoured by ancient prescription. This was the case of the bishop of Jerusalem. That city was no metropolis of the empire, but subject to Cæsarea, the metropolis of Palestine; yet, in regard that it was the mother church of the world, this peculiar honour was paid to it, that the bishop thereof was always next in dignity to the metropolitan of Cæsarea, and took place of all the other bishops of the province. And this privilege was confirmed to him by the Nicene council,⁵⁶ which made a canon to this purpose: That whereas, by ancient custom and tradition, the bishop of Ælia had a particular honour paid him, the same should be continued to him, still reserving to the metropolis the dignity and privilege which belonged to it. Some fondly imagine⁵⁷ that this canon gave the bishop of Jerusalem patriarchal power; whereas it does not so much as make him a metropolitan, but leaves him subject to the metropolis of Palestine, which was Cæsarea, as St. Jerom⁵⁸ informs us, whose words clear the sense of this canon, and prove that the bishop of Jerusalem was no metropolitan, nor independent of his metropolitan, as Valesius⁵⁹ imagines, but had only the second place of honour assigned him next to his metropolitan, which was that honorary primacy which the bishops of Jerusalem had always enjoyed, because, as the council of Constantinople words it,⁶⁰ Jerusalem was the mother of all other churches.

But leaving these honorary primates, who had little more than a name, I am here to show what were the offices and privileges of those who were properly metropolitans; and they were these that follow. First, They were to regulate the elections of all their provincial bishops, and either ordain, or authorize the ordination of them. No bishop was to be elected or ordained without their consent and approbation: otherwise the canons pronounce both the election and the ordination null. The κῆρος, or ratification of all that is done, says the council of Nice,⁶¹ belongs to the metropolitan in

Sect. 11.
3. The bishops of some mother churches, which were honoured by ancient custom.

Sect. 10.
2. Titular metropolitans.

Sect. 12.
The offices of metropolitans. 1. To ordain their suffragan bishops.

⁵¹ Euseb. lib. 5. c. 23, says he presided as the senior bishop, ὡς ἀρχαιότατος προυτέτακτο.

⁵² Con. Chalced. Act. 6. t. 4. p. 612.

⁵³ Con. 6. Gen. Act. 18.

⁵⁴ Con. Chalced. Act. 13. p. 716.

⁵⁵ Con. 6. Gen. Act. 18. p. 1050.

⁵⁶ Con. Nic. can. 7. ἔχεται τὴν ἀκολουσίαν τῆς τιμῆς, τῆ μητροπόλει σωζομένου τοῦ οἰκείου ἀξιώματος.

⁵⁷ Sylvius Addit. ad Caranz. summ. Concil.

⁵⁸ Jerom. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. Hoc ibi decernitur ut Palestinæ metropolis Cæsarea sit.

⁵⁹ Vales. Not. in Euseb. 5. 23.

⁶⁰ Con. Constant. Ep. Synod. ad Damas.

⁶¹ Con. Nic. can. 4.

every province. And again, If any bishop is made without the consent of the metropolitan, this great synod⁶² pronounces such a one to be no bishop. The same rule is repeated in the councils of Antioch,⁶³ Laodicea,⁶⁴ Arles,⁶⁵ Turin,⁶⁶ Sardica,⁶⁷ Ephesus,⁶⁸ and Chalcedon.⁶⁹ And whereas some pretend that the African primates had not this power, the contrary appears evidently from several canons of their councils. The second council of Carthage⁷⁰ says, No one shall presume to ordain a bishop without consulting the primate of the province, and taking his precept, though many other bishops should join with him. The third council of Carthage requires but three bishops to the ordination of a bishop, but then⁷¹ they must be such as are expressly authorized by the metropolitan. And the fourth council⁷² requires either his presence; or at least his authority and commission. Here a primate and a metropolitan are the same thing, viz. the senior bishop of the province, who usually went to the church, where the new bishop was to be placed, and consecrated him with his own hands, as St. Austin and Possidius⁷³ testify, who are good witnesses of their practice.

Nor was this power at all infringed by setting up of patriarchs above them. For though the metropolitans were then to be ordained by the patriarchs, and obliged to attend on them for it, who before were ordained by their own provincial synod; yet still the right of ordaining their own suffragans was all along preserved to them, and expressly confirmed by the council of Chalcedon;⁷⁴ nor do we ever find any patriarch assuming this power, except the bishop of Alexandria, for a particular reason, of which I shall give an account in the following chapter, sect. 11.

But here I must observe, that this power of metropolitans was not arbitrary: for though no bishop was to be elected or ordained without their consent, yet they had no negative voice in the matter, but were to be determined and concluded by the major part of a provincial synod. For so the council of Arles⁷⁵ decreed, that if there arose any doubt or hesitation betwixt the parties, the metropolitan should side with the greater number. And the council of Nice⁷⁶ to the same purpose: If two or three out of a contentious humour shall oppose the common election, duly and regularly made according to the canons of the church, in this case let the majority of voices prevail.

And the same rule was to be observed in the ordination of metropolitans themselves, who were to be chosen and consecrated by their own provincial bishops; who were not obliged to send for a metropolitan out of another province to do it, but they had power to do it in their own provincial synod among themselves. This, St. Austin says, was the custom of the catholic church, both in Africa and at Rome. And therefore, when the Donatists objected against Cæcilian, primate of Carthage, that his ordination was uncanonical, because he had not sent for the neighbouring primate of Numidia to come and ordain him: his answer was,⁷⁷ that Cæcilian had no need of this; since the custom of the catholic church was otherwise, which was not to have the Numidian bishops to ordain the bishop of Carthage, but the neighbouring bishops of the province of Carthage; as it was not the custom at Rome to send for a metropolitan out of another province, to ordain the bishop of Rome, but he was always ordained by the bishop of Ostia, a neighbouring bishop of the same province.

It is true there is a canon in the council of Sardica,⁷⁸ which orders the bishops of the next province, as some interpret it, to be called in to the ordination of a metropolitan, τοὺς ἀπὸ τῆς πλησιοχώρου ἐπαρχίας ἐπισκόπους. But this perhaps may as well be rendered, the neighbouring bishops of the same province;⁷⁹ and since custom and the practice of the church, which is the best interpreter of doubtful canons, does manifestly favour this sense, there is some reason so to understand it. But however it be, here is no mention of one metropolitan having a right to ordain another. From which it appears,

Sect. 13.
This power continued to them after the setting up of patriarchs.

Sect. 14.
Yet this power not arbitrary, but determined by the major vote of a provincial synod.

Sect. 15.
Metropolitans to be chosen and ordained by their own provincial synod.

⁶² Con. Nic. can. 6.

⁶³ Con. Antioch. can. 19.

⁶⁴ Con. Laodic. can. 12.

⁶⁵ Con. Arelat. 2. can. 5 et 6.

⁶⁶ Con. Taurin. can. 1.

⁶⁷ Con. Sardic. can. 6.

⁶⁸ Con. Ephes. Decret. de Episc. Cypr.

⁶⁹ Con. Chalced. Act. 13. It. can. 25.

⁷⁰ Con. Carth. 2. c. 12. Inconsulto primatè cujuslibet provinciæ nemo præsumat, licet cum multis episcopis, sine ejus præcepto, episcopum ordinarè.

⁷¹ Con. Carth. 3. c. 39. Non minus quam tres sufficiant, qui fuerint a metropolitano directi ad ordinandum episcopum.

⁷² Con. Carth. 4. c. 1. Conventu totius provinciæ episcoporum, maximeque metropolitani vel præsentia, vel auctoritate ordinetur episcopus.

⁷³ Aug. Ep. 261. Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 8.

⁷⁴ Con. Chalced. Act. 16. in fin.

⁷⁵ Con. Arelat. 2. can. 5. Si inter partes aliqua nata fuerit dubitatio, majori numero metropolitanus in electione consentiat.

⁷⁶ Con. Nic. can. 6.

⁷⁷ Aug. Brevic. Collat. tert. die, c. 16. Non exspectavit Cæcilianus ut princeps a principe ordinaretur; cum aliud habeat ecclesiæ catholicæ consuetudo, ut non Numidiæ, sed propinquiores episcopi episcopum ecclesiæ Carthaginis ordinent: sicut nec Romanæ ecclesiæ ordinat aliquis episcopus metropolitanus, sed de proximo Ostiensis episcopus.

⁷⁸ Con. Sard. can. 6.

⁷⁹ Harmenopolus so understood it; for in his Epitome he thus words it: Οἱ πλησιοχώροι τῆς ἐπαρχίας παρέπαισαν. Vid. Harmen. Epit. Canon. ap. Leunclav. Jur. Gr. Rom. t. 1. p. 2.

that in these times no metropolitan was obliged to go or send out of his own province, much less to Rome, for his ordination; but all was to be done by his suffragans in his own church. Nor was any bishop obliged to go for ordination to his metropolitan's church, but ordinarily the metropolitan and the rest of the bishops met synodically in the vacant church, and there elected and consecrated a new bishop in the presence of the people for whom they ordained him. This was the first part of the metropolitan's office.

Their next office was, to preside over their provincial bishops, and if any controversies arose among them, to interpose their authority to end and decide them: as also to hear the accusations of others, who complained of injury done them by their own bishops, from whom there was liberty always to appeal to their metropolitan. Thus in Africa it was ordained by the council of Milevis,⁸⁰ that if two bishops disputed about the bounds of their dioceses, the metropolitan should appoint a committee of bishops to hear and determine their controversy. If a presbyter or deacon was excommunicated by his own bishop, the council of Sardica⁸¹ allows him liberty to appeal to the metropolitan of his province; or if he were absent, to the metropolitan of the next province, to desire a new hearing of his cause. In such cases as these the metropolitan had three ways of proceeding: either, first, he was to appoint a select number of bishops to be judges; which was the practice of Africa, where such judges were therefore called⁸² judices electi, and their number assigned to be twelve,⁸³ if a bishop's cause was to be tried before them. Or, secondly, he was to refer the matter to a provincial synod, which seems to have been the general practice, when those called the Apostolical Canons were made; one of which orders,⁸⁴ that when a bishop is accused, he shall be convened before a synod of bishops. Another says,⁸⁵ The primate shall do nothing without the consent of all the other bishops; so concord will be preserved, and God will be glorified. And another, Twice a year let there be a synod of bishops⁸⁶ to examine doctrines of religion, and terminate all ecclesiastical controversies that may happen. But, thirdly, by Justinian's law⁸⁷ the metropolitan has power to hear causes upon appeal himself without a synod: yet whether he could proceed so far as to depose a bishop by his sole authority, is questioned. Spalatensis⁸⁸ gives some instances of bishops that were deposed by their metropolitans, but for aught that appears it was done in synod: but whether it was, or was not, matters not much; for still in all cases, by the same law of Justinian⁸⁹ and the Canons, there lay an appeal from the metropolitan to a provincial synod, of which he was only the president, or moderator and director of business in it.

And this leads us to a third office of the metropolitans, which was, to call provincial synods, and preside in them. For since the Canons⁹⁰ appointed two synods to be held ordinarily every year in each province, (besides such as might be called upon extraordinary occasions,) it was necessary some one should be appointed to give notice of the time and place, and have authority both to convocate and preside in them. All things therefore relating to this matter, were by common consent put into the primate's power, whose circular letters (which sometimes are called synodice and tractoria,⁹¹ as the emperor's were called sacrae) were a legal summons, which no bishop of the province might disobey under pain of suspension, or some such canonical censure, which is left to the discretion⁹² of the metropolitan and the council.

4. It belonged to metropolitans to publish and disperse such imperial laws and canons, as were either by councils or emperors made for the common good of the church. This they are required to do by several laws⁹³ both of the church and state, the better to diffuse the knowledge and enforce the practice of them. Nor were they only to disperse the canons that were made, but to see that they were observed: which gave them right to visit and inquire into neglects, abuses, and disorders committed by any bishop throughout the whole province. The metropolitan in this respect is said to have the care of the whole province, by the council of Antioch.⁹⁴ Not that this gave him power to officiate in any other bishop's church, or perform such acts as the bishop himself might perform alone, such as the ordaining of presbyters and deacons, and the like; which are specialties of every bishop, reserved to them by the same council: but in case of omission or scandalous neglect, the bishop

⁸⁰ Con. Milev. can. 21. Per episcopos judices causa finiatur, sive quos eis primates dederint, sive quos ipsi vicini ex consultu primatis delegerint.

⁸¹ Con. Sard. can. 14. ⁸² Con. Carth. 3. can. 7.

⁸³ Con. Carth. 1. can. 11. Episcopus a duodecim consacerdotibus audiatur.

⁸⁴ Can. Apost. c. 74. Con. Constant. 2 Gen. can. 6.

⁸⁵ Ibid. c. 35. Con. Antioch. can. 9. ⁸⁶ Ibid. c. 38.

⁸⁷ Cod. Just. lib. 1. tit. 4. c. 29.

⁸⁸ Spalat. de Repub. Eccl. par. 1. lib. 3. c. 7. n. 19.

⁸⁹ Cod. Just. ibid.

⁹⁰ Con. Nic. can. 5. Antioch. c. 20. Agathen. c. 35. Arelat. 2. c. 18. Can. Apost. c. 38.

⁹¹ Aug. Ep. 217. ad Victorin. Tractoria ad me quinto idus Novembris venit, &c.

⁹² Con. Chalced. can. 19. Con. Carth. 4. can. 21. Theodoret, Ep. 81.

⁹³ Justin. Novel. 6 et 42.

⁹⁴ Con. Antioch. can. 9. τιμὴν φρονιτῖα ἀναδείχθησθαι πάσης τῆς ἐπαρχίας.

Sect. 15.
The 2nd office of metropolitans, to decide controversies arising among their provincial bishops, and take appeals from them.

Sect. 17.
Their 3rd office, to call provincial synods, which all suffragans were obliged to attend.

Sect. 18.
4. Metropolitans to publish imperial laws and canons, visit dioceses, and correct abuses.

of the metropolis was to manifest his care with the advice of the rest of his brethren.

5. In Africa all bishops paid a peculiar deference to the primate, in taking his licence to travel, whenever they were called into a foreign country upon extraordinary occasions. This was expressly provided by a canon of the third council of Carthage,⁹⁵ that no bishop should go beyond sea without consulting his primate, and taking his formate, or letters of commendation. Nor was this so peculiar to Africa, but that we may meet with the same rule and practice in other places, even as low as the time of Gregory the Great, who in one of his epistles⁹⁶ gives the same direction to some bishops in reference to their metropolitan, that they should not travel upon urgent occasion without his letters of concession.

6. It belonged to metropolitans to take care of all vacant sees within their province; to administer the affairs of the church during the vacancy, to secure the revenues of the bishopric, and procure a speedy election of a new bishop. In Africa the primate commonly appointed one of the neighbouring bishops to be his vicegerent in such a case, whom therefore the canons (as have been observed before) call an interventor.⁹⁷ The council of Riez⁹⁸ in France in like manner puts the administration of a vacant see into the hands of a neighbouring bishop, under the inspection of the metropolitan. And the council of Valentia⁹⁹ in Spain authorizes the metropolitan to punish purloiners of the revenues in the vacancy, and to send an administrator till a new bishop is chosen. By a canon of the council of Chalcedon,¹⁰⁰ the care of the revenues of the church is committed to the steward of the church, the aconomus; but the care of supplying the vacant see with a new bishop within three months, is the business of the metropolitan.

7. It belonged to the metropolitan yearly to review the calculation of the time of Easter, and give notice to his suffragans of it. The care of composing the cycle indeed was by the Nicene fathers particularly committed to the bishop of Alexandria,¹⁰¹ as Pope Leo and others inform us; and he was to give notice to other churches: but due care was not always taken in this matter, and therefore the metropolitan in every province was concerned to settle the time, and acquaint the whole province with it. As we find St. Ambrose¹⁰² did for the province of Milan; and the bishop of Carthage,¹⁰³ for the province of Africa: and the Spanish councils¹⁰⁴ order their metropolitans first to concert the matter among themselves, and then communicate it to their provincials.

Some later canons¹⁰⁵ make it the privilege of metropolitans to consecrate all churches throughout the province. But I have showed before, that this was originally the privilege of every bishop in his own diocese; and being a private act, which only concerned his own church, and not the whole province, the metropolitan was to have no hand in it, no more than in the consecration of presbyters and deacons, by the ninth canon of the council of Antioch. Other canons¹⁰⁶ bind the whole province to follow the forms and rites of Divine service used in the metropolitan church: but I have observed before, that anciently every bishop had liberty to prescribe for his own diocese, and was under no limitation as to this matter, unless it were the order of a provincial council.

By this we see that the power of metropolitans in some places exceeded others. And I must here observe, that the primate of Alexandria was the greatest metropolitan in the world, both for the absoluteness of his power, and the extent of his jurisdiction. For he was not metropolitan of a single province, but of all the provinces of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, in which there were at least six large provinces, out of which sometimes above a hundred bishops were called to a provincial council. Alexander summoned near that number to the condemnation of Arius¹⁰⁷ before the council of Nice. And Athanasius¹⁰⁸ speaks of the same number meeting at other times: particularly the council of Alexandria, anno 339, which heard and justified the cause of Athanasius after his return from his banishment, had almost a hundred bishops in it; which was above thirty more than the bishop of Rome's libra, which was but sixty-nine. Nor was the primate of Alexandria's power less than the extent of his jurisdiction; for he not only ordained all his suffragan bishops, but had liberty to ordain presbyters and deacons in all churches throughout the whole district. Mr. Basnage and Launoy¹⁰⁹ will have it that he had the sole power of ordaining, ⁹⁵ Con. Carth. 3. can. 28. Ut episcopi trans mare non proficiscantur, nisi consulto primæ sedis episcopo, &c.

⁹⁶ Greg. M. Ep. 8. lib. 7.

⁹⁷ Con. Carth. 5. can. 8.

⁹⁸ Con. Reiens. can. 5 et 6. ⁹⁹ Con. Valent. can. 2.

¹⁰⁰ Con. Chalced. c. 25.

¹⁰¹ Leo, Ep. 72. al. 70. ad Marcian Imper.

¹⁰² Ambros. Ep. 83. ad Episc. per Æmyliam.

¹⁰³ Con. Carth. 3. can. 1 et 41.

¹⁰⁴ Con. Bracar. 2. can. 9. Con. Tolet. 4. can. 5.

¹⁰⁵ Gelas. Ep. 1. c. 4. Montan. Tolet. Ep. ad Palentinus ap. Blondel, Apol. p. 150.

¹⁰⁶ Concil. Gerundens. can. 1. Con. Epauv. can. 27. Con. Tolet. 11. can. 3.

¹⁰⁷ Alexand. Ep. Encycl. ap. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 6.

¹⁰⁸ Athan. Apol. 2. p. 720. Con. Alexandr. Ep. Encycl. Con. t. 2. p. 533.

¹⁰⁹ Basnag. Exerc. in Baron. p. 307. et Launoy, ibid.

Sect. 19.
5. Bishops not to travel without the letters of their metropolitan.

Sect. 20.
6. Metropolitans to take care of vacant sees within their province.

Sect. 21.
Metropolitans to calculate the time of Easter.

Sect. 22.
How the power of metropolitans grew in after ages.

Sect. 23.
The primate of Alexandria had the greatest power of any other.

and that not so much as a presbyter or deacon could be ordained without him. Valesius¹¹⁰ thinks his privilege was rather that he might ordain if he pleased, but not that he had the sole power of ordaining presbyters and deacons. But either way it was a great privilege, and peculiar to the bishop of Alexandria; for no other metropolitan pretended to the like power besides himself.

Sect. 21.
All metropolitans called apostolici, and their sees, sedes apostolicae.

I have but one thing more to observe concerning metropolitans, which is, that they were anciently all dignified with the name apostolici; which was then no peculiar title of the bishop of Rome. For Pope Siricius himself gives all primates¹¹¹ this appellation: and it continued to be their title to the days of Alcuin, who, speaking of the election of bishops, says,¹¹² when the clergy and people have chosen one, they draw up an instrument, and go with their elect to the apostolicus: by whom he means not the pope, but the primate or metropolitan of every province, who had the right and power of consecration.

CHAPTER XVII.

OF PATRIARCHS.

Sect. 1.
Patriarchs anciently called archbishops.

NEXT in order to the metropolitans or primates, were the patriarchs; or, as they were at first called, archbishops and exarchs of the diocese. For though now an archbishop and a metropolitan be generally taken for the same, to wit, the primate of a single province; yet anciently the name archbishop was a more extensive title, and scarce given to any but those whose jurisdiction extended over a whole imperial diocese, as the bishops of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, &c. That this was so, appears evidently from one of Justinian's Novels, where erecting the bishopric of Justiniana Prima into a patriarchal see, he says, Our pleasure is, that the bishop of Justiniana shall not only be a metropolitan, but an archbishop.¹ Here the names are clearly distinguished, and an archbishop reckoned superior to a metropolitan. And hence it was, that after the setting up of patriarchal power, the name archbishop was appropriated to the patriarchs.

Liberatus² gives all the patriarchs this title of archbishops. So does the council of Chalcedon frequently, speaking of the patriarchs of Rome and Constantinople³ under the name of archbishops also.

These were otherwise called ἐξαρχοι τῆς διοικήσεως, exarchs of the diocese, Sect. 2. And exarchs of the diocese. to distinguish them from the ἐξαρχοι τῆς ἐπαρχίας, the exarchs of a single province, which were only metropolitans.

Thus Domnus, bishop of Antioch, is styled exarch of the eastern diocese,⁴ by the councils of Antioch and Chalcedon. And in the subscriptions of the sixth general council at Constantinople, Theodore, bishop of Ephesus, subscribes himself both metropolitan of Ephesus,⁵ and exarch of the Asiatic diocese. As also Philalethes, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, styles himself exarch of the Pontic diocese. Which shows, that as the exarch of a province is a metropolitan, so the exarch of a diocese is a patriarch in the ancient language of the church. And by this we understand the meaning of the ninth and seventeenth canons of the council of Chalcedon, which allow of appeals from the metropolitan to the exarch of the diocese.

As to the name patriarch, there is some dispute among learned men, when first it began to be used as an appropriate title of any Christian bishops. Salmasius⁶ and some others are of opinion, that the bishop of Alexandria had this title from the time of the emperor Hadrian, which was in the beginning of the second century. Their reason is, because that emperor, in an epistle mentioned by Vopiseus, speaks of a patriarch at Alexandria. But the patriarch there spoken of, was not any Christian, but a Jewish patriarch; as may appear from Hadrian's words, and the character which he gives of him.⁷ For he says, he was one who was compelled to worship both Christ and Serapis: which agrees very well to the character of a Jewish patriarch, who neither acknowledged the heathen nor the Christian religion, and therefore needed as much compulsion to bring him to worship Christ, as Serapis; but it does not at all agree to the character of a Christian bishop, who, however he might need force to compel him to worship Serapis, yet must be supposed willing of his own accord to worship Christ. Besides, the patriarch which the emperor speaks of was one who came only occasionally into

Sect. 3.
Salmasius's mistake about the first use of the name patriarch.

¹¹⁰ Vales. Observ. in Socrat. lib. 3. c. 5.

¹¹¹ Siric. Ep. 4. c. 1. Ut extra conscientiam sedis apostolicae, id est, primatis, nemo audeat ordinare.

¹¹² Alcuin. de Div. Offic. c. 36. Cum episcopus civitatis fuerit defunctus, eligitur alius a clero seu populo, sitque decretum ab illis, et veniunt ad apostolicum cum suo electo.

¹ Justin. Novel. II. Volumus, ut non solum metropolitans, sed etiam archiepiscopus fiat.

² Liberat. Breviar. c. 17.

³ Con. Chalced. Act. 16. It. Act. 4. et can. 30.

⁴ Con. Antioch. in Act. 14. Con. Chalced.

⁵ Con. 6. Gen. Act. 18. Con. t. 6 p. 1077 et 1080.

⁶ Salmas. de Primat. c. 4. p. 44. It. not. in Vopiseum.

⁷ Hadrian. Epist. ap. Vopiseum Vit. Saturnin. Illi qui Serapin colunt, Christiani sunt; et devoti sunt Serapi, qui se Christi episcopus dicunt. Nemo illic archisynagogus Judeorum, nemo Samarites, nemo Christianorum presbyter, non mathematicus, non aruspex, non aliptes. Ille ipse patriarcha, quum Ægyptum venerit, ab aliis Serapidem adorare, ab aliis cogitur Christum.

Egypt out of another country; which cannot be said of the bishop of Alexandria, who had his fixed and continual residence there: but it suits exactly the state and condition of the Jewish patriarch, who resided at Tiberias in Palestine, and came but accidentally, or at some certain times, into Egypt. These, and the like reasons, make others conclude against Salmasius, that whoever is meant, it is not any Christian patriarch that is here spoken of. Baronius⁸ fancies it was the heathen pontifex, or high priest of Egypt: but the same reasons will hold against his opinion as against the other; for the high priest of Egypt lived in Egypt, and needed no compulsion to worship Serapis, as this patriarch did: so that it must be the Jewish patriarch, and no other, which Hadrian speaks of, as Mr. Basnage and Bishop Pearson,⁹ with some others, have observed.

These Jewish patriarchs, from whom, as is generally agreed, the Christian patriarchs borrowed their names, were a sort of governors among the Jews set up upon the destruction of Jerusalem; one of which had his residence at Tiberias, and another at Babylon, who were the heads of the Jews dispersed throughout the Roman and the Persian empire. Of these there is frequent mention made in the ancient writers of the church, Origen,¹⁰ Epiphanius,¹¹ Cyril of Jerusalem,¹² Theodoret,¹³ and many others. They continued in great power and dignity till the latter end of the fourth century, about which time their order ceased. For Theodoret says expressly, that long before his time their government was wholly abolished: and one of the laws of the younger Theodosius, anno 429,¹⁴ speaks of them as then extinct.

Much about the same time the Montanists, or Cataphrygian heretics, had an order of men among them, which they called patriarchs, and another which they called cenones, both which were superior to their bishops, and, as it should seem, distinct orders from them. For St. Jerom¹⁵ charges it on them as a crime, that they thrust down the order of the bishops, who were the apostles' successors, and set up an order of patriarchs and an order of cenones among them: which makes some learned men¹⁶ think, that when St. Jerom wrote that against the Montanists, the name patriarch was not as yet adopted into the church, though the power was under another name.

Indeed, the first time we meet with the name patriarch given to any bishop by any public authority of the church, is in the council of Chalcedon, which mentions¹⁷ the most holy patriarchs of every diocese, and particularly Leo patriarch¹⁸ of great Rome. Richerius, who has written accurately about the councils, can trace the name no higher.¹⁹ Among private authors, the first that mentions patriarchs by name is Socrates,²⁰ who wrote his history about the year 440, eleven years before the council of Chalcedon. By what he says, it appears that during the interval between the general council of Constantinople, anno 381, and that of Chalcedon, the name patriarch began to be an appropriate title of some eminent bishops in the church. For speaking of the fathers at Constantinople, he says, They constituted patriarchs, dividing the provinces among them. Valesius²¹ and Dr. Cave²² think Socrates speaks not of true and proper patriarchs, but only of extraordinary legates, or pro-tempore commissioners, appointed by the council to judge who were fit to be received to catholic communion in the several dioceses that were allotted them. But all others understand him in the proper sense, because by this time patriarchal power was settled in all the dioceses of the Roman empire.

But though the name of patriarchs came not into the church till about the time of Socrates, yet the power²³ itself, as is agreed on all hands, was much earlier; though where precisely to fix the epocha, and date its rise, is not so easy to determine. Some carry it as high as the apostles, and derive it, as they do the pope's supremacy, from St. Peter. So Baronius,²³ who is followed by the most eminent writers of his own communion, De Marca, Valesius, Richerius, Pagius, and Schelstrate. Others

Sect. 4.
Of the Jewish patriarchs, their first rise, duration, and extinction.

Sect. 5.
Of the patriarchs among the Montanists.

Sect. 6.
The name patriarch first used by Socrates and the council of Chalcedon.

Sect. 7.
Four different opinions concerning the first rise of patriarchal power.

⁸ Baron. Annal. tom. 2. an. 112.

⁹ Basnag. Exercit. Histor. p. 284. Pearson, Vindic. Ignat. par. 1. c. 11. p. 328. Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. Verbo πατριάρχης. Cave, Anc. Chur. Gov. p. 153.

¹⁰ Orig. περὶ ἀρχῶν, lib. 4. c. 1.

¹¹ Epiphanius. Hær. 30.

¹² Cyr. Catech. 12. n. 7.

¹³ Theodor. Dial. 1.

¹⁴ Cod. Theod. lib. 16. tit. 8. de Jud. lib. 29.

¹⁵ Jerom. Ep. 54. ad Marcel. adv. Montan. t. 2. p. 128. Apud nos apostolorum locum episcopi tenent: apud eos episcopus tertius est. Habent enim primos de Pepuza Phrygiæ patriarchas: secundos quos appellant cenones: atque ita in tertium, id est, pene ultimum locum, episcopi devolvuntur.

¹⁶ Basnag. Exercit. Histor. p. 285. Hinc colligi possit, præcis temporibus nondum episcopis insignioribus affixum fuisse nomen patriarchæ.

¹⁷ Con. Chalced. Act. 2. p. 338. ὁσιώτατοι πατριάρχαι διοικήσεως ἐκάστης.

¹⁸ Act. 3. p. 395.

¹⁹ Rich. Hist. Concil. tom. 1. c. 2. n. 11. Nomen patriarcharum primum quod sciam usurpatum in synodo Chalcedonensi.

²⁰ Soerat. H. E. lib. 5. c. 8.

²¹ Vales. Annot. in Socrat.

²² Anc. Ch. Gov. p. 147.

²³ Baron. Annal. t. 1. an. 39. n. 16. Pet. de Marca, de Concord. t. 1. lib. 1. c. 3. n. 5. Vales. Observ. Eccles. lib. 3. Richer. Hist. Concil. t. 1. c. 1. n. 14. Ant. Pag. Critic. an. 37. n. 9.

justly reject this, as founded upon no good authority, nor evidenced by any genuine records of the ancient church, but only the spurious epistles of the first popes; and reckon the first rise of patriarchs to have been after the apostolical age, and some time before the council of Nice. This is the opinion of Spalatensis²⁴ and Mr. Brerewood. The third opinion is that of Balzamon,²⁵ and other modern Greeks, that patriarchs were first instituted by the council of Nice: and this seems to be favoured by St. Jerom: for in his epistle to Pammachius, writing against the errors of John of Jerusalem, he says, it was decreed in the council of Nice,²⁶ that Cæsarea should be the metropolis of Palestine, and Antioch the metropolis of the whole East. Therefore the bishop of Jerusalem must either appeal to the bishop of Cæsarea, as his immediate metropolitan, or to the bishop of Antioch, as metropolitan of the East. But if I rightly understand St. Jerom, he does not mean (as some mistake him) that patriarchs were first set up by the council of Nice: for then metropolitans must be so too; since he says the same of them, which yet every one knows were in the church long before the council of Nice. His meaning then must be, that both metropolitans of provinces and metropolitans of dioceses were in being before the council of Nice, and only received confirmation, or a canonical establishment, from it. And indeed it is evident, that the Nicene fathers made no alteration in these matters, but only confirmed the ancient rights of the bishops of principal cities, as they found them authorized by custom before. For the words²⁷ they use are, τὰ ἀρχαῖα ἐθη κρατεῖρω, "Let ancient customs still take place; so as in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, the bishop of Alexandria shall have power over all; because such also is the custom of the bishop of Rome. And accordingly in Antioch, and in other provinces, let the privileges be preserved to the churches."

Here it is plain, that no new power is given to any bishops, but only what ancient custom and practice had assigned them. So that either patriarchs were set up by custom before the council of Nice,²⁸ and confirmed by the council, as St. Jerom thinks; or else not introduced till afterwards. This last opinion (notwithstanding what St. Jerom says) is embraced by the famous Mr. Launoy,²⁹ Mr. Basnage,³⁰ Dr. Beverege,³¹ and Dr. Cave,³² who think that patriarchal power was not confirmed by the Nicene canon, nor known in the church till about the time of the second general council of Constantinople, anno 381.

In a matter so obscure, and so variously controverted among learned men, it is not easy to determine where the right lies. Patriarchal power was not set up at one and the same time in all places. Alexandria and Antioch were as early as any, and the bishop of Alexandria before the council of Nice had all Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis under his jurisdiction, as appears from the Nicene canons. This was the diæcesis Ægyptiaca, which consisted of six large provinces, four in Egypt, viz. Thebais, Arcadia, Augustanica, and Ægyptus properly so called, Libya Inferior, and Libya Superior, which is Pentapolis. As all these were subject to the præfectus Augustalis of Egypt, so they were likewise under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Alexandria. So that he was not only a metropolitan of a single province, but of six provinces joined in one diocese. But now the question is, whether at this time he had any metropolitans under him? For if he had, then he was properly a patriarch at the time of the Nicene council. As to this, I can only say, that Epiphanius and Synesius do expressly mention archbishops and metropolitans under the archbishop of Alexandria, in the time of Athanasius, and Alexander his predecessor, who were both present in the council of Nice. But whether they mean metropolitans in the proper sense, or only coadjutors to the archbishop of Alexandria, I cannot yet determine. I will recite the passages, and leave the curious and the learned to make further inquiry. Synesius says, The great Athanasius seeing the church of Ptolemais had need of a bishop that was able to cherish and augment the small sparks of true religion, which was then in a dwindling condition there; and finding Siderius, bishop of Palæbisca, a man fit for great business; he commanded him to remove thence to Ptolemais,³³ to govern the metropolitan church there. And Epiphanius,³⁴ speaking of Meletius, the author of the Meletian schism before the council of Nice, says expressly, "He was an archbishop in Egypt, under Alexander, archbishop of Alexandria, to whom he gave the first information against Arius." This agrees with

Sect. 8.
The opinion of Spalatensis and St. Jerom preferred.

²⁴ Spalat. de Repub. par. 1. l. 3. c. 12. n. 21. Brerewood of Patriar. Gov. q. 1.

²⁵ Balzam. in can. 6. Con. Nic.

²⁶ Hieron. Ep. 61. t. 2. p. 178. Ad Alexandrinum episcopum Palestina quid pertinet? Ni fallor, hoc ibi decernitur, ut Palestinæ metropolis Cæsarea sit, et totius Orientis Antiochia. Aut igitur ad Cæsariensem episcopum referre debueras;—Aut si procul expetendum iudicium erat, Antiochiam potius literæ dirigendæ.

²⁷ Con. Nic. can. 6.

²⁸ So Du Pin, Bibliothec. vol. 2. p. 252. It. de Antiq.

Eccl. Disciplin. Dissert. 1. sect. 11. p. 37.

²⁹ Launoy, de Rect. Interpr. Can. 6. Con. Nic.

³⁰ Basnag. Exercit. Histor. p. 307.

³¹ Bevereg. Not. in Can. 2. Con. Constant.

³² Cave, Anc. Ch. Gov. c. 2 et 4.

³³ Synes. Ep. 67. ad Theoph. p. 231. Πάμμεγαν Ἀθανάσιον, — τὸν ἄνδρα τοῦτου, ὡς μείζονι πράγμασιν ἐπιτήδειον, ἐκεῖ διαβῆναι κελεύσαι, τὴν μητροπολίτην ἐκκλησίαν ἐπιτροπεύοντα.

³⁴ Epiphau. Hær. 69. n. 3. Ὁ ἀρχιεπίσκοπος Μελετίος ὁ κατὰ τὴν Αἴγυπτον, ὑπὸ δὲ χεῖρα Ἀλεξάνδρου.

what he says of him in another place,³⁵ "That he was chief of the Egyptian bishops, and next in order to Peter in the archbishopric, being his assistant, and administering ecclesiastical affairs under him. For there the custom is, for the archbishop of Alexandria to have the ordering of ecclesiastical matters throughout all Egypt, Thebais, Mareotes, Libya, Ammoniaca, Mareotis, and Pentapolis." So that as the bishop of Alexandria had six provinces under him, he seems also to have had subordinate metropolitans or archbishops under him likewise, as the archbishop of Lycopolis in Thebais, the metropolitan of Ptolemais in Pentapolis. And if these were properly metropolitans, he must be a patriarch, under the name of metropolitan of the whole Egyptian diocese, as they were metropolitans of their respective provinces: which is the thing that St. Jerom asserts in reference to Cæsarea and Antioch, that the one was the metropolis of Palestine, and the other the metropolis of the Oriental diocese; and this from ancient custom, ratified and confirmed by the council of Nice.

But however this be, (for I determine nothing positively in this matter,) the next age affords us very pregnant proofs of the establishment and growth of patriarchal power. The general council of Constantinople,³⁶ anno 381, has a canon to fix the limits of the several dioceses: so that the bishop of Alexandria should only administer the affairs of the Egyptian diocese: the bishops of the East, the Eastern diocese, reserving the privileges granted by the council of Nice to the church of Antioch: the bishops of the Asiatic diocese, the Asiatic churches only: those of the Pontic diocese, the Pontic churches: and those of the Thracian diocese, the Thracian churches only.

Theodoret,³⁷ speaking of this council, says, they divided the dioceses, and assigned every diocese its proper limits and jurisdiction. And Socrates,³⁸ more expressly, "that they constituted patriarchs, and distributed the provinces, so that no bishops should meddle with the affairs of another diocese, as was used to be done in times of persecution. Nectarius was allotted Constantinople and Thrace; Helladius, St. Basil's successor, the Pontic diocese," &c.

About fifty years after this, anno 431, the third general council was held at Ephesus, where we find the bishop of Antioch laying claim to the power of ordinations in the province of Cyprus: but this proving to be an unjust claim, the council made a decree in favour of the Cyprian bishops, exempting them from the jurisdiction of Antioch, because by ancient custom they always were exempt: and it is added,³⁹ "that the same rule should be observed in all dioceses and provinces, that no bishop should seize upon any province, which did not anciently belong to his jurisdiction." This plainly implies, that the bishop of Antioch had then several provinces, or a whole diocese, under his power; which was confirmed to him by the council, and he was only denied jurisdiction over the province of Cyprus, because of ancient right it did not belong to him.

About eighteen years after this, Theodosius, junior, and Valentinian, called the second council of Ephesus, anno 449. And in the letter of summons to Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, they give him orders to bring ten metropolitans⁴⁰ of his diocese with him. This is noted by Liberatus in his Breviary, and the letter is still extant in the council of Chalcedon,⁴¹ by which it appears, that at this time the archbishop of Alexandria had a great number of metropolitans within the Egyptian diocese, under his jurisdiction. So that though there be some dispute concerning the first rise and original of patriarchal power, yet there remains no manner of doubt, but that it was come to its full height and establishment in the time of the general councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon.

Therefore the next inquiry is into the rights and privileges of these patriarchs. And here it is to be nicely observed, that the power of patriarchs was not one and the same precisely in all churches, but differed according to the different customs of places and countries, or according as it was the pleasure of kings and councils to bestow greater privileges on them. The patriarch of Constantinople, when he was first advanced by the second general council, had only the single diocese of Thrace assigned him⁴² for the exercise of his jurisdiction; but in the next age he was grown to be a sort of patriarch over the patriarchs of Ephesus and Cæsarea in the Asiatic and Pontic dioceses, by the voluntary consent of those two exarchs (no doubt) at first, paying a deference to the exarch of the royal city, which, advancing into a custom, was afterwards confirmed by canon in the council of Chalcedon. In the sixteenth session of that council, there is a long debate about this matter, the pope's legates warmly sticking against it; but all the metropolitans of the two dioceses of Asia

Sect. 9.
Patriarchal power established in three general councils successively, viz. Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon.

Sect. 10.
The power of patriarchs not exactly the same in all churches.
The patriarch of Constantinople had some peculiar privileges.

³⁵ Hæc. 68. Meletian. n. 1. Ὁ Μελέτιος τῶν κατὰ τὴν Αἴγυπτον προήκων, καὶ δευτερεύων τῷ Πέτρῳ, κατὰ τὴν ἀρχιεπισκοπὴν, ὡς δι' ἀντιλήψεως αὐτοῦ χάριν, &c.

³⁶ Con. C. Pol. can. 2.

³⁷ Theod. Ep. 86. ad Flav. t. 3. p. 963.

³⁸ Socrat. H. E. lib. 5. c. 8. πατριάρχας καθέστησαν, &c.

³⁹ Con. Ephes. 1. Act. 7. Decret. de Episc. Cyp.

⁴⁰ Liberat. Breviar. c. 12. Imperator dirigens sacram Dioscoro in Alexandriam, præcepit, ut cum decem metropolitanis episcopis, quos voluisset, ipse eligeret, et veniret Ephesum.

⁴¹ Con. Chalced. Act. 1. C. t. 4. p. 100.

⁴² Con. Const. 1. can. 2.

and Pontus then in council, together with Thalassius, bishop of Cæsarea, and exarch of the Pontic diocese, with one voice declaring, that the bishop of Constantinople had, by long custom and prescription, enjoyed the privilege of ordaining metropolitans in those two dioceses, as well as that of Thrace; it was decreed, that this privilege should be continued to him, notwithstanding the bishop of Rome's intercession against it.⁴³ Also by two canons of that council he is allowed to receive appeals⁴⁴ from the exarchs of those dioceses, because his throne was in the royal city. And in such parts of those dioceses, as were chiefly in the hands of barbarians, he is authorized by another canon⁴⁵ to ordain all the bishops, which in other parts was the sole privilege of the metropolitans. Theodoret⁴⁶ observes even of Chrysostom himself, before the council of Chalcedon, that he exercised this power over all the three dioceses. For he says, "His care extended not only over Constantinople and Thrace, which consisted of six provinces, but over Asia and Pontus, each of which had eleven civil prætors in them." We are not therefore to take an estimate of patriarchal power from the growing greatness of Constantinople, but to distinguish the peculiar privileges of some patriarchs above others, which is the only way to understand the power of each.

For the patriarch of Alexandria had also some prerogatives, which no other patriarch besides himself enjoyed. Such was the right of consecrating and approving every single bishop throughout all the provinces of his diocese. This privilege was not allowed even to the patriarch of Constantinople; for the council of Chalcedon, in the very same place where they give him power to consecrate the metropolitans of three whole dioceses, deny him the privilege of consecrating the suffragan bishops of those metropolitans; and reserve it as an ancient right of each metropolitan, with a synod of his provincial bishops, to consecrate all the bishops within his province, the archbishops of Constantinople neither being consulted, nor having⁴⁷ any hand in those ordinations. But it was otherwise at Alexandria. For the bishop of Alexandria, whilst he was only a metropolitan, had the ordination of all the bishops of the six provinces of the Egyptian diocese, being the sole and only metropolitan in all those provinces: and having but the same diocese when he came to be a patriarch, he continued his ancient custom of ordaining all the bishops throughout the six provinces, notwithstanding that new metropolitans were set up in them. And in this the patriarch of Alexandria differed from all others: for in all other dioceses the metropolitans had the right of ordaining their suffragan bishops, which here the patriarch retained to himself, as an ancient branch of his metropolitanical power. I know indeed a very learned⁴⁸ person is of a different opinion: he says, "The bishop of Alexandria was rather a loser by being made a patriarch: for now, according to the constitution of church policy, the ordination of suffragan bishops, which before belonged entirely to him, was devolved upon the several metropolitans under him." But this assertion proceeds upon a supposition, that patriarchal rights were exactly the same in all places; which, from the instance I have given of Constantinople, appears to be otherwise; for the patriarchs of Ephesus and Cæsarea had not the ordination of their own metropolitans, but they were all subject to the bishop of Constantinople. And as to the case of Alexandria, it appears from Synesius, who was himself metropolitan of Ptolemais, that the ordination not only of the metropolitans, but of all the suffragan bishops throughout the whole district of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, belonged still to the patriarch of Alexandria. For in a letter to Theophilus, acquainting him how he and two other bishops had met at Olbiæ to make choice of a bishop, and that one Antonius was unanimously chosen by the people; he adds,⁴⁹ that yet there was one thing wanting, which was more necessary than all, viz. his sacred hand to consecrate him. Which shows, that the bishop of Alexandria still retained his ancient right of consecrating all the bishops of the Egyptian diocese.

In other dioceses, the patriarch's power was chiefly seen in the ordination or confirmation of all the metropolitans that were under him. This appears from the forecited canons⁵⁰ of the council of Chalcedon, and several of Justinian's Novels; one of which⁵¹ takes notice of the bishop of Constantinople's ordaining all the metropolitans under him; and another gives the same power to the patriarch of Justiniana Prima,⁵² then newly advanced to patriarchal dignity by Justinian, because it was the place of his nativity.

Sect. 11.
The patriarch of Alexandria had also privileges peculiar to himself.

Sect. 12.
The 1st privilege of patriarchs was, to ordain all the metropolitans of the diocese, and receive his own ordination from a diocesan synod.

⁴³ Con. Chalced. can. 28. et Act. 16. per tot.
⁴⁴ Ibid. can. 9 et 17. ⁴⁵ Con. Chal. can. 28.
⁴⁶ Theod. Hist. Eccl. lib. 5. c. 28.
⁴⁷ Con. Chalced. Act. 16. in fin. Etiam nihil communicante in illorum ordinationibus archiepiscopo regiæ Constantinopolis.
⁴⁸ Dr. Cave, Anc. Ch. Gov. c. 4. p. 159.
⁴⁹ Synes. Ep. 76. ad Theoph. ἐνός ἐστι δειῖ, τοῦ κυριοτάτου μίν τοι, τῆς ἱερᾶς σου χειρός.

⁵⁰ Con. Chalc. can. 28. et Act. 16.
⁵¹ Justin. Novel. 7. c. 1.
⁵² Justin. Nov. 131. c. 3. Per tempus beatissimum Justinianæ Primæ patriæ nostræ archiepiscopus habere semper sub sua jurisdictione episcopos provinciarum Daciæ Mediterraneæ, et Daciæ Ripensis, et Privalis, (al. Triballicæ,) et Dardaniæ, et Mysiæ superioris, et Pannoniæ: et ab eo hos ordinari, ipsum vero a proprio ordinari concilio.

And that this was a peculiar privilege of patriarchs, appears further from one of the Arabic canons published by Turrian, under the name of the Nicene Canons, which were invented after the name of patriarchs was well known in the church. The 36th of these canons, speaking of the catholic of Ethiopia,⁵³ who was no patriarch, but subject to the patriarch of Alexandria, says, He shall not have power to ordain archbishops, as patriarchs have; because he hath not the power or honour of a patriarch.

It was therefore the prerogative of patriarchs (those of Ephesus and Cæsarea only excepted) to ordain the metropolitans under them: but they themselves were to be ordained by a diocesan synod, as Justinian's forecited Novel⁵⁴ informs us. And this was called the canonical ordination of a patriarch. For so the council of Constantinople, in their synodical epistle to the western bishops, prove the ordination of Flavian, bishop of Antioch, (who presided over all the Eastern diocese,⁵⁵ as Theodoret says,) to be canonical, because he was ordained not only by the bishops of the province, but τῆς Ἀνατολικῆς διοικήσεως, the bishops of the whole Eastern diocese⁵⁶ synodically met together.

2. The next privilege of patriarchs was, the power of convening their metropolitans and all the provincial bishops to a diocesan synod; which privilege was founded upon the same canons that granted metropolitans authority to summon provincial synods, and preside in them. For by just analogy, the patriarch was to have the same power over the metropolitans, that they had over their provincial bishops. And therefore Theodoret,⁵⁷ speaking of his own attendance at the synods of his patriarch at Antioch, says, he did it in obedience to the ecclesiastical canons, which make him a criminal that is summoned to a synod, and refuses to pay his attendance at it.

3. Another privilege of patriarchs was, the power of receiving appeals from metropolitans and provincial synods, and reversing their decrees, if they were found faulty. If any bishop or clergyman have a controversy with the metropolitan of his province, let him have recourse to the exarch of the diocese, says the council of Chalcedon,⁵⁸ in one canon: and in another,⁵⁹ If any man is injured by his own bishop, or metropolitan, let him bring his cause before the exarch of the diocese, or the throne of Constantinople. These canons are adopted into the civil law, and confirmed by imperial edicts. For by one of Justinian's constitutions,⁶⁰ the patriarch is to receive appeals from a provincial synod, and give a final determination to all causes that are regularly brought before him: and the regular way of proceeding is there specified, which is, that no man shall bring his cause first before the patriarch, but first before his own bishop, then before the metropolitan, after that before a provincial synod, and last of all before the patriarch, from whose judgment there lay no appeal. The same is repeated and confirmed by other laws⁶¹ of that emperor, which need not here be recited.

4. As patriarchs might receive appeals from metropolitans, so they had power to inquire into their administration, and correct and censure them, in case of heresy, or misdemeanor, or any mal-administration, which made them liable by the canons to ecclesiastical censure. Justinian made an express law to this purpose,⁶² That if any clergyman was accused in point of faith, or morals, or transgression of the sacred canons; if he was a bishop, he should be examined before his metropolitan; but if he was a metropolitan, then before the archbishop, that is, the patriarch to whom he was subject. By virtue of this power Chrysostom deposed Gerontius,⁶³ metropolitan of Nicomedia: and Atticus decided a controversy between Theodosius and Agapetus,⁶⁴ who contended about the throne of Synada, the metropolis of Phrygia Pacatiana: and it were easy to add many other instances of the like nature out of the ancient councils, which concurred with the patriarchs in the exercise of this power.

Nor did this power extend only over metropolitans, but over their suffragan bishops also. For though every provincial bishop was to be tried by his own metropolitan and a provincial synod, yet in case they were negligent and remiss in executing the canons against delinquents, the patriarch had power to take the matter into his own cognizance, and censure any bishop within the limits of his jurisdiction. Thus Sozomen⁶⁵ observes of Chrysostom, that at one visitation at Ephesus he deposed thirteen bishops of Asia, Lycia, and Phrygia, for simony, and such other corrupt practices. This

Sect. 13.
A 2nd privilege was, to call diocesan synods, and preside in them.

Sect. 14.
A 3rd privilege, to receive appeals from metropolitans and provincial synods.

⁵³ Con. Nicen. Arab. c. 36. Non tamen jus habeat constituendi archiepiscopos, ut habet patriarcha; siquidem non habet patriarchæ honorem et potestatem.

⁵⁴ Novel. 131. Ipsum vero (patriarcham) a proprio ordinari concilio.

⁵⁵ Theod. H. E. lib. 5. c. 23.

⁵⁶ Con. Constant. Ep. ad Occident. ap. Theod. H. E. lib. 5. c. 9.

⁵⁷ Theod. Ep. 81.

⁵⁸ Con. Chalced. can. 9.

⁵⁹ Ibid. can. 17.

⁶⁰ Cod. Just. lib. 1. tit. 4. c. 29.

Sect. 15.
A 4th privilege, to censure metropolitans, and also their suffragans, when metropolitans were remiss in censuring them.

⁶¹ Just. Novel. 123. c. 22. Phot. Nomocan. tit. 9. c. 1.

⁶² Novel. 37. c. 5. Quoties quidam sacerdotum accusantur vel de fide, aut turpi vita, aut ob aliquid aliud contra sacros canones admissum; si quidem episcopus est is qui accusatus est, ejus metropolitanus examinet ea quæ dicta sunt: si vero metropolitanus sit, ejus beatissimus archiepiscopus sub quo degit.

⁶³ Sozom. H. E. lib. 8. c. 6.

⁶⁴ Socrat. H. E. lib. 7. c. 3.

⁶⁵ Sozom. H. E. lib. 8. c. 6.

was done in a synod of seventy bishops held at Ephesus, anno 401, as Valesius⁶⁶ and Du Pin observe out of Palladius, who mentions the same thing, though he speaks but of six bishops then deposed.

5. The patriarch had power to delegate or send a metropolitan into any part of his diocese, as his commissioner, to hear and determine ecclesiastical causes in his name. At least it was so in the diocese of Egypt, where Synesius was bishop. For in one of his epistles,⁶⁷ writing to Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, he tells him what a difficult task he had put upon him, when he sent him through an enemy's country, to Hydrax and Palæbisea, two villages in the confines of Libya, to determine a dispute that was risen there about erecting those places into bishops' sees: But, says he, there lies a necessity upon me, νόμον ἡγήσασθαι, to take every thing for a law that is enjoined me by the throne of Alexandria.

6. And as the metropolitans did every thing that was canonically enjoined them by the patriarch, so they did nothing of any great moment without him; paying the same deference to him, that the canons obliged their suffragans to pay to them. This at least was the custom of Egypt, as appears from a noted passage related in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon,⁶⁸ where we find, that when Pope Leo's epistle against Eutyches was subscribed by all the bishops in council, the Egyptian bishops then present refused to do it, because they had then no patriarch, and it was not lawful for them to do it without the consent of a patriarch, by the rule of the council of Nice, which orders all the bishops of the Egyptian diocese to follow the archbishop of Alexandria, and do nothing without him. This they pleaded in council, and their plea was accepted, and a decree⁶⁹ passed in their favour upon it, That since this was the custom of the Egyptian diocese, to do nothing of this nature without the consent and authority of their archbishop, they should not be compelled to subscribe till a new archbishop was chosen.

7. It was the patriarch's office to publish both ecclesiastical and civil laws, which concerned the church, and to take care for the dispersion and publication of them in all churches of their diocese. The method is prescribed by Justinian in the Epilogue to the sixth Novel: "The patriarchs of every diocese shall publish these our laws in their respective churches, and notify them to the metropolitans under them. The metropoli-tans likewise shall publish them in their metropolitan churches, and make them known to the bishops under them; that so they may publish them in their respective churches, and no one be left ignorant in our whole empire of what we have enacted for the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." See also Novel 42, directed to Menas, patriarch of Constantinople, concluding in the same tenor.

8. Synesius observes another privilege in the diocese of Alexandria, which was, that in the exercise of discipline upon great criminals and scandalous offenders, a peculiar deference was paid to the patriarch, by reserving their absolution to his wisdom and discretion. As he gives an instance in one Lamponianus a presbyter, whom he had excommunicated for abusing Jason his fellow presbyter. "Though," says he,⁷⁰ "he expressed his repentance with tears, and the people interceded for him, yet I refused to absolve him, but remitted him over for that to the sacred see: only assuming this to myself, that if the man should happen to be in manifest danger of death, any presbyter that was present should receive him into communion by my order. For no man shall go excommunicate out of the world by me. But in case he recovered, he should still be liable to the former penalty, and expect the ratification of his pardon from your divine and courteous soul." But whether this respect was paid by all metropolitans to their patriarch in every diocese, I have not yet observed.

9. The last privilege of patriarchs was, that they were originally all co-ordinate and independent of one another. I speak now of them as they were at their first institution: for after ages, and councils, and emperors, made great alteration in this matter. At first learned men⁷¹ reckon there were about thirteen or fourteen patriarchs in the church, that is, one in every capital city of each diocese of the Roman empire; the patriarch of Alexandria over the Egyptian diocese, the patriarch of Antioch over the Eastern diocese, the patriarch of Ephesus over the Asiatic diocese, the patriarch of Cæsarea in Cappadocia over the Pontic diocese; Thessalonica in Macedon or Illyricum Orientale, Sirmium in Illyricum Occidentale, Rome in the Roman præfecture, Milan in the Italian diocese, Carthage in Africa, Lyons in France, Toledo in Spain, and York in the diocese of Britain. The greatest part of these, if not all, were real patriarchs, and independent of one another, till Rome by encroachment, and Constantinople by law, got them-

Sect. 16.
A 5th privilege. Patriarchs might make metropolitans their commissioners, &c.

Sect. 17.
A 6th privilege. The patriarch to be consulted by his metropolitans in matters of any great moment.

Sect. 18.
7. Patriarchs to communicate to the metropolitans such imperial laws as concerned the church, &c.

Sect. 19.
The 8th privilege. Great criminals reserved to the patriarch's absolution.

Sect. 20.
The greater patriarchs absolute and independent of one another.

⁶⁶ Vales. Not. in loc. Du Pin, Biblioth. vol. 3. Vit. Chrys.

⁶⁷ Synes. Ep. 67. p. 208.

⁶⁸ Conc. Chalced. Act. 4. p. 512, 513.

⁶⁹ Conc. Chalced. can. 30. ex Act. 4.

⁷⁰ Synes. Ep. 67. p. 215.

⁷¹ Brerewood, Patriarch. Gov. qu. 1.

selves made superior to some of their neighbours, who became subordinate and subject unto them. The ancient liberties of the Britannic churches, as also the African and Italian diocese, and their long contests with Rome, before they could be brought to yield obedience to her, are largely set forth by several of our learned writers⁷² in particular discourses on this subject. I only here note, that the Eastern patriarchs, Alexandria, Antioch, Ephesus, Cæsarea, and Constantinople, were never subject to Rome, but maintained the ancient liberty which the canons gave them. For though Cæsarea and Ephesus were made subordinate to the patriarch of Constantinople, and any one might appeal from them to him; yet the appeal was to be carried no further,⁷³ unless it were to a general council. Which shows the independency of the greater patriarchs one of another.

The patriarch of Constantinople had also the honourable title of œcumenical, or universal patriarch, given him; probably in regard of the great extent of his jurisdiction. Thus Justinian styles Menas, Epiphanius, and Anthemius, archbishops and œcumenical patriarchs, in several of his rescripts;⁷⁴ and Leo gives the same title to Stephen, archbishop and universal patriarch, in ten laws⁷⁵ one after another. So that it was no such new thing as Pope Gregory made it, for the patriarch of Constantinople to be styled œcumenical bishop: for that title was given him by law many years before, even from the time of Justinian; and it is a vulgar error in history to date the original of that title from the time of Gregory I. which was in use at least a whole century before. But Justinian in another rescript goes a little further, and⁷⁶ says expressly, that Constantinople was the head of all churches. Which is as much as ever any council allowed to Rome, that is, a supremacy in its own diocese, and a precedency of honour in regard that it was the capital city of the empire. Equal privileges are granted to Constantinople upon the same ground, because it was New Rome, and the royal seat, as the councils of Constantinople and Chalcedon,⁷⁷ with some others, word it. So that they had privileges of honour, and privileges of power; the first of which were peculiar to those two sees; the other, in a great measure common to them and all other patriarchal churches, except those of Ephesus and Cæsarea, which, as I have often observed, were legally made subordinate to that of Constantinople.

Some here may be desirous to know, what authority those patriarchs had in the church after their subordination to the other. There are who tell us that they were sunk down to the condition of metropolitans again by the council of Chalcedon: but that is a mistake: for, first, They retained the name of exarchs of the diocese still, and so subscribed themselves in all councils. As in the sixth general council, Theodoret subscribes himself metropolitan of Ephesus and exarch of the Asiatic diocese;⁷⁸ and Philalethes, metropolitan of Cæsarea and exarch of the Pontic diocese. Secondly, They always sat and voted in general councils next immediately after the five great patriarchs, Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, who by the canons⁷⁹ had precedence of all the rest. Next to these, before all the metropolitans, the bishops of Ephesus and Cæsarea took place, as may be seen in the subscriptions of the fourth and sixth general councils.⁸⁰ Thirdly, They had power to receive appeals from metropolitans, which is evident from the same canons of Chalcedon, which give⁸¹ the patriarch of Constantinople power to take appeals from them. So that they were not mere titular patriarchs, as some in after ages, but had the power as well as the name; the right of ordaining metropolitans and receiving ultimate appeals only excepted. But how long they or any others retained their power, is not my business here any further to inquire.

Sect. 22.
Of subordinate patriarchs, what figure they made in the church, and that they were not mere titular patriarchs.

Sect. 21.
The patriarch of Constantinople dignified with the title of œcumenical, and his church head of all churches.

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF THE ΑΥΤΟΚΕΦΑΛΟΙ.

AMONG other titles which were anciently given to some certain bishops, we frequently meet with the name αὐτοκέφαλοι, absolute and independent bishops; which was not the name of any one sort of bishops, but given to several upon different reasons. For first, before the setting up of patriarchs, all metropolitans were αὐτοκέφαλοι, ordering the affairs of their own province with their provincial bishops, and being accountable to no superior but a synod, and that in case of heresy, or some great crime committed against religion and the rules of the church.

Sect. 1.
All metropolitans anciently styled αὐτοκέφαλοι.

⁷² Brerewood, Patr. Gov. qu. 2 et 3. Cave, Anc. Ch. Gov. c. 5.

⁷³ See the authorities cited before, sect. 14.

⁷⁴ See Justin. Novel. 7. 16. 42.

⁷⁵ Leo, Imp. Constit. Novel. 2, 3, &c.

⁷⁶ Just. Cod. lib. 1. tit. 2. c. 24. Constantinopolitana ecclesia omnium aliarum est caput.

⁷⁷ Con. Const. can. 3. Con. Chalced. can. 28. Con. Trull. can. 36. Justin. Novel. 131. c. 2.

⁷⁸ Con. 6. Gen. Act. 18.

⁷⁹ See Conc. Trull. can. 36. et Justin. Novel. 131. c. 2.

⁸⁰ Con. Chalced. Act. 1 et 3. Con. 6. Gen. Act. 18.

⁸¹ Con. Chalc. can. 9 et 17.

And even after the advancement of patriarchs, several metropolitans continued thus independent; receiving their ordination from their own provincial synod, and not from any patriarch; terminating all controversies in their own synods, from which there was no appeal to any superior, except a general council. Balsamon reckons among this sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι the metropolitans of Bulgaria,¹ Cyprus, and Iberia. And his observation is certainly true of the two last, who were only metropolitans, yet independent of any patriarchal or superior power. For though the bishop of Antioch laid claim to the ordination of the Cyprian bishops in the council of Ephesus, yet the council, upon hearing the case, determined against him, making a decree,² That whereas it never had been the custom for the bishop of Antioch to ordain bishops in Cyprus, the Cyprian bishops should retain their rights inviolable, and according to canon and ancient custom ordain bishops among themselves. And this was again repeated and confirmed by the council of Trullo,³ even after the Cypriots were driven into another country by the incursions of the barbarians.

Others⁴ observe the same privilege in the Iberian churches, now commonly called Georgians; that they never were subject either to the patriarch of Constantinople, or any other; but all their bishops, being eighteen in number, profess absolute obedience to their own metropolitan, without any other higher dependence or relation.

And this was the case of the Armenian churches in the time of Photius, as appears from an ancient Greek notitia episcopatum, cited by Peter de Marca,⁵ which says it was an αὐτοκέφαλος, and not subject to the throne of Constantinople, but honoured with independence in respect to St. Gregory of Armenia, their first apostle.

And this was also the ancient liberty of the Britannie church, before the coming of Austin the monk, when the seven British bishops, which were all that were then remaining, paid obedience to the archbishop of Caer-Leon, and acknowledged no superior in spirituals above him. As Dinotus, the learned abbot of Bangor, told Austin⁶ in the name of all the Britannie churches, that they owed no other obedience to the pope of Rome, than they did to every godly Christian, to love every one in his degree in perfect charity: other obedience than this they knew none due to him whom he named pope, &c. But they were under the government of the bishop of Caer-Leon upon Uske, who was their overseer under God.

Besides all these, there was yet a third sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι, which were such bishops as were subject to no metropolitan, but immediately under the patriarch of the diocese, who was to them instead of a metropolitan. Thus for instance, in the patriarchate or large diocese of Constantinople, the ancient Notitia, published by Leunclavius,⁷ reckons thirty-nine such bishops throughout the several provinces: that published by Dr. Beverege⁸ counts them forty-one, and the Notitia in Carolus à Sancto Paulo⁹ augments the number to forty-six. The bishop of Jerusalem is said¹⁰ to have had twenty-five such bishoprics in his patriarchate, and the bishop of Antioch sixteen, as Nilus Doxopatrius, a writer of the eleventh century, in his book of the patriarchal sees, informs us. But what time this sort of independent bishoprics were first set up in the church, is not certain: for the earliest account we have of them is in the Notitia of the emperor Leo Sapiens, written in the ninth century, where they are called archbishoprics, as in some other Notitia's they are called metropolitanical sees; though both these names were but titular, for they had no suffragan bishops under them.

Valesius mentions another sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι, which were such bishops as were wholly independent of all others: as they had no suffragans under them, so neither did they acknowledge any superior above them, whether metropolitan, or patriarch, or any other whatsoever. Of this sort he reckons the bishops of Jerusalem¹¹ before they were advanced to patriarchal dignity: but in this instance he plainly mistakes, and contradicts St. Jerom, who says expressly, that the bishop of Jerusalem was subject to the bishop of Cæsarea, as the metropolitan of all Palestine, and to the bishop of Antioch, as metropolitan of the whole East, as has been noted in the last chapter. If there were any such bishops as he speaks of, they must be such as the bishop of Tomis in Scythia, who, as Sozomen¹² notes, was the only bishop of all the cities of that province: so that he could neither have any suffragans under him, nor metropolitan above him. But such instances are very rare, and we scarce meet with such another example in all the history of the church. I have now completed the account of primitive bishops, and showed the distinctions which were

Sect. 2.
Some metropolitans independent after the setting up of patriarchal power, as those of Cyprus, Iberia, Armenia, and the church of Britain.

Sect. 3.
A third sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι, such bishops as were subject to no metropolitan, but only to the patriarch of the diocese.

Sect. 4.
A fourth sort of αὐτοκέφαλοι.

¹ Balsam. in Con. Constan. l. can. 2.

² Con. Ephes. Act. 7. Decret. de Cypr. Epis.

³ Con. Trull. can. 39.

⁴ Brerewood, Enquir. c. 18. Chytræus de Statu Eccles. &c.

⁵ Marca, de Primat. n. 27. p. 122.

⁶ Spelman. Con. Brit. an. 601. t. 1. p. 108.

⁷ Leunclav. Jus. Gr. Rom. t. 1. lib. 2. p. 88.

⁸ Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2. Not. in can. 36. Concil. Trull.

⁹ Car. a S. Paulo, Append. ad Geogr. Sacr. p. 10.

¹⁰ Nilus Doxopatr. ap. le Moyne Varia Sacra, t. 1.

¹¹ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 5. c. 23. See chap. 17. sect. 7.

¹² Sozom. lib. 6. c. 21. lib. 7. c. 19.

among them in the external polity of the church : I proceed in the next place therefore to consider the second order of the clergy, which is that of presbyters.

CHAPTER XIX.

OF PRESBYTERS.

Sect. 1.
The meaning of the name presbyter.

THE name, πρεσβύτεροι, presbyters or elders, is a word borrowed from the Greek translation of the Old Testament, where it commonly signifies rulers and governors, being (as St. Jerom¹ notes) a name of office and dignity, and not a mere indication of men's age : for elders were chosen, not by their age, but by their merits and wisdom. So that, as a senator among the Romans, and an alderman in our own language, signifies a person of such an order and station, without any regard to his age ; in like manner, a presbyter or elder in the Christian church, is one who is ordained to a certain office, and authorized by his quality, not by his age, to discharge the several duties of that office and station wherein he is placed.

Sect. 2.
Apostles and bishops sometimes called presbyters.

And in this large, extensive sense, it is readily granted by all, that bishops are sometimes called presbyters in the New Testament ; for the apostles themselves do not refuse the title. On the other hand, it is the opinion of many learned men, both ancient² and modern,³ that presbyters were sometimes called bishops, whilst the bishops that were properly such were distinguished by other titles, as that of chief priests and apostles, &c., of which I have given a particular account in one of the preceding chapters, and there evinced that they who maintained this identity of names, did not thence infer an identity of offices, but always esteemed bishops and presbyters to be distinct orders.

Sect. 3.
The original of presbyters properly so called.

Here then, taking presbyters in the strictest sense, for those only of the second order, we must first inquire into their original. The learned Dr. Hammond⁴ advances an opinion about this matter, which is something singular : he asserts, that in Scripture times the name of presbyters belonged principally, if not alone, to bishops ; and that there is no evidence, that any of this second order were then instituted, though soon after, he thinks, before the writing of Ignatius's Epistles, there were such instituted in all churches. The authorities he builds upon are Clemens Romanus and Epiphanius, who say, that in some churches at first there were bishops and deacons, without any presbyters. But I conceive it will not hence follow, that it was so in all churches : nor does Epiphanius maintain that, but the contrary, that as in some churches⁵ there were only bishops and deacons, so in others there were only presbyters and deacons ; and that in large and populous churches the apostles settled both bishops, presbyters, and deacons ; as at Ephesus, where Timothy was bishop, and had presbyters subject to him ; which Epiphanius proves from Scripture : That a bishop and presbyter, says he, are not the same, the apostle informs us, when writing to Timothy, who was a bishop, he bids him not rebuke an elder, but entreat him as a father. How comes the bishop to be concerned not to rebuke an elder, if he had no power over an elder ? In like manner the apostle says, Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses : but he never said to any presbyter, Receive not an accusation against a bishop ; nor did he ever write to any presbyter, not to rebuke a bishop. This plainly implies, that in all such large and populous churches as that of Ephesus, according to Epiphanius, all the three orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons were settled by the apostles ; though the smaller churches were differently supplied at first, some only with presbyters and deacons, before bishops were constituted in them, and others only with bishops and deacons without any presbyters. For all churches had not immediately all the same church officers upon their first foundation, but time was required to complete their constitution, as Bishop Pearson⁶ has observed on this very passage of Epiphanius.

Admitting then that presbyters, as well as bishops, were originally settled in the church by the apostles, Sect. 4.
The power and privileges of presbyters. we are next to inquire into the power and privileges that were proper to their order. And here I shall have occasion to say the less, having already showed⁷ what offices they might perform by virtue of their ordinary power, only acting in dependence on and subordination to their bishop, as the supreme minister of the church : they might baptize, preach, con-

¹ Hieron. in Esai. iii. t. 5. p. 16. in Scripturis Sanctis presbyteros merito et sapientia eligi, non ætate.

² Chrysost. Hom. 1. in Phil. i. It. Hom. 11. in 1 Tim. iii. Theodoret, Com. in Phil. i. l. It. in Phil. ii. 25. et in 1 Tim. iii. l. Ambrosiaster, in Eph. iv. 11. Hieron. Com. in Tit. i. Ep. 83. ad Ocean. et 85. ad Evagr.

³ Usser. Dissert. in Ignat. c. 18. p. 232. It. Orig. of Bish. et Metrop. p. 55. Coteler. Not. in Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes. n. 1.

⁴ Ham. Annot. on Acts xi. 30.

⁵ Epiph. Hær. 75. Aerian. n. 5.

⁶ Pearson, Vind. Ignat. par. 2. c. 13. p. 412. In aliquibus ecclesiis ab origine fuisse presbyteros, nondum constitutis episcopis ; in aliquibus episcopos, nondum constitutis presbyteris.

⁷ See before, chap. 3.

secrate and administer the eucharist, &c. in the bishop's absence, or in his presence, if he authorized and deputed them, as has been noted before: they might also reconcile penitents, and grant them absolution in the bishop's absence: and some think they had power likewise to confirm in cases of necessity by special licence and delegation. But these two things will be considered and discussed more particularly hereafter, when we come to treat of discipline and confirmation. What is further to be noted in this place, is the honour and respect that was paid to them, acting in conjunction with their bishop, who scarce did any thing in the administration and government of the church, without the advice, consent, and amicable concurrence of his presbyters.

Hence it was that presbyters were allowed to sit together with the bishop in the church (which privilege was never allowed to deacons): and their seats were dignified with the name of thrones, as the bishop's was, only with this difference, that his was the high throne, and theirs the second thrones. In allusion to this, Gregory Nazianzen,⁸ speaking of his own ordination to the degree of presbyter, says, his father who ordained him, brought him by violence to the second thrones. And in his vision concerning the church of Anastasia,⁹ he thus represents the several orders of the church: Methought I saw myself (the bishop) sitting on the high throne, and the presbyters, that is, the guides of the Christian flock, sitting on both sides by me on lower thrones, and the deacons standing by them. By this we may understand what Constantine meant in his letter to Chrestus bishop of Syracuse,¹⁰ when giving him a summons to the council of Arles, he bids him also bring with him two of the second throne, that is, two presbyters. And what Eusebius means by those words in his panegyric¹¹ upon the temple of Paulinus, where he says, he beautified and adorned the structure with thrones set up on high for the honour of the presidents or rulers. By which it is plain he means the thrones of the presbyters, as well as the bishop: for they were both exalted above the seats of the common people. Nay, both the name and thing was then so usual, that Aerius drew it into an argument,¹² to prove the identity and parity of bishops and presbyters: a bishop sits upon a throne, and so does a presbyter likewise. Which though it be but a very lame and foolish argument to prove what he intended, yet it is a plain intimation of what has here been noted to have been the then known custom and practice of the church. And little regard is to be had to those modern authors, who pretend to say, that presbyters had not power to sit in the presence of their bishops; which is confuted by the acts and canons¹³ almost of every council, and the writings of every ancient author, in which nothing more commonly occurs than the phrases, consessus presbyterorum, and sedere in presbyterio, importing the custom and privilege whereof we are now speaking.

There is one thing further to be noted concerning the manner of their sitting, which was on each hand of the bishop, in the form or figure of a semicircle; which is described by the author¹⁴ of the Constitutions under the name of Clemens Romanus, and Gregory Nazianzen, and others. Whence, as the bishop's throne is called the middle throne, or the middle seat, by Theodoret¹⁵ and the Constitutions; so for the same reason Ignatius¹⁶ and the Constitutions¹⁷ term the presbyters the spiritual crown or circle of the presbytery, and the crown of the church: unless we will take this for a metaphorical expression, to denote only that presbyters, united with their bishop, were the glory of the church.

This honour was done them in regard to their authority in the church, wherein they were considered as a sort of ecclesiastical senate, or council to the bishop, who scarce did any thing of great weight and moment without asking their advice, and taking their consent, to give the greater force and authority to all public acts done in the name of the church. Upon which account, St. Chrysostom¹⁸ and Synesius¹⁹ style them the court or sanhedrim of the presbyters; and Cyprian,²⁰ the sacred and venerable bench of the clergy; St. Jerom²¹ and others,²² the church's senate, and the Sect. 5. Presbyters allowed to sit with the bishop on thrones in the church.

Sect. 6. The form of their sitting in a semicircle: whence they were called corona presbyterii.

Sect. 7. Presbyters the ecclesiastical senate, or council of the church, whom the bishop consulted and advised with upon all occasions.

⁸ Naz. Carm. de Vita, κάμπτε βιαίως εἰς δευτέρους θρόνους.

⁹ Id. Somn. de Ecclesia Anastasiæ. Orat. 20. de Laud. Basil. p. 4. δεύτερα τῆς καθεδράς.

¹⁰ Ap. Euseb. lib. 10. c. 5. δύο γέ τινας τῶν ἐκ τοῦ δευτέρου θρόνου.

¹¹ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. ¹² Epiphan. Hær. 75. Aerian.

¹³ Con. Carthag. 4. c. 35, 36. Euseb. lib. 5. c. 20. Origen. Hom. 2. in Cantic. Con. Laodic. c. 56. Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. Con. Ancyra. c. 18.

¹⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. Κεῖσθω δὲ μέσος ὁ τοῦ ἐπισκόπου θρόνος, &c.

¹⁵ Theod. Hist. lib. 5. c. 3. Ὁ μέσος θῶκος.

¹⁶ Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes. n. 13. πνευματικὸν τέφανον τῆ πρεσβυτερίου.

¹⁷ Constit. lib. 2. c. 28. τεφανὸν ἐκκλησίας.

¹⁸ Chrys. de Sacerdot. lib. 3. c. 15. τὸ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων συνέδριον.

¹⁹ Synes. Ep. 67. ad Theoph.

²⁰ Cypr. Ep. 55. al. 59. ad Cornel. Cleri sacrum venerandumque consessum. Concil. Carth. 4. c. 35. Episcopus in consessu presbyterorum sublimior sedeat, &c.

²¹ Hieron. in Esai. iii. tom. 5. p. 17. Et nos habemus in ecclesia senatum nostrum, cætum presbyterorum.

²² Pius, Ep. 2. ad Just. Vien. Salutat te senatus pauper Christi apud Romam constitutus.

senate of Christ; Origen²³ and the author of the Constitutions,²⁴ the bishop's counsellors, and the council of the church: because though the bishop was prince and head of this ecclesiastical senate, and nothing could regularly be done without him; yet neither did he ordinarily do any public act, relating to the government or discipline of the church, without their advice and assistance.

The first ages afford the most pregnant proofs of this Divine harmony between the bishop and his presbyters. For any one that ever looked into the writings of Cyprian, must acknowledge, that at Rome and Carthage, the two great churches of the West, all things were thus transacted by joint consent: the bishop with his clergy did communi consilio ponderare,²⁵ weigh things by common advice and deliberation; whether it was in the ordinations of the clergy, (for Cyprian would not so much as ordain a subdeacon or a reader without their consent,) or whether it was in the exercise of discipline and reconciliation of penitents, Cyprian declares²⁶ his resolution to do all by common consent. And so Cornelius at the same time acted at Rome: for when Maximus and the rest of the confessors, who had sided with Novatian, came afterward and made confession of their error, and desired to be admitted again into the communion of the church, Cornelius would do nothing in it, till he had first called a presbytery, and taken both their advice and consent²⁷ in the affair, that he might proceed according to their unanimous resolution. Cyprian, in several other of his epistles,²⁸ speaks of the same deference paid to his presbytery, and in one place he more particularly tells them, that it was a law and a rule²⁹ that he had laid down to himself, from the first entrance on his bishopric, that he would do nothing without their advice, and the consent of the people. Epiphanius observes the same practice at Ephesus in the condemnation of Noëtus: for first, he says, he was convened before the presbytery,³⁰ and then again upon a relapse by them expelled the church. Which at least must mean, that the bishop and his presbyters joined together in this ecclesiastical censure. In like manner, speaking of the first condemnation of Arius, he says, Alexander, bishop of Alexandria,³¹ called a presbytery against him, before whom, and some bishops then present, he examined him, and expelled him. Cotelierius, in his Notes upon the Constitutions, has published, from an ancient manuscript, one of the forms of Arius's deposition,³² which may give some light to this matter. For thereby it appears, that when Alexander sent forth his circular letters to all other bishops against Arius, he first summoned all the presbyters and deacons of Alexandria, and region of Mareotes, not only to hear what he had written, but also to testify their consent to it, and declare that they agreed with him in the condemnation of Arius. From whence we learn, that though the deposition was properly the bishop's act, yet, to have it done with the greater solemnity, the consent both of the presbyters and deacons was required to it. And thus it was also in the condemnation of Origen: the council of Alexandria, which expelled him the city, was composed both of bishops and presbyters, who decreed that he should remove from Alexandria, and neither teach nor inhabit there, as Pamphilus³³ relates in the second book of his Apology for Origen, some fragments of which are preserved in Photius. The council of Rome, that was gathered against Novatian, consisted of sixty bishops, and many more³⁴ presbyters and deacons. The first council of Antioch, that was held against Paulus Samosatensis, had also³⁵ presbyters and deacons in it; the name of one of them, Malchion, a presbyter of Antioch, is still remaining in the synodical epistle among the bishops in the inscription.

From all which it appears, that this was an ancient privilege of presbyters, to sit and deliberate with bishops both in their consistorial and provincial councils. And if we ascend yet higher, we shall find matters always thus transacted in the church ab origine; as appears from Ignatius, whose writings (as a learned man observes,³⁶) speak as much for the honour of the presbytery, as they do for the superi-

²³ Orig. Com. in Mat. βουλή ἐκκλησίας. Pearson, Vind. Ignat. par. 1. c. 11. p. 321. Hi autem βουλευται Christiani sane fuerunt presbyteri.

²⁴ Const. Apost. lib. 2. c. 28. σύμβουλοι τοῦ ἐπισκόπου, συνέριον καὶ βουλή τῆς ἐκκλησίας.

²⁵ Cypr. Ep. 33. al. 38. ad Cler. In ordinationibus clericis solemus vos ante consulere, et mores ac merita singulorum communi consilio ponderare.

²⁶ Id. Ep. 6. al. 14. ad Cler. Ut ea quæ circa ecclesie gubernaculum utilitas communis exposcit, tractare simul, et plurimorum consilio examinata limare possemus.

²⁷ Cornel. Ep. 46. al. 49. ad Cypr. p. 92. Omni actu ad me perlato, placuit contrahi presbyterium—ut firmato consilio, quid circa personam eorum observari deberet, consensu omnium statueretur.

²⁸ Cypr. Ep. 24. al. 29. ad Cler. Ep. 32. ad Cler.

²⁹ Cypr. Ep. 6. al. 14. Quando a primordio episcopatus mei statuerim, nihil sine consilio vestro, et sine consensu plebis, mea privata sententia gerere: sed cum ad vos per Dei gratiam venero—in commune tractabimus.

³⁰ Epiph. Hær. 57. n. 1. ἐπὶ πρεσβυτερίῳ ἀγόμενος. Ibid. οἱ αὐτοὶ πρεσβύτεροι ἐξέωσαν αὐτὸν τῆς ἐκκλησίας.

³¹ Epiph. Hær. 69. Arian n. 3. συγκαλεῖται τὸ πρεσβυτερίον, καὶ ἄλλους τινας ἐπισκόπους παρόντας, &c.

³² Depositio Arian ap. Cotelier. Not. in Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 28. "Ἰνα καὶ τὰ νῦν γραφόμενα γνῶτε, τὴν τε ἐν τούτοις συμφωνίαν ἐαυτῶν ἐπίδειξησθε, καὶ τῇ καθαιρέσει τῶν περὶ Ἄρειον σύμψηφοι γένησθε.

³³ Pamphil. Apol. ap. Phot. Cod. 118 p. 298. Σύνοδος ἀθροίζεται: ἐπισκόπων καὶ τινῶν πρεσβυτέρων κατ' Ὀριγένους.

³⁴ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

³⁵ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 28.

³⁶ Pearson, Vind. Ignat. par. 2. c. 16. p. 428. Si quid ego in hac re intelligo, quicumque presbyterali dignitati

ority of episcopacy; no ancient author having given so many great and noble characters of the presbytery, as he does. For which reason it concerns those, who are most zealous for the honour and authority of presbyters, to look upon Ignatius as one of the best asserters and defenders of their power and reputation. For he always joins the bishops and presbyters together, as presiding over the church, the one in the place of God and Jesus Christ, and the other as the great council of God in the room of the apostles. Thus in his epistle³⁷ to the Ephesians, he bids them be subject to the bishop and the presbytery: and in his epistle to the Magnesians,³⁸ he commends Sotion the deacon, because he was subject to the bishop, as the gift of God, and to the presbytery, as the law of Christ. And a little after in the same epistle, he speaks of the bishop as presiding³⁹ in the place of God, and the presbyters in the place of the council of apostles. So in his epistle to the Trallians,⁴⁰ he bids them be subject to the presbytery, as to the apostles of Jesus Christ. And again, Reverence the presbyters,⁴¹ as the council of God, and the united company of apostles. Without which no church is called a church. Several other passages of the same importance may be seen in his epistles to Polycarp and the church of Smyrna.⁴²

And indeed all his epistles are so full of great eulogiums of the presbytery, as acting in the nature of an ecclesiastical senate together with the bishop, that our late learned defender of those epistles thence concludes, that the power and privileges of presbyteries was greater in the second century, when Ignatius lived, than in the fourth age of the church, when he thinks the power and authority of presbyteries was a little sunk and diminished over all the world, and even at Alexandria itself, where it had most of all flourished. And this he makes an argument of the antiquity of those epistles, that they were the genuine product of Ignatius, because no one of the fourth age would have given such encomiums of the presbytery, or armed⁴³ them with so great authority and power. I shall not dispute this matter, nor enter upon any nice comparison of the

Sect. 9.
The power of presbyters thought by some to be a little diminished in the fourth century.

autoritative maxime student, non habent sue existimationis firmiter aut solidius fundamentum, quàm epistolae sancti Ignatii nostri: neque enim in ullo vere antiquo Scriptore extra has epistolas tot ac tanta presbyteratus præconia inveniunt, neque illius ordinis honorem sine episcopatus prærogativa ullibi constitutum reperit.

³⁷ Ignat. Ep. ad Ephes. n. 2. ὑποτασσόμενοι τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ καὶ πρεσβυτερίῳ.

³⁸ Ep. ad Magnes. n. 2.

³⁹ Ep. ad Magnes. n. 6. Προκαθημένου ἐπισκόπου εἰς τὸ πῶν Θεοῦ, καὶ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων εἰς τὸ πῶν συνεδρίου τῶν ἀποστόλων.

⁴⁰ Ep. ad Trall. n. 2. Ὑποτάσσεσθε τῷ πρεσβυτερίῳ ὡς τοῖς ἀποστόλοις.

⁴¹ Ibid. n. 3. Ὡς συνέδριον Θεοῦ, καὶ ὡς σύνδεσμον ἀποστόλων. Χωρὶς τούτων ἐκκλησία οὐ καλεῖται.

⁴² Ep. ad Polycarp. n. 6. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 8.

different powers of presbyters in these two ages, but only represent to the reader what privileges still remained to them in the fourth century.

And here it cannot be denied, but that in this age, in the ordination of a presbyter, all the presbyters that were present were allowed, nay, even required, to join with the bishop in imposition of hands upon the party to be ordained. That it was so in the African churches is beyond all dispute; for in the fourth council of Carthage,⁴⁴ there is a canon expressly enjoining it: When a presbyter is ordained, while the bishop pronounces the benediction, and lays his hand upon his head, all the presbyters that are present shall lay their hands by the bishop's hand upon his head also. And this in all likelihood was the universal practice of the church. For in the Constitutions of the Church of Alexandria,⁴⁵ there is a rule to the same purpose. In the Latin church the decree of the council of Carthage seems also to have prevailed, because it is inserted into their canon law by Gratian⁴⁶ and other collectors, from whence it became the common practice of our own church, which is continued to this day. Some ancient canons⁴⁷ indeed say, that one bishop alone shall ordain a presbyter; but that is not said to exclude presbyters from assisting, but only to put a difference between the ordination of a bishop and a presbyter; for the ordination of a bishop could not regularly be performed without the concurrence of three bishops with the metropolitan; but a presbyter might be ordained by a single bishop, without any other assistance, save that of his presbyters joining with him. And this plainly appears to have been the practice of the fourth century.

Sect. 10.
Yet still they were admitted to join with the bishop in the imposition of hands in the ordination of presbyters.

It is further evident from the records of the same age, that presbyters had still the privilege of sitting in consistory with their bishops. For Pope Siricius, in the latter end of this century, acted as Cornelius had done before him. When he went about to condemn the errors of Jovinian, he first called⁴⁸ a presbyter, and with their advice censured his doctrines,

Sect. 11.
And allowed to sit in consistory with their bishops.

⁴³ Pearson, Vindic. Ignat. par. 2. c. 16. p. 423. Nemo tam seris ecclesie temporibus—Presbyterium tot laudibus cumulasset, tanta auctoritate armasset, cujus potestas ea tempestate, etiam Alexandriae, ubi maxime floruerat, tantopere imminuta est.

⁴⁴ Con. Carth. 4. c. 3. Presbyter cum ordinatur, episcopo eum benedicente, et manum super caput ejus tenente, etiam omnes presbyteri, qui praesentes sunt, manus suas juxta manum episcopi super caput illius tenent.

⁴⁵ Eccl. Alex. Constit. c. 6. ap. Bevereg. Not. in Canon. Apost. c. 2. Cum vult episcopus ordinare presbyterum, manum suam capiti ejus imponat, simulque omnes presbyteri istud tangant.

⁴⁶ Grat. Dist. 23. c. 8. Ivo Part. 6. c. 12.

⁴⁷ Can. Apost. c. 2. Con. Carthag. 3. c. 45.

⁴⁸ Siric. Ep. 2. ad Eccles. Mediolan. Facto presbyterio, constituit doctrinae nostrae, id est, Christianae, legi esse con-and then, with the consent of the deacons also and the rest of the clergy, expelled him the church. And so likewise Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, proceeded against Andronicus, the impious and blaspheming prefect of Pentapolis; he first laid open his horrible crimes before the consistory of his church, and then, with their consent, pronounced the sentence of excommunication against him; which he therefore calls the act of the consistory,⁴⁹ or sanhedrim of Ptolemais, in the circular letters which he wrote to give notice of his excommunication to other churches. Baronius indeed, and the common editors of the councils, reckon this by mistake among the provincial synods; but it appears evidently from Synesius, that it was only the private consistory of the church of Ptolemais; for he says expressly,⁵⁰ The church of Ptolemais gave notice of this excommunication to all her sister churches throughout the world, requiring them to hold Andronicus excommunicated, and not to despise her act, as being only a poor church in a small city. Which agrees very well with the state of a private consistory, but is not spoken in the style of a provincial council.

Yet this is not said with any design to deny that presbyters were allowed to sit in provincial synods; for there are undeniable evidences of their enjoying this privilege within the compass of the fourth century, and after ages also. In the council of Eliberis, which was held in the beginning of the fourth age, there were no less than thirty-six presbyters⁵¹ sitting together with the bishops, as is expressly said in the acts of the council. The first council of Arles, called by Constantine, had also several presbyters in it, the names of many of which are lost, as are also the names of most of the bishops, who were two hundred, yet the names of fifteen presbyters⁵² are still remaining. And it is observable, that in Constantine's tractoriae, or letters of summons, the presbyters, as well as bishops, were called by imperial edict to attend at that council; if we may judge of all the rest by that one example, which remains upon record in Eusebius; for there, in the letter sent to summon Chrestus, bishop of Syracuse, orders are given him⁵³ to bring along with him two of the second throne; which phrase, as has been observed before, denotes two presbyters. So that from hence it is clear, that presbyters were then privileged to sit in council with their bishops, and that by imperial edict. In Justellus's Bibliotheca Juris Canonici, there are three or four Roman councils, where the presbyters are particularly mentioned as sitting, and sometimes voting with the bishops. In the council under Hilarius, anno 461, the presbyters of Rome all sat⁵⁴ together with the bishops, and the deacons stood by them. So again in the council under Felix, anno 487,⁵⁵ the names of seventy-six presbyters are mentioned that sat together with the bishops in council, the deacons as before standing by them. And in the council under Symmachus, anno 499, sixty-seven presbyters and six deacons subscribed in the very same form of words⁵⁶ as the bishops did. In another council under the same Symmachus, anno 502, thirty-six presbyters are named,⁵⁷ who sat therein. And in the council under Gregory II., anno 715, the bishops, presbyters, and deacons all subscribe in the same form⁵⁸ to the decrees then published by them all together.

The like instances may be seen in the first councils of Toledo,⁵⁹ and Bracara,⁶⁰ where we may also observe the difference made between presbyters and deacons; that the presbyters are always represented as sitting together with their bishops, but the deacons only standing by to attend them. All which notwithstanding, Cellotius the Jesuit, and some others of that strain, have the confidence to assert, that presbyters were never allowed to sit with bishops in their councils. Bellarmin⁶¹ does not go so far, but only denies them a decisive voice there: in which assertion he is opposed, not only by the generality of protestant writers,⁶² but also by Habertus⁶³ and other learned defenders⁶⁴ of the Gallian liberties in his own communion. So that it is agreed on all hands by unprejudiced writers, and traria—Unde omnium nostrorum tam presbyterorum et diaconorum, quam totius cleri unam scitote fuisse sententiam, ut Jovinianus, Auxentius, &c., in perpetuum damnati, extra ecclesiam remanerent.

⁴⁹ Synes. Ep. 57. p. 190. Νυνὶ δὲ οἷς τὸ συνέδριον μετ- ἤλθε τῆν Ἀνδρονίκου μανίαν, ἀκούσατε.

⁵⁰ Id. Ep. 58. p. 199.

⁵¹ Con. Eliber. Proem. Residentibus etiam 36 [al. 26] presbyteris, astantibus diaconibus et omni plebe.

⁵² Con. Arelat. l. in Catalogo eorum qui Concilio interfuerunt. In Edit. Crab. male vocatur Secundum.

⁵³ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 5. Συζεύξας σεαυτῶ και δύο γέ τινας τῶν ἐκ τοῦ δευτέρου θρόνου.

⁵⁴ Con. Rom. ap. Justel. t. 1. p. 250. Residentibus etiam universis presbyteris, adstantibus quoque diaconis, &c.

⁵⁵ Ibid. p. 255.

⁵⁶ Ibid. p. 259. Subscripserunt presbyteri numero 67. Cælius Laurentius archipresbyter tituli Praxedis hic subscripsi et consensi synodalibus constitutis, atque in hac me profiteor manere sententia, &c.

⁵⁷ Ibid. p. 261. Residentibus etiam presbyteris, Projectitio, Martino, &c. Adstantibus quoque diaconis.

⁵⁸ Ibid. p. 234. Sisinnius presbyter huic constituto, a nobis promulgato, subscripsi. Petrus archidiaconus huic constituto, a nobis promulgato subscripsi.

⁵⁹ Con. Tolet. 1. Convenientibus episcopis in ecclesia—considentibus presbyteris, astantibus diaconis, &c.

⁶⁰ Con. Bracar. 2. Considentibus simul episcopis, præsentibus quoque presbyteris, astantibusque ministris, vel universo clero.

⁶¹ Bellarm. de Concil. lib. 1. c. 15.

⁶² Morton, Apol. Cathol. part 2. lib. 4. c. 8. Whitaker, de Concil. Quæst. 3.

⁶³ Habertus, Not. in lib. Pontiff. Grægor. p. 175.

⁶⁴ Ranchin, Review of the Council of Trent, lib. 1. c. 8.

curious searchers of antiquity, that pre-byters had liberty to sit and deliberate with bishops in provincial councils.

But to general or universal councils, there are some protestant writers, who seem to make it a dispute, whether presbyters anciently were allowed to sit in them. A learned person⁶⁵ of our own church says, It was never before heard of, that priests did sit in œcumenical councils, meaning, before the council of Lateran under Callistus the Second, anno 1123, where six hundred abbots were present. But I see no reason why we may not reckon the first council of Arles a general council, if a multitude of bishops from all quarters can make it so: for there were two hundred bishops present; and, as I noted before, several presbyters were ordered to come along with them. However, the council of Constantinople, anno 381, is reckoned by all a general council (though there were but one hundred and fifty bishops in it); and there we find three presbyters together⁶⁶ subscribing among the bishops also. The learned Habertus⁶⁷ gives several other instances out of the council of Chalcedon, the second council of Nice, the eighth council called against Photius, and others. From all which, and what has here been alleged, it must be concluded, that presbyters had anciently the privilege of sitting and voting also in general councils.

These prerogatives of presbyters, being thus allowed in so many cases to act in conjunction with their bishops, advanced their character and reputation very high, and made them of great esteem in the church: insomuch that many of the same titles of honour, which were given to bishops, were with a little variation given to presbyters also. Hence they are called πρόεδροι, by Synesius and Eusebius;⁶⁸ προεστῶτες, by Nazianzen and Basil;⁶⁹ προστᾶται, by Chrysostom and Nazianzen⁷⁰ likewise: which names answer to the titles of præpositi and antistites in Latin, and signify presidents, or rulers and governors of the people.

I know indeed some learned persons⁷¹ are of opinion, that the name antistes is never given to any presbyter by any ancient writer. But this assertion must be understood with a little qualification; otherwise it will not be exactly true: for Hilarius Sardus,⁷² speaking of presbyters, against whom a bishop is not to receive an accusation, but before two or three witnesses, gives them expressly the title of antistites Dei. So does also the author⁷³ of the Questions upon the Old and New Testament under the name of St. Austin. And though præpositi in Cyprian's epistles commonly signifies bishops, yet it does not always so: for the presbyters of Rome, writing⁷⁴ to the clergy of Carthage, style themselves præpositi; and Celerinus,⁷⁵ in his epistle to Lucian, gives them the same title. But Sidonius Apollinaris⁷⁶ sets this matter right, when he teacheth us to distinguish between an antistes of the first order, and an antistes of the second; which distinction, whenever presbyters are called antistites, if it be not expressed, is always to be understood. Therefore Blondel argues very loosely, when he would infer from this community of names and titles, that bishops and presbyters were but one and the same order. Which might as well be inferred from the name, sacerdotes, priests, which so frequently occurs in the ancient writers; and, as Cyprian observes,⁷⁷ denotes an honour common both to bishops and presbyters: though when there was occasion to speak more accurately and distinctly of bishops, their appropriate title was that of summi sacerdotes, chief priests, to distinguish them from those of the inferior order, as I have showed before in speaking of the titles of bishops; to which I shall only add here the testimony of Optatus, who⁷⁸ gives both bishops, priests, and deacons the name of priests, and their office the name of priesthood; but with this difference, that the deacons were only in the third degree of priesthood, and the presbyters in the second, but the bishops were the heads and chief of all. From whence it is plain, that if a bare community of names argued an identity of offices, one might as well infer, that bishops and deacons, antistites Dei sunt, in domo Dei et in honore Christi cum dignitate consistunt.

⁷⁴ Ep. 3. al. 8. ap. Cyprian. Cum incumbat nobis qui videmur præpositi esse, et vice pastoris custodire gregem.

⁷⁵ Celerin. Ep. 21. ap. Cypr. Præceperunt eos præpositi tantisper sic esse, donec episcopus constituatur.

⁷⁶ Sidon. lib. 4. Ep. 11. Antistes fuit ordine in secundo, fratrem fasce levans episcopali.

⁷⁷ Cypr. Ep. 58. al. 61. ad Lucium, p. 145. Presbyteri cum episcopo sacerdotali honore conjuncti.

⁷⁸ Optat. lib. 1. p. 35. Quid commemorem diaconos in tertio? Quid presbyteros in secundo sacerdotio constitutos? Ipsi apices et principes omnium, aliqui episcopi illis temporibus—Instrumenta divinæ legis impie tradiderunt. Confer Hieron. Epist. 27, where he calls presbyters, secundi ordinis sacerdotes.

⁶⁵ Bishop Burnet's Vindication of the Ordination, &c. Pref. p. 32.

⁶⁶ Con. Constantin. t. 2. p. 957. Tyrannus presbyter Amori: Auxanon presbyter Apameæ: Helladius presbyter Commanenensis.

⁶⁷ Habert. Not. in Pontif. p. 175.

⁶⁸ Synes. Ep. 12. Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4.

⁶⁹ Naz. Orat. 1. Basil. Reg. Moral. 70.

⁷⁰ Chrys. Hom. 11. in 1 Tim. iv. 1. Naz. Orat. 1. p. 37.

⁷¹ Bevereg. Not. in Concil. Ancyr. c. 13. Neque enim presbyter unquam antistes dicitur.

⁷² Ambros. al. Hilar. Com. in 1 Tim. v. Hujus ordinis sublimis honor est; hujusmodi enim vicarii sunt Christi: idcirco non facile de hac persona accusatio debet admitti. Incredibile enim debet videri, istum qui Dei antistes est, criminose versatum.

⁷³ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test. c. 101. Propter quod or presbyters and deacons, were but one and the same order, because they share in the same common titles of priest and priesthood.

If here it be inquired, as it is very natural to ask the question, Why Optatus gives all the three orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, the title of priesthood? the answer is plain and obvious: Because according to him every order had its share, though in different degrees, in the Christian priesthood. Which is not, as some imagine, a power to offer Christ's body and blood really upon the altar, as a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and dead; (which is such a notion of the Christian priesthood, as no ancient author or ritual ever mentions;) but it consists in a power and authority to minister publicly according to God's appointment in holy things, or things pertaining to God. And there are several parts of this power, according to the different participation of which, in the opinion of Optatus, bishops, presbyters, and deacons had each their respective share in the priesthood. Thus it was one act of the priest's office to offer up the sacrifice of the people's prayers, praises, and thanksgivings to God, as their mouth and orator, and to make intercession to God for them; another part of the office was, in God's name to bless the people, particularly by admitting them to the benefit and privilege of remission of sins by spiritual regeneration or baptism. And thus far deacons were anciently allowed to minister in holy things, as mediators between God and the people. Upon which account a late learned writer⁷⁹ joins entirely with Optatus, in declaring deacons to be sharers in this lowest degree of the Christian priesthood. Above this, was the power of offering up to God the people's sacrifices at the altar; that is, as Mr. Mede⁸⁰ and others explain them, first the eucharistical oblations of bread and wine, to agnize or acknowledge God to be the Lord of the creatures; then the sacrifice of prayer and thanksgiving in commemoration of Christ's bloody sacrifice upon the cross, mystically represented in the creatures of bread and wine; which whole sacred action was commonly called the Christian's reasonable and unbloody sacrifice, or the sacrifice of the altar. Now, the deacons (as we shall see in the next chapter) were never allowed to offer these oblations at the altar, but it was always a peculiar act of the presbyter's office, which was therefore reckoned a superior degree of the priesthood. Another act of the priestly office was, to interpret the mind and will of God to the people; as also to bless them solemnly in his name, and upon confession and repentance, grant them ministerial absolution. And these being also the ordinary offices of presbyters, they gave them a further title to the priesthood. All these offices, and some more the bishops⁸¹ could perform, such as the solemn consecration or benediction of persons set apart for the ministry, &c., which, together with their spiritual jurisdiction, or power of ruling and governing the church, as vicars of Christ, gave them a title to a yet higher degree of the Christian priesthood; whence, as I noted before, they were called chief priests, primi sacerdotes, summi sacerdotes, principes sacerdotum, and pontifices maximi. I know indeed, Albaspiny and several others of the Roman⁸² communion make a distinction between the prelatial and sacerdotal office in a bishop, which is invented to serve some peculiar hypotheses of their own; as, 1. That a bishop differs nothing from a presbyter as he is a priest; 2. That bishop and presbyter are but one sacerdotal order; and, 3. That the proper notion and specific character of the sacerdotal order, is a power to offer Christ's body and blood, as a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and dead. All which are contrary to the plain sense of antiquity, which knew no such specific character of the sacerdotal order, nor ever dreamt of bishops and presbyters being but one order in reference to the priesthood; but always spake of them as distinct orders, and placed their distinction in their enjoying different powers of the priesthood; making presbyters only the second order, and second priesthood, secundus ordo et secundum sacerdotium, and bishops the first; and asserting that the juridical acts of a bishop were also sacerdotal, or acts of a superior degree of the Christian priesthood peculiar to his order. St. Cyprian⁸³ scruples not to call such acts, sacerdotii vigor, the vigour and power of the episcopal priesthood, speaking of the power and jurisdiction which he had as the priest of God, to punish presbyters and deacons that were under him; which he had improperly called the power of his priesthood, had his jurisdiction and priesthood been two different powers in him. This may serve at once to caution the reader against that subtle distinction of the Romanists, and give him a short account both of the nature and different degrees of the Christian priesthood.

There is another name frequently occurring in the Greek writers, when they speak of Christian priests, which will deserve to be explained: that is, the name, μεσίται, mediators between God and men; a title given them by the author of the Constitutions,⁸⁴

⁷⁹ Dr. Hicks' Discourse of the Christian Priesthood, c. 2. § 5. p. 33.

⁸⁰ Mede, Christ. Sacrif. c. 2. p. 356. Hicks, ibid. p. 49. with many others cited by him.

⁸¹ Epiphanius calls it, Ἱερωργεῖν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, Hæc.

79. n. 3. See before, chap. 2. sect. 6.

⁸² Bellarm. de Cleric. lib. 1. c. 11. Canisius Catech. de Sacram. Ord. § 4.

⁸³ Cypr. Ep. 15. al. 20.

⁸⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 25.

Sec. 16.
Why priests called mediators between God and men.

as also by Origen, Chrysostom, Basil, Isidore of Pelusium, and many others, whose authorities are collected by Cotelerius.⁸⁵ The Latin writers are more sparing in the use of this term; for except St. Jerom, Cotelerius could find none that used it. St. Austin is so far from using it, that he condemns it⁸⁶ as intolerable in Parmenian the Donatist, who had said, that the bishop was mediator between God and the people. And, indeed, there is a sense in which it is intolerable to say, there is any other mediator besides one, the man Christ Jesus. But the Greek fathers used the word in a qualified sense, not for an authentic mediator, or mediator of redemption, who pleads his own merits before God in the behalf of others; but only for a mediator of ministerial intercession, in which sense some⁸⁷ of the ancients think Moses is called a mediator by St. Paul, Gal. iii. 19, because he was the internuncius to relate the mind of God to the people, and the people's requests and resolutions to God again. And in this qualified sense it is generally owned⁸⁸ that Christian priests may be called mediators also, as those that are appointed to convey the people's devotions to God, and the will and blessing of God to the people.

Having thus far spoken of the several offices and titles of presbyters, it remains that I give a short account of the form and manner of their ordination, by which they were invested with their power, and authorized to perform the several duties of their function. Now, as to this, it is plain, the ancient form was only imposition of hands and a consecration prayer. Thus it is described in the canon⁸⁹ of the council of Carthage, which has been cited before, and in the author under the name of Dionysius,⁹⁰ who represents it in this manner: he says, The person to be ordained kneeled before the bishop at the altar, and he, laying his hand upon his head, did consecrate him with a holy prayer, and then signed him with the sign of the cross; after which the bishop and the rest of the clergy that were present gave him the kiss of peace. The author of the Constitutions⁹¹ speaks also of imposition of hands and prayer, but no more. From which we may reasonably conclude, that the words which the Roman church makes to be the most necessary and essential part of the priest's ordination, viz. "Receive thou power to offer sacrifice to God, and to celebrate mass both for the living and the dead," were not in any of the ancient forms of consecration. One of their own writers,⁹² Morinus, after the most diligent search he could make into these matters, could find no form for nine hundred years together, that made any mention of them. And for their other ceremonies superadded to the old ones, other learned writers of that church do as ingenuously confess the novelty of them. Habertus⁹³ proves against Catumsiritus, that material unction is a new thing, and not to be met with in any ancient ordination; as neither is it in use in the Greek church at this day. So that when Gregory Nazianzen⁹⁴ and others speak of an unction, they are to be understood as speaking mystically of the spiritual unction of the Holy Ghost. Cabassutius⁹⁵ observes the same of the custom of delivering the sacred vessels into the hands of the person that was ordained, that however some plead very stiffly for its antiquity, yet it is really but a modern custom; and he cites Morinus for the same opinion. So that I need not stand, to show the novelty of these things, which is so evidently proved, as well by the confession of these learned men, as by the silence of all ancient rituals. But there is one thing the reader may be desirous to know further, viz. what form of words the consecration prayer was conceived in. To which I must answer, as I have done before about bishops, that there was no such general form then extant; but every bishop having liberty to frame his own liturgy, he used such a form as he thought convenient in his own church: it being a thing indifferent, as a learned person⁹⁶ observes, so the substance of the blessing were preserved. The only form now remaining is that which is extant in the Constitutions, which, because it will show the reader what was then the substance of the benediction, I will here insert the words of it, which are these: "Look, O Lord, upon this thy servant, who is chosen into the presbytery by the suffrage and judgment of all the clergy, and fill him with the spirit of grace and counsel, that he may help and govern thy people with a pure heart: in like manner as thou hadst respect to thy chosen people, commanding Moses to make choice of elders, whom thou didst replenish with thy Spirit. And now, Lord, do the same thing, preserving in us the never-failing Spirit of thy grace: that he being full of healing powers and instructive discourse, may with meekness

⁸⁵ Coteler. Not. ibid.

⁸⁶ Aug. Cont. Parmen. lib. 2. c. 8. Si Johannes diceret —mediatorem me habetis apud Patrem, et ego exoro pro peccatis vestris, (sicut Parmenianus quodam loco posuit episcopum mediator inter populum et Deum,) quis eum ferret bonorum atque fidelium Christianorum?

⁸⁷ Basil. de Spir. S^{co} c. 14. Theodor. Com. in Gal. iii. 19.

⁸⁸ See Dr. Potter, Ch. Gov. c. 5. p. 251. Coteler. Not. in Constit. lib. 2. c. 25.

⁸⁹ Con. Carth. 4. c. 3. cited before, sect. 10.

⁹⁰ Dionys. de Eccles. Hierarch. c. 5. part 2. p. 364.

⁹¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 16.

⁹² See Bishop Burnet of Ordination, p. 24, who cites Morinus.

⁹³ Habert., Observ. in Pontif. Græc. p. 356

⁹⁴ Naz. Orat. 5. p. 136.

⁹⁵ Cabassut. Notit. Concil. c. 43.

⁹⁶ Bishop Burn. Vindication of the Ordination, &c. p. 25.

teach thy people, and serve thee sincerely with a pure mind, and willing soul, and unblamably perform the sacred⁹⁷ services for thy people, through Christ," &c. Where we may observe, that it was not then thought necessary to express all or any of the offices of a presbyter in particular, but only in general to pray for grace to be given to the priest then ordained, whereby he might be enabled to perform them. And this, with a solemn imposition of hands, was reckoned a sufficient form of consecration. Which I note for the instruction of those, who may be apt to think that modern forms of ordination are in every circumstance like the primitive ones; whereas if Morinus say true, the words which are now most in use, viz. "Receive the Holy Ghost," were not in the Roman Pontifical above four hundred years ago. Which makes good the observation of a learned person,⁹⁸ that the church catholic did never agree on one uniform ritual, or book of ordination, but that was still left to the freedom of particular churches; and so the church of England had as much power to make or alter rituals, as any other had.

I should here have ended this chapter about presbyters, but that it is necessary to give some account of the archipresbyteri, and seniores ecclesie, which are sometimes mentioned in ancient writers. The archpresbyters are spoken of by St. Jerom, who seems⁹⁹ to say there was one, and but one, in every church: and perhaps he is the first author that mentions them. After him Socrates¹⁰⁰ speaks of one Peter, protopresbyter of Alexandria, whom Sozomen¹⁰¹ calls archpresbyter. And Liberatus¹⁰² mentions one Proterius, archpresbyter in the same church. From whom we also learn in some measure what was the office and quality of the archpresbyter. He was not always the senior presbyter of the church, as some are apt to imagine, but one chosen out of the college of presbyters at the pleasure of the bishop. For Liberatus says expressly, that Dioscorus the bishop made Proterius archpresbyter of the church: which implies that he did not come to the office by virtue of his seniority, but by the bishop's appointment. As to his office, it is plain from Liberatus, that it was to preside over the church next under the bishop, as chief of the college of presbyters, and to take care of all things relating to the church in the bishop's absence; as Proterius is said to have done, while Dioscorus went to the council of Chalcedon. And therefore some,¹⁰³ not without reason, think these archipresbyteri were much of the same nature with our deans in cathedral churches, as the college of presbyters were the chapter. But they wholly mistake the matter, who¹⁰⁴ confound these archipresbyteri with the cardinales presbyteri. For that is a name of much later date, not to be found in any genuine writer till the time of Gregory the Great: for the council of Rome, which is the only authority that Bellarmin¹⁰⁵ alleges to prove it more ancient, is a mere fiction. Besides that the cardinal presbyters were many in the same church or city, but the archpresbyter was but one. So that, whatever was the first original of cardinal presbyters; (whether they were so called from their being fixed in some principal churches, where baptism might be administered, which were therefore called ecclesie vel tituli cardinales, as Bellarmin thinks; or whether, as others¹⁰⁶ imagine, when the number of presbyters was grown so great in large and populous cities, that they could not conveniently meet, and join with the bishop, for ordering the government of the church, there were some as the chief of them chosen out from the rest, to be as the bishop's council, who were therefore called cardinales presbyteri; a dispute that does not concern me any further to inquire into or determine;) I say, whatever was their rise, or the reason of their name, it is certain they were not the same with the archipresbyteri of the primitive church.

As to the seniores ecclesie, they were a sort of elders, who were not of the clergy, yet had some concern in the care of the church. The name often occurs in Optatus and St. Austin, from whom we may easily learn the nature of their office. Optatus says,¹⁰⁷ when Mensurius bishop of Carthage was forced to leave his church in the time of the Diocletian persecution, he committed the ornaments and utensils of the church to such of the elders as he could trust, fidelibus senioribus commendavit. Upon which Albaspiny¹⁰⁸ notes, that, besides the clergy, there were then some lay-elders, who were intrusted to take care of the goods of the church. At the end of Optatus there is a tract, called, The Purgation of Felix and Cæcilian, wherein there are several epistles that make mention of the same name, as that of Fortis¹⁰⁹ and Purpurius, and another nameless ⁹⁷ Constitut. Apostol. lib. 8. c. 16. τὰς ὑπὲρ τοῦ λαοῦ ἱερ-ουργίας ἀμώμους ἐκτελεῖ.

⁹⁸ Bishop Burnet, Vind. of the Ordin. p. 35.

⁹⁹ Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Singuli ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archipresbyteri, singuli archidiaconi.

¹⁰⁰ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 9. Πέτρος τις πρωτοπρεσβύτερος.

¹⁰¹ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 12.

¹⁰² Liberat. Breviar. c. 14. Proterio Dioscorus commendavit ecclesiam, qui et eum archipresbyterum fecerat. In edit. Crab. male legitur archiepiscopum.

¹⁰³ Stillingfl. Irenic. part. 2. c. 7. p. 358.

¹⁰⁴ Onuphr. Interpret. Vocum Ecclesiast. Salmas. de Primat. c. 1. p. 10.

¹⁰⁵ Bellar. de Cleric. lib. 1. c. 16.

¹⁰⁶ Stillingfl. ibid.

¹⁰⁷ Optat. lib. 1. p. 41.

¹⁰⁸ Albaspiny. Not. in. Optat. p. 123. Præter ecclesiasticos et clericos quidam ex plebe seniores et probatæ vitæ res ecclesiæ curabant.

¹⁰⁹ Gesta, Purgat. Cæcil. et Fel. p. 268. ex Epist. Fortis :

Sect. 19.
Of the seniores ecclesiastici. That these were not lay-elders in the modern acceptance.

author. St. Austin inscribes one of his epistles¹¹⁰ to his own church of Hippo in this manner, Clero, senioribus, et universæ plebi, To the clergy, the elders, and all the people: and in several other places has occasion to mention these seniores in other churches.¹¹¹

From whence some have concluded,¹¹² that these were ruling lay-elders, according to the new model and modern acceptation. Whereas, as the ingenious author¹¹³ of the Humble Remonstrance rightly observes in his reply, those seniores of the primitive church were quite another thing. Some of them were the optimates, the chief men or magistrates of the place, such as we still call aldermen, from the ancient appellation of seniores. These are those which the Cabarsissitan council of Donatists in St. Austin calls seniores nobilissimi;¹¹⁴ and one of the councils¹¹⁵ of Carthage more expressly, magistratus vel seniores locorum, the magistrates or elders of every city; whom the bishops were to take with them to give the Donatists a meeting. In this sense Dr. Hammond¹¹⁶ observes, from Sir Henry Spelman, and some of our Saxon writings, that anciently our Saxon kings had the same title of elders, aldermanni, presbyteri, and seniores. As in the Saxon translation of the Bible, the word, princes, is commonly rendered, aldermen. And of this sort were some of those seniores ecclesiæ that have been mentioned, whose advice and assistance also, no doubt, the bishops took in many weighty affairs of the church. The other sort, which were more properly called seniores ecclesiastici, were such as were sometimes trusted with the utensils, treasure, and outward affairs of the church; and may be compared to our churchwardens, vestrymen, stewards, who have some care of the affairs of the church, but are not concerned as ruling elders in the government or discipline thereof. Now, lay-elders are a degree above the deacons; but the seniores ecclesiæ were below them: which is a further evidence, that they were not lay-elders in the modern acceptation. But of this enough. I now proceed to consider the third order of the clergy in the primitive church, which is that of deacons.

CHAPTER XX.

OF DEACONS.

THE name διακονοι, which is the original word for deacons, is sometimes used in the New Testament for any one that ministers in the service of God: in which large sense we sometimes find bishops and presbyters styled deacons, not only in the New Testament,¹ but in ecclesiastical writers also.² But here we take it in a more strict sense for the name of the third order of the clergy of the primitive church. In treating of which it will be necessary, in the first place, to show the sense of antiquity concerning their original. The council of Trullo advances a very singular notion about this matter, asserting, that the seven deacons spoken of in the Acts, are not to be understood of such as ministered in Divine service or the sacred mysteries,³ but only of such as served tables and attended the poor. But the whole current of antiquity runs against this: Ignatius⁴ styles them expressly, ministers of the mysteries of Christ, adding, that they are not ministers of meats and drinks, but of the church of God. In another place,⁵ he speaks of them as ministers of Jesus Christ, and gives them a sort of presidency over the people, together with the bishop and presbyters: Study to do all things, says he, in divine concord, under your bishop presiding in the place of God, and the presbyters in the place of the apostolical senate, and the deacons most dear to me, as those to whom is committed the ministry of Jesus Christ. And in many other places,⁶ he requires the people to be subject to them, and reverence them as Jesus Christ, that is, as his ministers attending on his service. Cyprian speaks of them in the same style, calling them⁷ ministers of episcopacy and the church; withal referring their original to that place in the Acts of the Apostles, which the council of Trullo disputes about, at the same time that he asserts⁸ they were called ad altaris ministerium, to the ministry and service of the altar. Tertullian⁹ was so far from thinking them only minis-

Sect. 1.
Deacons always reckoned one of the three sacred orders of the church.

Omnes vos episcopi, presbyteri, diacones, seniores, scitis, &c. Ibid. ex Epist. Purpuri: Adhibete conclericos, et seniores plebis, ecclesiasticos viros, et inquirent diligenter, quæ sunt istæ dissensiones. Ibid. Clericis et senioribus Cirthenisium in Domino æternam salutem.

¹¹⁰ Aug. Ep. 137.

¹¹¹ Id. cont. Crescon. lib. 3. c. 29 et 56. Concio 2. in Psal. xxxvi. p. 120.

¹¹² Smectymn. Answer to the Remonstrance, p. 71.

¹¹³ Hamon l'Estrange, Defence of the Remonstrance.

¹¹⁴ Aug. Conc. 2. in Psal. xxxvi. p. 120.

¹¹⁵ Con. Carthag. an. 403. in Con. African. c. 58. et in Cod. Can. Eccl. Afr. c. 91. Debere unumquemque nostrum in civitate sua per se convenire Donatistarum præpositos, aut adjungere sibi vicinum collegam, ut pariter eos in singulis quibusque civitatibus vel locis, per magistratus vel seniores locorum conveniant.

¹¹⁶ Ham. Dissert. 4. cont. Blondel, c. 19. n. 1.

¹ Acts i. 25; 2 Cor. vi. 4; 2 Tim. iv. 5; 1 Cor. iii. 5; Ephes. iii. 7.

² Athan. cont. Gent. Chrysost. Hom. 1. in Phil. i. 1.

³ Conc. Trull. c. 16. Ἐπὶ τὰ διακόνους μὴ ἐπὶ τῶν τοῖς μυστηρίοις διακονουμένων λαμβάνεσθαι.

⁴ Ignat. Ep. ad Trall. n. 2. ⁵ Epist. ad Magnes. n. 6.

⁶ Epist. ad Polycarp. n. 6. Ep. ad Trall. n. 3.

⁷ Cypr. Ep. 65. al. 3. ad Rogatian. Diaconos post ascensum Domini in cælos apostoli sibi constituerunt episcopatus sui et ecclesiæ ministros.

⁸ Id. Ep. 68. al. 67. ad Pleb. Legion. et Astur. p. 172.

⁹ Tertul. de Fuga, c. 11. Quum ipsi auctores, id est, ipsi

ters of meats and drinks, that he joins them with bishops and presbyters in the honourable titles of guides and leaders to the laity, and makes them in their degree pastors and overseers of the flock of Christ. And so St. Jerom, though he sometimes in an angry humour speaks a little contemptuously of them, styling them¹⁰ ministers of widows and tables; yet in other places¹¹ he treats them with greater respect, giving them the same honourable title as Tertullian does, and ranking them among the guides of the people. I showed before, in the last chapter, that Optatus¹² had so great an opinion of them, as to reckon their office a lower degree of the priesthood. And St. Austin seems to have had the same sentiments; for in one of his epistles¹³ he gives Præsidius the title of consacerdos, his fellow priest, whom yet St. Jerom in the next epistle¹⁴ calls a deacon.

Yet here, that I may not seem to impose upon my readers, I must observe, that the name of priests was not generally given to the deacons, by those that esteemed them a sacred order; but they are commonly distinguished from priests by the names of ministers and Levites. Thus St. Jerom¹⁵ distinguishes them from the priests of the second order, that is, from the presbyters, by the title of Levites. The author of the Questions¹⁶ upon the Old and New Testament under the name of St. Austin, and Hilarius Sardus¹⁷ under the name of St. Ambrose, are more positive and express in denying them the name of priests. And Salvian,¹⁸ though he acknowledges their ministration and function to be about holy things, yet he gives them but the same title of Levites, and that in contradistinction to the priests. And so frequently in the councils,¹⁹ the names sacerdos and Levita, are used as the peculiar distinguishing titles of presbyters and deacons. The fourth council of Carthage²⁰ speaks more expressly, that deacons are not ordained to the priesthood, but only to the ministering office, or inferior service. And hence the canons sometimes give them the name of ὑπηρέται and ministri, the ministers and servants, not only of the church, but of the bishops and presbyters, as may be seen in the councils of Nice,²¹ and Carthage,²² and many others. Whence some learned men²³ conclude against Optatus and St. Austin, that deacons were in no sense allowed to be priests: whilst others²⁴ with Optatus distinguish the several degrees of the priesthood, and reckon that though deacons were not absolutely called priests, because that was the appropriate title of bishops and presbyters, whose ministers and attendants they were; yet deacons sometimes performed such offices, as did entitle them to a lower degree of the priesthood. Having thus fairly stated and represented the matter on both sides, I must leave the judicious reader to determine for himself which opinion has the strongest reasons, whilst I proceed to give an account of the ordination of deacons, and their several offices, and such laws and rules as concerned their order.

The ordination of a deacon differed from that of a presbyter, both in the form and manner of it, and also in the gifts and powers that were conferred thereby. For in the ordination of a presbyter, as has been noted before, the presbyters who were present, were required to join in the imposition of hands with the bishop. But the ordination of a deacon might be performed by the bishop alone, because, as the council of Carthage²⁵ words it, he was ordained not to the priesthood, but to the inferior services of the church. These services are not particularly mentioned in the form of ordination now remaining in the Constitutions; but there the bishop only prays in general, that God would²⁶ make his face to shine upon that his servant, who was then chosen to the office of a deacon, and fill him with his Holy Spirit and power, as he did Stephen the martyr; that he, behaving himself acceptably, and uniformly, and unblamably in his office, might be thought worthy of a higher degree, &c. What therefore were the particular offices of the deacons, we are to learn not from the forms of the church, but from other writers.

diaconi, presbyteri, et episcopi fugiunt, quomodo laicus intelligere poterit, &c. Cum duces fugiunt, quis de gregario numero sustinebit?

¹⁰ Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. et Com. in Ezek. xlviii. Mensarum et viduarum ministri.

¹¹ Id. Com. in Mich. vii. Nolite credere in ducibus, non in episcopo, non in presbytero, non in diacono.

¹² Optat. lib. 1.

¹³ Aug. Ep. 16.

¹⁴ Hieron. Ep. 17. inter Epist. Aug.

¹⁵ Hieron. Ep. 27. Episcopi, et sacerdotum inferioris gradus, ac Levitarum innumerabilis multitudo.

¹⁶ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et N. Test. t. 4. qu. 46. Nunquid diaconus potest vicem gerere sacerdotis.—Sacerdotis vicem agere non potest, qui non est sacerdos.

¹⁷ Hilar. Com. in Ephes. iv. Evangelistæ diaconi sunt, sicut fuit Philippus, quamvis non sint sacerdotes.

¹⁸ Salvian. ad Eccles. Cathol. lib. 2. p. 391. Levitis ac sacerdotibus tanta divinarum rerum administratione fruentibus.

¹⁹ Con. Turon. 1. can. 1.

²⁰ Con. Carth. 4. c. 4. Diaconus non ad sacerdotium, sed ad ministerium consecratur.

²¹ Con. Nic. c. 18. Τοῦ μὲν ἐπισκόπου ὑπηρέται εἰσίν.

²² Con. Carth. 4. c. 37. Diaconus ita se presbyteri, ut episcopi, ministrum esse cognoscat. Vid. Con. Eliber. in titulis can. 18 et 33. Con. Turon. 1. c. 1.

²³ Bp. Fell. Not. in Cypr. Ep. 18. Hæbert. Not. in Pontific. p. 125.

²⁴ Rigalt. Not. in Cypr. Ep. 12. Dr. Hicks, Disc. of Priesthood, p. 33.

²⁵ Con. Carth. 4. c. 4. Diaconus quum ordinatur, solus episcopus qui eum benedicit, manum super caput illius ponat: quia non ad sacerdotium, sed ad ministerium consecratur.

²⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 18.

Sect. 2.

Yet not generally called priests, but ministers and Levites.

Sect. 2.

For this reason the bishop was not tied to have the assistance of any presbyters to ordain them.

Where we find, first, that the most ordinary and common office of the deacons, was to be subservient and assistant to the bishop and presbyters in the service of the altar. It belonged to them to take care of the holy table, and all the ornaments and utensils appertaining thereto. The author under the name of St. Austin²⁷ takes notice of this as the common office of deacons in all churches, except in such great churches as the church of Rome, where there being a multitude of inferior clergy, this office was devolved on some of them. But in other churches it was the deacon's office, where the inferior clergy, subdeacons, &c. were prohibited by canon to come into the sanctuary, or touch any of the sacred vessels in the time of Divine service, as may be seen in several canons²⁸ of the ancient councils.

Another part of the deacon's office was, to receive the people's offerings, and present them to the priest, who presented them to God at the altar: after which the deacon repeated the names of those that offered, publicly; and this rehearsal was commonly called, offerre nomina, as may be seen in Cyprian, who²⁹ speaks of it as part of the communion service of those times; which is also noted by Rigaltius³⁰ and others; of which custom I shall say more hereafter, when we come to treat of the ancient service of the church. At present I only observe, that this recital of the names of such as made their oblations, was part of the deacon's office, as is evident from St. Jerom, who tells us,³¹ that extortioners and oppressors made their oblations out of their ill-gotten goods, that they might glory in their wickedness, while the deacon in the church publicly recites the names of those that offered: Such a one offers so much, such a one hath promised so much: and so they please themselves with the applause of the people, while their conscience secretly lashes and torments them. Some indeed deny that there was any such custom as this public and particular rehearsal of men's names that offered in the church, and by consequence, that this was any part of the deacon's office: but I think St. Jerom's testimony is undeniable proof, and cannot otherwise be expounded, to make any tolerable sense of his words; for which reason I have made this one part of the deacon's office, though contrary to the judgment of some learned men.

Thirdly, In some churches, but not in all, the deacons read the Gospel both in the communion service, and before it also. The author of the Constitutions assigns all other parts of Scripture to the readers, but the Gospel is to be read³² only by a presbyter or a deacon. St. Jerom intimates³³ that it was part of the deacon's function; and so it is said by the council of Vaison, which authorizes deacons to read the homilies of the ancient fathers in the absence of a presbyter, assigning this reason for it: If the deacons be worthy to read³⁴ the discourses of Christ in the Gospel, why should they not be thought worthy to read the expositions of the holy fathers? This implies, that in the Western churches it was the ordinary office of the deacons to read the Gospels. But in other churches the custom varied: for, as Sozomen observes, it was customary at Alexandria for the arch-deacon only to read the Gospels, in other churches the deacons, in others the priests only, and in some churches on high festivals the bishop himself read, as at Constantinople on Easter-day. In the African churches, in the time of Cyprian, the readers were allowed to read the Gospels as well as other parts of Scripture, as appears from one of Cyprian's epistles, where, speaking of Celerinus the confessor, whom he had ordained a reader, he says, It was fitting he should be advanced to the pulpit³⁵ or tribunal of the church, (as they then called the reading desk,) that he might thence read the precepts and Gospels of his Lord, which he himself, like a courageous confessor, had followed and observed. So that we are not to look upon this to have been the deacon's peculiar office, but only in some churches and some ages.

But it was something more appropriate to them to assist the bishop or presbyters in the administration of the eucharist: where their business was ²⁷ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Testament. t. 4. c. 101. Ut autem non omnia ministeria obsequiorum per ordinem agant, multitudo facit clericorum. Nam utique et altare portarent, et vasa ejus, et aquam in manus funderent sacerdoti, sicut videmus per omnes ecclesias.

²⁸ Con. Agathens. c. 66. Non oportet in sacrosatos ministros licentiam habere, in secretarium (quod Græci diaconicon appellant) ingredi et contingere vasa Dominica. Con. Laodic. c. 21. cum Notis Balsamon. et Zonar. in loc.

²⁹ Cypr. Ep. 10. al. 16. p. 37. Ad communicationem admittuntur, et offertur nomen eorum, &c.

³⁰ Rigalt. Not. in Cypr. Ep. 60. Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 2. c. 8. n. 7.

³¹ Hieron. Com. in Ezek. xviii. p. 537. Multos conspicimus qui opprimunt per potentiam, vel furta committunt, ut de multis parva pauperibus tribuant, et in suis sceleribus gloriantur, publiceque diaconus in ecclesia recitet offerentium nomina: Tantum offert ille, tantum ille pollicitus est, placentque sibi ad plausum populi, torquente conscientia.

³² Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57.

³³ Hieron. Ep. 57. ad Sabin. Evangelium Christi quasi diaconus lectitabas.

³⁴ Con. Vasens. 2. c. 2. Si digni sunt diaconi, quæ Christus in evangelio locutus est legere, quare indigni judicentur sanctorum patrum expositiones publice recitare?

³⁵ Cypr. Ep. 34. al. 39. Quid aliud quam super pulpitem, id est, super tribunal ecclesiæ oportebat imponi, ut loci altioris celsitate subnixus—legat præcepta et evangelia Domini, quæ fortiter ac fideliter sequitur.

Sect. 4.
The deacon's office to take care of the utensils of the altar.

Sect. 6.
3rdly, To read the Gospel in some churches.

Sect. 5.
2ndly, To receive the oblations of the people, and present them to the priest, and recite the names of those that offered.

Sect. 7.
4thly, To minister the consecrated elements of bread and wine to the people in the eucharist.

to distribute the elements to the people that were present, and carry them to those that were absent also, as Justin Martyr³⁶ acquaints us in his second Apology. The author of the Constitutions³⁷ likewise, describing the manner of the ancient service, divides the whole action between the bishop and the deacon; appointing the bishop to deliver the bread to every communicant singly, saying, The body of Christ: and the deacon in like manner to deliver the cup, saying, The blood of Christ, the cup of life. This the author under the name of St. Austin³⁸ calls the proper office of the deacon's order. Yet it was not so proper to their order, but that they were to depend upon the will and licence of the bishop and the presbyters, if they were present, as is expressly provided in some of the ancient³⁹ councils, which forbid the deacon to give the eucharist in the presence of a presbyter, except necessity require, and he have his leave to do it. And therefore it was looked upon as a great absurdity for a presbyter to sit by and receive the sacrament from the hands of a deacon, as was sometimes practised, but the council of Nice⁴⁰ made a severe canon against it. So that what was allowed to deacons, was not to consecrate the eucharist, but only to distribute it, and that not to the bishop or presbyters, but only to the people. Yet this action of theirs is sometimes called oblation or offering, as in Cyprian,⁴¹ and the council of Ancyra,⁴² which forbids some deacons that were under censure, ἀρτον ἢ ποτήριον ἀναφέρειν, to offer either the bread or wine, as deacons otherwise were allowed to do.

Some learned persons,⁴³ I know, put a different sense upon the words of this council: they understand by offering, consecration, and thence conclude, that deacons anciently were invested with the ordinary power of consecrating the eucharist in the absence of the presbyters. But this is more than can fairly be deduced from the words, which are capable of two more reasonable constructions: either they may signify the deacon's offering the people's oblations to the priest, which was a part of their office, as I showed before: and so Petavius⁴⁴ and Habertus understand them: or else they may be interpreted by Cyprian's words, who expresses himself more fully, calling it offering the consecrated bread and wine to the people; which seems to be the most natural sense, and is preferred to all others by some late learned writers.⁴⁵ Whatever it be, there is no reason to believe it means that deacons were allowed the ordinary power of consecration. For the council of Nice, which was not long after the council of Ancyra, says expressly,⁴⁶ that deacons had not power to offer; that is, in the sense in which offering signifies consecration; for in that sense it was the proper office of presbyters. Some deacons, indeed, did, about this time, take upon them thus to offer, but the council of Arles, which was held in the same year with that of Ancyra, reckons it a presumption and transgression of their rule, and therefore made a new canon to restrain them.⁴⁷ St. Hilary is a good witness of the practice of the church in his own time, and he assures us there could be no sacrifice, or consecration of the eucharist, without a presbyter.⁴⁸ And St. Jerom says the same,⁴⁹ that presbyters were the only persons whose prayers consecrated bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ. For which reason, speaking of one Hilary, a deacon, he says, he could not consecrate the eucharist,⁵⁰ because he was only a deacon. The reason of this was, because the holy eucharist was looked upon as the prime Christian sacrifice, and one of the highest offices of the Christian priesthood: and deacons being generally reckoned no priests, or but in the lowest degree, they were therefore forbidden to offer or consecrate this sacrifice at the altar. This reason is assigned by the author of the Constitutions,⁵¹ and the author under the name of St. Austin, and several others.

But there is a passage in St. Ambrose, which seems to intimate, that in the third century the deacons at Rome had power to consecrate the eucharist; for speaking of Laurentius the deacon, he brings him in thus addressing himself to Sixtus, his bishop, as he was going to his martyrdom: Whither go you, holy priest, without your deacon? You did not use to offer sacrifice without your minister. Why are you then now displeased with me? Why may I not be partner with you in shed-

³⁶ Just. M. Apol. 2. p. 97.

³⁷ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 13.

³⁸ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test. c. 101. Diaconi ordo est accipere a sacerdote, et sic dare plebi.

³⁹ Con. Carth. 4. c. 38. Diaconus, presente presbytero, eucharistiam corporis Christi populo, si necessitas cogat, jussus croget. Vid. Con. Arelat. 2. c. 15.

⁴⁰ Con. Nic. can. 18.

⁴¹ Cypr. de Lapsis, p. 132. Solemnibus adimpletis calicem diaconus offerre presentibus cæpit.

⁴² Con. Ancyra. c. 2.

⁴³ Hospin. Hist. Sacram. lib. 2. c. 1. p. 23.

⁴⁴ Petav. Diatrib. de Pøstest. Consecr. c. 3. t. 1. p. 211. Habert. in Pontifical. Par. 9. Observ. 2. p. 190.

⁴⁵ Suicer. Thesaur. t. 1. p. 871.

⁴⁶ Con. Nic. c. 18. Τοὺς ἐξουσίαν μὴ ἔχοντας προσφέρειν, &c.

⁴⁷ Con. Arelat. l. c. 15. De diaconibus, quos cognovimus multis locis offerre, placuit minime fieri debere.

⁴⁸ Hilar. Fragm. p. 129. Sacrificii opus sine presbytero esse non potuit.

⁴⁹ Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. Quid patitur mensarum et viduarum minister, ut supra eos tumidus se efferat, ad quorum preces Christi corpus et sanguis conficitur?

⁵⁰ Id. Dial. cont. Lucif. p. 115. Hilarius cum diaconus de ecclesia recesserit, solusque ut putat turba sit mundi: neque eucharistiam conficere potest, episcopos et presbyteros non habens, &c.

⁵¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 28. Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test. qu. 46.

ding my blood, who was used to consecrate⁵² the blood of Christ by your commission, and be your partner in consummating the holy mysteries? Baronius was so perplexed with this difficulty, that he resolves it to be a corruption of the text, and that instead of consecrationem, it should be read⁵³ dispensationem: and some shameless editors have, without any grounds, made bold to foist this correction into the text; which Bona⁵⁴ and Habertus ingenuously condemn, as done against the authority of all the MSS., as well as former editions, and that without any reason for it from the difficulty of the expression. For the word, consecration, in this place, does not signify the sacramental consecration of the elements by prayer at the altar, which was performed by the bishop himself, as appears evidently from the context, where it is said, the bishop was never used to offer sacrifice without his minister or deacon: therefore the consecration, which was committed to the deacon, must be of another sort; for he could not offer, or consecrate the elements on the altar, in the bishop's presence, and at the same time that the bishop himself consecrated, but he might assist him, or bear a part with him, as it is there worded, in consummating the holy mysteries, that is, in giving the cup with the usual form of words to the people; which, in the language of those times, was called a ministerial consecration, or consummation of the sacrament, forasmuch as the receivers were hereby consecrated with the blood of Christ, and also consummated or made perfect partakers of the sacrament in both kinds, having received the bread from the hands of the bishop, and the cup from the hands of the deacon. This is plainly the consecration here spoken of, which refers only to the deacon's ministering of the cup to the people, which was their usual office, and so cannot be made an argument, as Hospinian and Grotius⁵⁵ would have it, that deacons were allowed to consecrate the eucharist at the altar.

Sect. 9.
5. Deacons allowed to baptize in some places.

But for the other sacrament of baptism, it is more evident, that they were permitted in some cases to administer it solely. For though the author⁵⁶ of the Constitutions says, that the deacons did neither baptize, nor offer; and Epiphanius⁵⁷ affirms universally, that the deacons were not intrusted with the sole administration of any sacrament; yet it appears from other writers that they had this power, at least in some places, ordinarily conferred upon them. Tertullian⁵⁸ invests them with the same right as presbyters, that is, to baptize by the bishop's leave. And St. Jerom⁵⁹ entitles them to the very same privilege. The council of Eliberis⁶⁰ as plainly asserts this right, when it says, If a deacon, that takes care of a people without either bishop or presbyter, baptizes any, the bishop shall consummate them by his benediction. This plainly supposes, that deacons had the ordinary right of baptizing in such churches over which they presided. So when Cyril⁶¹ directs his catechumens, how they should behave themselves at the time of baptism, when they came either before a bishop, or presbyter, or deacon, in city or in village; this may be presumed a fair intimation, that then deacons were ordinarily allowed to minister baptism in country places. I speak only now of their ordinary power. For as to extraordinary cases, not only deacons, but the inferior clergy, and laymen also, were admitted to baptize in the primitive church, as will be showed in its proper place.

Another office of the deacons was, to be a sort of monitors and directors to the people in the exercise of their public devotions in the church. To which purpose they were wont to use certain known forms of words, to give notice when each part of the service began, and to excite the people to join attentively therein; also to give notice to the catechumens, penitents, energumens, when to come up and make their prayers, and when to depart; and in several prayers they repeated the words before them, to teach them what they were to pray for. All this was called by the general name of κήρυτται, among the Greeks, and predicare, among the Latins; which does not ordinarily signify preaching, as some mistake it, but performing the office of a κήρυξ, or præco, in the assembly: whence Synesius⁶² and some others call the deacons, ἱεροκήρυκες, the holy criers of the church, as those that gave notice to the congregation how all things were re-

Sect. 10.
6. Deacons to bid prayer in the congregation.

⁵² Ambros. de Offic. lib. 1. c. 41. Quo sacerdos sancte sine diacono properas? Nunquam sacrificium sine ministro offerre conseruas. Quid in me ergo displicuit pater?—Cui commisisti Dominici sanguinis consecrationem, cui consummandorum consortium sacramentorum, huic consortium tui sanguinis negas.

⁵³ Baron. an. 261. n. 7.

⁵⁴ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 4. Habert. Not. in Pontifical. Græc. p. 191.

⁵⁵ Vid. Grot. de Cœnæ Administratione ubi Pastores non sunt. Cited and confuted by Petavius.

⁵⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 38.

⁵⁷ Epiphani. Hær. 79. Collyrid. n. 4.

⁵⁸ Tertul. de Bapt. c. 17. Dandi quidem habet jus summus sacerdos, qui est episcopus; dehinc presbyteri et diaconi, non tamen sine episcopi auctoritate, &c.

⁵⁹ Hieron. Dial. cont. Lucif. c. 4. p. 139. Inde venit, ut sine jussione episcopi, neque presbyter neque diaconus jus habeant baptizandi.

⁶⁰ Concil. Eliber. c. 77. Si quis diaconus, regens plebem sine episcopo vel presbytero, aliquos baptizaverit, episcopus eos per benedictionem perficere debet.

⁶¹ Cyril. Catech. 17. n. 17.

⁶² Synes. Ep. 67. p. 221. Chrysost. Hom. 17. in Heb. ix. Κήρυξ ὅταν εἴπῃ, τὰ ἅγια τοῖς ἀγίοις.

gularly to be performed. Thus the word κηρύξαι frequently occurs in the ancient rituals and canons; as in the Apostolical Constitutions, as soon as the bishop has ended his sermon, the deacon is to cry, Let the hearers and unbelievers depart.⁶³ Then he is to bid the catechumens pray, and to call upon the faithful also to pray for them, repeating a form of bidding prayer, to instruct the people after what manner they were to pray for them. Which form may be seen both in the Constitutions,⁶⁴ and in St. Chrysostom.⁶⁵ After this the deacon was to call in like manner upon the energumens, the competentes, and the penitents in their several orders, using the solemn words of exhortation both to them and the people to pray for them, ἐκτενῶς δεηθῶμεν, Let us ardently pray for them. Then again, when the deacon had dismissed all these by a solemn cry, ἀπολίσθε, πρόελθετε, or, Ite, Missa est; he called upon the faithful to pray again for themselves, and the whole state of Christ's church, repeating⁶⁶ another form of bidding prayer before them. And this is there called the deacon's προσφώνησις, or exhortation to pray, to distinguish it from the bishop's ἐπίκλησις, which was a direct form of address to God, whereas the deacon's address was to the people: for which reason it was called προσφώνησις, and κηρύξαι, bidding the people pray; or a call and exhortation to pray, with directions what they should pray for in particular. This the Latins called both oratio and predicatio, as may be seen in one of the councils of Toledo,⁶⁷ which explains the word orare, by predicare, making them both to signify this office of the deacon. And hence one of the deacon's ornaments (that I may note this by the way) is called by the same council his orarium, because he used it sometimes as a private signal to give notice of the prayers to his brethren of the clergy. By all this we may understand what So-crates means, when he says Athanasius⁶⁸ commanded his deacon κηρύξαι εὐχὴν, to bid prayer; and how we are to interpret that controverted canon of the council of Ancyra, which, speaking of some deacons that had lapsed into idolatry, and degrading them, says, They should no longer κηρύσσειν:⁶⁹ which some interpret preaching, but others⁷⁰ more truly understand it of this part of the deacon's office, which was to be the κῆρυξ or præco, the sacred crier of the congregation.

If it be inquired, whether deacons had any power to preach publicly in the congregation? the answer must be the same as in the case of baptism: they had power to preach by licence and authority from the bishop, but not without it. The author under the name of St. Ambrose⁷¹ says positively, that deacons did not preach in his time; though he thinks originally all deacons were evangelists, as Philip and Stephen were. I have showed before, that presbyters themselves in many places were not allowed to preach in the bishop's presence, but by his special leave; and therefore it is much more reasonable to conclude the same of deacons. Blondel⁷² and Baronius think that St. Chrysostom preached those elegant discourses, de Incomprehensibili Dei Natura, de Anathemate, &c. while he was but a deacon. But others think⁷³ more probably, that those were not sermons which he preached in the church, but only discourses that he composed upon other occasions; and that his first sermon was that which he preached when he was ordained presbyter, now extant in his 4th vol. p. 953. But if he ever preached while he was deacon, there is no question to be made but that he had the authority of his bishop Meletius for doing it: as Philostorgius⁷⁴ says, Leontius the Arian bishop of Antioch permitted Aetius his deacon to preach publicly in the church. Ephrem Syrus perhaps was another such instance: for he was never more than a deacon of the church of Edessa; yet Photius⁷⁵ says he composed several homilies or sermons, which were so excellent in their kind, that after his death they were translated into other languages, and allowed to be read in many churches immediately after the reading of the Scriptures, as St. Jerom⁷⁶ acquaints us. In some places, as in the French churches, the deacons were authorized by canon to read some such homilies in the church instead of a sermon, when the presbyter happened to be sick, and could not preach, as appears from the order made in the council of Vaison⁷⁷ upon this occasion. But here was necessity and permission too: so that the case of deacons preaching in those ages of the church seems to have been (according to the resolution, which Vigilius⁷⁸ afterward gave of it) allowable, if authorized by the bishop; but a presumption both against custom and canon, if done without his permission.

⁶³ Const. Apost. lib. 8. c. 5. κηρυττίτω, μή τις τῶν ἀκροαμένων, μή τις τῶν ἀπίστων.

⁶⁴ Ibid. c. 6. ⁶⁵ Chrys. Hom. 2. in I Cor.

⁶⁶ Const. Apost. lib. 8. c. 10.

⁶⁷ Con. Tolet. 4. c. 40. Unum orarium oportet Levitam gestare in sinistro humero, propter quod orat, id est, prædicat.

⁶⁸ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 11. ⁶⁹ Con. Ancyra. c. 2.

⁷⁰ Habert. Pontifical. p. 203. Bevereg. Not. in Con. Ancyra. c. 2. Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. t. 2. p. 99.

⁷¹ Ambros. Con. in Eph. iv. Nunc neque diaconi in populo prædicant, neque clerici vel laici baptizant.

⁷² Blondel, Apol. p. 57. Baron. an. 386. p. 512.

⁷³ Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. 1. p. 253.

⁷⁴ Philostorg. lib. 3. c. 17. διδάσκειν ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐπιτρέπει.

⁷⁵ Phot. Cod. 196. Λόγοι ἐννέα καὶ τεσσαράκοντα.

⁷⁶ Hieron. de Scriptor. c. 115.

⁷⁷ Con. Vasens. 3. c. 2. Si presbyter, aliqua infirmitate prohibente, per seipsum non potuerit prædicare, Sanctorum Patrum homiliæ a diaconibus recitentur.

⁷⁸ Vigil. Ep. ad Rustic. et Sebastian. Concil. t. 5. p. 554. Adjecistis etiam execranda superbia, que nec legun-

And so the case stood likewise with deacons in reference to the power of reconciling penitents, and granting them absolution. This was ordinarily the bishop's sole prerogative, as the supreme minister of the church; and therefore rarely committed to presbyters, but never to deacons, except in cases of extreme necessity, when neither bishop nor presbyter were ready at hand to do it: in this case deacons were sometimes authorized, as the bishop's special delegates, to give men the solemn imposition of hands, which was the sign of reconciliation. Thus we find it in Cyprian, in the case of those penitents, whom the martyrs by their letters recommended to the favour of the church: If, says he,⁷⁹ they are seized by any dangerous distemper, they need not expect my return, but may have recourse to any presbyter that is present; or if a presbyter cannot be found, they may make their confession before a deacon; that so they may receive imposition of hands, and go to the Lord in peace. Here it is observable, that none below a deacon are commissioned to perform this office; nor were the deacons authorized to do it, but as the bishop's delegates, and that in cases of extreme necessity, when no presbyter could be found to reconcile the penitent at the point of death.

In the like case, that is, in the case of absolute necessity, it seems very probable, that in some of the Greek churches they had power to suspend the inferior clergy, when need so required, and neither bishop nor presbyter was present to do it. Which may be collected from those words of the author of the Constitutions,⁸⁰ where he says, a deacon excommunicates a subdeacon, a reader, a singer, a deaconness, if there be occasion, and the presbyter be not at hand to do it. But a subdeacon shall have no power to excommunicate any, either clergy or laity; for subdeacons are only ministers of the deacons. This was a power then committed to deacons in extraordinary cases, and a peculiar privilege which none of the inferior clergy might enjoy.

It may be reckoned also among their extraordinary offices, that they were sometimes deputed by their bishops to be their representatives and proxies in general councils. Their ordinary office there was only to attend upon their bishops, and perform the duties of scribes, and disputants, &c. according as they were directed by tur, nec sine sui pontificis jussione aliquando ordinis vestri homines præsumpserunt, auctoritatem vobis prædicationis contra omnem consuetudinem vel canones vindicare.

⁷⁹ Cypr. Ep. 13. al. 18. ad. Cler. Si incommodo aliquo et infirmitatis periculo occupati fuerint, non expectata presentia nostra, apud presbyterum quemcunque præsentem, vel si presbyter repertus non fuerit, et urgere exitus cæperit, apud diaconothem; in which station we commonly find them employed in the ancient councils: but then there were two things in which they were treated as inferior to presbyters: 1. In that presbyters are usually represented as sitting together with their bishops, while the deacons stood with all the people. 2. Presbyters were sometimes allowed to vote, as has been showed before; but there are no instances that I know of, to evidence the same privilege to belong to deacons. Only when bishops could not attend in person, they many times sent their deacons to represent them; and then they sat and voted, not as deacons, but as proxies, in the room and place of those that sent them. Of which there are so many instances in the acts of the councils, that it is needless to refer the reader to any of them. Yet they that desire to see examples, may consult Christianus Lupus in his notes upon the seventh canon of the council of Trullo, where he observes some difference in the sitting and voting of deacons in the Eastern and Western councils: in the Eastern councils, if a deacon represented a metropolitan or a patriarch, he sat and subscribed in the place that the metropolitan or patriarch himself would have done, had he been present; but in the Western councils it was otherwise; there the deacons voted after all the bishops, and not in the place of those whose proxies they were.

Thus it was in general councils. But in provincial and consistorial synods, the deacons were sometimes allowed to give their voice, as well as the presbyters, in their own name. Of which the reader may see several instances in the Roman councils under Symmachus and Gregory II., published by Justellus⁸¹ in his Bibliotheca Juris Canonici, and in the fourth tome of the councils, where first the bishops, then the presbyters, and then the deacons, subscribe every one in their own name in particular. And those that are curious about this matter, may furnish themselves with many other such examples.

There are two things more to be observed concerning the office of deacons in church assemblies. 1. That as they were the regulators and directors of men's behaviour in Divine service; so they had power to rebuke the irregular, and chastise them for any indecent and unseemly deportment. The Constitutions often mention such acts as these belonging to the deacon's office. If any one be found sitting out of his place,⁸² let the num quoque exomologesin facere delicti sui possint; ut manibus in pœnitentia imposita veniant ad Dominum cum pace.

⁸⁰ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 28. Διάκονος ἀφορίζει τὸν ὑποδιάκονον, &c.

⁸¹ See before, chap. 19. sect. 12.

⁸² Const. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. ἐπιπλησσέσθω ὑπὸ τοῦ διακόνου, ὡς πρῶτους, &c.

Sect. 12.
8. Also to reconcile penitents in cases of extreme necessity.

And to suspend the inferior clergy in some extraordinary cases.

Sect. 13.
9. Deacons to attend upon their bishops, and sometimes represent them in general councils.

Sect. 14.
10. Deacons empowered to rebuke and correct men that behaved themselves irregularly in the church.

deacon rebuke him, and transfer him to his proper station, as the pilot or steersman of the church. And again a little after, Let the deacon⁸³ overlook and superintend the people, that no one talk, or sleep, or laugh, but give ear to the word of God. This is evident also from St. Chrysostom, who, speaking of the irreverent behaviour of some in the church, bids their neighbours first rebuke them, and if they would not bear it, to call the deacon⁸⁴ to do his office toward them. Agreeable to this, Optatus tells us a very remarkable story of Cæcilian, archdeacon of Carthage, that observing one Lucilla, a rich woman, commit an indecent act in the time of receiving the holy communion, (for before she received the bread and wine, she was used to kiss the relics of some pretended martyr,) he rebuked her⁸⁵ for it by virtue of his office: which she so highly resented, that afterward, when he was chosen bishop, she factiously withdrew herself, with some others, from his communion, and pretending his ordination to be illegal, she, by her power, got Majorinus ordained against him: and this was one of the principal causes of the schism of the Donatists, as Optatus there observes: It had its rise from the implacable malice of a proud and angry woman, who could never forgive the deacon that rebuked her in the church. Some may perhaps imagine, that what Cæcilian did was by virtue of a superior office, and that as archdeacon he was of a higher order, as now commonly archdeacons are. But I shall show in the next chapter, that anciently archdeacons were always of the order of deacons, and of no other degree: and it appears from what has here been already discoursed, that this act of Cæcilian was not from any peculiar power that he enjoyed as archdeacon, but from that ordinary power to rebuke offenders, which he had in common with all the other deacons of the church.

The other thing I would further remark concerning the office of deacons is this, that before the institution of the inferior orders of the church, (which were not set up in all churches at once, nor perhaps in any church for the two first ages, as shall be showed hereafter,) the deacons were employed to perform all such offices as were in after ages committed to those orders; such as the offices of readers, subdeacons, exorcists or catechists, door-keepers, and the like. Thus Epiphanius⁸⁶ observes, that originally all offices of the church were performed by bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and therefore no church was without a deacon. This was certainly the practice in the time of Ignatius, who never speaks of any order below that of deacons; but without them, he says, no church was⁸⁷ called a church. So that all the inferior offices must then be performed by deacons. And even in after ages we find that several of the inferior offices were many times put upon the same man, perhaps to avoid the charge of maintaining an over-numerous clergy in lesser churches. Thus Eusebius tells us, that Romanus the martyr⁸⁸ was both deacon and exorcist in the church of Cæsarea. And Procopius the martyr had three offices in the church of Scythopolis; he was at once reader, interpreter, and exorcist; as we learn from the Acts of his Martyrdom⁸⁹ published by Valesius. Now both these were martyred in the beginning of the fourth century, in the time of the Diocletian persecution. And we find, a whole age after this, if the author under the name of St. Austin⁹⁰ may be credited, that except in such great and rich churches as the church of Rome, where there was a numerous clergy, all the inferior services were still performed by the deacons. In the Greek church they were always the πυλωροί, or door-keepers, in the time of the oblation and celebration of the eucharist, as may be seen in the Apostolical Constitutions,⁹¹ where the deacons are commanded to stand at the men's gate, and the subdeacons at the women's, to see that no one should go out or come in during the time of the oblation. These were anciently the deacons' principal employments in the assemblies of the church.

But besides these, we are to take notice of two or three other offices, in which they were commonly employed by the bishop out of the church. One of these was to be his sub-almoner, to take care of the necessitous, such as orphans, widows, virgins, martyrs in prison, and all the poor and sick who had any title to be maintained out of the public revenues of the church. The deacons were particularly to inquire into the necessities and wants of all these, and make relation thereof to the bishop, and then distribute to them such charities as they received from him towards their relief and assistance. The archdeacon indeed was as it were the bishop's treasurer, but all the deacons were his dispensers, or ministers of the church's charity to the indigent.

Sect. 15.

11. Deacons anciently performed the offices of all the inferior orders of the church.

⁸³ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. p. 264. 'Ο διάκοιλος ἐπισκοπεῖ τὸν λαόν, &c. Confer lib. 8. c. 11.

⁸⁴ Chrys. Hom. 24. in Act.

⁸⁵ Optat. lib. 1. p. 40. Cum correptionem archidiaconi Cæciliani ferre non posset, quæ ante spiritalem cibum et potum, os nescio cujus martyris, si tamen martyris, libare dicebatur, &c.

⁸⁶ Epiphani. Hæc. 75. Aerian.

⁸⁷ Ignat. Ep. ad Tral. n. 3.

⁸⁸ Euseb. de Martyr. Palæstin. c. 2.

⁸⁹ Acta Procop. ap. Vales. Not. in Euseb. de Martyr. Palæst. c. 1. Ibi ecclesia tria ministeria præbebat: unum in legendi officio, alterum in Syri interpretatione sermonis, et tertium adversus dæmones manus impositione consummans.

⁹⁰ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et N. Test. c. 101. cited before, sect. 4.

⁹¹ Const. Apost. lib. 8. c. 11.

Sect. 16.
12. Deacons the bishop's sub-almoners.

Which appears from several passages in Cyprian,⁹² Dionysius⁹³ of Alexandria, and the author⁹⁴ of the Constitutions, who speak indifferently of this office as common to all the deacons. Particularly in the Constitutions, the duty of the deacon is thus described, that he should inform his bishop, when he knows any one to be in distress, and then distribute to their necessities by the directions of the bishop; but to do nothing clancularly without his consent, lest that might seem to accuse him of neglecting the distressed, and so turn to his reproach, and raise a murmuring against him.

Another office of the deacons in this respect was, to make inquiry into the morals and conversation of the people; and such evils as he could not redress himself, by the ordinary power which was intrusted in his hands, of those he was to give information to the bishop, that he by his supreme authority might redress them. Let the deacon, says the book⁹⁵ of Constitutions, refer all things to the bishop, as Christ did to the Father: such things as he is able, let him rectify, by the power which he has from the bishop; but the weightier causes let the bishop judge.

Upon this account the deacons were usually stiled the bishop's eyes and his ears, his mouth, his right hand, and his heart: because by their ministry he overlooked his charge, and by them took cognizance of men's actions, as much as if he himself had seen them with his own eyes, or heard them with his own ears: by them he sent directions and orders to his flock, in which respect they were his mouth and his heart; by them he distributed to the necessities of the indigent, and so they were his right hand. These titles are frequently to be met with in the Constitutions,⁹⁶ and the author of the Epistle⁹⁷ to St. James. And Isidore of Pelusium, in allusion to them, writing to Lucius,⁹⁸ an archdeacon, he tells him in the phrase of the church, that he ought to be all eye, forasmuch as deacons were the eyes of the bishop. The author of the Constitutions⁹⁹ terms them likewise the bishop's angels and prophets, because they were the persons whom he chiefly employed in messages, either to his own people, or foreign churches. For then bishops did nothing but by the mouth or hands of one of their clergy.

For this reason, there being such a multitude and variety of business commonly attending the deacon's office, it was usual to have several deacons in the same church. In some churches they were very precise to the number seven, in imitation of the first church of Jerusalem: The council of Neocæsarea¹⁰⁰ enacted it into a canon, that there ought to be but seven deacons in any city, though it was never so great, because this was according to the rule suggested in the Acts of the Apostles. And the church of Rome, both before and after this council, seems to have looked upon that as a binding rule also. For it is evident from the epistle of Cornelius,¹⁰¹ written in the middle of the third century, that there were then but seven deacons in the church of Rome, though there were forty-six presbyters at the same time. And Prudentius intimates that it was so in the time of Sixtus also, anno 261. For speaking of Laurentius the deacon, he terms him,¹⁰² the chief of those seven men, who had their station near the altar; meaning the seven deacons of the church. Nay, in the fourth and fifth centuries, the custom there continued the same, as we learn both from Sozomen,¹⁰³ and Hilarius Sardus,¹⁰⁴ the Roman deacon who wrote under the name of St. Ambrose. But Sozomen says, this rule was not observed in other churches, but the number of deacons was indifferent, as the business of every church required. And it is certain it was so at Alexandria and Constantinople. For though one of the writers of the Life of St. Mark, cited by Bishop Pearson,¹⁰⁵ says St. Mark ordained but seven deacons at Alexandria, yet in after ages there were more: for Alexander, in one of his circular letters,¹⁰⁶ names nine deacons, whom he deposed with Arius for their heretical opinions; and it is probable there were several others who continued orthodox: for in the form of Arius his condemnation, published¹⁰⁷ by Cotelarius, the catholic deacons of Alexandria and Mareotes are mentioned, as joining with their bishop in condemning him. And for the church of Constantinople, the number of deacons was there so great, that in one of Justinian's Novels,¹⁰⁸ we find them limited to a hundred for the service of the great church and three others only. So that it is evident the number of deacons usually increased with the necessities of the church, and

Sect. 19.
Deacons to be multiplied according to the necessities of the church.

⁹² Cypr. Ep. 49. al. 52. ad Cornel.
⁹³ Dionys. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 11.
⁹⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 31 et 32. lib. 3. c. 19.
⁹⁵ Const. Apost. lib. 2. c. 44.
⁹⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 44. lib. 3. c. 19.
⁹⁷ Clem. Ep. ad Jacob. c. 12.
⁹⁸ Isidor. lib. 1. Ep. 29. ⁹⁹ Const. Apost. lib. 2. c. 30.
¹⁰⁰ Conc. Neocæsar. c. 15.
¹⁰¹ Cornel. Ep. ad Fabi. ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.
¹⁰² Prudent. Hymn. de S. Laurent. Hic primus e septem viris qui stant ad aram proximi.

¹⁰³ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 19. Διάκονοι παρὰ Ῥωμαίους εἰσὶ τῶν οὐ πλείους εἰσὶν ἑπτὰ.
¹⁰⁴ Ambros. Com. in 1 Tim. iii. p. 995. Nunc autem septem diaconos esse oportet, aliquantos presbyteros, ut bini sint per ecclesias, et unus in civitate episcopus.
¹⁰⁵ Vit. S. Marci ap. Pearson. Vind. Ignat. par. 1. c. 11. p. 329. B. Marcus Anianum Alexandriæ ordinavit episcopum, et tres presbyteros, et septem diaconos.
¹⁰⁶ Alex. Ep. Encycl. ap. Theodor. lib. 1. c. 4.
¹⁰⁷ Cotelar. Not. in Const. Apost. lib. 8. c. 28.
¹⁰⁸ Justin. Novel. 3. c. 1.

the church of Rome was singular in the contrary practice.

Sect. 20.
Of the age at which deacons might be ordained. I speak nothing here of the qualifications required in deacons, because they were generally the same that were required in bishops and presbyters, and will be spoken of hereafter: only in their age there was some difference, which is here to be observed. Bishops and presbyters, as has been noted above, might not ordinarily be ordained before thirty, but deacons were allowed to be ordained at twenty-five, and not before. This is the term fixed both by the civil and canon law, as may be seen in Justinian's Novels,¹⁰⁹ the councils of Agde,¹¹⁰ Carthage, Trullo, and many others. And it was a rule very nicely observed: for though we meet with some bishops that were ordained before this age, yet those (as I have showed before) were never deacons, but ordained immediately bishops from laymen: but among those that were ordained deacons, we scarce meet with an instance of any one that was ordained before the age of twenty-five in all the history of the church.

Sect. 21.
Of the respect which deacons paid to presbyters, and received from the inferior orders. The last thing which I shall observe of deacons, is the great deference and respect they were obliged to pay to presbyters, as well as to the bishop.

It has been proved before, that the presbyters had their thrones in the church, whereon they sat together with their bishop: but the deacons had no such privilege, but are always represented as standing by them. So the author¹¹¹ of the Constitutions and Gregory Nazianzen¹¹² place them in this order, viz. the bishop sitting on the middle throne, the presbyters sitting on each hand of him, and the deacons standing by. The council of Nice expressly¹¹³ forbids deacons to sit among the presbyters in the church. And it is evident from St. Jerom¹¹⁴ and the author under the name of St. Austin,¹¹⁵ that though the Roman deacons were grown the most elated of any others, yet they did not presume to sit in the church. Nay, some canons go further, and forbid¹¹⁶ deacons to sit any where in the presence of a presbyter, except by his permission.

The like respect they were to pay to presbyters in several other instances, being obliged to minister to them, as well as to the bishop, in the performance of all divine offices; none of which might be performed by a deacon in the presence of a presbyter, without some special reason for it, as has been noted before. Nay, a deacon was not allowed so much as to bless a common feast, if a presbyter was present at it: as we may see in St. Jerom's epistle¹¹⁷ to Evagrius, where he censures the Roman deacons somewhat sharply for presuming to do so.

But then, as the canons obliged deacons to pay this respect to presbyters; so, to distinguish them from the lesser clergy, all the inferior orders were required to pay the same respect to them. The council of Laodicea, in the same canon that says, a deacon shall not sit in the presence of a presbyter without his leave, adds immediately after, that in like manner the deacon shall be honoured by the subdeacons and all the other clergy. And the council of Agde¹¹⁸ repeats the canon in the same words. I shall here also remind the reader of what I have observed before, that deacons in some churches had power to censure the inferior clergy in the absence of the presbyters. St. Jerom¹¹⁹ seems also to say, that their revenues were rather greater than those of the presbyters, which made them sometimes troublesome and assuming. Beside all this, the order of deacons was of great repute, because the archdeacon was always then one of this order, and he was commonly a man of great interest and authority in the church; of whose powers and privileges, because it is necessary to discourse a little more particularly, I shall treat distinctly of them in the following chapter.

CHAPTER XXI.

OF ARCHDEACONS.

THOUGH archdeacons in these last ages of the church have usually been of the order of presbyters, yet anciently they were no more than deacons; which appears evidently from those writers, who give us the first

Sect. 1.
Archdeacons anciently of the same order with deacons.

¹⁰⁹ Just. Novel. 123. c. 13. Presbyterum minorem triginta quinque annorum fieri non permitimus. Sed neque diaconum aut subdiaconum viginti quinque.

¹¹⁰ Conc. Agathens. c. 16. Conc. Carthag. 3. c. 4. Conc. Trull. c. 14. Conc. Tolet. 4. c. 20.

¹¹¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57.

¹¹² Greg. Naz. Somn. de Eccles. Anastas.

¹¹³ Conc. Nic. c. 18.

¹¹⁴ Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. In ecclesia Romæ presbyteri sedent, et stant diaconi.

¹¹⁵ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test. c. 101. Quamquam Romanæ ecclesiæ diaconi modice invecundiores videantur, sedendi tamen dignitatem in ecclesia non præsumunt.

¹¹⁶ Concil. Laodic. c. 20. Carthag. 4. c. 39.

¹¹⁷ Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. Licet increbrescentibus vitiis, inter presbyteros absente episcopo sedere diaconum viderim: et in domesticis conviviis, benedictiones presbyteris dare, al. benedictiones coram presbyteris dare.

¹¹⁸ Conc. Agathens. c. 65. Non oportet diaconum sedere præsentem presbytero, sed ex jussione presbyteri sedeat. Similiter autem honorificetur diaconus a ministris inferioribus et omnibus clericis.

¹¹⁹ Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. Presbyter noverit se lucris minorem, sacerdotio esse majorem. Id. Com. in Ezek. c. xlvi. Ultra sacerdotes, hoc est, presbyteros intumescunt: et dignitatem non merito sed divitiis æstimant.

account of them. St. Jerom¹ says the archdeacon was chosen out of the deacons, and was the principal deacon in every church, as the archpresbyter was the principal presbyter; and that there was but one of each in every church. Optatus calls Cæcilian² archdeacon of Carthage, yet he was never more than a deacon, till he was ordained bishop, as has been showed before: and that made Cæcilian himself say, that if he was not rightly ordained bishop, as the Donatists pretended, he was to be treated only as a deacon.³ It is certain also St. Laurence, archdeacon of Rome, was no more than the chief of the deacons, or the principal man of the seven,⁴ who stood and waited at the altar, as Prudentius words it. From these testimonies it is very plain, that in those times the archdeacon was always one of the order of deacons.

But how the archdeacon came by his honour, and after what manner he was invested with his office, is a matter of some dispute among learned men. Salmasius⁵ and some others are of opinion, that originally he was no more than the senior deacon, though they own that in process of time the office became elective. Habertus⁶ thinks it was always elective, and that it was at the bishop's liberty and discretion to nominate which of the deacons he thought fit to the office. That it was so in the case of Athanasius, seems pretty evident from what Theodoret says of him,⁷ that though he was very young, yet he was made chief of the order of deacons. For this implies, as Valesius there observes, that he was chosen by the bishop, and preferred before his seniors. St. Jerom, in the forecited passage, as plainly asserts that the office went not by seniority, but election: only he seems to put the power of electing in the deacons: but if they had any hand in it, it must be understood to be under the direction of the bishop, who is required by some canons to choose his own archdeacon, and ordinarily to give preference to the senior, if he was duly qualified; but if not, to make choice of any other, whom he thought most fit to discharge the offices of the church,⁸ and the trust that was reposed in him.

The office of the archdeacon was always a place of great honour and reputation. For he was the bishop's constant attendant and assistant; and next to the bishop, the eyes of the whole church were fixed upon him. By which means he commonly gained such an interest, as to get himself chosen the bishop's successor before the presbyters. Of which it were easy to give several instances, as Athanasius, Cæcilian, and many others. And this, I presume, was the reason why St. Jerom says, that an archdeacon thought himself injured,⁹ if he was ordained a presbyter: probably because he thereby lost his interest in the church, and was disappointed of his preferment. We might certainly conclude it was thus in the church of Rome, if what Eulogius, a Greek writer in Photius, says, might be depended on as true: that it was a law at Rome to choose the archdeacon the bishop's successor,¹⁰ and that therefore Cornelius ordained Novatian presbyter, to deprive him of the privilege and hopes of succeeding. But I confess there is no small reason to question the truth of this relation, both because we read of no such law in any writer of the Latin church, and because this author palpably mistakes, in saying, that Cornelius ordained Novatian presbyter, who was presbyter long before; and probably never was archdeacon, nor deacon, but ordained presbyter immediately from a layman, as may be collected from the letters of Cyprian¹¹ and Cornelius,¹² which tacitly reflect upon him for it. Yet if by law Eulogius meant no more than custom, perhaps it might be customary at Rome, as at some other places, to make the archdeacons the bishops' successors; their power and privileges, as I observed, commonly gaining them a considerable interest both among the clergy and the people.

As to the archdeacon's office, he was always the bishop's immediate minister and attendant: a latere pontificis non recessit, to use St. Jerom's phrase, he was always by his side, ready to assist him. Particularly at the altar, when the bishop ministered, he performed the usual offices of a deacon, that have been mentioned in the last chapter.

Sect. 3. Commonly persons of such interest in the church, that they were chosen the bishops' successors.

Sect. 2. Elected by the bishop, and not made by seniority.

Sect. 4. The offices of the archdeacon. 1. To attend the bishop at the altar, &c.

¹ Hieron. Ep. 85. ad Evagr. Aut diaconi eligant de se, quem industrium noverint, et archidiaconum vocent. Id. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Singuli ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archipresbyteri, singuli archidiaconi.

² Optat. lib. 1. p. 40. Cum correptionem archidiaconi Cæciliani ferre non posset, &c.

³ Optat. ibid. p. 41. Iterum a Cæciliano mandatum est, ut si felix in se, sicut illi arbitrabantur, nihil contulisset, ipsi tanquam adhuc diaconum ordinarent Cæcilianum.

⁴ Prudent. Hymn. de S. Steph. Hic primus e septem viris, qui stant ad aram proximi.

⁵ Salmas. de Primat. p. 8. Suicer. Thesaur. Eccl. t. 1. p. 531.

⁶ Habert. Pontifical. Obs. 6. p. 206.

⁷ Theod. lib. 1. c. 26. Νέος μὲν ὦν τὴν ἡλικίαν, τοῦ χοροῦ δὲ πῶν διακόνων ἡγούμενος.

⁸ Conc. Agathens. c. 23. Si officium archidiaconatus, propter simpliciore[m] naturam implere aut expedire nequiverit, ille loci sui nomen teneat, et ordinationi ecclesiarum, quem episcopus elegerit, præponatur.

⁹ Hieron. Com. in Ezek. xlvi. Certe qui primus fuerit ministrorum, quia per singula concionatur in populos, et a pontificis latere non recedit, injuriam putat, si presbyter ordinetur.

¹⁰ Eulog. ap. Phot. Cod. 182. Τὸν ἀρχιδιάκονον ἐνεθόμισο διάδοχον τοῦ ἀρχιερατεύοντος καθίτασθαι.

¹¹ Cypr. Ep. 52. al. 55. ad Antonian, p. 103.

¹² Cornel. Ep. ad Fabian. ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

bishop, and partly from the hands of the archdeacon. As, to give only one instance in the ordination of an acolythist, the canon says, The bishop was to inform him what his duty was, and then the archdeacon was to give him a taper into his hand, that he might know that he was appointed to light the candles of the church.

5. The archdeacon was invested also with a power of censuring the other deacons, and all the inferior clergy of the church. That it was so, at least in some churches, is very evident from a passage in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, where Ibas, bishop of Edessa, speaking of Maras, one of the deacons of his church, says, he was not excommunicated by himself, but by his archdeacon, who,²² for a crime committed against a presbyter, suspended him from the communion.

But whether the archdeacon had any power over presbyters, is a matter of dispute among learned men. Salmasius,²³ and the learned Suicerus²⁴ after him, scruple not to assert, that even the archpresbyter himself, in the Roman church, was subject to him. Cujacius, and some others, who are cited by Baluzius,²⁵ go one step further, and say it was so in all churches. Yet there is not the least footstep of any such power to be met with in any ancient writer or council: but the original of all the mistake is owing to a corruption in Gratian's Decree, and Gregory the Ninth's Decretals, who cite the words alleged in the margin,²⁶ the one as from Isidore of Seville, and the other from the council of Toledo, pretending that the archpresbyter is to be subject to the archdeacon: when yet, as both Baluzius and the Roman correctors confess, there are no such words to be found in Isidore's Epistle; nor will Garsias Loaisa own them to be the genuine decree of any council of Toledo. So that the whole credit of this matter rests upon Gratian and the compilers of the Decretals, whose authority is of little esteem in things relating to antiquity, when there is no better proof than their bare assertion. Yet I shall not deny, but that in Gratian's time it might be as he represents it: for, probably, by this time the archdeacons were chosen out of the order of presbyters; though when first they began to be so, is not very easy to determine. Only we are certain, that some centuries before the time of Gratian the custom was altered. For archdeacons, in the ninth century, were some of them, at least, of the order of presbyters: as appears from Hincmar's Capitula,²⁷ directed to Guntharius and Odelhardus, two of his archdeacons, whom he styles presbyter-archdeacons. And there is reason enough to think it was so in the time of Gratian; the archdeacons were then generally of the order of presbyters, as they have been ever since: which makes it no wonder that in Gratian's time they should have power over the archpresbyteri, which, in the language of that age, often signifies no more than rural deans, over which the archdeacons have usually power at this day. But by this the reader may judge how little such writers are to be depended on, who take their estimate of former ages from the practice of their own, and reckon every thing ancient that is agreeable to the rules and customs of the times they live in.

But to return to the archdeacons of the primitive church: there is one thing more may admit of some dispute, whether the archdeacon's power anciently extended over the whole diocese, or was confined to the city or mother church. In the middle ages of the church there is no question but they had power over the whole diocese. For Isidorus Hispalensis, who lived in the beginning of the seventh century, in the account which he gives of the archdeacon's office, says, the parochial clergy were under his care, that is, the deacons and inferior clergy; and that it belonged to him to order matters,²⁸ and end controversies among them; to give the bishop an account what churches stood in need of repairing, to make inquiry by the bishop's order into the state of every parish, and to see what condition the ornaments and goods of the church were in, and whether the ecclesiastical liberties were maintained. Habertus thinks²⁹ the archdeacons were invested with the same power some ages before, and for proof cites a passage out of the council of Chalcedon, where, in an instrument³⁰ presented by the presbyters of Edessa against Ibas their bishop, one Abramius, a deacon of that church, in all the Latin translations, is called diaconus apantita, which Habertus takes to be a general inspector of the church. But there are two evident reasons against this, which it is a wonder so observing a person as Habertus should not see:

²² Con. Chalced. Act. 10. p. 653. Ἀκοιῶνῆτος ἐπιστῶν ἰδίῳ ἀρχidiaκόνῳ, &c.

²³ Salmas. de Primat. c. 1. p. 9.

²⁴ Suicer. Thesaur. t. 1. p. 533.

²⁵ Baluz. Not. ad Gratian. Dist. 25. c. 1. p. 455.

²⁶ Grat. Dist. 25. c. 1. ex Epist. Isidor. Hispal. ad Ludifred. Archipresbyter vero se esse sub archidiacono, ejusque præceptis, sicut episcopi sui, sciat obedire. In Gregory's Decretal, lib. 1. Tit. 24. de Officio Archipresb. c. 1. the same words are cited ex Concilio Toletano.

²⁷ Hincmar. Capitula Archidiaconibus Presbyteris data.

Concil. t. 8. p. 591.

²⁸ Isidor. Ep. ad Ludifred. et ap. Gratian. Dist. 25. c. 1. Sollicitudo quoque parochitanorum (al. parochiarum) et ordinatio, et jurgia ad ejus pertinent curam: pro reparandis diœcesanis basilicis ipse suggerit sacerdoti: ipse inquirat parochias cum jussione episcopi, et ornamenta, vel res basilicarum parochitanorum (al. parochiarum) et libertatum ecclesiasticarum episcopo idem refert.

²⁹ Habert. in Pontifical. par. 9. Obser. 6.

³⁰ Concil. Chalced. Act. 10. p. 650.

1. That Abramius was not an archdeacon, but only a private deacon of the church; for in the same place there is mention made of another archdeacon, who, when Ibas was about to have had Abramius ordained bishop of Batena, interposed and hindered him from doing it, because he had been censured for the practice of magic, and never given any satisfaction to the church. And though it is said, that Ibas took occasion to remove that archdeacon from his office, yet it is not once intimated that he put Abramius in his room; which, if he had done, it would doubtless have been made another article of accusation against him before the council.

2. The original Greek in Labbé's edition is not διάκονος ἀπαντιῆς, as Habertus reads it, but only διάκονος ἀπ' αὐτῆς τῆς ἡμετέρας ἐκκλησίας, a deacon of that our church of Edessa: and though ἀπαντιῆς be put into the margin, yet it is not owned to be any various reading, but only the editor's conjecture, which I think is not sufficient to build such an assertion upon, when no other proof or authority is pretended. Therefore I determine nothing concerning this power of the archdeacons in ancient times, but leave it to further inquiry, and the determination of every judicious reader.

Sect. 10.
Of the name cor-episcopi, why given to archdeacons.

Valesius takes notice of another name, which he thinks was sometimes given to the archdeacons, that is, the name cor-episcopi; for which he cites the words of one Joannes Abbas,³¹ in a book written about the translation of the relics of St. Glodesindis. This at first may look like a corruption only of the name chorepiscopus, because in latter ages the power of the ancient chorepiscopi dwindled into that of the archdeacons; but when it is considered, that all the deacons anciently were called the bishop's eyes, and his ears, his mouth, and his heart, as has been noted in the last chapter, sect. 18, it will appear very probable that the archdeacon should be peculiarly dignified with those titles; and therefore be called cor-episcopi, the bishop's heart, because he was used to signify his mind and will to the people: as he is called oculus episcopi, not only in ancient authors,³² but in the Decretals,³³ and the council of Trent,³⁴ because he was the bishop's eye to inspect the diocese under him.

Sect. 11.
The opinions of learned men concerning the first original of the name and office of archdeacons.

Some may perhaps be desirous to know further the first rise and original of the name and office of archdeacons in the church; but this is a matter involved in so great obscurity that it cannot easily be determined. Habertus and some others³⁵ of the Roman communion, reckon this office as ancient as that of deacons themselves, deriving both from apostolical constitution, and making Stephen the first archdeacon of the church. But others, with greater reason,³⁶ deduce it only from the third century, and leave it as a matter under debate and inquiry, whether there were any such thing as the archdeacon's office in the time of Cornelius, bishop of Rome, which was in the middle of the third century. This is certain, that Cornelius, in his epistle to Fabius, where he gives a catalogue³⁷ of the Roman clergy, though he speaks of deacons, and subdeacons, acolythists, exorcists, readers, and door-keepers, makes no particular mention of the archdeacon; nor does Cyprian ever so much as once use the name: yet before the end of this century Cæcilian is supposed to have had the title as well as the office of archdeacon of Carthage, because Optatus calls him so, and the name of ten occurs in St. Jerom and other writers of the fourth age, in which St. Jerom lived. Baronius indeed urges St. Austin's authority, to prove that Stephen was properly an archdeacon; for he says St. Austin calls him primicerius diaconorum: but he that will look into St. Austin, will quickly find his mistake; for his words are not primicerius diaconorum, but primicerius martyrum,³⁸ the protomartyr, as we commonly call him, because he was the first that suffered for the name of Christ. And hence the reader may observe by the way, that the words primicerius and primus do not always denote principalty, or priority of power and jurisdiction, but only priority of time, or precedency of honour and dignity in respect of place or outward order. In which sense the same St. Austin³⁹ says in another place, that Stephen is named first among the deacons, as Peter was among the apostles. Which is a primacy that may be allowed to them both without any pretence of jurisdiction. Habertus urges further the authority of the Greek Menologion, which gives Stephen the title of archdeacon; but such books are not sufficient evidence, being they are of a modern date, and speak of ancient things in the language and phrase of their own times; for which reason they are not much to be depended on, except when they are backed with the concurrent testimony of some ancient authors, of which there are none in this case to yield any collateral evidence to this assertion. Yet on the other hand, the opinion of Salmasius is equally to be discarded, who⁴⁰ asserts that the office

³¹ Joh. Abbas ap. Vales. Not. in Theodoret. lib. 1. c. 26. Ad hoc inspicendum sacrorum ministros cum archidiacono majore, quem cor-episcopi dicunt, pontifex direxit.

³² Isidor. Pelus. lib. 1. Ep. 29.

³³ Decretal. lib. 1. Tit. 23. c. 7.

³⁴ Con. Trid. Sess. 24. cap. 12. de Reform.

³⁵ Habert. Not. in Pontifical. p. 207. Baron. an. 31. n. 285.

³⁶ Bp. Fell. Not. in Cypr. Ep. 52. al. 49. ad Cornel.

³⁷ Cornel. Ep. ad Fab. ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

³⁸ Aug. Ser. 1. de Sanctis, t. 10. Hodie celebramus natiuitatem, quo primicerius martyrum migravit ex mundo.

³⁹ Aug. Ser. 94. de Diversis. Inter diaconos illos nominatus primus, sicut inter apostolos Petrus.

⁴⁰ Salmas. de Primat. c. 1. p. 8.

of archdeacon was not in the church in the time of St. Jerom, though St. Jerom⁴¹ himself says in most express words, that the custom then was to have one bishop, one archpresbyter, one archdeacon in every church. But this is the usual way of that author in his book de Primatu, to advance paradoxes of his own fancy for ancient history, and lay down positive assertions upon the most slender conjectures; yea, many times against the plainest evidence of primitive records, as in the case before us, and many others which I have had occasion to take notice of in this discourse. It were to be wished, that that author, who wrote upon a useful design, had been a little more accurate in his accounts of the state of the clergy of the primitive church; and whilst he was demolishing the pope's supremacy, had not confusedly treated of some other orders and offices, which were of greater antiquity in the church.

CHAPTER XXII.

OF DEACONESSSES.

Sect. 1.
The ancient name of deaconesses, δίακονοι, προεβύτριαι, viduæ, ministræ.

HAVING spoken of deacons and archdeacons, it remains that I say something in this place of deaconesses, because their office and service was of great use in the primitive church. There is some mention made of them in Scripture, by which it appears that their office was as ancient as the apostolical age. St. Paul calls Phœbe a servant of the church of Cenchrea, Rom. xvi. 1. The original word is δίακονος, a deaconess, answerable to the Latin word ministra, which is the name that is given them in Pliny's Epistle,¹ which speaks about the Christians. Tertullian² and some others call them viduæ, widows, and their office viduatus, because they were commonly chosen out of the widows of the church. For the same reason Epiphanius³ and the council of Laodicea⁴ call them προεβύτριαι, elderly widows, because none but such were ordinarily taken into this office.

For indeed by some ancient laws these four qualifications were required in every one, that was to be taken into this order. Sect. 2.
Deaconesses to be widows by some laws. 1. That she should be a widow. 2. That she should be a widow that had borne children. 3. A widow that was but once married. 4. One of a considerable age, forty, fifty, or sixty years old. Though all these rules admitted of exceptions. In Tertullian's time the deaconesses were so commonly chosen out of the widows, that when a certain young virgin was made a deaconess, he speaks of it⁵ as a miracle or monstrous thing in the church. Yet some learned men are of opinion, that virgins were sometimes made deaconesses even in the time of Ignatius; because Ignatius, in his epistle to the church of Smyrna,⁶ salutes the virgins that were called widows, that is, deaconesses, as Cotelerius and Vossius truly expound it; for virgins could not be called widows congruously in any other sense. Some suspect that the word, virgins, is a corruption crept into the text: but there is no reason for this conjecture, for Ignatius is not the only author that speaks of virgin-deaconesses. Epiphanius⁷ says, in his time there were some virgins, and some widows that had been but once married. The author of the Constitutions⁸ says the same, that the deaconess was either to be a chaste virgin, or a widow that had been the wife of one man. And one of Justinian's Novels⁹ enacted it into a law, that the deaconesses should be chosen out of one of these orders. Accordingly we find in the practice of the church, virgins as well as widows admitted to this office. Gregory Nyssen¹⁰ says his own sister Macrina, who was a virgin, was a deaconess, and so was Lampadia, another virgin. And Sozomen¹¹ relates, how that Chrysostom would have ordained Nicarete, a famous virgin, to this office, but she refused it for the love she had to a private and philosophic life.

Yet by some laws they were required not only to be widows, but such widows as had children also. Sect. 3.
And such widows as had children. Tertullian¹² seems to intimate that this was the custom of the age he lived in, to put none into this office but such as were mothers, and had had the edu-

⁴¹ Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. cited before, sect. 1.
¹ Plin. lib. 10. Ep. 97. Quò magis necessarium credidi, ex duabus ancillis, quæ ministræ dicebantur, quid esset veri et per tormenta quærere.
² Tertul. lib. 1. ad Uxor. c. 7. Id. de veland. Virg. c. 9. Epiph. Hær. 79. n. 4. Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 13.
³ Epiph. Hær. 79. Collyrid. n. 4.
⁴ Con. Laodic. c. 11.
⁵ Tertul. de veland. Virg. c. 9. Scio alicubi virginem in viduatu ab annis nondum viginti collocatam. Cui si quid refrigerii debuerat episcopus, aliter utique salvo respectu disciplinæ, præstare potuisset, ne tale nunc miraculum, ne dixerim monstrum, in ecclesia denotaretur.
⁶ Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 13. Ἀσπάζομαι τὰς παρθένους τὰς λεγομένας χήρας. Coteler. in loc. Viduæ vocabantur, quia in gradu viduali seu diaconico erant constitutæ.

⁷ Epiph. Expos. Fid. n. 21. ἡ χηρεύσασαι ἀπὸ μονογαμίας, ἢ αἰε παρθενοὶ οὔσαι.
⁸ Const. Apost. lib. 6. c. 17.
⁹ Just. Novel. 6. c. 6. Aut virgines constitutas, aut unius viri quæ fuerant uxores.
¹⁰ Nyssen. Vit. Macrin. t. 2. p. 181 et 197.
¹¹ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 23.
¹² Tertul. de vel. Virg. c. 9. Ad quam sedem præter annos sexaginta non tantum univiræ, id est nuptæ, aliquando eliguntur, sed et matres et quidem educatrices filiorum: scilicet ut experimentis omnium affectuum structæ, facile norint cæteras et consilio et solatio juvare.

education of children, in the training up of whom they had learnt to be tender and compassionate in their affections, and so were qualified to assist others both by their counsel and comfort. Sozomen also mentions a law¹³ made by Theodosius to this purpose, that no women should be admitted to the office, except they had children, and were above sixty years old, according to the express rule of St. Paul. The law is still extant in the Theodosian Code,¹⁴ in the same words as Sozomen cites it: but he speaks of it as a new law, that was then made upon a particular occasion, by reason of some scandal that had happened in the church; which is a plain intimation, that from the time of Tertullian, to the making of this law, the church had varied in her practice.

And so she had likewise with respect to the age of deaconesses. For though the forementioned law of Theodosius require them to be sixty years of age complete; and Tertullian¹⁵ and St. Basil¹⁶ speak of the same age; yet Justinian in one of his Novels¹⁷ requires but fifty, and in another¹⁸ but forty; which is all that was insisted on before by the great¹⁹ council of Chalcedon, whose words are, No woman shall be ordained a deaconess before she is forty years old. And it is probable in some cases that term was not strictly required: for Sozomen²⁰ says, Nectarius bishop of Constantinople ordained Olympias a deaconess, though she was but a young widow, because she was a person of extraordinary virtue. By which we may judge, that as the church varied in her rule about this matter, so bishops took a liberty to ordain deaconesses at what age they thought fit, provided they could be assured of their probity and virtue.

But there was another qualification, which they were more strict in exacting, which was, that the deaconesses should be such widows as had been only the wives of one man, according to the apostle's prescription, 1 Tim. v. 9. Which rule they generally understood as a prohibition of electing any to be deaconesses who had been twice married, though lawfully and successively to two husbands one after another.

In this sense Tertullian²¹ says, the apostle requires them to be univiræ, the wives of one man; which Epiphanius²² calls χηρεύσασα ἀπὸ μονογαμίας, widows that have been but once married. So the author of the Constitutions, and Justinian's Novels,²³ which have been cited before.

But Theodoret gives a different sense of the apostle's words: for he supposes the apostle not to forbid the choosing of widows that had been twice married, but only such²⁴ as had married again after they had divorced themselves from a former husband; which was such a scandalous act, as justly excluded them from the church's service. And this sense is embraced as the most probable and rational, by the learned Justellus,²⁵ Dr. Hammond,²⁶ Suicerus,²⁷ and several others, of which I shall have occasion to give a further account, when I come to speak of that apostolical rule, as it concerned all the clergy. Thus much will suffice to be spoken at present concerning the qualifications of deaconesses before they were ordained.

The next inquiry is concerning their ordination itself, whether it was always performed by imposition of hands? And here learned men are very much divided in their sentiments. Baronius²⁸ thinks they had no imposition of hands at the time of the council of Nice, and he grounds his assertion upon one of the canons of that council, which, as he expounds it, denies that deaconesses were ordained by imposition of hands, and therefore makes no other account of them than as mere lay-persons. Valesius²⁹ gives the same exposition of the canon; though he owns that Balsamon and Zonaras, the ancient expositors, were of a contrary judgment, viz. that the canon speaks not of the deaconesses of the church, but of such as returned to the catholic church from the Paulianists, or Samosatene heretics, among whom they had received no imposition of hands, and therefore were to be treated as mere laics. And in this sense Suicerus³⁰ and Albaspiny,³¹ Christianus Lupus, Fabrotus, and other modern critics and expositors of the canon, explain it also. To make the reader himself judge in the matter, I

Sect. 4.
Not to be ordained under sixty years of age, by the most ancient canons.

Sect. 6.
Whether deaconesses were anciently ordained by imposition of hands.

Sect. 5.
To be such as had been only the wives of one man.

¹³ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 16. Εἰ μὴ πάντας ἔχοιεν, &c.

¹⁴ Cod. Theod. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 27. Nulla nisi emensis sexaginta annis, cui votiva domi proles sit, secundum præceptum apostoli ad diaconissarum consortium transferatur.

¹⁵ Tertul. ibid.

¹⁶ Basil. Ep. Canonic. c. 21.

¹⁷ Just. Novel. 6. c. 6. Super mediam constitutas ætatem, et circa quinquaginta annos.

¹⁸ Novel. 123. c. 13. Diaconissa in sancta ecclesia non ordinatur, quæ minor quadraginta annis sit.

¹⁹ Con. Chalced. c. 14. al. 15. Διάκονον μὴ χηροστονεῖσθαι γυναῖκα πρὸ ἐπῶν τεσσαράκοντα. Vid. Concil. Trullan. c. 14 et 40.

²⁰ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 9. Καίπερ νῆαν χήραι γενομένην—διάκονον ἐχειροτόνησε.

²¹ Tertul. ad Uxor. lib. 1. c. 7. Vidnam allegi in ordinationem nisi univiram non concedit. It. de Virg. veland. c. 9.

²² Epiph. Exp. Fid. n. 21.

²³ Justin. Novel. 6. c. 6. Constit. Apost. lib. 6. c. 17.

²⁴ Theod. Com. in 1 Tim. v. 9.

²⁵ Justel. Not. ad can. 1. Concil. Laodic.

²⁶ Ham. Annot. on 1 Tim. iii. 2.

²⁷ Suicer. Thesaur. t. 1. p. 899.

²⁸ Baron. an. 31. n. 283. It. Cabassut. Notit. Concil. c. 56. p. 312.

²⁹ Vales. Not. in Sozomen. lib. 8. c. 9.

³⁰ Suicer. Thesaur. t. 1. p. 867.

³¹ Albasp. Not. in can. 19. Concil. Nicen. Lupus, t. 1. Schol. in eund. can. Fabrot. Not. ad Balsamon. Collect. Constitut. p. 1417.

must here recite the words of the canon, which are these: Concerning the Paulianists which return to the catholic church, it is decreed, that they shall be by all means re-baptized. And if any of them were heretofore reckoned among the clergy, if they appear to be blameless, and without rebuke, let them be first baptized, and then ordained by the bishop of the catholic church: but if upon examination they be found unfit, let them be deposed. The same rule shall be observed concerning deaconesses, and all others who are reckoned among their clergy. And we particularly take notice³² of deaconesses, which appear in that habit or dignity, that having never had any imposition of hands, they are to be reckoned only among the laity. These last words about deaconesses seem to refer to what goes before; and then they must be interpreted of deaconesses among the Paulianists, who took upon them the habit of deaconesses without any consecration. Or if we understand them as spoken of deaconesses already in the church, they may mean that there were some deaconesses which had crept into the office without imposition of hands, and such the council accounts no more than lay-persons. That which will incline a man to interpret this canon to some such sense as this is, that all other councils and writers speak of ordaining deaconesses by imposition of hands. Valesius himself owns that it was so in the time of the council of Chalcedon; for in one of the canons of that council,³³ their ordination is expressly called both χειροτονία and χειροθεσία, ordination by imposition of hands. And the author of the Constitutions,³⁴ speaking of their ordination, requires the bishop to use imposition of hands, with a form of prayer, which is there recited. And thus it was both in the Greek and Latin church, so long as the order itself continued to be in use. The council of Trullo, anno 692, speaks of their ordination in two canons,³⁵ under the name of χειροτονία. And Sozomen³⁶ uses the same word in speaking of the ordination of Olympias. And though there be not so many examples of this practice to be met with in the Latin church, because the order was there much sooner laid aside; yet Cotelierus³⁷ has furnished us with some out of Fortunatus and the council of Worms, both which expressly say, the ordination of deaconesses was performed by imposition of hands. In the council of Worms, the 15th canon of the council of Chalcedon is repeated. And Fortunatus his words are, *manu superposita*³⁸ consecravit diaconam, speaking of one whom Medardus the bishop consecrated a deaconess by laying his hands upon her. All which shows, that it was the constant practice of the church to ordain deaconesses by imposition of hands: and that makes it very probable, that the Nicene canon is to be understood in that sense, which is most agreeable to the church's practice.

But the learned Justellus³⁹ still raises another scruple about their ordination: he thinks this imposition of hands was not properly an ordination, but only a benediction: for he distinguishes betwixt those two things, and says, every solemn imposition of hands is not an ordination; which is very true; for then the imposition of hands upon the catechumens, or upon the baptized in confirmation, or upon the penitents in order to reconcile them, or upon the sick in order to their cure, or upon any persons whatsoever to give them a common benediction, would be an ordination: but then that learned person seems not to have considered, that the imposition of hands upon the deaconesses was something more than all these; for it was a consecration of them to a certain office in the church, which sort of imposition of hands, joined with a prayer of benediction for grace to discharge that office aright, is what the church has always meant and called particularly by the name of ordination.

Yet we are not to imagine, that this consecration gave them any power Sect. 7.
Not consecrated to any office of the priesthood. to execute any part of the sacerdotal office, or do the duties of the sacred function. Women were always forbidden to perform any such offices as those. Therefore the author of the Constitutions calls it a heathenish practice to ordain women-priests, ιερείας χειροτονειν; for the Christian law allowed no such custom.⁴⁰ Some heretics indeed, as Tertullian observes,⁴¹ allowed women to teach, and exorcise, and administer baptism; but all this, he says, was against the rule of the apostle.⁴² Epiphanius brings the charge particularly against the Pepuzians, which were a branch of the Montanists, that they made women-bishops,⁴³ and women-presbyters, abusing that passage of the apostle, "In Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female," to put some colour upon their practice. He charges it also upon the Collyridians,⁴⁴ that they did ιερουργειν δια γυναικων, use women to sacrifice to the Vir-

³² Con. Nic. c. 19. Ἐμνήσθημεν δὲ τῶν διακονισσῶν τῶν ἐν τῷ σχήματι ἐξετασθεισῶν, ἐπεὶ μηδὲ χειροθεσίαν τινὰ ἔχουσιν, ὥστε ἐξάπαντος ἐν τοῖς λαϊκοῖς αὐτὰς ἐξετάζεσθαι.

³³ Con. Chalced. c. 15.

³⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 19. Ὡ ἐπίσκοπε, ἐπιθήσεις ἀντὴ τὰς χεῖρας, &c.

³⁵ Con. Trull. c. 14 et 40.

³⁶ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 9.

³⁷ Cotelier. Not. in Const. Apost. lib. 8. c. 19. Cou. Wormatiens. c. 73. ex Concil. Chalced. c. 15.

³⁸ Fortun. Vit. Radegundis ap. Surium. Aug. 13.

³⁹ Justel. Bibl. Jur. Canon. t. 1. p. 75. Not. in Con. Nic. c. 19.

⁴⁰ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. c. 9.

⁴¹ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 41. Ipsæ mulieres hæreticæ quam procaces, quæ audent docere, contendere, exorcismos agere, curationes repromittere, forsitan et tinguere.

⁴² Id. c. 17. de Baptismo.

⁴³ Epiph. Hær. 69. Pepuzian. n. 2. ἐπίσκοποι παρ' αὐτοῖς γυναῖκες, καὶ πρεσβύτεροι γυναῖκες.

⁴⁴ Id. Hær. 78. Antidicomarianit. n. 23.

gin Mary. Where it is observed, that the charge is double; 1. That they gave divine worship to the holy Virgin, and, 2. That they used women-priests in their service. Against these he has a particular dissertation, wherein he shows at large that no woman from the foundation of the world was ever ordained to offer sacrifice, or perform any solemn service of the church:⁴⁵ which, if it had been allowed to any, would certainly have been granted to the Virgin Mary herself, who was so highly favoured of God. But neither she nor any other woman had ever the priest's office committed to them. There is indeed, says he, an order of deaconesses in the church, but their business⁴⁶ is not to sacrifice, or perform any part of the sacerdotal office, or any of the sacred mysteries, but to be a decent help to the female sex in the time of their baptism, sickness, affliction, or the like: and therefore he denies, that the church made them either presbyteresses of priestesses, ἡ πρεσβυτερίδας, ἡ ἱερίσας. Where the reader is to observe, that Epiphanius puts a distinction betwixt the names πρεσβυτερίδας and πρεσβυτερίδας, because the former only denotes elderly women, such as the deaconesses commonly were; but the latter he uses to signify persons ordained to the office of presbyters or priests, which he absolutely denies any women in the Christian church to be.

Sect. 8.
Their offices:
1. To assist at the baptism of women.

And from hence it is plain, the offices of the deaconesses were only to perform some inferior services of the church, and those chiefly relating to the women, for whose sake they were ordained. One part of their office was, to assist the minister at the baptizing of women, where for decency's sake they were employed to divest them, (the custom then being to baptize all adult persons by immersion,) and so to order the matter, that the whole ceremony might be performed with all the decency becoming so sacred an action. This is evident from Epiphanius, both in the forecited passage, and other places.⁴⁷ And it is taken notice of also by Justinian,⁴⁸ and the author of the Constitutions,⁴⁹ who adds, that the deaconesses were used to anoint the women in baptism with the holy oil, as the custom of the Greek church then was, not only for the bishops, presbyters, and deacons, but also for the deaconesses, to

⁴⁵ Epiph. Hær. 79. Collyrid. n. 3. Ἐὶ ἱερατεύει γυναῖκες Θεῷ προσετάσσοντο, ἡ κανονικόν τι ἐργάζεσθαι ἐν ἐκκλησία, ἔδει μᾶλλον αὐτὴν τὴν Μαρίαν ἱερατεῖαν, ἐπιτελέσαι, &c.

⁴⁶ Ibid. Διακομισσῶν τάγμα ἔτιν ἐἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, ἀλλ' οὐχὶ εἰς τὸ ἱερατεῖν, οὐδὲ τι ἐπιχειροῖν ἐπιτρέπει.

⁴⁷ Epiph. Expos. Fid. n. 21. ⁴⁸ Justin. Novel. 6. c. 6.

⁴⁹ Const. Apost. lib. 3. c. 15. ⁵⁰ Coteler. in loc.

⁵¹ Hieron. Com. in Rom. xvi. 1. Sicut etiam nunc in Orientalibus diaconissæ mulieres in suo sexu ministrare videntur in baptismo, sive in ministerio verbi, quia privatim docuisse fœminas invenimus, &c.

use this ceremony of unction before baptism; of which Cotelerius, in his Notes,⁵⁰ gives several instances out of the ancient writers, but these belong to another place.

2. Another part of their office was, to be a sort of private catechists to the women-catechumens, who were preparing for baptism. For though they were not allowed to teach publicly in the church, yet they might privately instruct and teach those, how to make the proper answers that were required of all persons at their baptism. The author of the Short Notes on the Epistles⁵¹ under the name of St. Jerom, calls this, private ministry of the word, which the deaconesses performed in the Eastern churches in his time. And it was so usual and ordinary a part of their office in the African churches, that the fathers of the fourth council of Carthage⁵² require it as a necessary qualification in deaconesses when they are ordained, that they shall be persons of such good understanding, as to be able to instruct the ignorant and rustic women, how to make responses to the interrogatories, which the minister puts to them in baptism, and how they were to order their conversation afterward.

Sect. 9.
2. To be a sort of private catechists to the women-catechumens.

3. Another part of their employment was, to visit and attend women that were sick, which is noted by Epiphanius⁵³ and the author of the Constitutions, who⁵⁴ says they were employed likewise in delivering the bishop's messages and directions to women that were in health, whom the deacons could not visit because of unbelievers; that is, because of the scandal and reproach which the heathens were ready to cast upon them.

Sect. 10.
3. To visit and attend women that were sick and in distress.

4. In times of danger and persecution they were employed in ministering to the martyrs in prison; because they could more easily gain access to them, and go with less suspicion, and less danger and hazard of their lives from the heathen, than the deacons or any other ministers of the church could do. Cotelerius⁵⁵ and Gothofred collect this from some passages in Lucian and Libanius, which seem plainly to refer to this part of the deaconesses' ministry. For Lucian, in one of his Dialogues, speaking of Peregrine the philosopher, how he was ca-

Sect. 11.
4. To minister to the martyrs and confessors in prison.

⁵² Con. Carthag. 4. c. 12. Viduae vel sanctimonialis, quæ ad ministerium baptizandarum mulierum eliguntur, tam instructæ sint ad officium, ut possint apto et sano sermone docere imperitas et rusticas mulieres, tempore quo baptizandæ sunt, qualiter baptizatori interrogatæ respondeant, et qualiter, accepto baptismo, vivant.

⁵³ Epiph. Hær. 79. n. 3. Expos. Fid. n. 21.

⁵⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. c. 15 et 19. Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepot. Multas anus alit ecclesia quæ officium ægrotanti præstant, &c.

⁵⁵ Coteler. Not. in Const. lib. 3. c. 15. Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Theodos. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 27.

ressed by the Christians, whilst he was in prison for the profession of their religion, says, In the morning one might observe the old women the widows waiting at the prison gate⁵⁶ with some of the orphan children; where by the widows he doubtless means the deaconesses of the Christians. And there is little question but Libanius⁵⁷ means the same, when he says, that the mother or mistress of the old women, when she finds any one bound in prison, runs about, and begs and makes a collection for him. This plainly refers to the great charity and liberality of the Christians toward their martyrs, which was collected and sent to them by the hand of these deaconesses.

5. In the Greek churches the deaconesses had also the charge of the doors of the church, which part of their office is mentioned by the author⁵⁸ of the Constitutions, and the author under the name of Ignatius, who⁵⁹ styles them φρουρούς τῶν ἁγίων πυλώνων, the keepers of the holy gates. But probably this was only in such churches as made a distinction betwixt the men's gate and the women's gate: for Bishop Usher observes,⁶⁰ that no ancient writer beside these two make any mention of this, as part of the office of deaconesses: and in another place of the Constitutions⁶¹ this distinction is plainly expressed: Let the door-keepers stand at the gate of the men, and the deaconesses at the gate of the women.

Lastly, they were to assign all women their places, and regulate⁶² their behaviour in the church; to preside over the rest of the widows;⁶³ whence in some canons they are styled προκαθήμεναι, governesses; as Balsamon and Zonaras note upon the council⁶⁴ of Laodicea: and if any woman had any suit to prefer to a deacon or a bishop, a deaconess⁶⁵ was to introduce her. These were the offices of the deaconesses in the primitive church, which I have been a little more particular in describing, because they are not now so commonly known; the order itself having been for some ages wholly laid aside.

If it be inquired, how long this order continued in the church, and what time it was totally abolished?

⁵⁶ Lucian, Peregrin. Παρὰ τῷ δεσποτηρίῳ περιμένοντα γράδια, χήρας τινάς, &c.

⁵⁷ Liban. Orat. 16. in Tisamen. It. Orat. de Vincit's, cited by Gothofred.

⁵⁸ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 28.

⁵⁹ Pseudo-Ignat. Ep. ad Antioch. n. 12.

⁶⁰ Usser. Dissert. 16. in Ignat. p. 224.

⁶¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57.

⁶² Constit. lib. 2. c. 58.

⁶³ Ibid. lib. 3. c. 7.

⁶⁴ Con. Laodic. c. 11.

⁶⁵ Constit. lib. 2. c. 25.

⁶⁶ Balsam. Resp. ad Interrog. Marci, c. 35. ap. Leunclav. Jus Gr. Rom. t. 1. p. 381.

⁶⁷ Id. Com. in Concil. Chalced. c. 15.

I answer, it was not laid aside every where at once, but continued in the Greek church longer than in the Latin, and in some of the Latin churches longer than in others. In the Greek church they continued to the time of Balsamon, that is, to the latter end of the twelfth century; for he speaks of them⁶⁶ as then ministering in the church of Constantinople; though it appears from some other passages of the same author, that in other churches they were generally laid aside.⁶⁷ In the Latin church there were some decrees made against their ordination long before. For the first council of Orange, anno 441, forbids⁶⁸ any more deaconesses to be ordained. And the council of Epone,⁶⁹ anno 517, has a canon to the same purpose, wholly abrogating their consecration. Not long after which, the second council of Orleans, anno 533, renewed the decree⁷⁰ against them. And before any of these, the council of Laodicea in the Eastern church had forbidden them under the name of ancient widows or governesses, decreeing⁷¹ that no such for the future should be constituted in the church. But these decrees had no effect at all in the East, nor did they universally take effect in the West till many ages after. The author, indeed, under the name of St. Ambrose, would lead an unwary reader into a great mistake: for he makes as if the order of deaconesses was no where used⁷² but among the Montanists; ignorantly confounding the presbyteresses of the Montanists with the deaconesses of the church. And the author under the name of St. Jerom is not much more to be regarded, when he seems to intimate that in his time the order of deaconesses was wholly laid aside in the West, and only retained in the Oriental churches.⁷³ For I have already showed, (sect. 6,) from Venantius Fortunatus, who lived anno 560, and the council of Worms, which was held in the ninth century, that deaconesses were still retained in some parts of the Western church: which may be evinced also from the Ordo Romanus,⁷⁴ and other rituals in use about that time, where among other forms we meet with an Ordo ad Diaconam faciendam, an order or form to consecrate a deaconess. But in an age or two after, that is, in the tenth or ele-

⁶⁸ Conc. Arausic. l. c. 26. Diaconissæ omnimodæ non ordinandæ, &c.

⁶⁹ Conc. Epauens. c. 21. Viduarum consecrationem, quas diaconissas vocant, ab omni religione nostra penitus abrogamus.

⁷⁰ Conc. Aurel. 2. c. 18. Placuit ut nulli postmodum fœminæ diaconalis benedictio pro conditionis hujus fragilitate credatur.

⁷¹ Conc. Laodic. c. 11. Περὶ τοῦ μὴ δεῖν πρεσβυτέρους ἤτοι προκαθήμενας ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ καθίστασθαι.

⁷² Ambros. Com. in 1 Tim. iii. 11.

⁷³ Hieron. Com. in Rom. xvi. 1, and in 1 Tim. iii. 11.

⁷⁴ Ordo Roman. p. 161. in Bibl. Patr. t. 9. par. 1624.

venth century, Bona⁷⁵ thinks the whole order was quite extinct.

Before I make an end of this subject, I cannot but acquaint the reader, that there is another notion of the name diaconissa, sometimes to be met with in the writers of the middle ages of the church, who use it to signify not a deaconess, but a deacon's wife, in the same sense as presbytera signifies the wife of a presbyter, and episcopa, the wife of a bishop. The word episcopa is thus used in the second council of Tours, where it is said, that if a bishop hath not a wife,⁷⁶ there shall no train of women follow him. So also the words presbytera, diaconissa, and subdiaconissa,⁷⁷ for the wives of a presbyter, a deacon, and a subdeacon, occur a little after in the same council. And so in the council of Auxerre⁷⁸ and some other places. From which a learned and ingenious examiner⁷⁹ of the council of Trent concludes, that bishops in those times were not as yet obliged by the law of celibacy, not to cohabit with their wives, in the Gallican church. But I shall freely own, I take this to be a mistake: for from the time of Pope Siricius the celibacy of the clergy began to be pressed in the Western church, and these very canons do enforce it: therefore I lay no greater stress upon them than they will bear:

for as for the cause of the married clergy, it needs not be defended by such arguments, having the rule and practice of the whole catholic church, for some of the purest ages, to abet and support it; of which I shall give a just account hereafter, when I come to consider the general qualifications that were necessarily required of the clergy of the primitive church, among which the vow of celibacy will be found to have no place. What therefore these canons mean by episcopa and presbytera, is no more than the wife of a bishop or presbyter, which they had before they were ordained, but in those declining ages of the church were not allowed to cohabit with them after ordination. This explication agrees both with the scope of those canons, and the practice of the times they were made in; and we have no dispute with Antonius Augustinus,⁸⁰ or any candid writer of the Romish communion, who carry this notion no higher than the ages in which it was broached: but when Baronius⁸¹ and others transfer it to the primitive ages, and make the practice of the Western church in the sixth age to be the practice of the universal church in all ages, they manifestly prevaricate, and put a fallacy upon their readers, which it may be sufficient to have hinted here, and shall be more fully made out in its proper place.

⁷⁵ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 15.

⁷⁶ Con. Turon. 2. c. 13. Episcopum episcopam non habentem, nulla sequatur turba mulierum.

⁷⁷ Ibid. c. 19. Si inventus fuerit presbyter cum sua presbytera, aut diaconus cum sua diaconissa, aut subdiaconus cum sua subdiaconissa, annum integrum excommunicatus habeatur.

⁷⁸ Con. Antissiodor. c. 21.

⁷⁹ Gentillet. Exam. Concil. Trid. lib. 4. p. 259.

⁸⁰ Anton. Aug. de Emend. Gratiani, lib. 1. Dial. 20. p. 226.

⁸¹ Baron. an. 58. n. 18.

BOOK III.

OF THE INFERIOR ORDERS OF THE CLERGY IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE FIRST ORIGINAL OF THE INFERIOR ORDERS, AND THE NUMBER AND USE OF THEM : AND HOW THEY DIFFERED FROM THE SUPERIOR ORDERS OF BISHOPS, PRESBYTERS, AND DEACONS.

HAVING in the last book discoursed of the superior orders of the clergy in the primitive church, I come now to treat of those which are commonly called the inferior orders. And here our first inquiry must be concerning the original and number of them. The two great oracles of the Romish church, Baronius¹ and the council of Trent,² are very dogmatical and positive in their assertions both about their rise and number; that they are precisely five, viz. subdeacons, acolythists, exorcists, readers, and door-keepers; and that they are all of apostolical institution. And herein they are followed not only by Bellarmine,³ and the common writers of that side, but also by Schelstrate,⁴ a person who lived in greater light, and might have seen through the mists that were cast before the eyes of others. Cardinal Bona⁵ distinguishes between subdeacons and the rest. He fairly owns, that acolythists, exorcists, readers, and door-keepers are not of apostolical institution, as the modern school-men pretend; but as to subdeacons, he joins with them entirely, and says,⁶ that though the Scripture makes no express mention of them, yet their institution must be referred either to Christ, or at least to his apostles. The French writers are not generally so tenacious of this opinion, as having never sworn to receive the decrees of the Tridentine fathers with an implicit faith; but many of them ingenuously confess the rise of the inferior orders to be owing only to ecclesiastical institution. Morinus⁷ undertakes to prove that there was no such order as that of acolythists, or exorcists, or door-keepers among the Greeks in the age next to the apostles; nor does Schelstrate disprove his arguments, though he makes a show of refuting him. Duarenus⁸ says there were no such orders originally in the first and primitive church. Cotelerius⁹ confesses their original is involved wholly in obscurity; that there is no mention made of any of them in Ignatius, or any other ancient writer before Cyprian and Tertullian. And therefore Habertus¹⁰ is clearly of opinion, that it would be more advisable for their church to expunge all the inferior orders out of the number and catalogue of sacraments, and refer them only to ecclesiastical institution, as the ancient divines were used to do. By the ancient divines, he means the school-men, who were generally of this opinion heretofore. For Peter Lombard, who is set at the head of them,¹¹ declares that the primitive church had no orders below those of presbyters and deacons; nor did the apostle give command about any other, but the church in succeeding ages instituted subdeacons and acolythists herself. And this is the opinion of Aquinas,¹² and Amalarius

¹ Baron. an. 44. n. 78.

² Conc. Trid. Sess. 23. c. 2. It. Catechism. ad Parochos tit. de Sacramento Ordinis, p. 222.

³ Bellarm. de Clericis, lib. 1. c. 11.

⁴ Schelstrat. Concil. Antiochen. Restitut. Dissert. 4. c. 17. art. 2. p. 520.

⁵ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 17. Acolythos, exorcistas, lectores, et ostiarios, ab apostolis, vel ab immediatis eorum successoribus institutos, doctores scholastici asserunt, sed non probant.

⁶ Bona, ibid. n. 16. Subdiaconorum licet expressa mentio in sacris literis non reperitur, eorum tamen institutio vel ad Christum, ut recentiores scholastici existimant, vel ad apostolos referenda est.

⁷ Morin. de Ordinac. Exercit. 14. cap. 1.

⁸ Duaren. de Minister. et Beneficiis Eccl. lib. 1. c. 14.

⁹ Coteler. Not. in Constitut. Apost. lib. 2. c. 25.

¹⁰ Habert. Archieratic. par. 5. observ. 1. p. 48. Consultius meo quidem iudicio, ordines hierarchicis inferiores, ipsunque adeo hypodiaconi, et a sacramentorum censu expungere, et ad institutionem duntaxat ecclesiasticam cum antiquis theologis referre.

¹¹ Lombard. Sent. lib. 4. Dist. 21. p. 318. Hos solos primitiva ecclesia legitur habuisse, et de his solis præceptum apostoli habemus. Subdiaconos vero et acolythos procedente tempore ecclesia sibi constituit.

¹² Aquin. Supplement. par. 3. qu. 37. Art. 2. Resp. ad secundum.

Fortunatus,¹³ and many others. Schelstrate himself¹⁴ owns, that it was the opinion of two popes, Urban II. and Innocent III., that the order of subdeacons was not reckoned among the sacred orders of the primitive church: it was indeed an inferior order in the third century, but not dignified with the title of a sacred or superior order till the twelfth age of the church; when, as Menardus informs us out of a MS. book of Petrus Cantor,¹⁵ a writer of that age, it was then but just newly dignified with that character: that is, in an age when bishops and presbyters began to be reckoned but one order, in compliance with an hypothesis peculiar to the Romish church, then the order of subdeacons stepped up to be a superior order; and whereas the primitive church was used to reckon the three superior orders to be those of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, the Romish church now began to speak in a different style, and count the three superior orders, those of priests, deacons, and subdeacons: so that this last became a superior order, which for some ages before had been only an inferior order, and at first was no order at all. For the testimonies alleged by Schelstrate after Bellarmine and Baronius, to prove the inferior orders of apostolical institution, are of no authority or weight in this case. The Epistle under the name of Ignatius ad Antiochenos, and the Constitutions under the name of Clemens Romanus, which are the only authorities pretended in this matter, are now vulgarly known to be none of their genuine writings, but the works of some authors of much later date. So that till some better proofs be given, there will be reason to conclude, that these inferior orders were not of apostolical, but only of ecclesiastical constitution.

And this may be argued further, not only from the silence of the most ancient writers, but also from the accounts of those who speak of them presently after their institution. For though the Romish church determines them to be precisely five in number, yet in the ancient church there was no such rule; but some accounts speak of more than five, and others not of so many; which argues that they were not of apostolical institution. The author under the name of Ignatius¹⁶ reckons six without acolythists, viz. subdeacons, readers, singers, door-keepers, copiate, and exorcists. The author of the Constitutions under the name of Clemens Romanus¹⁷ counts but four of these orders, viz. subdeacons, readers, singers, and door-keepers. For he makes no mention of the copiate, or of acolythists: and though he speaks of exorcists, yet he says¹⁸ expressly it was no church order. The Apostolical Canons,¹⁹ as they are commonly called, name only three, subdeacons, readers, and singers. And though the author under the name of St. Jerom²⁰ mentions four, yet he brings the copiate or fossarii into the account, and makes them the first order of the clergy, leaving out acolythists and exorcists. Epiphanius²¹ makes no mention of acolythists, but instead of them puts in the copiate, and interpreters. Others add the parabolani also; and except Cornelius,²² there is scarce any other ancient writer, who is so precise to the number of five inferior orders, as now computed in the church of Rome.

The reason of which difference must needs be this, that there was no certain rule left originally about any such orders; but every church instituted them for herself, at such times and in such numbers as her own necessities seemed to require. For at first most of the offices of these inferior orders were performed by the deacons, as I have had occasion to show in another place.²³ But as the number of converts increased in large churches, such as that of Rome, which confined herself to the number of seven deacons, the duties of the deacon's office quickly became too great and heavy for them: whereupon a sort of assistants to them were appointed, first in those great churches, under the names of these inferior orders, to take off from the deacons some of the heavy burden that lay upon them. And that is the reason why we meet with the inferior orders in such great and populous churches as Rome and Carthage in the beginning of the third century; whereas in many of the lesser churches all the offices were still performed by deacons, even in the fourth and fifth centuries: which may be concluded from the words of the author under the name²⁴ of St. Austin, where speaking of the deacons of Rome, he says, the reason why they did not perform all the inferior services of the church was, that there was a multitude of the lesser clergy under them; whereas otherwise they must have taken care of the altar and its utensils, &c. as it was in other churches at that time. Which seems evidently to imply, that these inferior orders were not taken into all churches when that author made this observation.

Sect. 2.
No certain number of them in the primitive church.

¹³ Amalar. de Offic. Eccl. lib. 2. c. 6.

¹⁴ Schelstrat. de Concil. Antioch. p. 515.

¹⁵ Pet. Cantor, de Verbo Mirifico, ap. Menard. Not. in Sacramental. Gregor. p. 280. De novo institutum est, subdiaconatum esse sacrum ordinem.

¹⁶ Ep. ad Antioch. n. 12. ¹⁷ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. c. 11.

¹⁸ Ibid. lib. 8. c. 26.

¹⁹ Can. Apost. c. 69.

²⁰ Jerom. de Septem Ordin. Eccl. t. 4. p. 81.

²¹ Epiphanius. Expos. Fid. n. 21.

²² Cornel. Ep. ad Fab. ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

²³ Book II. chap. 20. sect. 15.

²⁴ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test. t. 4. c. 101. Ut autem non omnia ministeria obsequiorum per ordinem agant, multitudo facit clericorum. Nam utique et altare portarent, et vasa ejus, et aquam in manus funderent sacerdoti, sicut videmus per omnes ecclesias.

Sect. 4.
The principal use of them in the primitive church, to be a sort of nursery for the hierarchy.

But such churches as admitted them, made them subservient to divers good ends and purposes. For besides that of relieving the deacons in some part of their office, they were also a sort of nursery for the sacred hierarchy, or superior orders of the church. For in those days such churches as had these orders settled in them, commonly chose their superior ministers, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, out of them; and the clergy of these lesser orders were a sort of candidates under trial and probation for the greater. For the church, not having the advantage of Christian academies at that time, took this method to train up fit persons for the ministry, first exercising them in some of the lower offices, that they might be the better disciplined and qualified for the duties of the superior functions. And by this means every bishop knew perfectly both the abilities and morals of all the clergy of his diocese, for they were bred up under his eye, and governed by his care and inspection. In some places they lived all in one house, and ate all at one table: as Possidius²⁵ particularly notes of St. Austin's church at Hippo, and Sozomen²⁶ of the church of Rinocurra in the confines of Palestine and Egypt, that they had house, and table, and every thing in common. Hence it became a custom in Spain, in the time of the Gothic kings, about the end of the fifth century, for parents to dedicate their children very young to the service of the church; in which case they were taken into the bishop's family, and educated under him by some discreet and grave presbyter, whom the bishop deputed for that purpose, and set over them by the name of, præpositus, et magister disciplina, the superintendent, or master of discipline, because his chief business was to inspect their behaviour, and instruct them in the rules and discipline of the church. As we may see in the second and fourth councils²⁷ of Toledo, which give directions about this affair.

And upon this account these inferior clergy were tied as well as others to the perpetual service of the church, when once they had devoted and dedicated themselves to it; they might not then for-

Sect. 5.
Not allowed to forsake their service, and return to a mere secular life again.

²⁵ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 25. Cum ipso semper clerici, una etiam domo ac mensa, sumptibusque communibus alebantur et vestiebantur.

²⁶ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 31. Κοινή δέ ἐστι τοῖς αὐτοῖσι κληρικῶσι οἰκῆσις καὶ τράπεζα καὶ τὰλλα πάντα.

²⁷ Conc. Tolet. 2. c. 1. De his, quos voluntas parentum a primis infantia annis in clericatûs officio vel monachali posuit, statuimus—ut in domo ecclesiæ sub episcopali presentia a præposito sibi debeant erudiri. It. Tolet. 4. c. 23. Si qui in clero puberes aut adolescentes existunt, omnes in uno conclavi atrii commorentur, ut in disciplinis ecclesiasticis agant, deputati probatissimo seniore, quem et magistrum disciplinæ et testem vitæ habeant.

²⁸ Conc. Chalced. c. 7. Τοὺς ἀπαξ ἐν κλήρῳ κατειδεγ-sake their station, and return to a mere secular life again at their own pleasure. The council of Chalcedon²⁸ has a peremptory canon to this purpose: That if any person ordained among the clergy betake himself to any military or civil employment, and does not repent and return to the office he had first chosen for God's sake, he should be anathematized. Which is repeated in the council of Tours,²⁹ and Tribur,³⁰ and some others, where it is interpreted so, as to include the inferior orders as well as the superior.

But though they agreed in this, yet in other respects they differed very much from one another. As, 1. In name: the clergy of the superior orders are commonly called the ιερώμενοι, holy³¹ and sacred, as in Socrates and others; whence the name hierarchy is used by the author under the name of Dionysius³² the Areopagite, to signify peculiarly the orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons; as Hallier, a famous Sorbonne doctor, has abundantly proved against Cellotius the Jesuit, in his learned and elaborate Defence³³ of the Hierarchy of the Church. But on the other hand, the inferior orders in the ancient canons have only the name of insacrati, unconsecrated; as in the council³⁴ of Agde, where the insacrati ministri are forbidden to touch the sacred vessels, or to enter into the diaconicon or sanctuary, it is plain there must be meant the inferior orders. 2. Another difference, which gave rise to the former distinction, was the different ceremonies observed in the manner of their ordination. The one were always ordained at the altar; the others not so: the one with the solemn rite of imposition of hands; the other commonly without it. Whence St. Basil³⁵ calls the one βαθμός, a degree; but the other, ἀχειροτόνητος ὑπηρεσία, an inferior ministry, which had no imposition of hands. 3. The main difference was in the exercise of their office and function. The one were ordained to minister before God as priests, to celebrate his sacraments, expound his word publicly in the church, &c. In which respects the three superior orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, are said by Optatus, and others, to have each their

Sect. 6.
How they differed from the superior orders, in name, in office, and manner of ordination.

μέρους, ὠρίσαμεν, μήτε ἐπὶ στρατεῖαν, μήτε ἐπὶ ἀξίαν κοσμικὴν ἔρχεσθαι, &c.

²⁹ Si quis clericus, relicto officii sui ordine, laicam voluerit agere vitam, vel se militia tradiderit, excommunicationis pœna feriatur.

³⁰ Conc. Triburiens. c. 27.

³¹ Soerat. lib. 1. c. 10 et 15.

³² Dionys. de Hierar. Eccles. c. 5. n. 2.

³³ Hallier, Defensio Hierarch. Eccles. lib. 1. c. 3. lib. 3. sect. 2. c. 1 et 2.

³⁴ Conc. Agathen. c. 66. Non licet insacratos ministros licentiam habere, in secretarium, quod Græci diaconicon appellant, ingredi, et contingere vasa dominica.

³⁵ Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 51.

share and degree in the Christian priesthood, as has been noted in the former book:³⁹ but the inferior orders were not appointed to any such ministry, but only to attend the ministers in Divine service, and perform some lower and ordinary offices, which any Christian, by the bishop's appointment, was qualified to perform. What these offices were, shall be showed by a particular account of them in the following chapters.

CHAPTER II.

OF SUBDEACONS.

Sect. 1.
No mention of subdeacons till the third century.

THE first notice we have of this order in any ancient writers is in the middle of the third century, when Cyprian and Cornelius lived, who both speak of subdeacons as settled in the church in their time. Cyprian¹ mentions them at least ten times in his epistles; and Cornelius, in his famous epistle² to Fabius, bishop of Antioch, where he gives a catalogue of the clergy then belonging to the church of Rome, reckons seven subdeacons among them. But some think they were not quite so early in the Greek church: for Habertus³ says, no Greek writer speaks of them before Athanasius,⁴ who lived in the fourth century.

Sect. 2.
Their ordination performed without imposition of hands in the Latin church.

The author of the Constitutions, indeed, refers them to an apostolical original, and, in compliance with that hypothesis, brings in Thomas the apostle giving directions to bishops to ordain them with imposition of hands and prayer,⁵ as he does for all the rest of the inferior orders. But that author is singular in this; for it does not appear to have been the practice of the Greek church, whose customs he chiefly represents: St. Basil, a more credible witness, says of this and all the other inferior orders, that they⁶ were ἀχειροτόνητοι, ordained without imposition of hands. And for the Latin church it is evident, from a canon of the fourth council of Carthage, where we have the form and manner of their ordination thus expressed: When a subdeacon is ordained,⁷ seeing he has no imposition of hands, let him receive an empty patin and an empty cup from the hands of the bishop, and an ewer and towel from the archdeacon. Which form wholly excluding imposition of hands, is a good collateral evidence (as Habertus⁸ confesses ingenuously) to prove that this order was not instituted by the apostles: for they did not use to omit this ceremony in any of their ordinations.

As to the office of subdeacons, we may, in some measure, learn what it was from the forementioned canon,

Sect. 3.
A brief account of their offices.

viz. that it was to fit and prepare the sacred vessels and utensils of the altar, and deliver them to the deacon in time of Divine service. But they were not allowed to minister as deacons at the altar; no, nor so much as to come within the rails of it, to set a patin or cup or the oblations of the people thereon: as appears from a canon of the council of Laodicea,⁹ which forbids the ὑπηρέται, by which is meant subdeacons, to have any place within the diaconicon, or sanctuary, nor to touch the holy vessels, meaning at the communion table. Though this is now their office in the church of Rome; and in that, Bona¹⁰ owns they differ from those of the ancient church. Another of their offices was, to attend the doors of the church during the communion service. This is mentioned by the council of Laodicea, in a canon¹¹ which fixes them to that station. And Valesius thinks Eusebius meant them, when describing the temple of Paulinus, he speaks of some¹² whose office it was θυραυλιῶν καὶ ποδηγῶν τοὺς εἰσίσυρας, to attend the doors, and conduct those that came in to their proper places. The author of the Constitutions¹³ divides this office between the deacons and subdeacons, ordering the deacons to stand at the men's gate, and the subdeacons at the women's; that no one might go forth, nor the doors be opened in the time of the oblation. Besides these offices in the church, they had another office out of the church, which was to go on the bishop's embassies, with his letters or messages to foreign churches. For in those days, by reason of the persecutions, a bishop did not so much as send a letter to a foreign church but by the hands of one of his clergy. Whence Cyprian¹⁴ gives such letters the name of literæ clericæ: and the subdeacons were the men that were commonly employed in this office, as appears from every one of those epistles in Cyprian, which speak of subdeacons: particularly in that which he wrote to the clergy of Carthage in ³⁹ See Book II. chap. 19. sect. 15.

¹ Cypr. Ep. 8, 20, 29, 31, 35, 45, 78, 79. ed. Oxon.

² Ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43. ³ Habert. Archieratic. p. 49.

⁴ Athan. Ep. ad Solitar. Vit. agent.

⁵ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 21. ⁶ Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 51.

⁷ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 5. Subdiaconus quum ordinatur, quia manus impositionem non accipit, patinam de episcopi manu accipiat vacuum, et calicem vacuum. De manu vero archidiaconi, urceolum cum aqua, et mantile, et manutergium.

⁸ Habert. Archieratic. p. 48.

⁹ Conc. Laodic. c. 21.

¹⁰ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 16. Olim nec calicem nec patinam nec oblationes in altari ponebant.

¹¹ Conc. Laodic. c. 22. οὐ δεῖ ὑπηρέτην τὰς θύρας ἐγκαταλιμπάνειν.

¹² Euseb. Hist. lib. 10. c. 4.

¹³ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 11.

¹⁴ Cypr. Ep. 4. al. 9. Grave est si epistolæ clericæ veritas mendacio aliquo et fraude corrupta est.

his retirement, where he¹⁵ tells them, that having occasion to write to the church of Rome, and needing some of the clergy to convey his letter by, he was obliged to ordain a new subdeacon for this purpose, because the church could not spare him one at that time, having scarce enough left to perform her own daily services. These were anciently the chief of the subdeacons' offices at their first institution.

And great care was taken that they should not exceed their bounds, or encroach too much upon the deacon's office. They might not take upon them to minister the bread¹⁶ or the cup to the people at the Lord's table; they might not bid the prayers, or do any part of that service which the deacons did, as they were the κήρυκες or holy criers of the church. This is the meaning of the canon¹⁷ of the council of Laodicea, which prohibits the subdeacons from wearing an horaryum in time of Divine service: which was a habit of deacons, that they made use of as a signal to give notice of the prayers, and other services of the church, to the catechumens, penitents, &c., who were to observe their directions: this habit therefore the subdeacons might not wear, because it was a distinguishing habit of a superior order. And further, to show the same subjection and deference to deacons, as deacons did to presbyters, they are forbidden by another canon¹⁸ of that council to sit in the presence of a deacon without his leave.

There is but one thing more I shall note concerning this order, which is the singularity of the church of Rome in keeping to the number of seven subdeacons. For in the epistle of Cornelius¹⁹ which gives us the catalogue of the Romish clergy, we find but seven deacons, and seven subdeacons, though there were forty-four presbyters, and forty-two acolythists, and of exorcists, readers, and door-keepers no less than fifty-two. But other churches did not tie themselves to follow this example. For in the great church of Constantinople, and three lesser that belonged to it, there were ninety subdeacons, as may be seen in one of Justinian's Novels,²⁰ where he gives a catalogue of the clergy, and fixes the number of every order, amounting to above five hundred in the whole.

Sect. 4.
What offices they might not perform.

Sect. 5.
The singularity of the church of Rome in keeping to the precise number of seven subdeacons.

CHAPTER III.

OF ACOLYTHISTS.

NEXT to the subdeacons the Latin writers commonly put acolythists, which was an order peculiar to the Latin church: for there was no such order in the Greek church for above four hundred years; nor is it ever so much as mentioned among the orders of the church by any Greek writer all that time, as Cabassutus¹ and Schelstrate² confess. And though it occurs sometimes in the later Greek rituals, yet Schelstrate says it is there only another name for the order of subdeacons. But in the Latin church these two were distinguished: for Cornelius in his catalogue makes a plain difference between them, in saying there were forty-two acolythists, and but seven subdeacons in the church of Rome. Cyprian also speaks of them³ frequently in his epistles, as distinct from the order of subdeacons; though wherein their offices differed is not very easy to determine from either of those authors.

But in the fourth council of Carthage there is a canon which gives a little light in the matter: for there we have the form of their ordination, and some intimation of their office also. The canon⁴ is to this effect: When any acolythist is ordained, the bishop shall inform him how he is to behave himself in his office: and he shall receive a candlestick with a taper in it, from the archdeacon, that he may understand that he is appointed to light the candles of the church. He shall also receive an empty pitcher to furnish wine for the eucharist of the blood of Christ. So that the acolythist's office seems at that time to have consisted chiefly in these two things, lighting the candles of the church, and attending the ministers with wine for the eucharist: the designation to which office needed no imposition of hands, but only the bishop's appointment, as is plain from the words of the canon now cited.

Some think⁵ they had another office, which was to accompany and attend the bishop whithersoever he went; and that they were called acolythists upon this ac-

Sect. 1.
Acolythists an order peculiar to the Latin church, and never mentioned by any Greek writer, for four centuries.

Sect. 2.
Their ordination and office.

Sect. 3.
The origination of the name.

¹⁵ Cyr. Ep. 24. al. 29. Quoniam oportuit me per clericos scribere; scio autem nostros plurimos absentes esse, paucos vero, qui illic sunt, vix ad ministerium quotidiani operis sufficere: necesse fuit novos aliquos constituere, qui mitterentur: fecisse me autem sciat lectorem Saturum et hypodiamonum Optatum confessorum.

¹⁶ Conc. Laodic. c. 25. ἡ δεῦ ὑπηρέτας ἄρτον διδόναι, ἔδει ποτήριον εὐλογεῖν.

¹⁷ Ibid. c. 22. ἡ δεῦ ὑπηρέτην ὠράριον φορεῖν, &c.

¹⁸ Conc. Laodic. c. 20. ¹⁹ Ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

²⁰ Justin. Novel. 3.

¹ Cabassut. Notit. Concil. c. 42. p. 249.

² Schelstrat. de Concil. Antiocheno, Dissert. 4. c. 17. p. 526.

³ Cyr. Ep. 7, 34, 52, 59, 77, 78, 79. ed. Oxon.

⁴ Conc. Carthag. 4. c. 6. Acolythus quum ordinatur, ab episcopo quidem doceatur qualiter in officio suo agere debeat: sed ab archidiacono accipiat ceroferarium cum cereo, ut sciat se ad accendenda ecclesie luminaria vincipari. Accipiat et ureolum vacuum ad suggerendum vinum in eucharistiam sanguinis Christi.

⁵ Duaren. de Minister. et Benefic. lib. 1. c. 14.

count: or perhaps because they were obliged to attend at funerals in the company of the canonice and ascetice, with whom they are joined in one of Justinian's Novels.⁶ The original word, ἀκόλουθος, as Hesychius⁷ explains it, signifies a young servant, or an attendant who waits continually upon another. And the name seems to be given them from this. But the inference which a learned person⁸ makes from hence, that the order of acolythists was first in the Greek church, because the name is of Greek original, seems not to be so certain; because it can hardly be imagined, that it should be an order of the Greek church, and yet no Greek writer before Justinian's time make any mention of it.

I know, indeed, St. Jerom⁹ says, it was a custom in the Oriental churches to set up lighted tapers when the Gospel was read, as a token and demonstration of their joy; but he does not so much as once intimate, that they had a peculiar order of acolythists for this purpose: nor does it appear that this was any part of their office in the Latin church; for that which the council of Carthage speaks of, is probably no more than lighting the candles at night, when the church was to meet for their lucernalis oratio, or evening prayer. This office of acolythists, as much as the Romanists contend for the apostolical institution of it, is now no longer in being in the church of Rome, but changed into that of the ceroferrarii, or taper-bearers, whose office is only to walk before the deacons, &c., with a lighted taper in their hands. Which is so different from the office of the ancient acolythists, that Duarenus¹⁰ cannot but express his wonder, how the one came to be changed into the other, and why their doctors should call him an acolythist of the ancient church, who is no more than a taper-bearer of the present. Cardinal Bona¹¹ carries the reflection a little further, and with some resentment complains, that the inferior orders of the Romish church bear no resemblance to those of the primitive church, and that for five hundred years the ancient discipline has been lost.

⁶ Justin. Novel. 59.

⁷ Hesych. Ἀκόλουθος, ὁ νεώτερος παῖς, Ξεράπων, ὁ περιτόσωμα.

⁸ Bp. Fell, Not. in Cypr. Ep. 7.

⁹ Hieron. cont. Vigilant. t. 2. p. 123. Per totas Orientis ecclesias, quando legendum est evangelium, accenduntur lumina, &c.

¹⁰ Duaren. de Minister. et Benefic. lib. 1. c. 14. p. 74. Nescio quomodo tandem factum est, ut hoc munus in luminariarum curam postea conversum sit, et doctores nostri passim acolythos ceroferrarios interpretentur.

¹¹ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 18. Desierunt quoque minorum ordinum officia, quæ plerumque a pueris, et hominibus mercede conductis, nullisque ordinibus initiatis exercantur, &c.

¹ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 7. p. 331. εὐχῆ καὶ ὀρκώσσειν ἰδιῶται τὸ τοιοῦτον πρᾶσσοσι, &c.

CHAPTER IV.

OF EXORCISTS.

THERE is nothing more certain than that in the apostolical age, and the next following, the power of exorcising, or casting out devils, was a miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost, not confined to the clergy, much less to any single order among them, but given to other Christians also, as many other extraordinary spiritual gifts then were. Origen¹ says, private Christians, that is, laymen, did by their prayers and adjurations dispossess devils. And Socrates² observes particularly of Gregory Thaumaturgus, that whilst he was a layman he wrought many miracles, healing the sick, and casting out devils, by sending letters to the possessed party only. And that this power was common to all orders of Christians, appears further from the challenges of the ancient apologists, Tertullian³ and others, to the heathens, wherein they undertake, that if they would bring any person possessed with a devil into open court before the magistrate, any ordinary Christian should make him confess that he was a devil, and not a god. Minucius⁴ speaks of this power among Christians, but he does not ascribe it to any particular order of men: as neither does Justin Martyr,⁵ nor Irenæus,⁶ nor Cyprian,⁷ nor Arnobius,⁸ though they frequently speak of such a power in the church.

But as this gift was common to all orders of men, so it is reasonable to believe, that it was in a more especial manner conferred upon the bishops and presbyters of the church, who, when there was any occasion to use any exorcism in the church, were the ordinary ministers of it. Thus Cardinal Bona⁹ understands that famous passage of Tertullian, where speaking¹⁰ of a Christian woman, who went to the theatre, and returned possessed with a devil, he says, the unclean spirit was rebuked in exorcism for presuming to make such an attempt

Sect. 1.
Exorcists at first no peculiar order of the clergy.

Sect. 2.
Bishops and presbyters, for the three first centuries, the usual exorcists of the church.

² Socrat. lib. 4. c. 27. λαϊκὸς ὢν πολλὰ σημεῖα ἐποίησε, νοσῶντας Ξεραπέων, καὶ δαίμονας δι' ἐπιτολῶν φυγαδεύων.

³ Tertul. Apol. c. 23. Edatur hic aliquis sub tribunalibus vestris, quem dæmone agi constet. Jussus a quolibet Christiano loqui spiritus ille, tam se dæmonem confitebitur de vero, quam alibi Deum de falso.

⁴ Minuc. Octav. p. 83. Ipsos dæmonas de semetipsis confiteri, quoties a nobis tormentis verborum et orationis incendiis de corporibus exiguntur.

⁵ Justin. Apol. 1. p. 45.

⁶ Iren. lib. 2. c. 56 et 57.

⁷ Cypr. ad Donat. p. 4.

⁸ Arnob. cont. Gent. lib. 1.

⁹ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 17.

¹⁰ Tertul. de Spectac. c. 26. Theatrum adiit, et inde cum dæmonio rediit. Itaque in exorcismo cum oneraretur immundus spiritus, quod ausus esset fidelem aggredi: Constanter et justissime quidem (inquit) feci, in meo enim inveni.

upon a believer: to which the spirit replied, that he had a right to her, because he found her upon his own ground. This exorcism, I say, Bona supposes to be performed by some presbyter of the church, endowed with that miraculous gift. And the like may be said of those exorcists in Cyprian,¹¹ who cast out devils by a Divine power: and of those also who are mentioned by Firmilian,¹² as persons inspired by Divine grace, to discern evil spirits and detect them: as one of them did a woman of Cappadocia, who pretended to be inspired, and to work miracles, and to baptize, and consecrate the eucharist by Divine direction. These exorcisms were plainly miraculous, and prove nothing more than that some persons had such a gift, who probably were some eminent presbyters of the church: at least, they do not prove that exorcists were as yet become any distinct order among the clergy in the church.

Some think the order was as old as Tertullian, because Ulpian, the great lawyer, who lived in Tertullian's time, in one of his books¹³ speaks of exorcising, as a thing used by impostors, by whom probably he means the Christians. Gothofred thinks he means the Jewish exorcists, who were commonly impostors indeed: but admitting that he means Christians, (which is more probable, considering what Laetantius¹⁴ says of him, that he published a collection of the penal laws that had been made against them,) yet it proves no more than what every one owns, that exorcising was a thing then commonly known and practised among the Christians. Others urge the authority of Tertullian himself in his book de Corona Militis, where yet he is so far from owning any particular order of exorcists, that he rather seems to make every man his own exorcist. For there, among other arguments which he urges to dissuade Christians from the military life under heathen emperors, he makes use of this,¹⁵ that they would be put to guard the idol temples, and then they must defend those devils by night, whom they had put to flight by day by their exorcisms; by which he means their prayers, as Junius rightly understands him. And so in another place, dissuading Christians from selling such things as would contribute toward upholding of idolatry, or the worship of devils, he argues thus; that otherwise the devils would be their alumni; that is, might be said to be fostered and maintained by them, so long as they furnished out materials to carry on their service: and with what confidence, says he,¹⁶ can any man exorcise his own alumni, those devils, whose service he makes his own house an armoury to maintain? Vicecomes¹⁷ and Bona,¹⁸ by mistake, understand this as spoken of exorcism before baptism, taking the word, alumni, to signify the catechumens of the church: whereas, indeed, it signifies devils in this place, who are so called by Tertullian, in respect of those who contribute to uphold their worship; for such men are a sort of foster-fathers to them. So that this passage, when rightly understood, makes nothing for the antiquity of exorcists, as a peculiar order of the clergy, but only shows in what sense every Christian is to be his own exorcist, viz. by his prayers, resisting the devil, that he may fly from him.

Setting aside then both that extraordinary power of exorcising, which was miraculous, and this ordinary way also, in which every man was his own exorcist; it remains to be inquired, when the order of the exorcists was first settled in the church. And here I take Bona's opinion to be the truest, that it came in upon the withdrawing¹⁹ of that extraordinary and miraculous power; which probably was by degrees, and not at the same time in all places. Cornelius,²⁰ who lived in the third century, reckons exorcists among the inferior orders of the church of Rome: yet the author of the Constitutions, who lived after him, says it was no certain order,²¹ but God bestowed the gift of exorcising as a free grace upon whom he pleased: and therefore, consonant to that hypothesis, there is no rule among those Constitutions for giving any ordination to exorcists, as being appointed by God only, and not by the church. But the credit of the Constitutions is not to be relied upon in this matter: for it is certain, by this time exorcists were settled as an order in most parts of the Greek church, as well as the Latin; which is evident from the council of Antioch, anno 341, in one of whose canons²² leave is given to the chorepiscopi to promote subdeacons, readers, and exorcists; which argues, that those were then all standing orders of the church. After this, exorcists are frequently mentioned among the

Sect. 3.
In what sense every man his own exorcist.

Sect. 4.
Exorcists constituted into an order in the latter end of the third century.

¹¹ Cyp. Ep. 76. al. 69. ad Magnum, p. 187. Quod hodie etiam geritur, ut per exorcistas, voce humana et potestate divina, flagelletur, et uratur, et torqueatur diabolus.

¹² Firmil. Ep. 75. ap. Cyp. p. 223. Unus de exorcistis—inspiratus Dei gratia fortiter restitit, et esse illum nequissimum spiritum, qui prius sanctus putabatur, ostendit.

¹³ Ulpian. lib. 8. de Tribunal. in Digest. lib. 50. Tit. 13. Leg. 1. Si incantavit, si imprecatus est, si (ut vulgari verbo impostorum utar) exorcisavit.

¹⁴ Lact. Instit. lib. 5. c. 11.

¹⁵ Tertul. de Coron. Milit. c. 11. Quos interdiu exorcismis fugavit, noctibus defensabit.

¹⁶ Tertul. de Idol. c. 11. Qua constantia exorcisabit alumnos suos, quibus domum suam cellariam præstat?

¹⁷ Vicecom. de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 2. c. 30. p. 362.

¹⁸ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 17.

¹⁹ Bona, ibid. Postea subtracta hac potestate, constituit ecclesia ordinem, qui dæmonia expelleret.

²⁰ Ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

²¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 26. ²² Conc. Antioch. c. 10.

inferior orders by the writers of the fourth century, as in the council of Laodicea,²³ Epiphanius,²⁴ Paulinus,²⁵ Sulpicius Severus,²⁶ and the Rescripts of Theodosius,²⁷ and Gratian²⁸ in the Theodosian Code, where those emperors grant them the same immunity from civil offices, as they do to the other orders of the clergy.

Their ordination and office is thus described by the fourth council of Carthage:²⁹ When an exorcist is ordained, he shall receive at the hands of the bishop a book, wherein the forms of exorcising are written, the bishop saying, Receive thou these and commit them to memory, and have thou power to lay hands upon the energumens, whether they be baptized or only catechumens. These forms were certain prayers, together with adjurations in the name of Christ, commanding the unclean spirit to depart out of the possessed person: which may be collected from the words of Paulinus concerning the promotion of St. Felix to this office, where he says,³⁰ from a reader he arose to that degree, whose office was to adjure evil spirits, and to drive them out by certain holy words. It does not appear that they were ordained to this office by any imposition of hands either in the Greek or Latin church; but yet no one might pretend to exercise it either publicly or privately, in the church or in any house, without the appointment of the bishop, as the council of Laodicea directs;³¹ or at least the licence of a chorepiscopus, who, in that case, was authorized³² by the bishop's deputation.

As to the energumens, for whose sake this office was appointed, they were so called from the Greek word, ἐνεργούμενοι, which, in its largest signification, denotes persons who are under the motion and operation of any spirit, whether good or bad; but in a more restrained sense, it is used by ecclesiastical writers for persons whose bodies are seized or possessed with an evil spirit. Upon which account they are otherwise called δαίμονιζόμενοι, demoniacs, and κατεχόμενοι, possessed. And because this was frequently attended with great commotions and vexations, and disturbances of the body, occasioning sometimes frenzy and madness, sometimes epileptic fits, and other violent tossings and contortions; such persons are often upon that account styled χειμαζόμενοι by the Greek, and hyemantes by the Latin writers, that is, tossed as in a winter storm or tempest. Thus the author of the Constitutions in some places styles them simply χειμαζόμενοι,³³ by which that he means the energumens is evident, because in another place he styles them χειμαζόμενοι ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀλλοτρίου,³⁴ such as were under the commotions and vexations of Satan; and tells us, that prayer was made for them under that character, in the oblation at the altar for all states and conditions of men, that God would deliver them from that violent energy or agitation of the wicked one. And thus most learned men, except Albaspinæus, understand that phrase in the canon of the council of Ancyra,³⁵ which orders some certain notorious sinners, εἰς τοὺς χειμαζόμενους εὐχισθαι, to pray in loco hyemantium, in that part of the church where the demoniacs stood, which was a place separate from all the rest. And some also think the name,³⁶ κλυδωνιζόμενοι, was given to the energumens upon the same account, because it signifies persons agitated by a spirit, as a wave in a tempest.

Now these energumens, or demoniacs, or whatever other name they were called by, were the persons about whom the exorcists were chiefly concerned. For besides the prayers which were offered for them in all public assemblies, by the deacons and bishops, and the whole congregation, (some forms of which prayers may be seen in the author³⁷ of the Constitutions,) the exorcists were obliged to pray over them at other times,³⁸ when there was no assembly in the church; and to keep them employed in some innocent business, as in sweeping³⁹ the church and the like, to prevent more violent agitations of Satan, lest idleness should tempt the tempter; and to see them provided of daily food⁴⁰ and sustenance, while they abode in the church, which it seems was the chief place of their residence and habitation.

Sect. 6.
A short account of the energumens, their names, and station in the church.

Sect. 7.
The exorcist chiefly concerned in the care of them.

²³ Conc. Laodic. c. 24 et 26.

²⁴ Epiphanius. Expos. Fid. n. 21.

²⁵ Paulin. Natal. 4. S. Felicis.

²⁶ Sulpic. Vit. S. Martin. c. 5.

²⁷ Cod. Theod. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 121.

²⁸ Ibid. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 24.

²⁹ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 7. Exorcista quum ordinator, accipiat de manu episcopi libellum, in quo scripti sunt exorcismi, dicente sibi episcopo: Accipe et commenda memoriae, et habeto potestatem imponendi manus super energumenum, sive baptizatum, sive catechumenum.

³⁰ Paulin. Natal. 4. Felic. Primis lector servivit in annis, inde gradum cepit, cui munus voce fideli adjurare malos, et sacris pellere verbis.

³¹ Conc. Laod. c. 26.

³² Concil. Antioch. c. 10.

³³ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 35 et 37.

³⁴ Constit. lib. 8. c. 12. παρακαλούμέν σε ὑπὲρ τῶν χειμαζομένων ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀλλοτρίου—ὅπως καθαρῆς ἐκ τῆς ἐνεργείας τοῦ ποιηροῦ.

³⁵ Conc. Ancyra. c. 17.

³⁶ Vid. Dodwel. Dissert. I. in Cypr. n. 17.

³⁷ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 6 et 7.

³⁸ Conc. Carthag. 4. c. 90. Omni die exorcistæ energumenis manus imponant.

³⁹ Ibid. c. 91. Pavimenta domorum Dei energumeni verrant.

⁴⁰ Ibid. c. 92. Energumenis in domo Dei assidentibus victus quotidianus per exorcistas opportuno tempore ministratur.

Sect. 8.
The duty of exorcists in reference to the catechumens.

This was the exorcist's office in reference to the energumens; to which Valesius⁴¹ and Gothofred⁴² add another office, viz. that of exorcising the catechumens before baptism. Which is a matter that will admit of some dispute. For it does not appear always to have been the exorcist's office, save only in one of these two cases: either, first, when a catechumen was also an energumen, which was a case that very often happened: and then he was to be committed to the care of the exorcists, whose office was to exorcise all energumens, whether they were baptized, or only catechumens, as is evident from the canon already alleged, sect. 5, out of the council of Carthage. Or, secondly, it might happen that the exorcist was also made the catechist, and in that case there can be no question but that his office was as well to exorcise as to instruct the catechumens. But then the catechist's office was many times separate from that of the exorcist's: (though some modern writers confound them together:) sometimes a presbyter, or a deacon, or a reader was the catechist: and in that case it seems more probable that the exorcism of the catechumens was performed by the catechist than by the exorcist; and for that reason I shall treat of the office of catechist distinctly in its proper place.

CHAPTER V.

OF LECTORS OR READERS.

Sect. 1.
The order of readers not instituted till the 3rd century.

It is the opinion now of most learned men, even in the Romish church, that there was no such order as that of readers distinct from others for at least two ages in the primitive church. Bona owns¹ it to be one of the four orders, which he thinks only of ecclesiastical institution. And Cotelerius² says there is no mention made of it before the time of Tertullian, who is the first author that speaks of it as a standing order in the church. For writing against the heretics,³ he objects to them, that their orders were desultory and inconstant: a man was a deacon among them one day, and a reader the next. Which implies, that it was otherwise in the church, and that readers then were as much a settled order as deacons, or any other. Cyprian, who lived not long after Tertullian, frequently speaks of them as an order of the clergy. In one place⁴ he says he had made one Satorius a reader; and in another place he mentions one Aurelius, a confessor, whom he had ordained a reader for his singular merits, and constancy in time of persecution:⁵ and for the same reason he made Celerinus, another confessor, one of the same order among the clergy.⁶ So that it was then reckoned not only a clerical office, but an honourable office, to be a reader in the church, and such a one as a confessor needed not to be ashamed of. Sometimes persons of the greatest dignity were ordained to this office, as Julian is said to have been in the church of Nicomedia⁷ while he professed himself a Christian. Sozomen⁸ says expressly, that both he and his brother Gallus were reckoned among the clergy, and read the Scriptures publicly to the people. And there is no writer of that age, but always speaks of readers as a distinct order of the clergy in the church.

But since the order of readers, though frequently spoken of in the third and fourth ages, are never once mentioned in the two first, it will be proper to inquire, by whom the Scriptures were read in the church for those two centuries? Mr. Basnage⁹ is of opinion that the Christian church at first followed the example of the Jewish church, and in this matter took her model from the synagogue, where, as he observes out of Dr. Lightfoot,¹⁰ the custom was on every sabbath day to have seven readers, first a priest, then a Levite, and after them five Israelites, such as the minister of the congregation (whom they called the bishop or inspector and angel of the church) thought fit to call forth and nominate for that purpose: he thinks it was much after the same manner in the Christian church; the office was not perpetually assigned to any particular man, but chiefly performed by presbyters and deacons, yet so as that any other might do it by the bishop's appointment. But indeed the matter is involved in so great obscurity, that no certain conjecture can be made from the writings of the two first ages, but all that we can argue is from the seeming remains of the ancient customs in the following ages. For since we find that deacons in many churches continued to read the Gospel, even after the

Sect. 2.
By whom the Scriptures were read in the church before the institution of that order.

⁴¹ Vales. Not. in Euseb. de Martyr. Palæstin. c. 2.

⁴² Gothofred. Not. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 24.

¹ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 17.

² Coteler. Not. in Constitut. Apost. lib. 2. c. 25.

³ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 41. Hodie diaconus, qui cras lector.

⁴ Cyr. Ep. 24. al. 29. Fecisse me sciatis lectorem Satorius.

⁵ Id. Ep. 33. al. 38. Merebatur Aurelius clericæ ordinationis ultiores gradus—Sed interim placuit ut ab officio lectionis incipiat, &c.

⁶ Id. Ep. 34. al. 38. Referimus ad vos, Celerinum—clero nostro non humana suffragatione, sed divina dignatione conjunctum, &c.

⁷ Socrat. lib. 3. c. 1. Nazian. Invectiv. l. t. i. p. 58.

⁸ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 2. ὡς καὶ κλήρω ἐγκαταλεγεῖναι, καὶ ὑπαναγινώσκειν τῷ λαῷ τὰς ἐκκλησιαστικὰς βίβλους.

⁹ Basnag. Exercit. in Baron. p. 623.

¹⁰ Lightfoot, Harm. p. 479.

order of readers was set up; as I have had occasion to show¹¹ in another place from the author¹² of the Constitutions, and St. Jerom,¹³ and the council¹⁴ of Vaison; we may thence reasonably conclude, that this was part of their office before; and since presbyters and bishops in other churches did the same, as Sozomen¹⁵ informs us, it may as rationally be inferred, that this was their custom in former ages. But whether laymen performed this office at any time by the bishop's particular direction, as the Israelites did in the Jewish church, cannot be so certainly determined; only we find that in after ages, in the most celebrated church of Alexandria, even the catechumens, as well as believers,¹⁶ were admitted to do the office of readers; and that may incline a man to think that this office was not wholly confined to the clergy in the two first ages. But this being peculiar to the church of Alexandria, nothing can be argued from it concerning the practice of the universal church; and therefore, till some better light is afforded, I leave this matter undetermined.

It is more certain, that after the order of readers was set up, it was generally computed among the orders of the clergy, except perhaps at Alexandria, where that singular custom prevailed of putting catechumens into the office; for it can hardly be supposed, that they reckoned persons that were unbaptized, and not yet allowed to partake of the holy mysteries, into the number of their clergy. But in all other places it was reputed a clerical order, and persons deputed to the office were ordained to it with the usual solemnities and ceremonies of the other inferior orders. In the Greek church Habertus¹⁷ thinks they were ordained with imposition of hands, but among the Latins without it. The author of the Constitutions prescribes a form of prayer to be used with imposition of hands; but whether that was the practice of all the Greek church is very much questioned. In the Latin church it was certainly otherwise. The council of Carthage¹⁸ speaks of no other ceremony, but the bishop's putting the Bible into his hands in the presence of the people, with these words: Take this book, and be thou a reader of the word of God, which office if thou fulfil faithfully and profitably, thou shalt have part with those that minister in the word of God. And in Cyprian's time they seem not to have had so much as this ceremony of delivering the Bible to them, but they were made readers by the bishop's commission and deputation only to such a station in the church.

This was the pulpitum, or tribunal ecclesie, as it is commonly called in Cyprian, the reading-desk in the body of the church, which was distinguished from the bema, or tribunal of the sanctuary. For the reader's office was not to read the Scriptures at the altar, but in the reading-desk only. Whence, super pulpitum imponi, et ad pulpitum venire, are phrases in Cyprian¹⁹ to denote the ordination of a reader. In this place, in Cyprian's time, they read the Gospels, as well as other parts of Scripture; which is clear from one of Cyprian's epistles,²⁰ where speaking of Celerinus the confessor, whom he had ordained a reader, he says, It was fitting he should be advanced to the pulpit or tribunal of the church, that having the advantage of a higher station, he might thence read the precepts and Gospels of his Lord, which he himself as a courageous confessor had followed and observed. Albaspinæus²¹ says, they also read the Epistles and Gospels in the communion service: but he should first have proved, that those were anciently any part of the communion service; for they do not appear to have been so from the most ancient liturgies, but were only read in the missa catechumenorum, or, as we now call it, the first service, at which the catechumens were present. And wheresoever they were taken into the communion service, it was the office of deacons, and not the readers, to rehearse them. But of this more when we come to the liturgy and service of the ancient church.

There is but one thing more to be noted concerning this order, which is the age at which readers might be ordained. That is fixed by one of Justinian's Novels,²² precisely forbidding any one to be ordained reader before he was completely eighteen years old. But before this law was made it was customary to ordain them much younger: for Ennodius, bishop of Ticinum, says of Epiphanius his predecessor,²³ that he was ordained reader at eight years old: as ¹¹ Book II. chap. 20. sect. 6.

¹² Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57.

¹³ Hieron. Ep. 58. ad Sabin.

¹⁴ Conc. Vasens. 2. c. 2.

¹⁵ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 19.

¹⁶ Socrat. lib. 5. c. 22. ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ δὲ Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ ἀναγνώσται καὶ ὑποβολεῖς ἀδιάφορον, εἴτε κατηχούμενοι εἰσὶν, εἴτε πιστοί.

¹⁷ Habert. Archieratic. par. 4. obs. 1. p. 41.

¹⁸ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 8. Lector cum ordinatur, faciat de illo verbum episcopus ad plebem, indicans ejus fidem, vitam, et ingenium. Post hæc spectante plebe tradat ei codi- cem, de quo lecturus est, dicens, Accipe et esto lector verbi Dei, habiturus, si fideliter et utiliter impleveris officium, partem cum eis qui verbum Dei ministraverunt.

¹⁹ Cypr. Ep. 38 et 39. ed. Oxon.

²⁰ Cypr. Ep. 34. al. 39. Quid aliud quam super pulpitum, id est, super tribunal ecclesie oportebat imponi, ut loci altioris celsitate subnixus—legat præcepta et evangelia Domini, quæ fortiter ac fideliter sequitur?

²¹ Albaspin. Nof. in Concil. Carthag. 3. can. 4.

²² Justin. Novel. 123. c. 54.

²³ Ennod. Vit. Epiphani. Bibl. Patr. t. 15. p. 295. Anno- rum ferme octo lectoris ecclesiastici suscipit officium.

Cæsarius Arrelatensis²¹ is said to have been at seven. And this leads us to understand what Sidonius Apollinaris means, when speaking of John, bishop of Chalons, he says, he was a reader from his infancy.²² Which is also said of St. Felix by Paulinus,²³ that he served in the office of a reader from his tender years. So Victor Uticensis, describing the barbarity of the Vandalic persecution in Africa, he aggravates their cruelty with this circumstance, that they had murdered or famished all the clergy of Carthage, five hundred or more, among whom there were many infant readers.²⁷ Now, the reason why persons were ordained so young to this office, was what I have intimated before, that parents sometimes dedicated their children to the service of God from their infancy, and then they were trained up and disciplined in some inferior offices, that they might be qualified and rendered more expert for the greater services of the church.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE OSTIARIUM OR DOOR-KEEPERS.

THIS is the last of those five orders, which are pretended by the present church of Rome to be of apostolical institution: but for three whole centuries, we never so much as meet with the name of it in any ancient writer, except in the epistle of Cornelius,¹ bishop of Rome, where the πυλωροι, or door-keepers, are mentioned with the rest. In Cyprian and Tertullian there is no mention of them: the first and lowest order with them is that of readers, as it is now in the Greek church, among whom the order of door-keepers has been laid aside from the time of the council of Trullo, anno 692, as Schelstrate² scruples not to confess; though he blames Morinus for being a little too frank and liberal in extending this concession to the apostolical ages; and in order to confute him, alleges the authority of Ignatius and Clemens Romanus³ for the antiquity of this order. But he refers us only to spurious treatises under their names, not known till the fourth century, about which time it is owned this order began to be spoken of by some few Greek

Sect. 1.
No mention of this order till the third or fourth century.

²¹ Vit. Cæsar. ap. Sur. 27. Aug. Clero adscriptum inter ipsa infantie rudimenta, post exactum ætatis septennium.

²² Sidon. lib. 4. Ep. 25. Lector hic primum, sic minister altaris, idque ab infantia.

²³ Paulin. Natal. 4. Felic. Primis lector servivit in annis.

²⁷ Victor. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 3. Bibl. Patr. t. 7. 613. Fere quingenti vel amplius, inter quos quamplurimi erant lectores infantuli, &c.

¹ Ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

² Schelstrat. Conc. Antioch. Dissert. 4. c. 17. p. 520.

writers. For Epiphanius⁴ and the council of Laodicea⁵ put the θυρωροι, that is, door-keepers, among the other orders of the clergy. And Justinian also, in one of his Novels,⁶ speaks of them as settled in the great church of Constantinople, where he limits their number to one hundred, for the use of that and three other churches. This proves that they were settled in some parts of the Greek church, though, as Habertus⁷ observes, they continued not many ages, nor ever universally obtained an establishment in all churches.

What sort of ordination they had in the Greek church we do not find; for there is no author that speaks of it. In the Latin church it was no more but the bishop's commission, with the ceremony of delivering the keys of the church into their hands, and saying, Behave thyself as one that must give an account to God of the things that are kept locked under these keys; as the form is⁸ in the fourth council of Carthage, and the Ordo Romanus,⁹ and Gratian,¹⁰ who have it from that council.

Sect. 2.
The manner of their ordination in the Latin church.

Their office is commonly said to consist in taking care of the doors of the church in time of Divine service, and in making a distinction betwixt the faithful and the catechumens, and excommunicated persons, and such others as were to be excluded from the church. But I confess this is more than can be made out from ancient history, at least in reference to the state and discipline of many churches. For, in the African church particularly, as I shall have occasion to show in another place, a liberty was given not only to catechumens and penitents, but also to heretics, Jews, and heathens, to come to the first part of the church's service, called the missa catechumenorum, that is, to hear the Scripture read, and the homily or sermon that was made upon it: because these were instructive, and might be means of their conversion, so that there was no need of making any distinction here. Then, for the other part of the service, called missa fidelium, or the communion service, the distinction that was made in that, was done by the deacons or subdeacons, and deaconesses, as I have showed before in speaking of those orders. So that all that the door-keepers could have to do in this matter was only to open and shut the doors as officers and servants under the other, and to be governed wholly by their direction. It belonged to

Sect. 3.
Their office and function.

³ Ignat. Ep. ad Antioch. et Clement. Constit. lib. 3. c. 11.

⁴ Epiphan. Expos. Fid. n. 21. ⁵ Conc. Laodic. c. 24.

⁶ Just. Novel. 3. c. 1. Insuper centum existentibus iis, qui vocantur ostiarii.

⁷ Habert. Archierat. par. 5. obs. 1. p. 47.

⁸ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 9. Ostiarius cum ordinatur—ad suggestionem archidiaconi tradat ei episcopus claves ecclesie, dicens, Sic age quasi redditurus Deo rationem de his rebus quæ his clauibus recluduntur.

⁹ Ordo Roman. part. 2. p. 98. ¹⁰ Grat. Dist. 23. c. 19.

them likewise to give notice of the times of prayer and church assemblies; which in time of persecution required a private signal for fear of discovery: and that perhaps was the first reason of instituting this order in the church of Rome, whose example by degrees was followed by other churches. However it be, their office and station seems to have been little more than that of clerks and sextons in our modern churches.

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE PSALMISTÆ, OR SINGERS.

I HAVE hitherto given an account of those five inferior orders, which the church of Rome has singled out from the rest, and without any reason stamped them with the authority and character of apostolical institution; whilst yet she takes no notice of some others, which have as good pretence to antiquity, and to be styled distinct clerical orders, as most of the former. Among these I reckon the psalmistæ, the copiatæ, and the parabolani of the primitive church. Habertus,¹ and Bellarmine,² and others, who are concerned to maintain the credit of the Romish church in making but five inferior orders, pretend that singers and readers are only one and the same order. But as the canonists of their own church generally reckon them two, so nothing can be more evident than that they were always accounted so in the primitive church from their first institution. For they are distinguished as much as any other orders, by all the writers that mention them, as the reader that is curious in this matter may satisfy himself by consulting the places of Ephrem Syrus,³ the council of Laodicea,⁴ and those called the Apostolical Canons,⁵ and Constitutions,⁶ the author⁷ of St. Mark's liturgy, the epistle under the name of Ignatius,⁸ Justinian,⁹ and the council of Trullo,¹⁰ referred to in the margin. Particularly Justinian's Novel does so distinguish them, as to inform us that there were twenty-five singers and one hundred and ten readers in the Greek church of Constantinople. Which is a convincing evidence that they were of different orders.

The first rise and institution of these singers, as an order of the clergy, seems to have been about the beginning of the fourth century. For the council of Laodicea is the first that mentions them, unless any one thinks perhaps the Apostolical Canons to be a little more ancient. The reason of instituting them seems to have been to regulate and encourage the ancient psalmody of the church. For from the first and apostolical age singing was always a part of Divine service, in which the whole body of the church joined together: which is a thing so evident, that though Cabassutius¹¹ denies it, and in his spite to the reformed churches, where it is generally practised, calls it only a protestant whim; yet Cardinal Bona has more than once¹² not only confessed, but solidly proved it to have been the primitive practice. Of which therefore I shall say no more at present, but only observe, that it was the decay of this that first brought the order of singers into the church. For when it was found by experience, that the negligence and unskilfulness of the people rendered them unfit to perform this service without some more curious and skilful to guide and assist them; then a peculiar order of men were appointed, and set over this business, with a design to retrieve and improve the ancient psalmody, and not to abolish or destroy it. And from this time these were called κανονικοί ψαλται, the canonical singers, that is, such as were entered into the canon or catalogue of the clergy, which distinguished them from the body of the church. In some places, it was thought fit for some time to prohibit all others from singing but only these; with design, no doubt, to restore the concert of the ancient ecclesiastical harmony, which otherwise could not well have been done, but by obliging the rest for some time to be silent, and learn of those who were more skilful in the art of music. Thus I understand that canon of the council of Laodicea,¹³ which forbids all others to sing in the church, except only the canonical singers, who went up into the ambo, or singing desk, and sung out of a book. This was a temporary provision, designed only to restore and revive the ancient psalmody, by reducing it to its primitive harmony and perfection. That which the rather inclines me to put this sense upon the canon, and look upon it only as a prohibition for a time, is, that in after ages we find the people enjoyed their ancient privilege of singing all together; which is frequently mentioned by St. Austin, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Basil, and many others, who give an account of the psalmody and service of the church in

¹ Habert. Archierat. par. 4. obs. 4. p. 44.

² Bellarm. de Clericis, lib. 1. c. 11.

³ Ephrem. 93. Sermon. de Secundo Dom. Advent.

⁴ Conc. Laodic. can. 24. ⁵ Can. Apost. c. 69 et 43.

⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 3. c. 11.

⁷ Liturg. Marci, Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 35.

⁸ Epist. ad Antiochen. ⁹ Justin. Novel. 3. c. 1.

¹⁰ Concil. Trull. c. 4.

¹¹ Cabassut. Notit. Concil. c. 38. p. 201.

¹² Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 19. It. de Divin. Psalmod. c. 17.

¹³ Conc. Laodic. c. 15. μη δεῖν πλέον τῶν κανονικῶν ψαλτῶν τῶν ἐπὶ τὸν ἄμβωνα ἀναβαινόντων, καὶ ἀπὸ διφθέρας ψαλλόντων, ἐτέροισιν τινῶς ψάλλειν ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ.

their own ages, of which I shall speak more hereafter in its proper place.

Here I must note, that these canonical singers were also called ὑποβολεῖς, monitors, or suggestors, from their office, which was to be a sort of precentors to the people: for the custom in some places was for the singer or psalmist to begin a psalm or hymn, and sing half a verse by himself, and then the people answered in the latter clause; and from this they were said ὑπηχέειν, or succinere, to sing after him, by way of antiphona or responsal. In this sense, Epiphanius Scholasticus understands the name ὑποβολεῖς in Socrates,¹⁴ for he translates it, psalmi pronunciatores: and so both Valesius¹⁵ and Cotelerius¹⁶ explain it. But Habertus is of the contrary mind: he thinks the name,¹⁷ ὑποβολεῖς, denotes not singers, but readers; and that they were so called, because they suggested to the preachers a portion of Scripture to discourse upon: for then their homilies were frequently upon such parts of Scripture, as the reader had just before repeated. The controversy is nice betwixt these learned men, and I shall no further inquire into the merits of it, but leave it to every judicious reader to determine.

There is but one thing more that needs be noted concerning this order, which is the manner of their designation to this office: which in this agreed with all the other inferior orders, that it required no imposition of hands, or solemn consecration: but in one thing it differed from them, that whereas the rest were usually conferred by the bishop or a chorepiscopus, this might be conferred by a presbyter, using this form of words, as it is in the canon of the fourth council of Carthage:¹⁸ See that thou believe in thy heart what thou singest with thy mouth, and approve in thy works what thou believest in thy heart. And this is all the ceremony we find any where used about their designation.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE COPIATE OR FOSSARII.

ANOTHER order of the inferior clergy in the primitive church were those, whose business was to take care of funerals, and provide for the decent interment of the dead. These, in ancient writers, are commonly termed copiate, which is the name that Constantine gives them in two rescripts¹ in the Theodosian Code. Epiphanius speaks of them² under the same name, styling them κοπιᾶται, and the author³ under the name of Ignatius, κοπιῶντες. Gothofred⁴ deduces it from the Greek word κοπά-ζεν, which signifies resting; others from κοπερός, mourning; but generally the name is thought to be given them from κόπος, and κοπιᾶσθαι, which signify labouring; whence they are by some called laborantes. The author under the name of St. Jerom⁵ styles them fossarii, from digging of graves: and in Justinian's Novels⁶ they are called lecticarii, from carrying the corpse or bier at funerals. Gothofred thinks it improper to reckon these among the *clerici*⁷ of the ancient church: but when we are speaking of things and customs of the ancient church, I know not how we shall speak more properly than in the language of the ancients, who themselves call them so. For not only the author⁸ under the name of St. Jerom calls them the first order of the clerici, as they are in his account; but St. Jerom himself also gives them the same title, speaking of one that was to be interred: The clerici, says he, whose office⁹ it was, wound up the body, digged the earth, builded a vault, and so according to custom made ready the grave. This is the reason why Epiphanius¹⁰ and the counterfeit Ignatius reckon them among the inferior orders. And Gothofred had no need to make emendations upon those imperial laws¹¹ in the Theodosian Code, which give the copiate the name of clerici, and entitle them to some immunities and privileges upon that account: for this, as appears, was only to speak in the language and style of other ecclesiastical writers.

Sect. 3.
Why called ὑποβολεῖς.

Sect. 1
The copiate or fossarii reckoned among the clerici of the primitive church.

Sect. 4.
What sort of ordination they had.

¹⁴ Socrat. lib. 5. c. 22. ¹⁵ Vales. in Socrat. ibid.

¹⁶ Coteler. Not. in Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57.

¹⁷ Habert: Archierat. par. 4. obs. 1. p. 39.

¹⁸ Conc. Carthag. 4. c. 10. Psalmista, id est, cantor potest absque scientia episcopi, sola jussione presbyteri, officium suscipere cantandi, dicente sibi presbytero: Vide ut quod ore cantas, corde credas: et quod corde credis, operibus comprobas.

¹ Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 1. de Lustrali Collat. Leg. 1. It. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 15.

² Epiphan. Expos. Fid. n. 21.

³ Epist. ad Antioch. n. 12.

⁴ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 1. Leg. 1.

⁵ Hieron. de septem Ordin. Eccles. t. 4. p. 81.

⁶ Justin. Novel. 43 et 59.

⁷ Gothofr. Not. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 15.

⁸ De septem Ordin. Eccles. Primus in clericis fossarium ordo est, &c.

⁹ Hieron. Ep. ad Innocent. de Muliere septies icta, t. 1. p. 235. Clerici, quibus id officii erat, cruentum linteo cadaver obvolvunt, et fossam humum lapidibus construunt, ex more tumulum parant.

¹⁰ Epiphan. et Ignat. ubi supra.

¹¹ Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 20. de Veteranis, Leg. 12. Dum se quidam vocabulo clericorum, et infaustis defunctorum obsequiis occupatos—defendunt, &c. Ibid. lib. 13. Tit. 1. de Lustrali Collat. Leg. 1. Clericos excipi tantum, qui copiate appellantur, &c. Ibid. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 15. Clerici vero, vel hi quos copiatas recens usus instituit nuncupari, &c.

This order seems to have been first instituted in the time of Constantine: for Constantius his son, in one of those laws just now referred to, speaks of it as a late institution; and there is no writer of the three first ages that ever mentions it, but all that time the care of interring the dead was only a charitable office, which every Christian thought himself obliged to perform as occasion required. And that is the reason why we meet with so many noble encomiums of this sort of charity in the writers of those ages, but never once mention of any order instituted for that purpose. But when Constantine came to the throne, and was quietly settled in his new seat at Constantinople, he incorporated a body of men to the number of eleven hundred in that city, under the name of copiatae, for that particular service: and so they continued to the time of Honorius and Theodosius junior, who reduced them to nine hundred and fifty:¹² but Anastasius augmented them again to the first number, which Justinian confirmed by two Novels¹³ published for that purpose. And I suppose from this example of the Constantinopolitan church they took their rise in other populous churches.

But probably there might be some little difference between those in the church of Constantinople and others in the lesser churches. For at Constantinople they were incorporated into a sort of civil society, in the Roman language called, collegium, a college, whence the laws sometimes style them collegiati, and decani, collegiate, and deans. As in the forementioned laws of Honorius and Theodosius junior, and Justinian, and another of Theodosius the Great¹⁴ in the Justinian Code, where he grants them an exemption from some other civil offices, provided they did not act upon a feigned and pretended title, but were really employed in the service of the church. But why they were called decani, is not very easy to conjecture. Probably it might be, because they resembled the palatine deans, who were a sort of military officers belonging to the emperor's palace, and are styled also corpus decanorum in both the Codes¹⁵ mentioned by St. Chrysostom¹⁶ and other Greek writers under the name of δεκανοὶ ἐν τοῖς βασιλείοις, deans of the palace, to distinguish them from those other deans of the church, which some unwarily confound together. But I am not very confident that this was the reason of the name, and therefore I only propose it as a conjecture, till some one assigns a better reason for it.

Their office was to take the whole care of funerals upon themselves, and to see that all persons had a decent and honourable interment. Especially they were obliged to perform this last office to the poorer sort, without exacting any thing of their relations upon that account. That it was so at Constantinople, appears from one of Justinian's Novels,¹⁷ which acquaints us how Anastasius the emperor settled certain revenues of land upon this society, and ordered a certain number of shops or work-houses in the city to be freed from all manner of tribute, and to be appropriated to this use; out of whose income and annual rents of the lands, the defenders and stewards of the church, who had the chief care and oversight of the matter, were to pay these deans, and see the expenses of such funerals defrayed. Justinian not only confirmed that settlement; but a complaint being made of an abuse that, notwithstanding the laws of Anastasius, pay was exacted for funerals, he published that his Novel on purpose to correct it. But we do not find that such settlements were made in all other churches, but it is more probable that the copiatae were maintained partly out of the common stock of the church, and partly out of their own labour and traffic, which for their encouragement was generally exempted from paying custom or tribute, as we shall see hereafter.

CHAPTER IX.

OF THE PARABOLANI.

ANOTHER order of men, which by some are reckoned among the clerici of the ancient church, were those whom they called parabolani. Theodosius junior, in one of his laws relating to them in the Theodosian Code,¹ puts them among the clerici, and evidently includes them under that common title, as Gothofred rightly observes in his exposition of the place. Baronius himself does not deny that they were of the clergy, but he would persuade his reader ¹² Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 2. de SS. Eccles. Leg. 4. Non plures quam nongenti quinquaginta decani deputentur ecclesiarum, &c.

¹³ Justin. Novel. 43 et 59.

¹⁴ Cod. Just. lib. 11. Tit. 17. de Collegiatis Leg. unica. Qui sub prætextu decanorum seu collegiatorum, cum id munus non impleant, aliis se muneribus conantur subtrahere, eorum fraudibus credimus esse obviandum.

¹⁵ Vid. Cod. Theod. lib. 6. Tit. 33. de Decanis. Leg. 1.

It. Cod. Just. lib. 12. Tit. 27. Leg. 1 et 2.

¹⁶ Chrys. Hom. 13. in Hebr. p. 1849.

¹⁷ Justin. Novel. 59.

¹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 42. Placet nostræ Clementiæ, ut nihil commune clericis cum publicis actibus vel ad curiam pertinentibus habeant. Gothofr. Not. in loc. Sane clericorum eos numero fuisse, tum hujus legis initium, tum utraque hæc lex et sequens ostendunt.

that they were not a distinct order, but chosen out of the inferior orders of the clergy,² of which there is nothing said in that law, but rather the contrary, that they were to be chosen out of the poor of Alexandria.

Their office is described in the next law, where they are said to be deputed to attend upon the sick, and to take care of their bodies in time of their weakness.³ At Alexandria they were incorporated into a society to the number of five or six hundred, to be chosen at the discretion of the bishop of the place, out of any sort of men except the honorati and curiales, who were tied to serve in the civil offices of their country, and therefore were not allowed to enter themselves into any ecclesiastical service. They were to be under the government and direction of the bishop, as appears from the same law, which is a correction of the former law; for by it they were put under the government of the prefectus augustalis (as the chief civil magistrate was called at Alexandria): but by this law Theodosius revoked his former decree, and subjected them entirely to the care and disposition of the bishop; or, as the Greek collector of the ecclesiastical constitutions out of the civil law styles him,⁴ the pope; meaning, not the pope of Rome, as some ignorantly mistake, but the pope or bishop of Alexandria. For then it was customary to give every bishop the name of papa, as has been showed in another place.⁵ What time this order began, we cannot certainly determine: the first notice we have of it is in these laws of Theodosius junior, anno 415. Yet it is not there spoken of as newly instituted, but as settled in the church before. And probably it might be instituted about the same time as the copiate were under Constantine, when some charitable offices, which were only voluntarily practised by Christians before, as every one's piety inclined him, were now turned into standing offices, and settled upon a certain order of men particularly devoted to such services. That it was not any order peculiar to the church of Alexandria, is evident, because there is mention made of the parabalani being at Ephesus in the time of the second council that was held there, anno 449. For Basilius Seleuciensis, who subscribed there to the condemnation of Flavian, and the absolution of Eutyches the heretic, being brought to a recantation in the council of Chalcedon, makes this apology for himself, that he was terrified into that subscription, by the soldiers that came armed into the church, together with Barsumas and his monks, and the parabalani,⁶ and a great multitude of others. The original word is παραβαλανίς, which the old translator rightly renders, parabalani, which is the same with parabolani, for it is written both ways in ancient authors: but Binius, in his Greek edition of the councils, not understanding the word, explains it, ii qui circa balnea versantur, as if the parabalani had been persons attending at the public baths; whereas now all men know their office was of a different nature, and their names given them for a reason very different from that of giving attendance at the baths.

As to the reason of their name, to omit the fanciful interpretations of Aleciat and Accursius, which are sufficiently exposed by Gothofred, the opinion of Duarenus⁷ and Gothofred seems to be the truest, that they were called parabolani from their undertaking παράβολον ἔργον, a most dangerous and hazardous office, in attending the sick, especially in infectious and pestilential diseases. The Greeks were used to call those παράβολοι, who hired themselves out to fight with wild beasts in the amphitheatre. And so Socrates the historian uses the word,⁸ speaking of Theodosius his exhibiting one of the public games to the people at Constantinople, he says, The people cried out to him that he should suffer one of the bold παράβολοι to fight with the wild beasts. These were those whom the Romans called bestiarii, and sometimes paraboli and parabolarii, from the Greek word παραβάλλεσθαι, which signifies exposing a man's life to danger, as they that fought with wild beasts did. In this sense, I have had occasion to show before,⁹ the Christians were generally called parabolarii by the heathens, because they were so ready to expose their lives to martyrdom. And it is the opinion of Gothofred¹⁰ and some other¹¹ learned critics, that the ancient reading of the Greek copies of St. Paul's Epistle to the Philipians, chap. ii. ver. 30, was παραβουλευσάμενος τῇ ψυχῇ, exposing his life to danger, as an old Latin interpreter of Puteanus's renders it, parabolatus de anima sua. In the same sense these parabolani of the primitive church we are now speaking of, had their name from their bold exposing their lives to danger in attendance upon the sick in all infectious and pestilential distempers.

² Baron. an. 416. t. 4. p. 400. Fuisse hos minoris ordinis clericos allectos, exordium dati hoc anno rescripti insinuare videtur.

³ Cod. Th. ibid. Leg. 43. Parabalani, qui ad curanda debiliū ægra corpora deputantur, quingentos esse ante præcepimus: sed quia hos minus sufficere in præsentī cognovimus, pro quingentis sexcentos constitui præcepimus, &c.

⁴ Collect. Constit. Eccles. lib. I. Tit. 3. c. 18.

⁵ Book II. chap. 2. sect. 7.

⁶ Concil. Chalced. Act. 1. t. 4. p. 252.

⁷ Duaren. de Minist. et Benefic. lib. 1. c. 19.

⁸ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 22. Ὁ δῆμος κατεβόα, δεινῶ θηρίῳ ἕνα τῶν εὐφύων παραβόλων μάχεσθαι.

⁹ Book I. chap. 2. sect. 9.

¹⁰ Gothofr. Not. in Cod. Th. 16. t. 42.

¹¹ Vid. Grot. Hammond. Capel. in Philip. ii. 30.

Sect. 4.
Some laws and rules concerning their behaviour.

I shall only observe further of them, that being commonly, according to their name, men of a bold and daring spirit, they were ready upon all occasions to engage in any quarrel that should happen in church or state. As they seem to have done in the dispute between Cyril the bishop, and Orestes the governor of Alexandria: which was the reason why Theodosius by his first law sunk their number to five hundred, and put them under the inspection of the praefectus augustalis, and strictly prohibited them from appearing at any public shows, or in the common council of the city, or in the judges' court, unless any of them had a cause of his own, or of the whole body, as their syndic, to prosecute there; and then he must appear single, without any of his order or associates to abet him. And though he not long after revoked this law as to the former part, allowing them to be six hundred, and the bishop to have the choice and cognizance of them; yet in all other respects he ordered it to stand in its full force, still prohibiting them to appear in a body upon any of the foresaid occasions:¹² and Justinian made this law perpetual by inserting it into his own Code. Which shows that the civil government always looked upon these parabolani as a formidable body of men, and accordingly kept a watchful eye and strict hand over them; that whilst they were serving the church, they might not do any disservice to the state, but keep within the bounds of that office whereto they were appointed.

CHAPTER X.

OF THE CATECHISTS.

Sect. 1.
Catechists no distinct order of the clergy, but chosen out of any other order.

I HAVE hitherto discoursed of such particular orders of the ecclesiastics in the primitive church, as were designated precisely to some particular office and function: but there were some offices which did not require a man to be of any one distinct order, but might be performed by persons of any order; and it will be necessary I should give some account of these also, whilst I am treating of the clergy of the church. The first of these I shall speak of is the catechist, whose office was to instruct the catechumens in the first principles of religion, and thereby prepare them for the reception of baptism. This office was sometimes done by the bishop himself, as is evident from that passage in St. Ambrose, where he says,¹ upon a certain Lord's day, after the reading the Scriptures and the sermon, when the catechumens were dismissed, he took the competentes, or candidates for baptism, into the baptistery of the church, and there rehearsed the creed to them. This was on Palm-Sunday, when it was customary for the bishop himself to catechise such of the catechumens as were to be baptized on Easter-eve. Theodorus Lector² takes notice of the same custom in the Eastern churches, when he tells us, that before the time of Timothy, bishop of Constantinople, the Nicene creed was never used to be repeated publicly in that church, except only once a year, on the great day of preparation, the day of our Lord's passion, when the bishop was wont to catechise. At other times presbyters and deacons were the catechists. St. Chrysostom performed this office when he was presbyter of Antioch, as appears from one of his Homilies,³ which is inscribed, Κατήχησις πρὸς τοὺς μέλλοντας φωτίζεσθαι, A catechism or instruction for the candidates of baptism. Deogratias was catechist when he was deacon of Carthage, as we learn from St. Austin's book⁴ de Catechizandis Rudibus, which he wrote at his request, to give him some assistance in performing his duty.

Nor was it only the superior orders that performed this office, but sometimes persons were chosen out of the inferior orders to do it. Optatus was but a reader in the church of Carthage, and yet Cyprian made him catechist, or, as it is in his phrase,⁵ the doctor audientium, the master of the hearers, or lowest rank of catechumens. Origen seems to have had no higher degree in the church when he was first made catechist at Alexandria. For both Eusebius⁶ and St. Jerom⁷ say, he was but eighteen years old when he was deputed to that office; which was at least seven years before he could be ordained deacon by the canons of the church.

The author under the name of Clemens Romanus seems to have had regard to this, when comparing the

Sect. 2.
Readers sometimes made catechists.

Sect. 3.
Why called ναυτολόγοι by some Greek writers.

¹² Cod. Just. lib. i. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 18. Hi sexcenti viri reverendissimi sacerdotis præceptis ac dispositionibus obsecundant: reliquis, quæ dudum latæ legis forma complectitur super his parabolanis, vel de spectaculis, vel de judiciis, cæterisque (sicut jam statutum est) custodiendis.

¹ Ambros. Ep. 33. Post lectiones atque tractatum, dimissis catechumenis, symbolum aliquibus competentibus in baptisteriis tradebam basilicæ.

² Theodor. Lector. Collectan. lib. 2. p. 563. τὸ σύμβολον ἕπαξ τοῦ ἔτους λεγόμενον πρότερον ἐν τῇ ἁγίᾳ παρασκευῇ τοῦ θεοῦ πάθους, τῷ καιρῷ τῶν γινουμένων ὑπὸ τοῦ ἐπισκόπου κατηχήσεων.

³ Chrys. Hom. 21. ad Popul. Antiochen.

⁴ Aug. de catechizand. Rudibus, c. 1. t. 4. p. 295. Dixisti quod sæpe apud Carthaginem, ubi diaconus es, ad te adducantur, qui fide Christiana imbuendi sunt, &c.

⁵ Cypr. Ep. 24. al. 29. Optatum inter lectores doctorem audientium constituimus.

⁶ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 3.

⁷ Hieron. de Scriptor. in Origene. Decimo octavo ætatis suæ anno κατηχήσεων opus aggressus, &c.

church to a ship, and the clergy to the officers in it, he plainly distinguishes the catechists from the bishop, presbyters, and deacons, saying, The bishop⁸ is to resemble the πρωρεύς, or pilot; the presbyters the ναῦται, or mariners; the deacons, the τοιχαρχοί, or chief rowers; the catechists, the ναυτολόγοι, or those whose office it was to admit passengers into the ship, and contract with them for the fare of their passage. This was properly the catechist's duty, to show the catechumens the contract they were to make, and the conditions they were to perform, viz. repentance, faith, and new obedience, in order to their admittance into the Christian ship, the church, in which they were to pass through this world to the kingdom of heaven. Upon this account the catechists were termed ναυτολόγοι, and as such distinguished from bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Cotelerius⁹ says he found a Greek manuscript in one of the French king's libraries, where the same comparison is made, and cited out of the Constitutions, in these words: The church is like a ship: Christ is the governor; the bishop, the pilot; the presbyters, the mariners; the deacons, the chief rowers; the catechists, or navtologi, the orders of subdeacons and readers. So that it is evident the catechists were sometimes chosen out of the inferior orders, when any of them were found duly qualified to discharge the duties of that function. And this will be the less wondered at by any one that considers, that the deaconesses, whilst their order was in being, were required to be a sort of private catechists to the more ignorant and rustic women-catechumens: which I need not stand to evidence here, because I have done it heretofore in speaking of the offices which belonged to that order. See Book II. chap. 22. sect. 9.

Sect. 4.
Whether all catechists taught publicly in the church.

But in all these cases there is one thing to be diligently noted, that this sort of catechists were not allowed to instruct their catechumens publicly in the church, but only in private auditories appointed particularly for that purpose. Valesius¹⁰ observes this in the case of Origen, and rightly concludes it from the invective of Demetrius bishop of Alexandria, against Alexander bishop of Jerusalem, and Theoctistus bishop of Cæsarea, who had authorized Origen to preach publicly in the church, when as yet he was no presbyter. This accusation had been ridiculous, had he himself given Origen the same power before, when he was catechist at eighteen years of age at Alexandria. Ruffin indeed, in his translation of Eusebius, says positively that Demetrius gave him authority to catechise and teach publicly in the church.¹¹ But that is an interpolation and false paraphrase of Eusebius his words, who says no such thing, but only,¹² that Demetrius, bishop of the church, had committed to his care the office of catechising, or, as we may render it, the catechetical school, where probably for some time he also taught grammar and other human learning. That there were such sort of catechetical schools adjoining to the church in many places, is evident from a Novel¹³ of the emperor Leo, who calls them κατηχομένα, and says they were a sort of buildings belonging to the church. It might be the baptistery, as St. Ambrose calls it, or any other places set apart for that purpose.

Sect. 5.
Of the succession in the catechetical school at Alexandria.

Such a school as this we may suppose that to have been, wherein Origen and so many other famous men read catechetical lectures at Alexandria. Eusebius says Pantænus taught in this school,¹⁴ anno 181, and that it was a school of sacred learning from ancient custom long before, and that it continued so to be to his own time. St. Jerom deduces its original from St. Mark, the first founder of the church of Alexandria, telling us, that Pantænus¹⁵ taught Christian philosophy at Alexandria, where it had been the custom of old always to have ecclesiastical doctors from the time of St. Mark. Where by ecclesiastical doctors he does not mean the bishop and presbyters of the church, (which were originally in all churches as well as Alexandria,) but the doctors of Christian philosophy in the catechetical school, whereof there had been a succession from the first foundation of the church. And the succession was continued for some ages after: for Clemens Alexandrinus¹⁶ succeeded Pantænus; and Origen,¹⁷ Clemens; Heraclas,¹⁸ Origen; and Dionysius,¹⁹ Heraclas. After whom some²⁰ add Athenodorus, Malchion, Athanasius, and Didymus. And the author of the Greek Synodicon published ⁸ Clem. Ep. ad Jacob. n. 14.

⁹ Coteler. Not. in Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. p. 263.

ἔοικεν ἡ ἐκκλησία νηὶ ὃ μὲν κυβερνήτης ἐστὶν ὁ Χριστός· ὃ δὲ πρωρεύς, ὃ ἐπίσκοπος· οἱ ναῦται, οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, οἱ τοιχαρχοί, οἱ διάκονοι, οἱ ναυτολόγοι, τὸ τῶν ἀναγνωστῶν καὶ ὑπηρετῶν τάγμα.

¹⁰ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 6. c. 19. It. Hallier. de Hierarch. Eccles. lib. 1. c. 7. p. 66.

¹¹ Ruffin. lib. 6. c. 3. Demetrius—catechizandi ei, id est, docendi magistristerium in ecclesia tribuit.

¹² Euseb. lib. 6. c. 3. αὐτῷ μὲν τῆς τῆς κατηχέων διατριβῆς ὑπὸ Δημητρίου τῆς τῆς ἐκκλησίας προεστώτος ἐπιτεταμένους.

¹³ Leo, Novel. 73. In ecclesiarum cœnaculis, quæ promiscuum vulgus κατηχομένα vocare solet. Vid. Concil. Trull. c. 97. et Balsamon. et Zonar. in loc.

¹⁴ Euseb. lib. 5. c. 10. ἠγγέιτο τηρικαῦτα τῆς τῶν πιτῶν αὐτοῦ διατριβῆς Πάντανος· ἐξαρχαίου ἐξουσιάζοντος διὰ δασκαλείου τῶν ἱερῶν λόγων παρ' αὐτοῖς συνεστώτος· ὁ καὶ εἰς ἡμᾶς παρατείνεται.

¹⁵ Hieron. de Scriptor. c. 36. Pantænus Stoicæ sectæ philosophus, juxta quamdam veterum in Alexandria consuetudinem, ubi a Marco evangelista semper ecclesiastici fuerunt doctores—docuit sub severo principe, &c.

¹⁶ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 6.

¹⁷ Id. lib. 6. c. 19.

¹⁸ Hieron. de Scriptor. in Origene. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 26.

¹⁹ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 29.

²⁰ Hospin. de Templis, lib. 3. c. 5.

by Pappus, says,²¹ Arius taught in the same school before he broached his heresy. It were easy to recount many other such schools at Rome, Cæsarea, Antioch, &c.; but I shall have another occasion to speak of these, when I come to consider the encouragement that Christian emperors gave to schools of learning and the professors of liberal arts and sciences: what has here been suggested upon this head, may suffice at present to show what was the office of the catechist, and what the use of catechetical schools in the church.

CHAPTER XI.

OF THE ECCLESIECIDICI AND DEFENSORES, OR SYNDICS OF THE CHURCH.

ANOTHER office which will deserve to be spoken of in this place, because it was sometimes, though not always, managed by the hands of the clergy, is that of the defensores. For the understanding of which it will be necessary in the first place to distinguish between the civil and ecclesiastical defenders. For Gothofred thinks there were in all four sorts of them, viz. the defensores senatus, defensores urbium, defensores ecclesiarum, and defensores pauperum. But he might have added one more, which Ulpian¹ calls, defensores rerum publicarum, whose office was, to be a sort of proctors or syndics in managing of the public causes of that corporation or company of tradesmen to which they belonged: which sort of defenders were first instituted by Alexander Severus, as Lampridius² tells us in his Life. The defensores civitatum, or, as they are otherwise called, defensores plebis, were a sort of tribunes of the people; one of their chief offices being to defend the poor plebeians against the insults and oppressions of the great and wealthy citizens. Now, in imitation of these, I presume, the ecclesiastical defenders were instituted, as both their name and office seems plainly to imply.

The defenders of the poor had much the same employment in the church, as the defensores plebis had in the state: for if any of the poor, or virgins, or widows belonging to the church, were injured or oppressed by the rich, it was the business of these defenders, as their proctors or advocates, to see them righted, and to solicit the magistrate that they might have justice done them. This is evident from the decree made in the fifth council of Carthage, anno 401, which is also inserted into the African Code, and is to this purpose: That³ forasmuch as the church was incessantly wearied with the complaints and afflictions of the poor, it was unanimously agreed upon by them in council, that the emperors should be petitioned to allow defenders to be chosen for them by the procurement and approbation of the bishops, that they might defend them from the power and tyranny of the rich.

As to the other sort of defenders, called defensores ecclesie, (whom I speak of separately, because Gothofred makes a distinction between them, though others take them to be the same,) their office did as plainly resemble that of the other sort of civil defenders, called defensores rerum publicarum. For as those were the proctors and syndics of their respective companies, to manage the public concerns of their societies at law upon all emergent occasions; so these did the same for the church, whose syndics they were, being employed to solicit the cause of the church, or any single ecclesiastic, when they were injured or oppressed, and had occasion for redress in a civil court; or if they were not remedied there, they were to address the emperors themselves in the name of the church, to procure a particular precept in her favour. Thus Possidius⁴ tells us in the Life of St. Austin, that when the Circumcellions, in their mad zeal, had plundered and slain some of the catholic clergy, the defensor of the church prosecuted them at law for the fact, that the peace of the church might no more be disturbed or impeded. In like manner, we read in the first council of Carthage,⁵ that it being a thing against the imperial laws for any layman to impose a secular office upon a clergyman; if any such injury was offered to the church, it is said, the affront might be redressed, if the defenders of the church did not fail in their duty. Which plainly implies, that it was the business of the defenders to see the rights of the church, that were settled upon her by law, truly maintained; and if any encroachments were made upon them, they were to prosecute the aggressors and invaders before the magistrates, and execute the sentence which they gave in favour of

Sect. 1.
Five sorts of defensores noted, two whereof only belonged to the church.

Sect. 2.
Of the defensores pauperum.

²¹ Synodicon Concil. t. 1. p. 1491.

¹ Digest. lib. 49. Tit. 4. Leg. 1.

² Lamprid. Vit. Alexand. Corpora omnium constituit, vinariorum, lupinariorum, caligariorum, et omnino omnium artium: hisque ex sese defensores dedit.

³ Conc. Carth. 5. c. 9. Ab imperatoribus universis visum est postulandum, propter afflictionem pauperum, quorum molestiis sine intermissione fatigatur ecclesia, ut defensores eis, adversus potentias divitum, cum episcoporum provisione delegentur. Vid. Cod. Eccles. Afr. can. 75.

⁴ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 12. De qua re, ne pacis ecclesie amplius impediretur profectus, defensor ecclesie inter leges non siluit, &c.

⁵ Conc. Carthag. 1. c. 9. Ipsis non liceat clericos nostros eligere apothecarios vel ratiocinatores.—Quod si injuria constitutionis imperatorie clericos inquietandos putaverint, si defensio ecclesiastica nos non deridet, pudor publicus vindicabitur.

Sect. 3.
Of the defensores ecclesie, their office and function.

the church. It is further observable from a law of Arcadius and Honorius, recited in the next paragraph, that in case of necessity they were likewise to make application to the emperors, and bring their mandate to the inferior judges, when they could not otherwise have justice done them. By a canon of the council of Chalcedon, defenders are also empowered to admonish such idle monks and clerks as resorted to the royal city Constantinople, without any licence or commission from their bishop; and if after admonition they continued still to loiter there, the same defenders were to expel them thence by force,⁶ and cause them to return to their own habitation. It appears also, from Justinian's laws,⁷ that the defenders, together with the aconomi, were made a sort of superintendents over the copiate, or great body of deans, whose business was to attend at funerals, as has been showed before: the defenders were charged with the care of these, both in reference to their revenues and persons. They were likewise to make inquiry, whether every clerk belonging to the church carefully attended the celebration of morning and evening service in the church, and to inform the bishop of such as neglected, that they might be proceeded against with ecclesiastical censures.⁸ These were the chief, if not the only offices of the defenders in the primitive church: for as to any spiritual power or jurisdiction over the clergy, they had none; nor were they as yet admitted to hear criminal causes, great or little, in the bishop's name; but these things were devolved upon them in latter ages, as Morinus⁹ shows at large in a long dissertation upon this subject, to which I refer the inquisitive reader, contenting myself to give such an account of the defensor's office and power, as I find it to have been in the ages next after their institution.

The next inquiry must be into their quality, whether they were of the clergy or laity? For learned men are not agreed about this. Petavius¹⁰ says they were always laymen. But Morinus¹¹ and Gothofred,¹² with much better reason, assert the contrary, that at first they were generally chosen out of the clergy, till, for some particular reasons, it was thought most proper to have advocates at law to discharge this office in the African churches. This change was made about the year 407, when the African fathers, in the council of Carthage,¹³ petitioned the emperor Honorius, that he would give them leave to choose their defensors out of the scholastici, or advocates at law, who were actually concerned in pleading of causes; that so they who took upon them the defence of the churches, might have the same liberty as the provincial priests were used to have, to go, upon necessary occasion, into the judges' consistory, or council-chamber behind the veil, and there suggest what they thought necessary to promote their own cause, or obviate the plots of their adversaries. In answer to this petition, Honorius shortly after published a law, wherein he granted them liberty to make use of such advocates for their defensors as they desired: for he decreed,¹⁴ that whatever privileges were specially obtained of the emperor, relating to the church, should be intimated to the judges, and executed, non per coronatos, not by clergymen, as Gothofred rightly explains it, but by advocates at law. So that now it was no longer necessary that the defensors should be of the clergy, but the office was frequently intrusted in the hands of laymen. Which is further evident from an epistle of Pope Zosimus, who lived about the same time: for he says,¹⁵ the defensors of the church were chosen out of the laity, and might afterward, if they were deserving, be ordained among the clergy. Yet after this we find the defensors in some places continued still to be of the clergy. For Morinus shows, that in the first session of the council of Chalcedon there is frequent mention made of one John, a presbyter and defensor;¹⁶ as also in many epistles of Gregory the Great, the defensors of the Roman church are said to be of the clergy: to which I shall add a fragment of Theodorus Lector taken out of Damascen,¹⁷ which speaks of one John, as both deacon and defensor of the church of St. Stephen at Constantinople in the time of Anastasius the emperor, which was in the beginning of the sixth century. From all which it is very evident against Petavius, that the defensors were sometimes chosen out of the clergy, and not always made of advocates or laymen.

Sect. 4.
Of their quality,
whether they were clergymen or laymen?

⁶ Conc. Chalced. c. 23. "Ακουτας αὐτὲς διὰ τῶ αὐτῶ ἐκόικεν ἐκβάλλεσθαι, καὶ τὲς ἰδίαις καταλαμβάνειν τόπους.

⁷ Justin. Novel. 59.

⁸ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 42. n. 10.

⁹ Morin. de Ordin. Eccles. par. 3. Exercit. 16. c. 7.

¹⁰ Petav. Not. in Epiph. Hær. 72. n. 10.

¹¹ Morin. ibid. Exerc. 16. c. 6. n. 16.

¹² Gothofred. Not. in Cod. Theod. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 38.

¹³ Concil. African. vulgo dictum. can. 64. Placuit ut petant legati a gloriosissimis imperatoribus, ut dent facultatem defensores constituendi scholasticos, qui in actu sunt, vel in munere defensionis causarum, ut more sacerdotum provinciarum, iidem ipsi qui defensionem ecclesiarum susceperint, habeant facultatem pro negotiis ecclesiarum, quoties necessitas flagitaverit, vel ad obsistendum obrepentibus, vel ad necessaria suggerenda, ingredi judicium secretaria. Vid. Cod. can. Afr. Gr. Lat. c. 97. et Concil. Milevitan. c. 16, to the same purpose.

¹⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 38. Ut quæcunque de nobis ad ecclesiam tantum pertinentia, specialiter fuerint impetrata, non per coronatos, sed ab advocatis, eorum arbitratu, et iudicibus innotescant, et sortiantur effectum, &c.

¹⁵ Zosim. Ep. 1. c. 3. Defensores ecclesiarum, qui ex laicis fiunt, supradicta observatione teneantur, si meruerint esse in ordine clericatus.

¹⁶ Concil. Chalced. Act. 1.

¹⁷ Vid. Damascen. Orat. 3. de Imagin. p. 799. et Fragment. Theodor. Lector. edit. a Vales. p. 583. Ιωάννης διάκονος καὶ ἐκδικὸς τῆ ἰαγῆς οἴκου Στεφάνου, &c.

Sect. 6.
The ἔκδικοι and ἐκκλησιαστικῶν among the Greeks the same with the defensors of the Latin church.

I must not omit to acquaint the reader, that what the Latins call defensores, the Greek church commonly calls ἔκδικοι and ἐκκλησιαστικῶν, which signify the same as defensors; though Gothofred,¹⁸ without any just reason, makes a difference between them: for not only their offices and powers are described to be the same, but also whenever the Greeks have any occasion to speak of the Latin defensors, they give them the name of ἔκδικοι, as may be seen either in the Code of the African church¹⁹ published by Justellus, or that which the Greeks commonly call the council of Carthage, published by Ehinger,²⁰ and Dr. Beverege²¹ in the Pandects. But whether προσάτης be another Greek name for a defensor, is not so certain. The word is only found once used by Epiphanius,²² who speaking of one Cyriacus, styles him Κυριακὸς προσάτης, which Petavius renders, Cyriacus defensor. He seems indeed to have had some office in the church, because he is joined in the subscription of a letter with the clergy, presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, and readers: but whether that be a sufficient reason to make him a defensor, I must leave the judicious reader to determine.

Sect. 6.
Chancellors and defensors not the same in the primitive church.

There is one thing more must be resolved before I dismiss this subject; that is, whether chancellors and defensors were the same in the primitive church? In answer to which I say, it is very plain they were not: because the first time we find any mention of the office of chancellors in the church, they are expressly distinguished from the ἔκδικοι or defensors; and that is in the Novel of Heraclius, made in the beginning of the seventh century, where, determining the number of ecclesiastical officers that were to be allowed in the great church of Constantinople, he says, there should be two syncelli, twelve chancellors,²³ ten defensors, twelve referendaries, forty notaries, and twelve sceuophylaces, whereof four to be presbyters, six deacons, and two readers. It is not very easy to determine what the office of these chancellors was at that time; but it is very evident, however, from this, that they were not the same with the defensors. They who are acquainted with the civil law, know that the cancellarii in the civil courts were not judges, but officers attending the judge in an inferior station; which appears evidently from a title in both the Theodosian and Justinian Code,²⁴ De adessoribus et domesticis et cancellariis judicium. Hottoman and Accursius take them for actuaries or notaries; but Gothofred, in his learned Notes²⁵ upon the Theodosian

Code, proves at large out of Cassiodore and Agathias, that they were the custodes secretarii, the guards of the judges' consistory, and called cancellarii because they stood ad cancellos, at the rails or barriers which separated the secretum from the rest of the court. So that their office then was not to sit as judges or assessors, but only to attend the judge, and keep peace and good order under him. And if this was the condition of the cancellarii in the state, it is probable they had some such office in the church in the time of Heraclius, who first mentions them; but what that office was I am not able to determine any further, save only that it was not the same with that of the defensors of the church.

It may be asked then, whether the office of our modern chancellors has any relation or resemblance to that of defensors in the ancient church? There are some learned men who make them altogether the same. Bishop Beverege derives the authority of them both from the same fountain. For he says²⁶ the defensors heard and determined causes in the bishop's name; and those not only that related to the poor, who sought the patronage of the church; but also when presbyters and deacons had any controversy with any other, whether of the clergy or laity, they might bring their action before the πρωτέδικος or defensor. Whence he concludes, that chancellors of later ages are the very same ecclesiastical officials, as the defensors of the primitive church. It were to be wished that that learned person had given us ancient records for that power which he ascribes to the old defensors; for then they would have looked more like chancellors under another name: but indeed the authorities he alleges are all modern, such as Papias's Glossary, and Balsamon's Meditata, and the catalogues of officials in the church of Constantinople, which were written several ages after the first institution of defensors, and in times when the protecdicus among the Greeks was become an officer of great authority and power. So that though the power of chancellors might be much the same as that of the ἔκδικοι among the modern Greeks, yet that it was altogether the same with the ancient defensors, seems not hitherto to be solidly proved; since the business of the ancient defensors, was not to do the office of judges, but of advocates at law, to defend the rights of the poor, and the liberties of the church, against all aggressors and invaders. But if any can show from ancient records, that the defensors had a larger power, he will very much oblige the world with such a discovery: in the mean time the reader will pardon

Sect. 7.
Whether the defensors' office was the same with that of our modern chancellors?

¹⁸ Gothofred. Not. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 38.

¹⁹ Cod. Can. Eccles. Afr. c. 75 et 97.

²⁰ Concil. Carthag. Gr. ap. Ehinger. c. 76 et 99.

²¹ Conc. Carth. ap. Beverege. c. 78 et 100.

²² Epiph. Hær. 72. Marcell. n. 10.

²³ Heracl. Novel. 2. ap. Leunclav. Jus. Gr. Rom. t. 1

p. 79. Καγκελαρίους δὲ εἰς ἑβ' ἐκδικούς εἰς 1.

²⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 1. Tit. 12. Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 51.

²⁵ Gothofred, Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 1. Tit. 12. de Adessorib. Leg. 3.

²⁶ Beverege. Not. in can. 23. Concil. Chalced.

me for not ascribing to them greater powers than I had authority to do. The matter is curious, and may excise the pens of learned men, and be the subject of further disquisition and inquiry.

CHAPTER XII.

OF THE ŒCONOMI.

In the writings of the fourth and fifth centuries we frequently meet with an officer in the church, styled by the Greeks ¹ οικονόμος, and by the Latins ² œconomus, or præpositus domus, as it is in St. Austin.³ His office was to manage the revenues of the whole diocese under the inspection of the bishop. For anciently, as I have showed elsewhere,⁴ the whole revenue of the church was intrusted in the hands of the bishop, to be divided among the clergy and poor of the church by his direction and appointment: and in managing this affair he commonly made use of his archdeacon, as a proper assistant to ease himself of the great burden and encumbrance of it. But upon the general conversion of heathens, and the consequent augmentation of every diocese and church revenues, both the bishop and his archdeacon had business enough of another nature to take up the greatest part of their time; and then it was found necessary to institute officers on purpose, and set them over this affair, under the name of œconomi, or stewards of the church. Morinus⁵ thinks they were instituted to avoid suspicion; and in some churches there is no question but it was so: for in the remaining fragments of the council of Tyre, anno 448, which are inserted into the acts of the council of Chalcedon,⁶ we find that Ibas, bishop of Edessa, being accused by some of his clergy for embezzling the revenues of the church, is obliged to promise, that for the future the revenues should be managed by œconomi, or stewards, chosen out of the clergy, after the manner of the great church of Antioch. And it is not improbable, but the like accusation being brought against Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, in the council of Chalcedon, was the reason that moved that council to make a general decree in this matter, that forasmuch as they were informed, that in some churches the bishops alone administered the ecclesiastical revenues, without any stewards, they now ordained, that every church having a bishop, should also have a steward of her own clergy,⁷ to manage the revenues of the church by the direction of the bishop; that so there might be witnesses of the right administration of them; and by that means neither the church's goods be embezzled, nor any scandal or reproach brought upon the priesthood. But then I cannot think this was the case of all churches. For these canons were made plainly against such bishops as managed the revenues of the church, ἀμάρτυροι, as the canon words it, without either archdeacon or œconomus to attest the fidelity of their management: but in such churches where bishops took the assistance of their archdeacon, this could not be the reason for setting up the office of the œconomus, because suspicion of mismanagement was provided against as well by the testimony of an archdeacon, as any other officer that could be appointed. And therefore I have assigned a more general, and, as I take it, a truer reason for the institution of this office in the church.

And that which further confirms my opinion is, that the œconomi, as well as the archdeacons, were always to be chosen out of the clergy. For so those canons of the councils of Tyre and Chalcedon, already cited, plainly direct. And for any thing that appears to the contrary, this was the constant practice of the church. We find in the acts of the council of Ephesus,⁸ which are inserted also into the council of Chalcedon, one Charisius styled both presbyter and œconomus of the church of Philadelphia. And Liberatus⁹ speaks of one John, who was œconomus of Alexandria, and presbyter of Tabennesus, a region belonging to Alexandria. Possidius tells us, in the Life of St. Austin,¹⁰ that he always made one of his clergy the præpositus domus, as he calls him, whose office was to take care of the church revenues, and give an account of what he received and expended, when it was demanded of him. And to the same purpose Socrates¹¹ says of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, that having advanced two monks to the honour of the clergy, he made them the œconomi of the church. So that it was both the rule and practice of the church to take the œconomi out of some of the clergy, and we never meet with any instance or order to the contrary. Which argues plainly, that the true reason for devolving this office upon them, which formerly belonged to the

¹ Vid. Conc. Chalced. c. 2, 25, 26.
² Liberat. Breviar. c. 16. ³ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 24.
⁴ Book II. chap. 4. sect. 6.
⁵ Morin. de Ordin. Eccl. par. 3. Exerc. 16. c. 5. n. 3.
 Concil. Chalced. Act. 9.
⁶ Conc. Chalced. c. 26. ἔδοξεν πᾶσαν ἐκκλησίαν ἐπίσκοπον ἔχουσαν, καὶ οἰκονόμον ἔχειν ἐκ τοῦ ἴδιου κλήρου.— ὡς πρὸς μὴ ἀμάρτυρον εἶναι τὴν οἰκονομίαν τῆς ἐκκλησίας, &c.
⁷ Conc. Ephes. in Act. I. Conc. Chalced. t. 4. p. 292.
 Charisius presbyter et œconomus Philadelphia.

⁹ Liberat. Breviar. c. 16. Johannes ex œconomus factus presbyter Tabennesiotes.—Factusque est iterum œconomus, habens causas omnium ecclesiarum.
¹⁰ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 24. Domus ecclesiæ curam, omnemque substantiam ad vices valentioribus clericis delegabat et credebat: nunquam clavem, nunquam annulum in manu habens, sed ab eisdem domus præpositis cuncta et accepta et erogata notabantur.
¹¹ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 7. τὴν οἰκονομίαν ἐκκλησίας αὐτοῖς ἐνεχείρισεν.

Sect. 2. Always to be chosen out of the clergy.

archdeacons, was no other than that because of a multiplicity of business the archdeacons now could not so well attend it.

What the office itself was, appears from what has already been said: to which I shall only add one thing: that by the authority of the council of Chalcedon¹² the æconomus was to continue in his office during the vacancy of the bishopric, and to look after the income of the church, that it might be preserved safe for the succeeding bishop. Which canon some not improbably think was designed to prevent delays in filling of vacant sees; that no metropolitan, or interventor, under whose care the vacant church was, might lie under any temptation to defer the election of a new bishop, in hopes of enriching himself from the revenues of the church; but whether this was the reason or not, it certainly argues that these men were generally persons of extraordinary credit and worth, since the church could securely repose so great a confidence in them.

And indeed all imaginable care was taken in their election, that they should be persons of such a character. To which purpose some canons required, that they should be chosen by all the clergy; as particularly Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria,¹³ in his canonical epistle, gives a direction in that case. Which provision was but reasonable: for since all the clergy had a common concern in the revenues of the church, which were their livelihood and subsistence, it was fit the æconomus, to whose care the revenues were committed, should be chosen by common consent, that he might be a person without exception, and no one have reason to complain that he was injured or defrauded of his dividend or portion.

CHAPTER XIII.

A BRIEF ACCOUNT OF SOME OTHER INFERIOR OFFICERS IN THE CHURCH.

BESIDE the officers already mentioned, there were in the fourth and fifth century some few others, whose names are not very commonly met with, and therefore I shall but just hint the signification of them, and not spend time in any curious inquiries about their offices and employments. The same canon¹ of the council of Chalcedon, which speaks of the æconomus and defensor, mentions also another officer belonging to the church, who is styled παραμονάριος in the language of that council. But the translators and critics are not agreed upon the meaning of the word. The ancient translation of Dionysius Exiguus renders it mansionarius, and explains that in a marginal reading by ostiarius, or door-keeper of the church. And indeed this was the office of the mansionarius in the Roman church about the time when Dionysius Exiguus lived. For Gregory the Great, not long after, in one of his dialogues,² speaking of Abundius mansionarius, gives him also the title of custos ecclesie; and in another dialogue he makes it the office of the *mansionarius*³ to light the lamps or candles of the church. Yet, notwithstanding this, the best learned of the modern critics give another sense of the Greek name παραμονάριος. Justellus⁴ explains it by villicus, a bailiff, or steward of the lands. Bishop Beverege⁵ styles him rerum ecclesiasticarum administrator, which is the same. And their opinion is confirmed by Gothofred, Cujacius, Suicerus, Vossius, and many others, whose judgment in the case may be sufficient to decide the controversy, till the reader sees better reason otherwise to determine him.

The civil law takes notice of another sort of officers, who are called custodes ecclesiarum, and custodes locorum sanctorum; which, though some writers confound together, yet Gothofred makes a distinction between them. The custodes ecclesiarum were either the same with the ostiarii, or order of door-keepers, or else with those called seniores ecclesia, which, as I have showed⁶ in another place, were much of the same nature with our churchwardens and vestry-men. But the custodes locorum sanctorum were the keepers of those particular places in Palestine, which, if Gothofred judge right, had more peculiarly the title of loca sancta, holy places, because they were a sort of memorials of our Saviour; such as Bethlehem, the place of his nativity; and Mount Golgotha, the place of his crucifixion; and his grave or monument, which was the place of his resurrection; and Mount Olivet, the place of his ascension. These places were frequently visited by Christians in those ages, as appears from Eusebius, Gregory Nyssen, St. Jerom, and several others, whom the reader, that is curious in this matter, may find quoted by Gothofred,⁷ who maintains, that upon that very account those places had a sort of guardians or keepers assigned them, under the title of custodes locorum sanctorum. But however this matter be, it is certain they had such an employment in the church as, in the eye of the law, was reputed a religious service; and accordingly they were entitled

Sect. 3.
Their office to take care of the revenues of the church, especially in the vacancy of the bishopric.

Sect. 4.
The consent of the clergy required in the choice of them.

Sect. 2.
Of the custodes ecclesiarum, and custodes locorum sanctorum; and how these differed from each other.

¹² Concil. Chalced. c. 25.

¹³ Theophil. can. 9. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2. p. 173. γυβήνη παντός ἱερατικῆς οἰκονόμου ἀποδείχθηναί, &c.

¹ Concil. Chalced. c. 2.

² Greg. M. Dial. lib. 3. c. 25.

³ Ib. Dial. lib. 1. c. 5. Constantius mansionarius omnes lampades ecclesiæ implevit aqua, &c.

⁴ Justel. Bibliothec. Jur. Canon. t. 1. p. 91.

⁵ Bevereg. Not. in Conc. Chalced. c. 2.

⁶ Book II. chap. 19. sect. 19.

⁷ Gothofred. Not. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 26.

to the same privilege⁸ as the ecclesiastics had, to be exempt from personal tribute in regard to this their employment, as appears from a law of Theodosius the Great, by whom this immunity was granted them.

Next to these, for the similitude of the name and office, I mention the sceuophylaces, or, as they were otherwise called, κειμηλιων φύλακες, keepers of the κειμήλια, that is, the sacred vessels, utensils, and such precious things as were laid up in the sacred repository of the church. This was commonly some presbyter: for Theodorus Lector⁹ says, Macedonius was both presbyter and sceuophylax of the church of Constantinople; and Sozomen¹⁰ before him, speaking of the famous Theodore, presbyter of Antioch, who suffered martyrdom in the days of Julian, styles him φύλακα τῶν κειμηλιων, keeper of the sacred utensils, and says, he was put to death because he would not deliver up what he had under his custody to the persecutors. It will not be improper to give this officer also the name of chartophylax and eustos archivorum, because the rolls and archives are reckoned part of the sacred repository of the church. Whence Suicerus¹¹ observes, that in Photius the names sceuophylax and chartophylax are given to the same person. But I must note, that the modern Greeks have a little changed this office, and added a power to it which did not belong to it in the primitive church. For now, as Balsamon¹² informs us, the chartophylax acts as the patriarch's substitute, excommunicating, censuring, and licensing the ordinations of presbyters and deacons, and sits as supreme ecclesiastical judge under the patriarch in many other cases relating to the church, which are things we do not find belonging to the office of a sceuophylax in the primitive ages.

Epiphanius takes notice of another sort of officers in the church, to whom he gives the name¹³ of ἐρμηνευται, interpreters, and says, their office was to render one language into another as there was occasion, both in reading the Scriptures, and in the homilies that were made to the people. That there was such an office in the church appears further from the Passion of Procopius the martyr, published by Valesius,¹⁴ where it is said, that Procopius had three offices in the church of Seythopolis, he was reader, exorcist, and interpreter of the Syriac tongue. I conceive the office was chiefly in such churches where the people spake different languages, as in the churches of Palestine, where probably some spoke Syriac and others Greek, and in the churches of Africa, where some spake Latin and others Punic. In such churches there was occasion for an interpreter, that those who understood not the language in which the Scriptures were read, or the homilies preached, might receive edification by having them immediately rendered into a tongue which they did understand. So far was the primitive church from encouraging ignorance, by locking up the Scriptures in an unknown tongue, that she not only translated them into all languages, but also appointed a standing office of interpreters, who were viva voce to make men understand what was read, and not suffer them to be barbarians in the service of God, which is a tyranny that was unknown to former ages!

Another office, that must not wholly be passed over whilst we are upon this head, is that of the notarii, or exceptores, as the Latins called them; who are the same that the Greeks call ἀνεγράφοι, or ταχυγράφοι, from their writing short-hand by characters, which was necessary in the service they were chiefly employed in. For the first use of them was to take in writing the whole process of the heathen judges against the Christian martyrs, and minutely to describe the several circumstances of their examination and passion; what questions were put to them; what answers they made; and whatever passed during the time of their trial and suffering. Whence such descriptions were called gesta martyrum, the Acts and Monuments of the Martyrs; which were the original accounts which every church preserved of her own martyrs. The first institution of these notarii into a standing office at Rome, Bishop Pearson¹⁵ and some other learned persons think, was under Fabian in the time of the Decian persecution. For in one of the most ancient catalogues¹⁶ of the bishops of Rome, Fabian is said to have appointed seven subdeacons to inspect the seven notaries, and see that they faithfully collected the acts of the martyrs. But though it was no standing office before, yet the thing itself was always done by some persons fitly qualified for the work; as appears from the ancient acts of Ignatius and Polycarp, and several others, which were written before Fabian is said to ⁸ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 26. Universos quos constituerit custodes ecclesiarum esse, vel sanctorum locorum, ac religiosi obsequii deservire, nullius adtentationis molestiam sustinere decernimus. Quis enim eos capite census patiatur esse devinctos, quos necessario intelligit supra memorato obsequio mancipatos?

⁹ Theodor. Lector. lib. 2.

¹⁰ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 8.

¹¹ Suicer. Thesaur. t. 2. p. 971.

¹² Balsam. Not. ad. can. 9. Concil. Nic. 2.

¹³ Epiph. Expos. Fid. n. 21. ἐρμηνευται γλώσσης εἰς γλώσσαν, ἢ ἐν ταῖς ἀναγνώσειν, ἢ ἐν ταῖς προσμιλίαις.

¹⁴ Acta Procop. ap. Vales. Not. in Euseb. de Martyr. Palestin. c. 1. Ibi ecclesie tria ministeria præbebat: unum in legendi officio, alterum in Syri interpretatione sermonis, et tertium adversus dæmones manus impositione consummans.

¹⁵ Pearson. de Succession. Episc. Rom. Dissert. l. c. 4. n. 3. Fell, Not. in Cypr. Ep. 12.

¹⁶ Catalog. Rom. Pontif. in Fabian. Hic fecit sex vel septem subdiaconos, qui septem notariis imminerent, ut gesta martyrum fideliter colligerent.

have instituted public and standing notaries at Rome. In after ages these notaries were also employed in writing the acts of the councils, and taking speeches and disputations, and whatever else passed in synod. Thus Eusebius¹⁷ notes that Malchion's dispute with Paulus Samosatensis in the council of Antioch was recorded as it was spoken, by the notaries who took it from their mouths: and Socrates says the same¹⁸ of the disputation between Basilius Ancyranus and Photinus in the council of Sirmium. We read also of a sort of notaries in councils, whose office was to recite all instruments, allegations, petitions, or whatever else of the like nature was to be offered or read in council. And these were commonly deacons, and sometimes a presbyter was the chief of them, and thereupon styled primicerius notariorum; as in the acts of the general councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon¹⁹ there is frequent mention of Aetius, deacon and notary, and Peter, presbyter of Alexandria and chief of the notaries, primicerius notariorum. There were also notaries that were employed to take the discourses of famous and eloquent preachers from their mouths: by which means, Socrates²⁰ observes, many of St. Chrysostom's sermons were preserved, and some of Atticus his successor. Bishops also had their private ὑπογραφεῖς, which some call notaries: but Valesius²¹ reckons them in the quality of readers. Whatever they were, Athanasius served in this office, as ὑπογραφεὺς, under Alexander, and Proclus under Atticus, as Socrates²² informs us.

The curious reader perhaps will find several other of these lesser offices, which he will think might come into this catalogue: but, that I may not seem too minute in small matters, I will only add one office more, which is that of the apocrisarii, or responsales. These were a sort of residents in the imperial city in the name of foreign churches and bishops, whose office was to negotiate as proctors at the emperor's court, in all ecclesiastical causes wherein their principals might be concerned. The institution of the office seems to have been in the time of Constantine, or not long after, when the emperors being become Christians, foreign churches had more occasion to promote their suits at the imperial court than formerly: however, we find it established by law in the time of Justinian; for in one of his Novels it is ordered,²³ that forasmuch as no bishop was to be long absent from his church without special command from the emperor, if therefore any one had occasion to negotiate any ecclesiastical cause at court, he should prefer his petition either by the apocrisarius of his church, whose business was to act in behalf of the church, and prosecute her affairs; or else by the æconomus, or some other of his clergy sent on purpose to signify his request. It does not indeed appear from that law, that these apocrisarii were of the clergy, but from other writers we may easily collect it. For Liberatus says,²⁴ Anatolius, a deacon of Alexandria, was apocrisarius or resident for Dioscorus his bishop at Constantinople, by which means he gained a favourable opportunity of being chosen bishop of Constantinople upon the death of Flavian. And Evagrius²⁵ observes the same of Euty chius, that from being apocrisarius to the bishop of Amasia, he was immediately advanced to be bishop of the royal city after Mennas. Which seems plainly to imply, that he was one of the clergy before, since it does not appear that he was promoted per saltum. I must further observe, that in imitation of these apocrisarii in the church, almost every monastery had their apocrisarii likewise, whose business was not to reside in the royal city, as the former did, but to act as proctors for their monastery, or any member of it, when they had occasion to give any appearance at law before the bishop under whose jurisdiction they were. This is clear from another of Justinian's Novels, which requires the Ascetics in such cases to answer by their apocrisarii or responsales.²⁶ And these were sometimes also of the clergy, as appears from the acts of the fifth general council, where one Theonas²⁷ styles himself presbyter and apocrisarius of the monastery of Mount Sinai. The Latin translator calls him ambasiator, which is not so very proper, yet in some measure expresses the thing: for, as Suicerus²⁸ observes, in process of time the emperors also gave the name of apocrisarii to their own ambassadors, and it became the common title of every legate whatsoever. Which I the rather note, that the reader may distinguish these things, and not confound the civil and ecclesiastical sense of the name apocrisarius together. And thus much of the inferior orders and offices of the clergy in the primitive church.

¹⁷ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 29. ἐπισημειουμένων ταχυγράφων.

¹⁸ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 30. ὀξυγράφων τὰς φωνὰς αὐτῶν γραφόντων.

¹⁹ Concil. Ephes. Act. 1. in Actione 1. Concil. Chalced. t. 4. p. 292.

²⁰ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 4. It. lib. 7. c. 2. ²¹ Vales. Not. in Socr. lib. 5. c. 22. ²² Socrat. lib. 7. c. 17 et 41.

²³ Justin. Novel. 6. c. 2. Sancimus, si quando propter ecclesiasticam occasionem inciderit necessitas, hanc aut per eos qui res agunt sanctorum ecclesiarum (quos apocrisarios vocant) aut per aliquos clericos huc destinatos, aut æconomos suos notam imperio facere, &c.

²⁴ Liberat. - Breviar. c. 12. Ordinatus est pro eo (Flaviano) Anatolius diaconus, qui fuit Constantinopoli apocrisarius Dioscori.

²⁵ Evagr. lib. 4. c. 38. ταῖς ἀποκρίσεσιν Ἀμασείας ἐπισκόπον διηκονεῖτο, &c.

²⁶ Justin. Novel. 79. c. 1.

²⁷ Concil. 5. General. Act. 1. in Libello Monachor. Syriæ Secundæ. t. 5. p. 116. Θεωνὰς πρεσβύτερος, καὶ ἀποκρισάριος τοῦ ἁγίου ὄρους Σινᾶ.

²⁸ Suicer. Thesaur. t. 1. p. 456.

BOOK IV.

OF THE ELECTIONS AND ORDINATIONS OF THE CLERGY, AND THE PARTICULAR QUALIFICATIONS OF SUCH AS WERE TO BE ORDAINED.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE SEVERAL WAYS OF DESIGNING PERSONS TO THE MINISTRY, IN THE APOSTOLICAL AND PRIMITIVE AGES OF THE CHURCH.

Sect. 1.
Four several ways
of designing persons for the ministry. Of the first way, by casting lots.

HAVING thus far given an account of all the orders of the clergy in the primitive church, both superior and inferior, together with the several offices and functions that were annexed to them, I now proceed to consider the rules and methods that were observed in setting apart fit persons for the ministry, especially for the three superior orders, which were always of principal concern. And here in the first place it will be proper to observe, that in the apostolical and following ages, there were four several ways of designing persons for the ministry, or discovering who were most fit to be ordained: the first of which was by casting lots; the second, by making choice of the first-fruits of the Gentile converts; the third, by particular direction and inspiration of the Holy Ghost; and the last, in the common and ordinary way of examination and election. The first method was observed in the designation of Matthias to be an apostle, as we read, Acts i. 23, 26, where it is said, that the disciples themselves first appointed two, Joseph called Barsabas, and Matthias; and then praying to God, that he would show whether of those two he had chosen, they gave forth their lots, and the lot fell upon Matthias. St. Chrysostom¹ says, they used this method because as yet the Holy Ghost was not descended on them, and they had not at this time the power of choosing by inspiration; and therefore they committed the business to prayer, and left the determination to God. The author of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy under the name of Dionysius,² fancies that God answered their prayer by some visible token: but if so, this had not been choosing by lot, as the Scripture says it was, but a quite different method of election. However, interpreters generally agree, that there was something extraordinary in it: Dr. Lightfoot³ thinks Matthias had no other ordination to his apostleship; for the apostles did not give him any ordination by imposition of hands after this, as they did to presbyters afterwards: and that, if true, was extraordinary indeed. Others reckon the extraordinariness of it to consist in the singular way of electing and designing him to that office by lot: for they say⁴ all ecclesiastical history scarce affords such another instance: and I confess there are not very many, but some few there are, which show that that method of electing was not altogether so singular as is commonly imagined. For in Spain, it was once the common practice, as may be concluded from a canon⁵ of the council of Barcelona, anno 599, which orders, that when a vacant bishopric is to be filled, two or three shall be elected by the consent of the clergy and people, who shall present them to the metropolitan and his fellow bishops, and they, having first fasted, shall cast lots, leaving the determination to Christ the Lord: then he on whom the lot shall fall, shall be consummated by the blessing of consecration. There is nothing different in this from the first example, save only that in this there is express mention of a consecration afterward, which is not in the history of Matthias; and yet, perhaps, there might be a consecration in his case too, though not expressly mentioned: but I leave this to further inquiry.

The second way of designation was,
Sect. 2.
The second way,
by making choice of the first-fruits of the Gentile converts.
by making choice of the first-fruits of the Gentile converts to be ordained to the ministry. For these expressing a greater zeal than others, by their readiness and

¹ Chrys. Hom. 5. in 1 Tim.

² Dionys. Ecl. Hier. c. 5. p. 367.

³ Lightfoot, in Acts i. 21.

⁴ Dodwel, Dissert. 1. in Cyp. n. 17.

⁵ Concil. Barcinon. c. 3. tom. 5. p. 1606. Duobus aut

tribus, quos ante consensus cleri et plebis elegerit, metropolitani iudicio ejusque coepiscopis presentatis, quem sors, præeunte jejunio, Christo Domino terminante, monstraverit, benedictio consecrationis accumul.

forwardness to embrace the gospel, were generally pitched upon by the apostles, as best qualified for propagating the Christian religion in the world. Clemens Romanus, in his epistle to the Corinthians,⁶ says, the apostles in all countries and cities where they preached, ordained their first converts bishops and deacons, for the conversion of others; and that they had the direction of the Spirit for doing this. And hence the author that personates the same Clemens, in his pretended epistle to James, bishop of Jerusalem, giving him an account of the reasons that moved St. Peter to ordain him, says,⁷ it was because he was chief of the first-fruits of his converts among the Gentiles. Some compare this to the right of primogeniture among the ancient patriarchs, which entitled the first-born to the priesthood; and I will not deny but there might be something of allusion in it: but then the parallel will not hold throughout; for in the latter case it was not any natural right, but personal merit attending their primogeniture, that entitled the first converts to the Christian priesthood.

Which will appear further by considering, that many of them were ordained by the particular direction of the Holy Ghost. For so the words, δοκιμάζοντες τῷ Πνεύματι, in Clemens Romanus, may be understood, to signify the Spirit's pointing out the particular persons whom he would have to be ordained; which I observed to be the third way of designation of persons to the ministry, very usual in those primitive times of the church. Thus Timothy was chosen and ordained, according to the prophecies that went before of him, 1 Tim. i. 18. Whence his ordination is also called the gift that was given him by prophecy, 1 Tim. iv. 14. In regard to which the ancient interpreters, Chrysostom⁸ and Theodoret, say, he had not any human vocation, but was chosen by Divine revelation, and ordained by the direction of the Spirit. Clemens Alexandrinus, in his famous homily, entitled, Quis Dives salvetur, observes the same of the clergy of the Asiatic churches, whom St. John ordained after his return from the isle of Patmos: he says, they were such as were signified or pointed out⁹ to him by the Spirit. I know indeed Combefis¹⁰ puts a different sense upon these words, and says, the designation here spoken of, means not any new or distinct revelation, but I know not what Divine predestination of the persons; or else their ordination itself, which was the seal or consignment of the Spirit; and that there is no authority for the common sense which interpreters put upon this passage. But as he owns his notion to be singular, and contrary to the sense of all other learned men; so it is evidently against matter of fact and ancient history, which affords several other instances of the like designations in the following ages. I will give an instance or two out of many. Eusebius¹¹ says, Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, was chosen κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν, by revelation, and an oracular voice, which signified to some Ascetics of the church, that they should go forth out of the gates of the city, and there meet him whom God had appointed to be their bishop; which was this Alexander, a stranger from Capadocia, coming upon other business to Jerusalem. He was indeed bishop of another place before, but his translation to the see of Jerusalem was wholly by Divine direction, which is the thing I allege it for. We have another such instance in the election of Alexander, surnamed Carbonarius, bishop of Comana, mentioned by Gregory Nyssen in the Life of Gregory Thaumaturgus. This Alexander was a Gentile philosopher, and very learned man, who upon his conversion to Christianity, that he might avoid observation, and follow his philosophical studies with the greater privacy, in his great humility betook himself to the trade of a collier, whence he had the name of Carbonarius. Now it happened upon the vacancy of the bishopric of Comana, that the citizens sent to Gregory Thaumaturgus to desire him to come and ordain them a bishop; but they not agreeing in their choice, one by way of jest and ridicule proposed Alexander the collier; who being discovered¹² by special revelation to Gregory Thaumaturgus to be a man of extraordinary virtues and worth, who had submitted to that contemptible calling only to avoid being taken notice of; and being found upon a due inquiry to be the man he was represented to be, he was thereupon unanimously chosen by all the church to be their bishop, and immediately ordained by St. Gregory. Cyprian often speaks of this Divine designation in the case of Celerinus,¹³ and Aurelius,¹⁴ when they were but to be ordained readers:

⁶ Clem. Rom. Ep. I. n. 42. κατὰ χώρας καὶ πόλεις κηρύσσοντες, κατῆσαν τὰς ἀπαρχὰς αὐτῶν, δοκιμάζοντες τῷ Πνεύματι εἰς ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους τῶν μελλόντων πιτεύειν.

⁷ Pseudo-Clem. Ep. ad Jacob. ap. Coteler. t. I. p. 606. ὃ γὰρ δι' ἐμοῦ τῶν σωζομένων ἐβῶν εἰ κρείττων ἀπαρχή.

⁸ Chrys. et Theod. in Tim. i. 18.

⁹ Clem. Alex. ap. Euseb. lib. 3. c. 23. et ap. Combefis. Auctar. Noviss. p. 185. κλήρω ἔταξε τινα κληρώσαν τῶν ὑπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος σημαινομένων.

¹⁰ Combefis. Not. in loc. p. 192. Quos Spiritus designasset Divina potius prædestinatione, quam nova aliqua et dis-tincta revelatione, quam nec Clemens significavit, nec ulla probat auctoritas, &c.

¹¹ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 11.

¹² Nyssen. t. 3. p. 562.

¹³ Cypr. Ep. 34. al. 39. ad Cler. Carthag. Referimus ad vos Celerinum fratrem nostrum—Clero nostro non humana suffragatione, sed Divina dignatione conjunctum. Qui cum consentire dubitaret, ecclesie ipsius admonitu et hortatu in visione per noctem compulsus est, ne negaret nobis suadentibus, &c.

¹⁴ Id. Ep. 33. al. 38. Expectanda non sunt testimonia humana, cum præcedunt Divina suffragia.

and he says also, he had a Divine direction¹⁵ to translate Numidicus from another church to the church of Carthage. And Sozomen¹⁶ tells us from Apollinarius, that Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, appointed Athanasius his successor by Divine command. For some time before his death it was signified to him by Divine revelation, that no one should succeed him but Athanasius: and therefore, when he lay upon his death-bed, he called Athanasius by name, who was then absent and fled for fear of being made bishop; and another of the same name, who was present, answering to the call, he said nothing to him, but called Athanasius again: which he did several times, whereby it was at last understood, that he meant the Athanasius that was fled; to whom, though absent, he then prophetically said, Thinkest thou that thou art escaped, Athanasius? No: thou art not escaped. It were easy to add many other instances of the like nature, but these are sufficient to show against Combefis, that in those early ages men were sometimes designed to the ministry by particular Divine revelation and prophecy, or else the ancients themselves were wonderfully deceived. Whilst I am upon this head, I must suggest two things further: First, that a dove's lighting upon the head of any man at an election was usually taken for a Divine omen; and commonly the person who had that sign, was looked upon as pointed out by the Spirit, and accordingly chosen before all others, as having a sort of emblem of the Holy Ghost. Eusebius observes,¹⁷ it was this that turned the election upon Fabian, bishop of Rome, and gave him the preference before all others, though he was a stranger. No one at first thought of choosing him: but a dove being observed by the people to settle upon his head, they took it for an emblem of the Holy Ghost, which heretofore descended upon our Saviour in the form of a dove; and thereupon with one consent, as if they had been moved themselves by the Holy Ghost, they cried out, Ἄξιον, he was worthy; which was the word then used to signify their consent; and so without more ado they took him and set him upon the bishop's throne. The election of Severus, bishop of Ravenna, and that of Euortius, bishop of Orleans, was determined the same way, as Blondel¹⁸ has observed out of their lives in Surius; and the inquisitive reader may furnish himself with other instances from his own observation. The other thing I would suggest is, that sometimes an accidental circumstance was so providentially disposed, as to be taken for an indication of the Divine will, and approbation of an election. Sulpicius Severus makes this observation particularly upon a circumstance that happened in the election of St. Martin, bishop of Tours. Some of the provincial bishops, who were met at the place, for very unjust reasons opposed his election; and more especially one, whose name was Defensor, was a violent stickler against him. Now it happened, that the reader who was to have read that day, not being able to get in due time to his place, by reason of the press and crowding of the people; and the rest being in a little confusion upon that account; one of those that stood by, taking up a book, read the first verse that he lighted upon, which happened to be those words of the 8th Psalm, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise, because of thine enemies, that thou mightest destroy the enemy and defensor." For so it seems the vulgar Gallican translation then read it, ut destruas inimicum et defensorem. These words were no sooner read, but the people gave a shout, and the adverse party were confounded. And so, says our author,¹⁹ it was generally believed that this Psalm was read by Divine appointment, that Defensor the bishop might hear his own work condemned, whilst the praises of God were perfected in St. Martin out of the mouth of babes and sucklings, and the enemy was at once both discovered and destroyed. By what has been said, the reader now will be able to judge of the meaning of the ancients, when they speak of particular Divine designations of persons to the ministry of the church.

The fourth and last way of designation, was by the ordinary course of Sect. 4.
The fourth way,
by common suffrage and election. suffrage and election of the church: the method of which in general was so accurate and highly approved, that one of the Roman emperors, though a heathen, thought fit to give a great character and encomium of it, and propose it to himself as an example proper to be imitated in the designation and choice of civil officers for the service of the empire. For so Lampridius²⁰ represents the practice of Alexander Severus: whenever he was about to constitute any governors of provinces, or receivers of the public revenues, he first proposed their names, desiring the people to make evidence against them, if any one could prove them guilty of any crime: but if they accused them falsely, it should be at the peril of their own lives: saying, it was unreasonable, that when the Christians and Jews did this in propounding those whom they ordained ¹⁵ Cypr. Ep. 35. al. 40. Admonitos nos et instructos sciatis dignatione Divina, ut Numidicus presbyter adscribatur presbyterorum Carthaginiensium numero.

¹⁶ Sozom. lib. 2. c. 17. Ἀλέξανδρος διάδοχον αὐτῷ κατέλιπε Ἀθανάσιον Θελαίου προστάξαι ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἀγαγὼν τὴν ψῆφον, &c.

¹⁷ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 29.

¹⁸ Blond. Apol. p. 426. Surius, Vit. Sanct. Feb. 1. et Sep. 7.

¹⁹ Sever. Vit. S. Martin. c. 7. p. 225. Ita habitum est, Divino nutu Psalmum hunc lectum fuisse, ut testimonium operis sui Defensor audiret, quia ex ore infantium atque lactantium in Martino Domini laude perfecta, et ostensus pariter et destructus est inimicus.

²⁰ Lamprid. Vit. Alex. Sever. c. 45.

their priests and ministers, the same should not be done in the appointment of governors of provinces, in whose hands the lives and fortunes of men were intrusted. This argues, that all imaginable care was taken in the election of Christian ministers, since their practice in this respect has such ample testimony from the heathens. And indeed all modern writers agree upon the matter in general, that anciently elections were made with a great deal of caution and exactness: but as to the particular methods that were used, men are strangely divided in their accounts of them; by which means there is no one subject has been rendered more intricate and perplexed than this of elections, which has even frightened some from attempting to give an account of it: but I must not wholly disappoint my readers through such fears, and therefore I shall briefly acquaint them with the different sentiments of modern authors who have handled this subject, and then clear what I take to be the true state of the case, from evident proofs of ancient history, which shall be the business of the next chapter.

CHAPTER II.

A MORE PARTICULAR ACCOUNT OF THE ANCIENT METHOD AND MANNER OF ELECTIONS OF THE CLERGY.

Sect. 1.
The different opinions of learned men concerning the people's power anciently in elections.

THE grand question in this affair, upon which learned men are so much divided, is concerning the persons who had a right to vote in the elections of the clergy. Some think the people were never allowed any other power, save only to give their testimonials to the party elected, or to make objections, if they had any just and reasonable exceptions, against him. So Habertus,¹ and Sixtus Senensis,² and Bellarmine.³ Others say the people were absolute and proper electors, and that from apostolical right, which they always enjoyed for a succession of many ages. This opinion is advanced, and with great show of learning asserted, by Blondel,⁴ against Sancta Clara, and the rest of the other opinion. De

Marca⁵ takes a middle way between those two extremes. He says the people had as much power anciently, as any of the clergy below bishops; that is, their consent was required in the promotion of a bishop, as well as their testimony: yet he will not allow this to be called electing; for the designation, election, or judgment, he says, still belonged only to the metropolitan, together with the synod of provincial bishops. And though we read sometimes of their giving their vote or suffrage, yet that, he says, is only to be understood of suffrage of consent, not the suffrage of election. But Mr. Mason, in answer to Pamelius, who had advanced something of this notion before De Marca, rejects this as a deluding distinction, and asserts, that the people had properly a voice or suffrage of election, and he quotes⁶ Bishop Andrews⁷ for the same opinion. Yet he does not carry the point so high, as to maintain with Blondel, that it was of unalterable right, but left by God as a thing indifferent, to be ordered by the discretion of the church, so all things be done honestly and in order. And this seems to have been the opinion of Spalatensis,⁸ Richerius,⁹ Justellus,¹⁰ Suicerus, and some other learned men of both churches. Others there are, who distinguish between the times preceding the council of Nice, and those that followed after: for they think whatever power was allowed the people in the three first ages, was taken away by that council, and the councils of Antioch and Laodicea, that followed not long after. So Schelstrate,¹¹ in his dissertations upon the council of Antioch, where he quotes Christianus Lupus and Sirmond for the same opinion. But this is exploded as a groundless fiction, not only by Spalatensis,¹² and Bishop Pearson,¹³ but also by Richerius,¹⁴ Cabassutius,¹⁵ Valesius,¹⁶ Petavius,¹⁷ De Marca,¹⁸ and other learned persons of the Roman communion, who think the fathers of the Nicene council made no alteration in this matter, but left all things as they found them. Some, again, distinguish between the election of bishops and the other clergy, and say, the people's consent was only required in the election of bishops, but not in the promotion of the inferior clergy. So Cabassutius,¹⁹ and Bishop Beverege,²⁰ who reckons this so clear a point, that there is no dispute to be made of it. Yet Valesius disputes it, and asserts the contrary,²¹

¹ Habert. Archieratic. p. 436.

² Sixt. Biblioth. lib. 5. Annot. 118.

³ Bellarm. de Clericis, lib. 1. c. 7

⁴ Blondel, Apol. p. 379, &c.

⁵ Marca, de Concord. lib. 8. cap. 2. n. 2.

⁶ Mason, Consecrat. of Bishops, lib. 4. c. 4. p. 159, 160.

⁷ Andrews, Resp. ad Apol. Bell. c. 13. p. 313. Præsentia plebis apud Cyprianum includit testimonium de vita, nec excludit suffragium de persona.

⁸ Spalat. de Repub. lib. 3. c. 3. n. 42.

⁹ Richer. Hist. Concil. lib. 1. c. 12. n. 18. p. 389.

¹⁰ Justel. Not. in Can. 6. Conc. Chalced.

¹¹ Schelstr. Not. in Can. 19. Conc. Antioch.

¹² Spalat. de Repub. lib. 3. c. 3. n. 12.

¹³ Pearson, Vind. Ignat. par. 1. c. 11. p. 324.

¹⁴ Richer. Hist. Concil. t. 1. c. 2. n. 7.

¹⁵ Cabassut. Notit. Concil. c. 17. p. 83.

¹⁶ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

¹⁷ Petav. Not. in Synes. p. 56.

¹⁸ Marca, de Concord. lib. 8. c. 3. n. 4.

¹⁹ Cabassut. Notit. Concil. c. 36. p. 196.

²⁰ Bevereg. Not. in Can. 6. Conc. Chalced.

²¹ Vales. in Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43. Presbyteri olim ab episcopo ordinari non poterant sine consensu cleri et populi.

that anciently presbyters were not to be ordained by the bishop without the consent of the clergy and people. Bishop Stillingfleet, who is one of the last that has considered this matter, gives us his sense in these following observations. First, That the main ground of the people's interest was founded upon the apostles' canon,²² that a bishop must be blameless and of good report. And therefore, he says,²³ the people's share and concern in elections, even in Cyprian's time, was not to give their votes, but only their testimony concerning the good or ill behaviour of the person. Secondly, That yet upon this the people assumed the power of elections, and thereby caused great disturbances and disorders in the church. Thirdly, That to prevent these, many bishops were appointed without their choice, and canons made for the better regulating of them. Fourthly, That when there were Christian magistrates, they did interpose as they thought fit, notwithstanding the popular claim, in a matter of so great consequence to the peace of church and state. Fifthly, That upon the alteration of the government of Christendom, the interest of the people was secured by their consent in parliaments, and that by such consent the nomination of bishops was reserved to princes, and the patronage of livings to particular persons. In this great variety of judgments and opinions of learned men, it will be no crime to dissent from any of them, and therefore I shall take the liberty to review their opinions, and express impartially what I take to be agreeable or disagreeable in any of them to ancient history, and the rules and practice of the church.

Sect. 2.
The power of the people equal to that of the inferior clergy in the election of a bishop.

And here, first of all, it will be proper to observe, that there was no one universal, unalterable rule observed in all times and places about this matter, but the practice varied according to the different exigences and circumstances of the church; as will evidently appear in the sequel of this history. In the mean time, I conceive the observation made by De Marca, thus far to be very true, That whatever power the inferior clergy enjoyed in the election of their bishop, the same was generally allowed to the people, or whole body of the church, under the regulation and conduct of the metropolitan and synod of provincial bishops. For their power, whatever it was, is spoken of in the very same terms, and expressed in the same words. Some call it consent, others suffrage or vote, others election or choice; but all agree in this, that it was equally the consent, suffrage, vote, election, and choice, both of clergy and people. Thus Cyprian observes of Cornelius,²⁴ that he was made bishop by the testimony of the clergy and suffrage of the people. Where it is evident the words, testimony and suffrage, are equally ascribed both to clergy and people. Socrates,²⁵ speaking of the election of Chrysostom, says he was chosen by the common vote of all, both clergy and people. And Theodoret describes the election of Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, after the same manner, when he tells us²⁶ he was compelled to take the bishopric by the common vote of the bishops and clergy, and all the people. Siricius²⁷ styles this the election of the clergy and people; and Celestin,²⁸ the consent and desire of the clergy and people; and Leo,²⁹ both the consent, and election, and suffrage or votes of the people; who adds also, that in case the parties were divided in their votes, then the decision should be referred to the judgment of the metropolitan, who should choose him who had most votes and greatest merit to recommend him. From all which, and many other passages that might be alleged to the same purpose, it is very evident, that the power of the clergy and people was equal in this matter, and that nothing was challenged by the one, that was not allowed to the other also.

And hence it appears further, that this conjunctive power of clergy and people was not barely testimonial, but, as Bishop Andrews and Mr. Mason assert, a judicial and effective power, by way of proper suffrage and election; and that as well in the time of Cyprian, as afterwards: for Cyprian speaks both of testimony and suffrage belonging to both clergy and people: and says further,³⁰ that that is a just and legitimate ordination, which is examined by the suffrage and judgment of all, both clergy and people. So that they were then present at the choice of their bishop, not merely to give testimony concerning his life, but, as Bishop Andrews words it, to give their vote and suffrage in reference to his person. Which observation will be further

Sect. 3.
This power not barely testimonial, but judicial and elective.

²² Stillingfleet, Unreason. of Separat. par. 3. n. 25. p. 312.

²³ Ibid. p. 316, 317.

²⁴ Cypr. Ep. 52. al 55, ad Antonian. p. 104. Factus est Cornelius episcopus—de clericorum pene omnium testimonio, de plebis quæ tum adfuit suffragio.

²⁵ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 2. Ψηφισματι κοινῶ ὁμοῦ πάντων, κλήρου τε καὶ λαοῦ.

²⁶ Theod. lib. 1. c. 7. Ψήφω κοινῇ κατηνάγκασαν ἀρχιερεῖς τε καὶ ἱερεῖς καὶ ἅπασ ὁ λαός.

²⁷ Siric. Ep. 1. ad Himerium Tarracon. c. 10. Presbyterio vel episcopatu, si eum cleri ac plebis evocaverit electio, non immerito societur.

²⁸ Celestin. Ep. 2. c. 5. Nullus invitis detur episcopus. Cleri, plebis, et ordinis consensus et desiderium requiratur.

²⁹ Leo, M. Ep. 81. ad Anastas. c. 5. Cum de summi sacerdotis electione tractabitur, ille omnibus præponatur, quem cleri plebisque consensus concorditer postularit; ita ut si in aliam forte personam partium se vota dividerint, metropolitani judicio is alteri præferatur, qui majoribus et studiis juvatur et meritis, &c.

³⁰ Cypr. Ep. 68. al. 67. ad Fratr. Hispan. p. 172. Ordinatio justa et legitima, quæ omnium suffragio et judicio fuerit examinata.

evidenced and confirmed, by proceeding with the account of several rules and customs generally observed in these elections.

One of these was, that no bishop was to be obtruded on any orthodox people against their consent. I say, an orthodox people, for in case the majority of them were heretics or schismatics, the practice was different, as will be showed hereafter: but where they were all catholics, and could agree upon a catholic and deserving bishop, they were usually gratified in their choice, and no person was to be put upon them against their inclination. Sometimes the bishops in synod proposed a person, and the people accepted him: sometimes, again, the people proposed and the bishops consented; and where they were unanimous in a worthy choice, we scarce ever find they were rejected. If they were divided, it was the metropolitan's care to unite and fix them in their choice, but not to obtrude upon them an unchosen person. This we learn from one of Leo's epistles,³¹ where he gives us at once both the church's rule and practice, and the reasons of it. In the choice of a bishop, says he, let him be preferred, whom the clergy and people do unanimously agree upon and require: if they be divided in their choice, then let the metropolitan give preference to him, who has most votes and most merits: always provided, that no one be ordained against the will and desire of the people, lest they contemn or hate their bishop, and become irreligious or disrespectful, when they cannot have him whom they desired. The transgression of this rule was objected as a great crime to Hilarius Arelatensis by the emperor Valentinian III., that³² he ordained bishops in several places against the will and consent of the people, whom when they would not admit of, because they had not chosen them, he used armed force to settle them in their sees, introducing the preachers of peace by the violence of war. Leo objects³³ the same thing to him, saying, that he ought to have proceeded by another rule, and first to have required the votes of the citizens, the testimonies of the people, the will of the gentry, and the election of the clergy: for he that was to preside over all, was to be chosen by all. This evidently shows, that the suffrage of the people was then something more than barely testimonial.

Secondly, Another argument is, that in many cases the voices of the people prevailed against the bishops themselves, when they happened to be divided in their first proposals. Thus it happened in the famous election of St. Martin, bishop of Tours, which has been mentioned in the last chapter, sect. 3. The people were unanimously for him; Defensor with a great party of bishops at first were against him; but the voice of the people prevailed, and the bishops complied and ordained him. Philostorgius gives us such another instance. Demophilus, bishop of Constantinople, with some other bishops suspected of Arianism, meeting at Cyzicum to ordain a bishop there, the people first made a protestation against them, that unless they would anathematize publicly Aetius and Eunomius both in word and writing, they should ordain no bishop there: and when they had complied to do this, they still insisted on their privilege, that no one should be ordained but one of their own choosing.³⁴ Which was one, who, as soon as he was ordained, preached the catholic doctrine of the ὁμοούσιον, that the Son was of the same substance with the Father. Ancient history will furnish the reader with many other instances of the like nature.

Thirdly, Another evidence of the people's power in elections is the manner of their voting, or the way of giving their assent or dissent to the ordination of any person: which was threefold: for either, first, they were unanimous in their vote for or against a man, and then their way was to express their mind by a general acclamation, crying out with one voice, Ἄξιος, or Ἀνάξιτος, dignus, or indignus, as the word then was, He is worthy, or unworthy. Instances of which form the reader may find in St. Ambrose,³⁵ St. Austin,³⁶ Eusebius,³⁷ Philostorgius,³⁸ Photius,³⁹ the author of the Constitutions,⁴⁰ and several others. Or else, secondly, they were divided in their choice, and then they expressed their dissent in particular accusations of the parties proposed, and sidings, and sometimes outrageous tumults. St. Chrysostom,⁴¹ reflects upon this way in his books of the priesthood, when he vota civium, testimonia populorum, quæreretur honoratorum arbitrium, electio clericorum.—Qui præfutura est omnibus, ab omnibus eligatur.

³¹ Leo, Ep. 84. c. 5. Si in aliam forte personam partium se vota diviserint, metropolitani iudicio is alteri præferatur, qui majoribus et studiis juvatur et meritis: tantum ut nullus invitis et non petentibus ordinetur, ne plebs invita episcopum non optatum aut contemnat aut oderit, et fiat minus religiosa quam convenit, cui non licuerit habere quem voluit.

³² Novel. 24. ad calcem Cod. Theod. Indecenter alios invitis et repugnantibus civibus ordinavit. Qui quidem, quoniam non facile ab his qui non elegerant, recipiebantur, manum sibi contrahebat armatam.—Et ad sedem quietis pacem prædicaturos per bella ducebat.

³³ Leo, Ep. 89. ad Episc. Vien. Expectarentur certe

³⁴ Philostorg. lib. 9. c. 13. ὃν αὐτῶν αἱ ψήφοι προσέταπτον.

³⁵ Ambr. de Dignit. Sacerd. c. 5. In ordinationibus eorum clamant et dicunt, Dignus es, et justus es.

³⁶ Aug. Ep. 110. Dignus et justus est, dictum est vicies.

³⁷ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 29. πάντα λαὸν Ἄξιου ἐπιβοῆσαι.

³⁸ Philostorg. lib. 9. c. 10. ³⁹ Phot. Cod. 256. p. 1414.

⁴⁰ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 4.

⁴¹ Chrys. de Sacerdot. lib. 3. c. 15.

Sect. 5.
2dly, This further confirmed from examples of the bishops complying with the voice of the people against their own inclination.

Sect. 6.
3dly, From the manner of the people's voting at elections.

tells us, that in those popular solemnities, which were then customarily held for the choice of ecclesiastical rulers, one might see a bishop exposed to as many accusations, as there were heads among the people. And the account that is given not only by Ammianus Marcellinus,⁴² but by Socrates,⁴³ and the other historians, of the tumult raised at Rome in the election of Damasus, shows that the people were indulged in something more than barely giving testimony, else they had hardly run into so great a heat and ungovernable tumult. There was also a third way of expressing their consent, which was by subscribing the decree of election for greater security, that no party might pretend afterward that they had not given assent to it. Thus it was in the election of Meletius, bishop of Antioch, who was chosen by common consent both of catholics and Arians, each party presuming him to be of their own opinion. The election-paper was subscribed by all, Theodoret⁴⁴ says, and put into the hands of Eusebius Samosatenensis, which Constantius, when Meletius proved a catholic, demanded to have had it destroyed, but with all his menaces he could not extort it from him. St. Austin gives the like account⁴⁵ of the election of Eradius his successor at Hippo, which for some reasons he got done in his own life-time. He first ordered the notaries of the church to take the acclamations of the people in writing, and then required all that could write, to subscribe the instrument themselves. And this was the common way, whenever the metropolitan could not be present at the election; then the decree of the whole church was drawn up in writing, and carried to him for his consent and approbation. The remains of which custom may still be seen in the ancient Ordo Romanus,⁴⁶ where there is a form of a decree, which the clergy and people were to sign upon their choice of a bishop, and present it to the metropolitan and the synod, in order to his consecration. In which case, if the metropolitan found him upon examination to be a person every way qualified, as they represented him, he then confirmed and ratified their choice, and so proceeded immediately to his ordination. All which argues that the people had something of a decisive power in elections, and that their suffrage was not merely testimonial.

Fourthly, This is further evident from the use and office of interventors in the Latin church, whose business was to promote and procure a speedy election of a new bishop in any vacant see, as I have had occasion to show in another place.⁴⁷ For in the Roman and African churches, upon the vacancy of a bishopric, it was usual for the metropolitan to grant a commission to some of his provincial bishops to go to the vacant church, and dispose the clergy and people to be unanimous in the choice of a new bishop; and when they were agreed, they petitioned the metropolitan by the interventor to confirm their choice, and with a synod of provincial bishops to come and ordain him whom they had elected. Or else they drew up an instrument in writing, subscribed both by the interventor and themselves, and presented the new elect bishop to the metropolitan, who ordained him in his own church. This was the practice of the Roman province in the time of Symmachus and Gregory the Great, as appears from their epistles, which gave directions to the interventors, or visitors, as they call them, concerning their behaviour in the present case. Let no one, says Symmachus,⁴⁸ draw up an instrument of election without the presence of the visitor, by whose testimony the agreement of the clergy and people may be declared. And Gregory, writing to Barbarus, bishop of Beneventum, and visitor of the church of Palermo, bids him endeavour to make the clergy and people unanimous in their presentation of a worthy person to be their bishop, who could not⁴⁹ be rejected by the canons; and then drawing up their petition in form of a decree signed with all their hands, and the letters testimonial of the visitor, they should send him to Rome for consecration. Nothing can be plainer, than that here the clergy and people made the choice of their bishop with the assistance of a visitor or interventor, and then presented him to the metropolitan, who, if he had no canonical exception against him, confirmed their choice, and proceeded to his ordination.

Fifthly, As a further evidence of this power and privilege indulged to the people, it may be observed likewise, that it was customary in those days for the people in many places to lay violent

Sect. 7.
4thly, From the use and office of interventors.

Sect. 8.
5thly, From the custom of the people's taking persons and having them ordained by force.

⁴² Ammian. lib. 27. c. 3.

⁴³ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 29.

⁴⁴ Theod. lib. 2. c. 31.

⁴⁵ Aug. Ep. 110. A notariis ecclesiæ, sicut cernitis, excipiuntur quæ dicimus, excipiuntur quæ dicitis, et meus sermo, et vestræ acclamationes in terram non cadunt.—Hoc ad ultimum rogo, ut gestis istis dignemini subscribere qui potestis.

⁴⁶ Ordo Rom. Biblioth. Patr. t. 10. p. 104. Decretum quod clerus et populus firmare (al. formare) debet de electo episcopo.—Ut omnium nostrorum vota in hanc electionem convenire noscatis, huic decreto canonico promptissima voluntate singuli manibus propriis roborantes subscripsimus.

⁴⁷ Book II. chap. 15.

⁴⁸ Symmach. Ep. 5. c. 6. Decretum sine visitatoris præsentia nemo conficiat, ejus testimonio clericorum, ac civium possit unanimitas declarari.

⁴⁹ Greg. lib. 11. Ep. 16. Dilectio tua clerum plebemque ejusdem ecclesiæ admonere festinet, ut remoto studio, uno eodemque consensu talem sibi præficiendum expetant sacerdotem, qui et tanto ministerio dignus valeat reperiri, et venerandis canonibus nullatenus respuatur. Qui dum fuerit postulatus cum solemnitate decreti omnium subscriptionibus roborati, et dilectionis tuæ testimonio literarum, ad nos sacrandus occurrat.

hands upon persons, and bring them by force to the bishop to be ordained. Thus Possidius⁵⁰ tells us it was in the ordination of St. Austin, the people seized him and brought him to the bishop, requiring with one voice that he would ordain him presbyter, whilst he in the mean time wept abundantly for the force that was put upon him. Paulinus⁵¹ says the same of himself, that he was ordained presbyter by force and the irresistible violence of an inflamed and zealous people. And there are many other instances of the like nature.

Sixthly, I observe but one thing more relating to this matter, which was the compliment that some bishops passed upon their people upon this account, styling them fathers, in regard to the share and influence they had in their designation and election. St. Ambrose himself speaking to his people, addresses himself to them in this style: Ye are⁵² my fathers, who chose me to be bishop: ye, I say, are both my children and fathers; children in particular, fathers altogether. In which words he plainly refers to that providential consent of the people of Milan, who, when they were divided before into several factions, as soon as Ambrose was named, all unanimously conspired together in his election. These are some of those collateral evidences, that may be brought to prove that anciently the clergy and people joined in a common vote in the election of their bishop, and that their suffrage was something more than testimonial, especially in the fourth and fifth ages, in the Latin church, where, as De Marca owns, the people's request was chiefly considered.

Nor was this privilege only indulged them in the election of their bishop, but sometimes in the designation of presbyters also. For St. Austin and Paulinus were but to be ordained presbyters, when that forcible constraint, just now spoken of, was laid upon them by the people. Besides, St. Jerom⁵³ says expressly, that presbyters and the other clergy were as much chosen by the people, as the bishops were. And Possidius⁵⁴ notes this to have been both the custom of the church and St. Austin's practice, ⁵⁰ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 4. Eum tenerunt, et ut in talibus consuetum est, episcopo ordinandum intulerunt, omnibus id uno consensu et desiderio fieri perficique petentibus, magnoque studio et clamore flagitantibus, ubertim eo flente.

⁵¹ Paulin. Ep. 35. inter Epist. August. A Lampio apud Barcinonam in Hispania, per vim inflammata subito plebis sacratus sum. Vid. Paulin. Ep. 6. ad Severum, p. 101.

⁵² Ambr. Com. in Luc. lib. 8. c. 17. Vos enim mihi estis parentes, qui sacerdotium detulistis: vos, inquam, filii vel parentes, filii singuli, universi parentes.

⁵³ Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Cum te vel populus vel pontifex civitatis in clerum elegerit, agito quæ clerici sunt. Id. in Ezek. lib. 10. c. 33. p. 609. Speculator ecclesiæ, vel episcopus vel presbyter, qui a populo electus est.

in the ordinations of priests and clerks, to have regard to the majority or general consent of Christian people. And Siricius, who speaks the sense and practice of the Roman church, says,⁵⁵ that when a deacon was to be ordained either presbyter or bishop, he was first to be chosen both by the clergy and people. And therefore I cannot so readily subscribe to the assertion of those learned men, who say that bishops before their ordination were propounded to the people, but not presbyters or any other of the inferior clergy.

As to those who assert, that the people were anciently indulged in these matters before the council of Nice, but that their power was abridged by a new decree of that council, they are evidently under a mistake; for it is certain the Nicene fathers made no alteration in this affair, but left the whole matter as they found it. For though in one of their canons⁵⁶ it is said, that the presence, or at least the consent, of all the provincial bishops, and the confirmation or ratification of the metropolitan, shall be necessary to the election and ordination of a bishop; yet that is not said to exclude any ancient privilege that the people enjoyed, but only to establish the rights of metropolitans and provincial bishops, which Meletius, the schismatical Egyptian bishop, had particularly invaded, by presuming to ordain bishops without the authority of his metropolitan, or consent of his fellow bishops in the provinces of Egypt. That nothing else was designed by that canon is evident from this, that the same council, in the synodical epistle written to the church of Alexandria, expressly mentions the choice of the people, and requires it as a condition of a canonical election. For speaking of such Meletian bishops as would return to the unity of the catholic church, it says, that when any catholic bishop died, Meletian bishops might succeed in their room, provided they were worthy, and that the people⁵⁷ chose them, and the bishop of Alexandria ratified and confirmed their choice. Our learned Bishop Pearson has rightly observed, that Athanasius⁵⁸ himself was thus chosen after the Nicene council was ended; which is a certain argument

⁵⁴ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 21. In ordinandis sacerdotibus et clericis consensum majorem Christianorum et consuetudinem ecclesiæ sequendam esse arbitrabatur.

⁵⁵ Siric. Ep. 1. ad Himer. Tarracœn. c. 10. Exinde jam accessu temporum, presbyterium vel episcoparum, si eum cleri ac plebis evocaverit electio, non immerito sortietur.

⁵⁶ Conc. Nic. can. 4.

⁵⁷ Conc. Nic. Ep. Synod. ap. Theod. lib. 1. c. 9. et Socrat. lib. 1. c. 9. εἰ ἄξιοι φαίνονται, καὶ ὁ λαὸς αἰροῖτο, συνεπιψηφίσοντος αὐτῶ καὶ ἐπισφραγίζοντος τοῦ τῆς Ἀλεξανδρείας ἐπισκόπου.

⁵⁸ Pearson, Vind. Ignat. par. 1. c. 11. p. 324. ed. Antwerp. Eusebiani, qui creationem Athanasii abrogare voluerunt, defectum popularis electionis objiciebant, et epis-

Sect. 9.
6thly, From the title of fathers, which some bishops upon this account by way of compliment gave to their people.

Sect. 11.
Whether the council of Nice made any alteration in these matters.

that the people's right was not abrogated in that council. The Eusebian party made it an objection against him, that he had not the choice of the people: but the bishops of Egypt assembled in synod, in their synodical epistle do with great earnestness maintain the contrary, asserting, that the whole multitude of the people of the catholic church,⁵⁹ as if they had been all united in one soul and body, cried out, requiring Athanasius to be ordained bishop. Whence Gregory Nazianzen⁶⁰ also says of him, that he was brought to the throne of St. Mark, ψήφῳ τοῦ λαοῦ παντός, by the suffrage of all the people. It were easy to add many other instances and proofs of the like nature to the time of the council of Chalcedon, when the people of Alexandria still enjoyed their ancient privilege, as appears from several passages in Liberatus, who says of Proterius and some other of their bishops, that they were chosen by the nobles, and the decree⁶¹ and voice of all the people: but I shall say no more upon this head, but only allege two canons of the fourth council of Carthage, which comprise the whole practice of the church in relation to this matter: the one decreeing,⁶² that the ordination of a bishop should always be by the consent of four parties, the clergy, the laity, the provincial bishops, and the metropolitan, whose presence and authority was principally necessary in all such cases. The other canon⁶³ orders, that no bishop shall ordain any clergymen without consulting with his clergy, and asking the consent, approbation, and testimony of his people. This seems to have been the most common and ordinary practice of the church.

But then, as all general rules have their exceptions, so it cannot be denied but that this rule varied sometimes, or at least had its limitations and restrictions; and I shall not do justice to the reader, nor the subject neither, unless I mention those also. Here therefore we are to observe in the first place, that this rule did not hold when the greatest part of any church were turned heretics or schismatics. For in that case, had elections been made by the general suffrage of the peo-

Sect. 12.
Some exceptions to the general rule. First, in case the greatest part of the church were heretics or schismatics.

copi Ægypti, in synodo congregati, epistola ad omnes ecclesiæ catholicæ episcopos scripta, contrarium magna animi contentione asseruerunt.—Quod neque hi neque illi fecissent, si populi suffragia in eligendo episcopo locum nullum habuissent.

⁵⁹ Ep. Synod. Concil. Alex. ap. Athan. Apol. 2. t. 2. p. 726. πᾶς ὁ λαός—ἀνεβόων, ἔκραζον, αἰτοῦντες Ἀθανάσιον ἐπίσκοπον.

⁶⁰ Naz. Orat. 21. t. 1. p. 377.

⁶¹ Liberat. Breviar. c. 14. Collecti sunt nobiles civitatis, ut eum qui esset vita et sermone pontificatu dignus, eligerent.—Novissime in Proterium omnium sententia declinavit. Id. c. 15. Scripsit imperator Leo duci Alexandriæ Stilæ, ut pelleret quidem ab episcopatu modis omnibus

ple, none but heretical or schismatical bishops must have been ordained. And therefore in the time of the great prevalency of Arianism, and the long schism of the Donatists, the church did not tie herself always to act precisely by this rule. We find it objected by the Donatists in the collation of Carthage,⁶⁴ that the catholics made bishops in many places where they had no people; that is, no catholic people, for they were all Donatists; consequently, those bishops were ordained not only without, but against the consent of the people. And this I take to be the case of those bishops mentioned in the seventeenth and eighteenth canons of the council of Antioch; one of which says, That if any bishop is ordained to preside over a people, and does not take upon him his office, and go to the church to which he is ordained, he shall be excommunicated, till he complies, or a provincial synod determines otherwise about him: and the other says, If such a bishop absents from his diocese, not by his own default, but διὰ τὴν τοῦ λαοῦ παραίτησιν, because the people refuse to receive him, in that case he shall be honoured as a bishop, though not admitted to his own church. These canons were made at a time when the Arian faction had raised great commotions in the church, which probably made some bishops unwilling to go to their churches, and others could not be admitted, because the faction strongly prevailed against them: and in both of them it is supposed the ordinations were made without asking the people's consent; of which practice we have frequent instances in ecclesiastical history in cases of the same nature.

Secondly, Another exception to the rule was, when bishops were to be ordained for very distant countries or barbarous nations. When Athanasius ordained Frumentius bishop of the Indies at Alexandria, as the historians⁶⁵ report, no one can imagine that he had the formal consent, though he might have the presumptive approbation, of all his people. As neither can we suppose the bishop of Tomi in Scythia to be chosen by his people, when he was the only bishop⁶⁶ in all that region, and commonly ordained at Constantinople, as by the twenty-eighth

Sect. 13.
2ndly, In case of ordaining bishops to far distant places, or barbarous nations.

Timotheum, inthronizaret autem alium decreto populi, qui synodum vindicaret.

⁶² Conc. Carth. 4. c. 1. Cum consensu clericorum et laicorum, et conventu totius provincie episcoporum, maximeque metropolitani vel auctoritate vel presentia ordinetur episcopus.

⁶³ Ibid. can. 22. Ut episcopus sine consilio clericorum suorum clericos non ordinet; ita ut civium assensum, et conniventiam, et testimonium querat.

⁶⁴ Collat. Carth. 1. c. 182. Petilianus episcopus dixit, Imo crebros ubi habes episcopos, sane et sine populis habes.

⁶⁵ Ruffin. lib. 1. c. 9. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 19. Theodoret. lib. 1. c. 23.

⁶⁶ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 19.

canon of the council of Chalcedon, the bishops of barbarous nations were appointed to be.

Thirdly, In case an interventor, or visitor, who was sent to procure a speedy election in any vacant see, got himself settled in the see, by the interest which he had gained in the people during his administration; yet he was not allowed to continue in the possession of that see, though he had made never so strong a party among the people, or had the consent of them all. As appears from a canon of the fifth council of Carthage,⁶⁷ which is also inserted into the Code of the African church. The case was the same with any vacant bishops, ἐπίσκοποι σχολάζοντες, as the canons call them, who were ordained to such places as would not receive them: if any of them intruded themselves into any vacant church without the consent of the metropolitan and a provincial synod, they were to be rejected, though all the people were unanimous in choosing them, as the council of Antioch decreed in express terms against⁶⁸ such invaders: If, say they, a vacant bishop transfers himself into a vacant church, and seizes the throne by stealth, without the authority of a full synod of the province, he shall be discarded, though all the people upon whom he thrust himself should agree in the choice of him. The same council has another canon,⁶⁹ which prohibits any bishop to remove from one diocese to another, either of his own accord, or by the compulsion of the people. Which plainly implies, that in all such cases no regard was had to the choice of the people, when they pretended to act without the concurrence of a provincial synod.

Fourthly, When the people were divided in their choice, and could not unanimously agree upon any one; then, to prevent further disputes, and the mischievous consequences of faction and division, it was usual for the metropolitan and the synod to choose an indifferent person, whom no party had named, and prefer him before all the competitors of the people. And this was usually done with good success; for the people commonly were ashamed of their own choice, and universally acquiesced in this. Sidonius Apollinarius gives us a famous instance in the ordination of John, bishop of Chalons: a triumvirate of competitors, whose characters were not extraordinary, had, by different interests, drawn the people into three very great factions; to remedy which, the metropolitan, privately consulting with his fellow bishops, but taking none of the people into council, ordained this John, to the surprise of them all: but, as our author⁷⁰ observes, it was managed with that prudence, that though the advice of the people was not taken, yet the holy man was ordained, to the astonishment of the factious, and the confusion of the wicked, with the general acclamations of the good, and the contradictions and oppositions of none. And this was a common method in case of incurable divisions among the people.

Fifthly, Sometimes the emperors interposed their authority, and themselves nominated the person whom they would have to be ordained bishop, when they found by experience what dangerous tumults these popular elections raised among the people. Thus it was in the case of Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, who was nominated by Theodosius only. For the people were not so much as consulted in the matter, but the emperor ordered the bishops to give him in a catalogue of fit persons, reserving the power of election entirely to himself. Nay, when some of the bishops objected against Nectarius, that he was but a catechumen and unbaptized, the emperor, notwithstanding, persisted in his choice, and the bishops complied, and immediately baptized and ordained him, as Sozomen⁷¹ informs us. Socrates takes notice of the same prerogative made use of by Theodosius junior, upon the like occasion, who nominated Nestorius to the see of Constantinople, διὰ τοὺς κενσοπουδιστὰς, by reason of factious and vain-glorious persons⁷² in the church. And for the like reason, the same author⁷³ tells us, upon another vacancy, to prevent tumults in the election, he gave his mandate to the bishops to enthrone Proclus in the church. De Marca⁷⁴ will furnish the reader with other instances, and ecclesiastical history with more to the same purpose.

Sometimes, again, we find the people and clergy were confined in their choice, to take one out of three that were first nominated by the bishops in council. Thus it was in France in the time of the second council of Arles, anno 452, when that council made an order about elections to

Sect. 14.
3dly, In case an interventor or any other bishop intruded himself into any see without the consent of a provincial synod.

Sect. 15.
4thly, In case of factions and divisions among the people.

Sect. 16.
5thly, The emperors sometimes interposed their authority to prevent tumults in the like cases.

Sect. 17.
6thly, The people sometimes restrained to the choice of one out of three, which were nominated by the bishops.

⁶⁷ Conc. Carth. 5. c. 8. Placuit, ut nulli intercessori licitum sit, cathedram cui intercessor datus est, quibuslibet populorum studiis, vel seditionibus retinere. Vid. Cod. Can. Eccl. Afr. c. 74.

⁶⁸ Conc. Antioch. c. 16. εἴ τις ἐπίσκοπος σχολάζων ἐπὶ σχολάζουσιν ἐκκλησίαν ἐαυτὸν ἐπιβρίψας, ὑφάρπαξει τὸν ὀνόμου διχα συνόδου τελείας: τῶτόν ἀποβλήτων εἶναι, καὶ εἰ πᾶς ὁ λαὸς, ὃν ὑφάρπασεν, ἔλουτο αὐτόν.

⁶⁹ Ibid. can. 21. Ἐπίσκοπον ἀπὸ παροικίας ἑτέρας εἰς ἑτέραν μὴ μεδίσασθαι, μήτε ἀυθαίρετως ἐπιβρίπτουσα ἐαυτὸν, μήτε ὑπὸ λαῶν ἐκβιαζόμενον.

⁷⁰ Sidon. lib. 4. Ep. 25. Streptu furentis turbæ despecto, sanctum Johannem, stupentibus factiosis, erubescensibus malis, acclamantibus bonis, reclamantibus nullis, collegam sibi consecraverat.

⁷¹ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 8.

⁷² Socrat. lib. 7. c. 29.

⁷³ Idem, lib. 7. c. 40.

⁷⁴ Marca, de Concord. lib. 8. c. 9. n. 18.

this purpose: That in the ordination of a bishop⁷⁵ this rule should be observed, the bishops shall nominate three, out of which the clergy and people shall have power to choose one. Other laws⁷⁶ appointed the clergy and people to nominate three, and the metropolitan and provincial bishops to cast lots which of the three should be ordained; which was the rule of the Spanish church in the time of the council of Barcelona, anno 599.

Lastly, We find also in Justinian's laws, that a considerable alteration was made in this affair wherever those laws took place; for thereby the inferior sort of the common people were wholly cut off from having any concern in these elections, which were now confined to the clergy and the optimates, or persons of better rank and quality in every church. For so, by two of his Novels,⁷⁷ it is expressly provided, that when a bishop is to be ordained for any city, the clergy and chief men of the city shall meet, and nominate three persons, drawing up an instrument, and inserting therein upon their oath that they choose them neither for any gift, nor promise, nor friendship, nor any other cause, but because they know them to be of the true catholic faith, and of honest life, and good learning, &c. That out of these three, one that is best qualified may be chosen by the discretion and judgment of the ordainer. De Marca thinks the council of Laodicea long before made a canon to the same purpose, forbidding the elections of the clergy to be committed τοῖς ὑπλοῖς, vili plebecula, as De Marca renders it,⁷⁸ that is, to the common and inferior sort of people. But it is not certain the canon intended the prohibition in that sense; or if it did, it was of no force, for the people continued their ancient practice for some ages after that council. However, upon the whole matter it appears that this power of the people did never so universally obtain, but that it was limited in several cases by certain restrictions, and varied according to the different state of times and nations.

At last, upon the breaking of the Roman empire, the Gothic kings in France and Spain were generally complimented with a share in these elections, and their consent was as necessary as any other to the ordination of bishops within their dominions. By which means their power quickly increased into a prerogative of nominating solely, and all others had little else to do but to accept their nominations. Which the reader, that is curious in this matter, may find discoursed at large by De Marca,⁷⁹ in his account of the change that was made in the French and Spanish churches in after ages, which it is none of my business here further to pursue. As to the power of nomination in inferior patrons, it is generally agreed by learned men,⁸⁰ that it came in upon the division of dioceses into distinct parishes, and the founding of churches in country places. For, to give greater encouragement to such pious and useful works, the founder of any church, who settled an endowment upon it, was allowed to retain the right of presentation to himself, to nominate a fit clerk to the bishop for his approbation. That which led the way to this practice, was a decree of the first council of Orange, anno 441, wherein this power and privilege was first granted to bishops, that if any bishop was disposed to found a church in the territory of another bishop, the bishop of the diocese where the church was built, should consecrate it; reserving to the founder⁸¹ the right of nominating such clerks as he should desire to have in his own church, whom the bishop of the diocese should ordain at his request; or if they were already ordained, he should allow them to continue without any molestation. And this canon is repeated in the second council of Arles,⁸² in the editions of Sirmond and Labbe, though it be wanting in some others. After this, by the laws of Justinian, all founders of churches, and their heirs, are allowed to nominate their own clerks, upon the right of patronage, to those churches. If any man builds an oratory, says one of his Novels,⁸³ and either he or his heirs are minded to have clerks ordained thereto; if they allow maintenance to them, and they be worthy persons, such as they nominate shall be ordained. And the bishop has no power ⁷⁵ Sect. 19.

Lastly, By Justinian's laws, the elections were confined to the optimates, and the inferior, people wholly excluded.

⁷⁶ Conc. Arelat. 2. c. 54. Placuit in ordinatione episcopi hunc ordinem custodiri, ut tres ab episcopis nominentur, de quibus clerici vel cives erga unum habeant eligendi potestatem.

⁷⁷ Conc. Barcinon. can. 3.

⁷⁸ Justin. Novel. 123. c. 1. Sancimus, quoties opus fuerit episcopum ordinari, clericos et primates civitatis, cui episcopus ordinandus est, mox in tribus personis decreta facere, propositis sacrosanctis evangelis, periculo suarum animarum dicentes in ipsis decretis, quia neque propter aliquam donationem, neque propter aliquam promissionem, aut amicitiam, aut aliam quamlibet causam; sed scientes eos recte et catholicæ fidei, et honestæ esse vitæ, et literas nosse, hos elegerint:—ut ex tribus illis personis melior ordinetur, electione et judicio ordinantis. See also Novel. 137. c. 2. et Cod. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 42.

⁷⁹ Concil. Laodic. c. 13. Marca, de Concord. lib. 8. c. 6. n. 8.

⁸⁰ Marca, de Concord. lib. 8. c. 9 et 10.

⁸¹ See Stillingfleet, Unreas. of Separ. p. 326.

⁸² Conc. Araisican. l. c. 9. Reservata edificatori episcopo hac gratia, ut quos desiderat clericos in re sua videre, ipsos ordinet in in cujus civitatis territorio est; vel si jam ordinati sunt, ipsos habere acquiescat.

⁸³ Conc. Arelat. 2. an. 452. can. 36.

⁸⁴ Novel. 123. c. 18. Si quis oratorii domum ædificaverit, et voluerit in ea clericos ordinare aut ipse, aut ejus hæredes: si expensas ipsis clericis ministrant, et dignos denominant, denominatos ordinari. Si vero qui ab eis eliguntur, tanquam indignos prohibent sacræ regulæ ordinari, tunc episcopus quoscunque putaverit meliores, ordinari procuret.

came to have the chief power of elections.

to ordain any other, unless the persons so nominated be unqualified by the canons. Another Novel⁸⁴ allows the bishop liberty to examine them, and judge of their qualifications; but if he finds them worthy, he is obliged to ordain them, having in that case no power to refuse them. They who would see more of this matter, may consult our learned Bishop Stillingfleet, who gives an account⁸⁵ of the progress of it in future ages; which being foreign to my subject, I return to the business of elections in the ancient church, and proceed to give an account of the several qualifications, that were necessarily required in persons to be elected and ordained to any office or dignity in the church.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE EXAMINATION AND QUALIFICATIONS OF PERSONS TO BE ORDAINED TO ANY OFFICE OF THE CLERGY IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH. AND FIRST, OF THEIR FAITH AND MORALS.

BEFORE any person could regularly be elected or ordained to any clerical office in the church, the electors and ordainers were obliged to make several inquiries concerning him, which I think may be reduced to these three heads: the examination of his faith, his morals, and his outward state and condition in the world. The two first of these they were most strict in canvassing and examining, because they were more essential and necessary to the ministry; but the third they did not omit, because the peculiar state of those times did more especially require it. For then men were tied by the laws of the empire to bear the offices of the state, according to their quality and substance, and those offices were commonly inconsistent with the offices of the church: which made it necessary to inquire, before men were ordained, whether they were under any obligation to the state, or obnoxious to any distinct power, for fear the church should seem to encroach upon other men's rights, or bring trouble upon herself, by having her clergy recalled to a secular life again.

The trial of their faith and orthodoxy, under which I also comprehend their learning, was made three ways: partly by obliging the electors to give in their public testimony of them; partly by obliging the persons elected to answer to certain interrogatories, or questions of doctrine, that were put to them; and partly by making them subscribe a body of articles, or confession of faith, at the time of their ordination. By a law of Justinian's,¹ the electors themselves were to declare upon oath in the instrument or decree of election, if it were a bishop that was chosen, that they knew him to be a man of the true catholic faith, and of good life and conversation, &c. And by the same law, the bishop to be ordained was required to give in a libel, or form of confession of his faith, subscribed with his own hand; and to repeat the form of prayer used at the oblation of the holy eucharist, and at baptism, with the other prayers of the church. Which was an intimation that he allowed and approved the liturgy, or public service of the church. The fourth council of Carthage prescribes a particular form of examination by way of interrogatories to the bishop who was to be ordained, which is too long to be here inserted; but it consists chiefly of such questions as relate to the articles of the creed, and doctrines levelled against the most noted heresies,² that either then were, or lately had been, predominant in the church. Orders also are there given to examine, whether the candidate be well instructed in the law of God, and able to expound the sense of Scripture, and be thoroughly exercised in the doctrines of the church. By which we may judge what due precaution was then taken, to admit none but persons rightly qualified, as to their faith, to the chief administrations of the church.

Upon which consideration it has seemed very difficult to some learned men, to account for the practice and conduct of Theophilus of Alexandria, in ordaining Synesius, at the same time that he professed he could not yet believe the doctrine of the resurrection, and some other articles of the Christian faith. Baronius³ and Habertus,⁴ and our learned Bishop Taylor,⁵ reckon he only dissembled, and used this stratagem to avoid being ordained. But had this been the case, it had still been a just canonical exception against him: for the canons⁶ forbid the ordination of any one, who accuses himself as guilty of any heinous crime, whether his accusation be true or false: for he proves himself guilty, either by confessing a truth, or at least by telling a lie about it. But indeed the case of Synesius was no feigned case, for he spake the real sense of his soul;

Sect. 1.
Three inquiries made about persons to be ordained, respecting, 1st. Their faith, 2dly, their morals, 3dly, their outward quality and condition.

Sect. 2.
The rule and method of examining their faith and learning.

Sect. 3.
The irregular ordination of Synesius considered.

⁸⁴ Nov. 77. c. 2. ⁸⁵ Still. Unreas. of Separ. par. 3. p. 327.

¹ Justin. Novel. 137. n. 2. Quemque ipsorum jurare secundum divina eloquia, et ipsis psephismatibus inscribi—Quod scientes ipsos recte et catholicæ fidei et honestæ vitæ, ipsos elegerint. Ibid. Exigi etiam ante omnia ab eo qui ordinandus est, libellum ejus propria subscriptione completentem quæ ad rectam ejus fidem pertinent. Enunciari

etiam ab ipso et sanctam oblationis formulam, quæ in sancta communione fit, et eam quæ fit in baptisate precationem, et reliquis deprecationem.

² Conc. Carth. 4. c. 1. ³ Baron. an. 410. t. 5. p. 315.

⁴ Habert. Archieratic. p. 500.

⁵ Taylor, Duct. Dubit. book 3. c. 2. p. 495.

⁶ Conc. Valentin. c. 4. Quicumque sub ordinatione vel as appears not only from what the historian says of it,⁷ but from the account which he himself gives in one of his epistles⁸ to his brother Euoptius: You know, says he, that philosophy teaches the contrary to many of those generally-received doctrines. Therefore I cannot persuade myself, that the soul is postnate to the body; I cannot say that the world and all its parts shall be dissolved; I look upon the resurrection to be ἱερόν τι καὶ ἀπόρρητον, a sort of mystical and ineffable thing, and am far from assenting to the vulgar opinions about it.—And now being called to the priesthood, I would not dissemble these things, but testify them both before God and man. This asseveration seems too solemn and serious, to be the speech of one who was only acting a part, and dissembling his opinion; and therefore it is more probable that he was in earnest, as Lucas Holstenius⁹ more fully shows in a peculiar dissertation upon this subject against Baronius. Valesius, to vindicate Theophilus, says,¹⁰ Synesius altered his opinions before he was ordained: but that is more than can be proved. The best account of the thing is that which is given by Holstenius, that it was the man's admirable virtues, and excellent qualifications in other respects, and a great want of fit men in those difficult times, that encouraged Theophilus to ordain him, in hopes that God would enlighten his mind, and not suffer so excellent a person long to labour under such errors in religion. But the fairest colours that can be put upon it, will hardly justify a fact so contrary to the rules of the church. The instance was singular, and never made a precedent, or drawn into imitation; the general practice of the church being, as has been showed, to examine men's orthodoxy, and require their assent and subscriptions to the rule of faith before their ordination.

Their next inquiry was into the morals of the person to be ordained. And here the examination was very strict and accurate. For then the custom was generally to ordain such only as were known to all the people, and of whose life and character they were satisfied, and could bear testimony to them. The bishops and presbyters who

Sect. 4.
A strict inquiry made into the morals of such as were to be ordained.

diaconatus, vel presbyterii, vel episcopatus, mortali crimine se dixerint esse pollutos, a supradictis ordinationibus esse submovendos, reos scilicet vel veri confessione, vel mendacio falsitatis.

⁷ Evagr. lib. 1. c. 15. οὐπω τὸν λόγον τῆς ἀνατάσεως παραδεχόμενον, &c.

⁸ Synes. Ep. 105. p. 397.

⁹ Holsten. Dissert. 3. de Synesio, ap. Vales. Not. in Theodor. p. 203.

¹⁰ Vales. Not. in Evagr. lib. 1. c. 15. It. Petav. Vit. Synes. p. 4.

¹¹ Tertul. Apol. c. 39. Præsident apud nos probati quique seniores, honorem istum non pretio, sed testimonio adepti.

¹² Cypr. Ep. 68. al. 67. p. 172. Episcopus deligatur plebe preside over us, says Tertullian,¹¹ are advanced to that honour only by public testimony. The law is, says Cyprian,¹² to choose bishops in the presence of the people, who have perfect knowledge of every man's life, and are acquainted with the tenor of their actions by their conversation.

Upon which account the laws forbade the ordination of strangers in any church to which they did not belong. Optatus makes it an objection against the Donatists, that in the Roman see they never had a bishop who was a citizen of Rome, but still their succession in that city was supplied by Africans and strangers.¹³ Whereas, on the contrary, he challenges them to show,¹⁴ whenever the church at any time brought a Frenchman or a Spaniard into Africa; or ordained a stranger to a people that knew nothing of him. In the civil law we have a constitution of Honorius the emperor to this purpose,¹⁵ That no clerks should be ordained out of any other possession or village, but only that where their church was. Or if any thinks that decree was made rather for reasons of state, he may read the same in the canons of the church: as in the council of Eliberis,¹⁶ which decrees, That no stranger baptized in a foreign country, should be ordained out of the province where he was baptized, because his life and conversation could not be known. And this rule was generally observed, except in some extraordinary cases, when either public fame had made a man eminent and noted over all the world; or there were some particular reasons for going against the rule, of which I have given an account in another place. See Book II. chap. 10. sect. 3.

The strictness of this examination, as to men's morals, will appear further from this, that the commission of any scandalous crime, for which a man was obliged to do penance in the church, did, for ever after, according to the rules and discipline of those times, render that person irregular and incapable of holy orders. For though they granted pardon and absolution, and lay-communion, to all offenders that submitted to the discipline of public penance; yet

Sect. 5.
For which reason no stranger to be ordained in a foreign land.

Sect. 6.
Nor any one who had done public penance in the church.

præsente, quæ singulorum vitam plenissime novit, et uniuscujusque actum de ejus conversatione perspexit.

¹³ Optat. lib. 2. p. 48. Quid est hoc, quod pars vestra in urbe Roma episcopum civem habere non potuit? Quid est quod toti Afri et peregrini in illa civitate sibi successisse noscuntur.

¹⁴ Ibid. p. 51. Nunquid nos adduximus Hispanum aut Gallum? Aut nos ordinavimus ignorantibus peregrinum?

¹⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 33. Clerici non ex alia possessione vel vico, sed ex eo ubi ecclesiam esse constitit, ordinentur.

¹⁶ Conc. Eliber. c. 21. Omnes qui peregre fuerint baptizati, eo quod eorum minime sit cognita vita, placuit, ad clerum non esse promovendos in alienis provinciis.

they thought it not proper to admit such to clerical dignities, but excluded them from the orders and promotions of the church. At least it was thus in most of the Western churches in the fourth and fifth centuries, as appears from the Latin writers of those ages. The epistles of Siricius and Innocent show it to have been the practice of the Roman church in their time. For Siricius¹⁷ says, no layman, after public penance and reconciliation, was to be admitted to the honour of the clergy: because, though they were cleansed from the contagion of all their sins, yet they ought not to touch the instruments of the sanctuary, who themselves before had been the instruments and vessels of sin. The letters of Innocent¹⁸ are to the same purpose. And so for the French churches we have the testimony of Gennadius,¹⁹ and the second council of Arles,²⁰ and Agde.²¹ And for the Spanish churches, a canon of the first council of Toledo,²² which allows not penitents to be ordained, except in case of necessity, and then only to the offices of the inferior orders, door-keepers and readers. The practice of the African churches is evident, from the fourth council of Carthage, which decrees that no penitent should be ordained,²³ though he was a good man at the present. And if any such was ordained by the bishop's ignorance, not knowing his character, he should be deposed, because he did not declare that he had been a penitent, at the time of his ordination. By this we may understand what Optatus means, when, speaking of the Donatists, who made some of the catholic children do public penance in the church, he says they thereby gave them a wound, which was intended²⁴ to cut them off from the benefit of ordination; plainly referring to this rule in the church, that he who had done public penance, was thereby made incapable of ordination. Which seems also to be St. Austin's meaning, when speaking of a Christian astrologer, who had done penance for his fault, he says, his conversion perhaps²⁵ might make some think he intended to get an office among the clergy of the church: but no, says he, he is a penitent; he seeks nothing more but only a pardon and absolution: meaning, that a person in his circumstances could not pretend to sue for orders by the rules and canons of the church. But we are to note, that this is always to be understood of public penance, not of private: for the council of Girone, or Gerunda, in Catalonia, expressly makes this distinction²⁶ between public penance in the church, and private penance in time of sickness; making the one to incapacitate men from taking orders, but not the other. And in all other canons, where this distinction is not expressed, it is always to be understood. For it was only that penance which left some public mark of disgrace upon men, which unqualified them for the orders of the church. But this rule might be dispensed with in extraordinary cases, and there are some learned men who think it was not so generally insisted on in the three first ages of the church.

As to particular crimes, there were a great many that unqualified men, whether they had done public penance for them or not. Such as the three great crimes of murder, adultery, and lapsing in time of persecution. The council of Toledo²⁷ sets murder in the front of those sins which exclude men from holy orders. The crime of fornication and adultery is noted upon the same account by those called the Apostolical Canons,²⁸ the council of Neocæsarea,²⁹ the council of Nice,³⁰ Eliberis,³¹ and several others. Nay, the council of Neocæsarea goes a little further, and decrees,³² that if any man's wife committed adultery whilst he was a layman, he should not be admitted to any ecclesiastical function. Or if she committed adultery when he was in office, he must give her a bill of divorce and put her away; otherwise be degraded from his office. As to the crime of lapsing and sacrificing in time of persecution, Origen³³ assures us it was the custom of the church in his time to exclude such as were guilty of it, from all ecclesiastical power and government. And Athanasius³⁴ says the same, that

Sect. 7.
No murderer to be ordained, nor adulterer, nor one that had lapsed in time of persecution.

¹⁷ Siric. Ep. 1. ad Himer. Tarracon. c. 14. Post pœnitentiam et reconciliationem nulli unquam laico liceat honorem clericatus adipisci: quia quamvis sint omnium peccatorum contagione mundati, nulla tamen debent gerendorum sacramentorum instrumenta suscipere, qui dudum fuerint vasa vitiorum.

¹⁸ Innoc. Ep. 22. c. 3. Ubi pœnitentiæ remedium necessarium est illic ordinationis honorem locum habere non posse.

¹⁹ Gennad. de Eccl. Dogm. c. 72.

²⁰ Conc. Arelat. 2. c. 25.

²¹ Conc. Agath. c. 93. De pœnitentibus nullus clericus ordinetur.

²² Conc. Tolet. 1. c. 2. Pœnitentes non admittantur ad clerum, nisi tantum necessitas aut usus exegerit, et tunc inter ostiarios deputentur, vel inter lectores.

²³ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 68. Ex pœnitentibus (quamvis sit bonus) clericum non ordinetur. Si per ignorantiam episcopi factum fuerit, deponatur a clero, quia se ordinationis tempore non prodidit fuisse pœnitentem.

²⁴ Optat. lib. 2. p. 59. Invenistis pueros, de pœnitentiâ sauciatis, ne aliqui ordinari potuissent.

²⁵ Aug. Append. Enarrat. Psal. lxi. Posset videri, quia sic conversus est, clericatum quærere in ecclesia. Pœnitens est: non quærît nisi solam misericordiam. Vid. Aug. Ep. 50. ad Bonifac. p. 87.

²⁶ Conc. Gerundens. an. 517. c. 9. Qui ægritudinis languore depressus, pœnitentiæ benedictionem, quam viaticum deputamus, per communionem accepit; et postmodum reconvalescens caput pœnitentiæ in ecclesia publicè non subdidit; si prohibitis vitiis non detinetur obnoxius, admittatur ad clerum.

²⁷ Conc. Tolet. 1. can. 2.

²⁸ Canon. Apost. c. 61.

²⁹ Conc. Neocæs. c. 9 et 10.

³⁰ Conc. Nic. c. 2.

³¹ Conc. Eliber. c. 30.

³² Conc. Neocæs. c. 8.

³³ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 3. p. 143.

³⁴ Athan. Ep. ad Rufin. t. 2. p. 41.

they were allowed the privilege of repentance, but not to have any place among the clergy. Or if any were ignorantly ordained, they were to be deposed as soon as they were discovered, by a rule³⁵ of the great council of Nice. Which was no new rule, but the ancient rule of the whole catholic church: for Cyprian³⁶ says it was agreed upon at Rome, and in Africa, and by the bishops of the whole world, that such men might be admitted to repentance, but should be kept back from the ordinations of the clergy, and the honour of the priesthood. Upon this account the Arians themselves, though they were not much given to act by rules, sometimes thought fit to deny men ordination; as Athanasius³⁷ and Socrates³⁸ say they did by Asterius the sophist, whom they would not ordain, because he had sacrificed in time of persecution. But they were far from being constant to this rule; for if Philostorgius³⁹ says true, the leading bishops of the Arian party, Eusebius of Nicomedia, Maris of Chalcedon, Theognis of Nice, Leontius of Antioch, Antonius of Tarsus, Menophantus of Ephesus, Numenius, Eudoxius, Alexander, and Asterius of Cappadocia, all sacrificed in the Diocletian persecution. But then it must be owned, that some of these were ordained bishops in the church before the Arian heresy began to appear: whence we must conclude, that either the bishops who ordained them knew nothing of their lapsing; or else that the church herself sometimes granted dispensations in this case also. Baronius⁴⁰ and some others lay it to the charge of Eusebius the historian, that he sacrificed in time of persecution: Petavius,⁴¹ and Huetius,⁴² and Mr. Pagi⁴³ bring the same charge against Origen out of Epiphanius, the first reporter of the story: whilst Valesius⁴⁴ and Du Pin⁴⁵ undertake to vindicate the reputation of Origen from so foul an aspersion; and Hanckius⁴⁶ and Dr. Cave⁴⁷ do the same for Eusebius. I will not interpose in these controversies, but only observe, that if the accusations brought against those two persons were true, the consequence must be, either that persons who had lapsed might be ordained, or at least continue in their orders undeposed, when the church saw fit to dispense with her ordinary rule; which probably was not so strict, but that it might admit of some relaxation, when proper occasions and cases extraordinary seemed to require it.

Another crime which unqualified men for orders in those times, was Sect. 8. No usurer, or seditious person. sedition or rebellion; for he that stood convicted of treasonable practices was never to be ordained. This appears from the fourth council of Carthage,⁴⁸ which joins the seditious and usurers together, and excludes them both from ordination. As to the crime of usury, I shall not here stand to explain the nature of it, which will be done in a more convenient place,⁴⁹ but only observe, that this crime, in the sense in which the ancients condemned it, was of such an odious and scandalous nature, as to debar men that had been guilty of it, from the honour and privilege of ordination. Whence Gennadius, speaking of the practice of the Latin church, and the qualifications required in persons to be ordained, says, they must not be men convicted of taking usury.⁵⁰ In the Greek church, at least in the province of Cappadocia, the rule seems not to have been altogether so strict: for St. Basil's canons⁵¹ do not absolutely exclude such from the ministry, but allow them to be ordained, provided they first gave away to the poor what they had gained by usury, and promised not to exercise it for the future.

Another crime which made a man Sect. 9. No one who had voluntarily dismembered his own body. irregular, and debarred him from the privilege of ordination, was the disfiguring or dismembering of his own body. If any man indeed happened to be born a eunuch, there was no law against his ordination: for Eusebius⁵² says, Dorotheus, presbyter of Antioch, was a eunuch from his mother's womb; and Socrates⁵³ and Sozomen say of Tigris, presbyter of Constantinople, that he was made a eunuch by a barbarian master. Or if a man had suffered the loss of any member by the cruelty of the persecutors; as many confessors in the Diocletian persecution had their right eyes bored out, and their left legs enfeebled; in that case there was no prohibition of their ordination, except they were utterly incapacitated from doing the office of ministers, by being made blind, or deaf, or dumb; for so those called the Apostolical Canons⁵⁴ determined: A man that hath lost an ³⁵ Conc. Nic. c. 10.

³⁶ Cyp. Ep. 68. al. 67. p. 174. Cum jam pridem nobiscum, et cum omnibus omnino episcopis in toto mundo constitutis, etiam Cornelius collega noster—decreverit, ejusmodi homines ad pœnitentiam quidem agendam posse admitti; ab ordinatione autem cleri, atque sacerdotali honore prohiberi.

³⁷ Athan. de Synod. Arim. et Seleuc. t. 1. p. 887.

³⁸ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 36. ³⁹ Philostorg. lib. 2. c. 14.

⁴⁰ Baron. ad an. 335. n. 8.

⁴¹ Petav. Animadvers. in Epiphani. Hær. 64. n. 2.

⁴² Huet. Origenian. lib. 1. c. 4.

⁴³ Pagi Critic. in Baron. an. 251. n. 6.

⁴⁴ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 6. c. 39.

⁴⁵ Du Pin, Bibliothèque, t. 1. p. 444.

⁴⁶ Hanckius, de Scriptor. Byzantin. par. 1. c. 1. n. 158.

⁴⁷ Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. 1. p. 128.

⁴⁸ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 67. Seditiosarios nunquam ordinandos clericos, sicut nec usurarios.

⁴⁹ Book VI. c. 2. sect. 8.

⁵⁰ Gennad. de Eccles. Dogm. c. 172. Neque illum qui usuras accepisse convineitur.

⁵¹ Basil. Can. 14. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2.

⁵² Euseb. lib. 7. c. 32.

⁵³ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 15. Sozom. lib. 8. c. 24.

⁵⁴ Canon. Apost. c. 76 et 77.

eye, or is maimed in his leg, may be ordained bishop, if he be otherwise worthy. For it is not any imperfection of body that defiles a man, but the pollution of his soul. Yet if a man is deaf or blind, he shall not be made bishop; not because he is polluted, but because he will not be able to perform the duties of his function. The council of Nice adds a third case, in which it was lawful to ordain dismembered persons, which was when, in case of a mortal distemper, the physicians thought it necessary to cut off one limb of the body to save the whole. All these were excepted cases, and the prohibition of the canons did not extend to them: but the crime was, when any one dismembered himself in health, as the Nicene canon words it;⁵⁵ such a one was not to be ordained, or if he was ordained when he committed the fact, he was to be deposed. The Apostolical Canons give this reason for it,⁵⁶ because such a one is in effect a self-murderer, and an enemy of the workmanship of God. Nor was it any excuse in this case, that a man made himself a eunuch out of a pretended piety, or to avoid fornication. For such were liable to the penalty of the canon, as well as any others; which is noted by Gennadius⁵⁷ and the council of Arles.⁵⁸ And indeed the first reason of making the canon was to prevent that mistaken notion of piety, which had once possessed Origen,⁵⁹ who taking those words of our Saviour, "There are some that make themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake," in a wrong sense, fulfilled them literally upon himself. And the Valesian heretics carried the matter a little further, asserting, that men ought to serve God after that manner; and therefore they both made themselves eunuchs, and all that came over to them, as St. Austin⁶⁰ informs us. It was to correct and discountenance these erroneous opinions and practices, that the church at first made this rule; which was so nicely observed, that we scarce meet with two instances to the contrary in after ages. Leontius made himself a eunuch, to avoid suspicion in his converse with the virgin Eustolium; but he was deposed from the office of presbyter for the fact, and it gave occasion to the council of Nice to renew the ancient canon against such practices; so that when the Arians afterward ordained him bishop of Antioch, the historians⁶¹ tell us the catholics generally declaimed against his ordination as uncanonical. The only instance that looks like a dispensation with this rule, is what we have in Baronius concerning Timotheus, bishop of Alexandria, his ordaining Ammon the Egyptian monk, who, to avoid being ordained, had cut off his own right ear, to make himself irregular; notwithstanding which, Baronius says,⁶² Timotheus ordained him, and justified what he did with this expression: That this law indeed was observed by the Jews; but for his own part, if they brought to him a man without a nose, that was but of good morals, he would ordain him bishop. But there is some reason to question the truth of this narration; for not only Palladius, whom Baronius cites, but Socrates and Sozomen,⁶³ in telling the story, seem rather to intimate that he was not ordained. However, supposing it to be true, it is a singular instance, and we shall hardly find such another in all the history of the church. Which shows how cautious the ancients were in observing this rule, that they might not bring any disrepute or scandal upon the church.

But in all these and the like cases there is one thing particularly to be observed, that the crimes which made men irregular, were generally understood to be such only as were committed after baptism. For all crimes committed before baptism were supposed to be so purged away in the waters of baptism, as that a perfect amnesty passed upon them, and men notwithstanding them were capable of ordination. So that not only the crimes which men committed whilst they were heathens, but such as they fell into when they were catechumens, were overlooked in this inquiry, when their morals came to be examined for ordination. This is evident not only from the known case of St. Austin, whose faults were never objected to him at his ordination, because they were only such as preceded his baptism; but also from the rule made in the council of Ancyra, in the case of such as lapsed into idolatry whilst they were only catechumens. For the canon⁶⁴ says, That such as sacrificed before baptism, and were afterwards baptized, might be promoted to ecclesiastical dignities, as persons that were cleansed from all crimes by the sanctification of baptism. It is true, only that one crime of sacrificing is here specified; but by parity of reason, the rule must be understood to extend to all other cases of the like nature: and so the practice of the church has commonly determined it.

Yet here again we must observe, that if any great irregularity happened in men's baptism itself, such crimes were always objected against them, to debar them from ordination. Thus it was frequently with those who were baptized

Sect. 10.
Men only accountable for crimes committed after baptism, as to what concerned ordination.

Sect. 11.
Except any great irregularity happened in their baptism itself. As in the case of clinic baptism.

⁵⁵ Conc. Nic. c. 1.

⁵⁶ Canon. Apost. c. 21.

⁵⁷ Gennad. de Eccles. Dogm. c. 72.

⁵⁸ Conc. Arelat. 2. c. 7. Si qui se, carnali vitio repugnare nescientes, abscondunt, ad clerum pervenire non possunt.

⁵⁹ Vid. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 8. Epiphan. Hæc. 64. n. 3.

⁶⁰ Aug. de Hæres. c. 37. Valesii et seipsos castrant, et hospites suos, hoc modo existimantes Deo se debere servire.

⁶¹ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 26. Theodor. lib. 2. c. 24.

⁶² Baron. an. 355. p. 513.

⁶³ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 23. Sozom. lib. 7. c. 30. Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 12.

⁶⁴ Conc. Ancy. c. 12.

only with clinic baptism, in time of sickness or urgent necessity, when they had carelessly deferred their baptism to such a critical moment, and might have had it sooner, had it not been their own default. This delaying of baptism was always esteemed a very great crime, and worthy of some ecclesiastical censure: and therefore the church, among other methods which she took to discountenance the practice of it, thought fit to punish persons who had been guilty of it, and had put themselves upon the fatal necessity of a clinic baptism by denying them ordination. We have a canon in the council of Neocæsarea⁶⁵ to this purpose: If any man is baptized only in time of sickness, he shall not be ordained a presbyter; because his faith was not voluntary, but as it were of constraint; except his subsequent faith and diligence recommend him, or else the scarcity of men make it necessary to ordain him. And that this was an old rule of the church, appears from the account which Cornelius⁶⁶ gives of the ordination of Novatian to be presbyter. He says, the clergy and many of the people objected against it, alleging, that it was not lawful to ordain one who had been baptized upon his bed in time of sickness; and that the bishop was forced to intercede with them, to give way to his ordination, as a matter of grace and favour. Which shows, that the ordination of such was contrary to the common rule and practice of the church.

In like manner, they who were baptized by heretics, were not ordinarily allowed clerical promotion, when they returned to the bosom of the catholic church. The council of Eliberis is very peremptory⁶⁷ in its decree, That whatever heresy they came from, they should not be ordained: or if any such were already ordained, they should be undoubtedly degraded. Pope Innocent⁶⁸ testifies for the same practice in the Roman church, saying, It is the custom of our church, to grant only lay-communion to those that return from heretics, by whom they were baptized, and not to admit any of them to the very lowest order of the clergy. But it must be confessed, that the council of Nice dispensed with the Novatians⁶⁹ in this respect, allowing their clergy, though both baptized and ordained among them, to be received with imposition of hands, and retain their orders in the church. And the African fathers granted the same indulgence to the Donatists, to encourage them to return to the unity of the catholic church. For in the council of Carthage, anno 397, which is inserted into the African Code,⁷⁰ a proposal was made, that such as had been baptized among the Donatists in their infancy, by their parents' fault, without their own knowledge and consent, should, upon their return to the church, be allowed the privilege of ordination: and in the next council⁷¹ the proposal was accepted, and a decree passed accordingly in favour of them. By which we may understand, that this was a piece of discipline, that might be insisted on or waved, according as church governors in prudence thought most for the benefit and advantage of the church. But in case the persons so returning had been baptized by such heretics, whose baptism was null, and to be reiterated in the church; as the baptism of the Paulianists, or Samosatzenian heretics, was; in that case it was determined by the great council of Nice, that such persons, when they were rebaptized, might be ordained.⁷² For baptism, as has been noted before, set men clear of all crimes: and their former baptism being null, that was reckoned their only baptism, which they received at their return to the catholic church; and no crimes committed before that were then to prejudice their ordination in the church.

I cannot here omit to mention another qualification required of persons to be ordained, because it was of great use and service in the church; which was, that none should be admitted, at least to the superior degrees of bishops, presbyters, or deacons, before they had made all the members of their family catholic Christians. This is a rule we find in the third council of Carthage,⁷³ which was equally designed to promote the conversion of pagans, Jews, heretics, and schismatics, who are all opposed to catholic Christians: and it was a very proper rule in that case; since nothing could be more disadvantageous or dishonourable to religion, than to have any countenance or secret encouragement given to its opposers, by those who were designed to serve at the altar. Besides that this was but a proper way of making reprisals upon the heathen religion. For Julian had made a like decree for his pagan priests, in opposition to the Christians; charging Arsacius, high priest of Galatia, that he should admit none to the priest's office,⁷⁴ who tolerated either servants, or children, or wives that were Galilæans; and did not come with their whole family and retinue to the worship of the gods

Sect. 13.
No man to be ordained, who had not made all his family catholic Christians.

⁶⁵ Conc. Neocæs. c. 12.

⁶⁶ Ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

⁶⁷ Conc. Eliber. c. 51. Ex omni hæresi qui ad nos fidelis venerit, minime est ad clerum promovendus. Velsi qui sunt in præteritum ordinati, sine dubio deponentur.

⁶⁸ Innoc. Ep. 22. Nostræ lex ecclesiæ est, venientibus ab hæreticis, qui tamen illic baptizati sunt, per manus impositionem laicam tantum tribuere communionem, nec ex his aliquem in clericatûs honorem vel exiguum subrogare.

⁶⁹ Conc. Nic. c. 8. χειροθετουμένους αὐτοὺς μένεν ἕπαις ἐν τῷ κλήρῳ.

⁷⁰ Cod. Can. Afric. c. 48. al. 47.

⁷¹ Ibid. c. 58. al. 57.

⁷² Conc. Nic. c. 19. ἀναβαπτισθέντες χειροτονείσθωσαν.

⁷³ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 18. Ut episcopi, presbyteri, et diaconi non ordinentur, priusquam omnes qui sunt in domo eorum Christianos catholicos fecerint.

⁷⁴ Julian. Ep. ad Arsac. ap. Sozomen. lib. 5. c. 16.

in the idol temples. It had been a great omission and oversight in the governors of the Christian church, had they not been as careful to secure the interest of the true religion in the families of their ministers, as that pagan prince was to secure a false religion among his idol priests: and therefore, had there been nothing more than emulation in the case, yet that had been a sufficient reason to have laid this injunction upon all the candidates of the Christian priesthood.

There is but one qualification more I shall mention under this head, which was, that men should come honestly and legally to their preferment, and use no indirect or sinister arts to procure themselves an ordination. Merit, and not bribery, was to be their advocate, and the only thing to be considered in all elections. In the three first ages, whilst the preferments were small, and the persecutions great, there was no great danger of ambitious spirits, nor any great occasion to make laws against simoniacal promotions. For then martyrdom was as it were a thing annexed to a bishopric; and the first persons that were commonly aimed and struck at, were the rulers and governors of the church. But in after ages, ambition and bribery crept in among other vices, and then severe laws were made both in church and state to check and prevent them. Sulpitius Severus takes notice of this difference betwixt the ages of persecution and those that followed, when he says,⁷⁵ that in the former, men strove who should run fastest to those glorious combats, and more greedily sought for martyrdom by honourable deaths, than in after times by wicked ambitions they sought for the bishoprics of the church. This implies, that in the age when Sulpitius lived, in the fifth century, some irregular arts were used by particular men to advance themselves to the preferments of the church. To correct whose ambition and ill designs, the church inflicted very severe censures upon all such as were found guilty of simony, or, as some then⁷⁶ called it, χριστιμυροπείαν, the selling of Christ. The council of Chalcedon decreed,⁷⁷ that if any bishop gave ordination, or an ecclesiastical office or preferment of any kind, for money, he himself should lose his office, and the party so preferred be deposed. And the reader may find several other constitutions of the same import in those called the Apostolical Canons,⁷⁸ the council of Constantinople⁷⁹ under Gennadius, anno 459, the second council of Orleans,⁸⁰ Bracara,⁸¹ and many others. The imperial laws also were very properly contrived to prevent this abuse. For by one of Justinian's laws it was enacted,⁸² that whenever a bishop was to be chosen, the electors themselves should take an oath, and insert it into the election paper, that they did not choose him for any gift, or promise, or friendship, or any other cause, but only because they knew him to be a man of the true catholic faith, and an unblamable life, and good learning. And in another of his laws, where this same injunction is repeated, it is further provided, that the party elected shall also at the time of his ordination take an oath, upon the holy Gospels, that he neither gave nor promised,⁸³ by himself or other, nor hereafter will give to his ordainer, or to his electors, or any other person, any thing to procure him an ordination. And for any bishop to ordain another without observing the rule prescribed, is deposition by the same law, both for himself and the other whom he ordained. These were some of those ancient rules to be observed in the examination of men's lives and morals, before they were consecrated to the sacred function, or admitted to serve in any of the chief offices of the church.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE QUALIFICATIONS OF PERSONS TO BE ORDAINED, RESPECTING THEIR OUTWARD STATE AND CONDITION IN THE WORLD.

A THIRD inquiry was made into men's outward state and condition in the world. For there were some callings and states of life, which debarred men from the privilege of ordination, not because they were esteemed absolutely sinful vocations, but because the duties attending them were commonly incompatible and inconsistent with the offices of the clergy. Of this nature were all those callings, which come under the general name of militia Ro-

Sect. 1.
No soldier to be ordained.

⁷⁵ Sever. Hist. lib. 2. p. 99. Certatim in gloriosa certamina ruebatur, multoque avidius tum martyria gloriosioribus quærebantur, quam nunc episcopatus pravis ambitionibus appetuntur.

⁷⁶ Vid. Epist. Alexandri Alexandrini ap. Theodor. lib. 1. c. 4.

⁷⁷ Conc. Chalced. c. 2. ⁷⁸ Canon. Apost. c. 29.

⁷⁹ Conc. CP. Epist. Synod. Con. t. 4. p. 1025.

⁸⁰ Conc. Aurel. 2. c. 3 et 4.

⁸¹ Bracara. 3. c. 3.

⁸² Justin. Novel. 123. c. 1. Propositis eis sacrosanctis evangelii, periculo suarum animarum dicentes in ipsis decretis, quia neque propter aliquam donationem, nec promissionem, aut amicitiam, aut aliam quamlibet causam, sed scientes eos rectæ et catholicæ fidei, et honestæ esse vitæ, et literas nosse, hos elegerunt.

⁸³ Novel. 137. c. 2. Jusjurandum autem suscipere eum qui ordinatur, per Divinas Scripturas, quod neque per se ipsum neque per aliam personam dedit quid, aut promisit, neque posthac dabit, vel ordinanti ipsum, vel his qui sacra pro eo suffragia fecerunt, vel alii cuiquam ordinationis de ipso faciendæ nomine, &c.

mana, which we cannot so properly English, the military life, as, the service of the empire. For it includes several offices, as well civil as military: the Romans, as Gothofred and other learned persons have observed,¹ calling all inferior offices by the name of militia: so there were three sorts of it, militia palatina, militia castrensis or armata, and militia prædialis or cohortalis: the first including the officers of the emperor's palace; the second, the armed soldiery of the camp; and the third, the apparitors and officials of judges and governors of provinces; all which were so tied to their service, that they could not forsake their station: and for that reason the laws of the state forbade any of them to be entertained as ecclesiastics, or ordained among the clergy. Honorius² the emperor particularly made a law to this purpose, That no one who was originally tied to the military life, as some were even by birth, should, either before or after they were entered upon that life, take upon them any clerical office, or think to excuse themselves from their service under the notion of becoming ecclesiastical persons. The canons of the church seem to have carried the matter a little further; for they forbade the ordination of any who had been soldiers after baptism, because they might perhaps have imbrued their hands in blood. This appears from the letters of Innocent I., who blames the Spanish churches³ for admitting such persons into orders, alleging the canons of the church against it. The first council of Toledo forbids any such to be ordained deacons, though they had never been concerned in shedding of blood; because, though they had not actually shed blood,⁴ yet by entering upon the military life they had obliged themselves, if occasion had so required, to have done it. Which seems to import, that soldiers might be allowed in the inferior services, but were not to be admitted to the sacred and superior orders of the church.

Another state of life, which debarred men from the privilege of ordination, was that of slaves or vassals in the Roman empire; who, being originally tied by birth or purchase to their patron's or master's service, could not legally be ordained, be-

Sect. 2.
Nor any slave or freeman without the consent of his patron.

¹ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 63. Vales. Not. in Sozomen. lib. 5. c. 4. Pagi Critic. in Baron. an. 375. n. 12.

² Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 20. de Veteranis Leg. 12. Quoniam plurimos vel ante militiam, vel post inchoatam, nec peractam, latere objectu piæ religionis agnovimus, dum se quidam vocabulo clericorum—defendunt, nulli omnino tali excusari objectione permittimus, &c.

³ Innoc. Ep. 22. c. 4. Quantos ex militia, qui cum potestatis obediunt, severa necessario præcepta sunt executi. Ibid. c. 6. Ne quispiam qui post baptismum militaverit, ad ordinem debeat clericatus admitti. Vid. Ep. 2. ad Victricium Rothomagens. c. 2.

⁴ Conc. Tolet. 1. c. 8. Si quis post baptismum militaverit, et chlamydem sumpserit, aut cingulum ad necandos fideles, cause the service of the church was incompatible with their other duties, and no man was to be defrauded of his right under pretence of an ordination. In this case therefore the patron was always to be consulted before the servant was ordained. Thus in one of those called the Apostolical Canons⁵ we find a decree, that no servants should be admitted among the clergy without the consent of their masters, to the grievance of the owners, and subversion of their families. But if a servant be found worthy of an ecclesiastical promotion, as Onesimus was, and his master give his consent, and grant him his freedom, and let him go forth from his house, he may be ordained. The council of Toledo⁶ has a canon to the same purpose. And the council of Eliberis⁷ goes a little further, and says, though a secular master, that is, a heathen, as Albaspinæus interprets it, had made his servant a freeman, he should not be ordained. The reason of which is conceived to be, that such masters gave them only a conditional freedom, and still retained a right to exact certain services and manual labours of them, which would not consist with the service of the church. The imperial laws also⁸ made provision in this case, that no persons under such obligations should be admitted to any office of the clergy, or if they were admitted, merely to evade their obligations, their masters should have power to recall them to their service, unless they were bishops or presbyters, or had continued thirty years in some other office of the church. By which it appears, that the ordination of such persons was prohibited only upon a civil account, not because that state of life was sinful, or that it was any undervaluing or disgrace to the function to have such persons ordained, but because the duties of the civil and ecclesiastical state would not well consist together.

For the same reason, the laws forbade the ordination of any persons, who were incorporated into any society for the service of the commonwealth, unless they had first obtained the leave of the society and prince under whom they served. This is the meaning of that law of

Sect. 3.
Nor any member of a civil company, or society of tradesmen, who were tied to the service of the commonwealth.

etiamsi graviora non admisserit, si ad clerum admissus fuerit, diaconii non accipiat dignitatem.

⁵ Canon. Apost. c. 82.

⁶ Conc. Tolet. 1. c. 10. Clericos, si quidem obligati sint vel pro æquatione, vel de genere alicujus domûs, non ordinandos, nisi probatæ vitæ fuerint, et patroni consensus accesserit.

⁷ Conc. Eliber. c. 80. Prohibendum est, ut liberti, quorum patroni in sæculo fuerint, ad clerum provehantur.

⁸ Valent. 3. Novel. 12. ad ealem Cod. Th. Nullus originarius, inquilinus, servus, vel colonus ad clericale munus accedat.—ut vinculum debitæ conditionis evadat.—Originarii sane vel servi, qui jugum natalium declinantes, ad ecclesiasticum se ordinem transtulerunt, exceptis episcopis et presbyteris, ad dominorum jura recedant, si non in eodem officio annum tricesimum compleverunt.

Justinian,⁹ which forbids any of those called ταξιῶται, or cohortales, that is, the officers or apparitors of judges, to be ordained, unless they had first spent fifteen years in a monastic life. And the first council of Orleans¹⁰ requires expressly either the command of the prince, or the consent of the judge, before any such secular officer be ordained. By the laws of Theodosius junior,¹¹ and Valentinian III.,¹² all corporation men are forbidden to be ordained; and if any such were ordained among the inferior clergy, they were to be reclaimed by their respective companies; if among the superior, bishops, presbyters, or deacons, they must provide a proper substitute, qualified with their estate to serve in the company from whence they were taken. The reader, that is curious in this matter, may find several other laws in the Theodosius Code,¹³ made by the elder Valentinian and Theodosius the Great, with respect to particular civil societies so incorporated for the use of the public, no member of which might be ordained, but either they must quit their estates, or be liable to be recalled to the service, which they had unwarrantably forsaken.

For reasons of the same nature, the canons were precise in forbidding the ordination of any of those who are commonly known by the name of curiales, or decuriones, in the Roman government; that is, such as were members of the curia, the court, or common council of every city. These were men who, by virtue of their estates, were tied to bear the offices of their country; so that out of their body were chosen all civil officers, the magistrates of every city, the collectors of the public revenue, the overseers of all public works, the pontifices or flamens, who exhibited the public games and shows to the people, with abundance of others, whose offices are specified by Gothofred,¹⁴ to the number of twenty-two, which I need not here recite. These were always men of estates, whose substance amounted to the value of three hundred solids; which is the sum that is specified by Theodosius junior,¹⁵ as qualifying a man to be a member of the curia; and both they and their estates were so tied to civil offices, that no member of that body was to be admitted into any ecclesiastical office, till he had first discharged all the offices of his country, or else provided a proper substitute, one of his relations qualified with his estate to bear offices in his room: otherwise the person so ordained was liable, by the laws of the empire, (of which I give a more particular account hereafter¹⁶ in the next book,) to be called back by the curia from an ecclesiastical to a secular life again. Which was such an inconvenience to the church, that she herself made laws to prohibit the ordination of any of these curiales, to avoid the trouble and molestation, which was commonly the consequent of their ordination. St. Ambrose¹⁷ assures us, that sometimes presbyters and deacons, who were thus ordained out of the curiales, were fetched back to serve in curial offices, after they had been thirty years and more in the service of the church. And therefore, to prevent this calamity, the council of Illyricum, mentioned by Theodoret,¹⁸ made a decree, that presbyters and deacons should always be chosen out of the inferior clergy, and not out of these curiales, or any other officers of the civil government. Innocent, bishop of Rome, frequently refers to this rule of the church¹⁹ in his epistles, where he gives two reasons against their ordination: first, that they were often recalled by the curia to serve in civil offices, which brought some tribulation upon the church. Secondly, because many of them had served in the office of *flamens*²⁰ after baptism, and were crowned as the heathen high priests were used to be, while they exhibited the public games and shows to the people. Which, though it was indulged by the civil law in Christian magistrates, yet the church reckoned it a crime, for which men were sometimes obliged to do public penance, as appears from the canons²¹ of the council of Eliberis: and consequently such a crime, as made men irregular and incapable of ordination. So that upon both accounts, these curiales were to be excluded from the orders of the church. And though this rule by the importunity of men was

⁹ Justin. Novel. 123. c. 15. Sed neque cohortales, neque decuriones clerici fiunt. — Dempto si monachicam aliquis ex ipsis vitam non minus quindecim annis transegerit.

¹⁰ Conc. Aurel. l. c. 4. Nullus sæcularium ad clericatûs officium præsumatur, nisi aut cum regis jussione, aut cum judicis voluntate.

¹¹ Theodos. Novel. 26. de Corporatis Urbis Romæ, ad calcem Cod. Th.

¹² Valentin. Novel. 12. ibid.

¹³ Cod. Th. lib. 14. Tit. 4. de Suariis Leg. 8. Eos qui ad clericatûs se privilegia contulerunt, aut agnoscere oportet propriam functionem, aut ei corpori, quod declinat, proprii patrimonii facere cessionem. Vid. ibid. l. 14. Tit. 3. de Pistoribus Leg. 11. It. lib. 8. Tit. 5. de Cursu Publico Leg. 46.

¹⁴ Gothofred. Paratitlon. Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurionibus, t. 4. p. 339.

¹⁵ Theod. Novel. 38. ad calcem Cod. Th.

¹⁶ See Book V. chap. 3. sect. 15.

¹⁷ Ambr. Ep. 29. Per triginta et innumeros annos presbyteri quidam gradu functi, vel ministri ecclesiæ retrahuntur a munere sacro, et curiæ deputantur.

¹⁸ Ap. Theodor. lib. 4. c. 9. ἐκ τοῦ ἱερατικοῦ τάγματος, καὶ μὴ ἀπὸ τοῦ βουλευτηρίου καὶ στρατιωτικῆς ἀρχῆς.

¹⁹ Innoc. Ep. 4. c. 3. De curialibus manifesta ratio est, quoniam etsi inveniantur hujusmodi viri qui debeant clerici fieri, tamen quoniam sæpius ad curiam repetuntur, cavendum ab his est propter tribulationem, quæ sæpe de his ecclesiæ provenit.

²⁰ Innoc. Ep. 23. c. 6. Neque de curialibus aliquem ad ecclesiasticum ordinem venire posse, qui post baptismum vel coronati fuerint, vel sacerdotium, quod dicitur, sustinuerint, et editiones publicas celebraverint, &c.

²¹ Conc. Eliber. c. 3.

sometimes transgressed, yet the laws both of church and state always stood in force against such ordinations; and sometimes the ordainers themselves were punished with ecclesiastical censures. Of which there is a famous instance related by Sozomen,²² who says the council of Constantinople, anno 360, deposed Neonas from his bishopric for ordaining some of these curiales bishops. Sozomen indeed calls them πολιτεύόμενοι; but that is but another name for curiales, whom the Greeks otherwise term βουλευται, counsellors; and the Latins, municipes, burghers, or corporation men; and minor senatus,²³ the little senate of every city, in opposition to the great senate of Constantinople and Rome. These persons, whatever denomination they went by, were so entirely devoted to the service of the commonwealth, that till they had some way or other discharged that duty, they might not (as appears) be admitted to serve in any office of the church.

Indeed it was a general rule in this matter, as we learn from one of the councils²⁴ of Carthage, that no one was to be ordained, who was bound to any secular service. And for that reason it was decreed by the same council, at least for the churches of Africa, that no agent or factor in other men's business, nor any guardian of orphans, should be ordained, till his office and administration was perfectly expired; because the ordination of such²⁵ would otherwise turn to the reproach and defamation of the church. But if I mistake not, this prohibition did not extend to the inferior orders, but only to those whose office was to serve at the altar.

In some churches there seems also to have been an absolute prohibition and rule against ordaining advocates or pleaders at law, not only whilst they continued in their profession, but for ever after. This seems to have been the custom of the Roman and Spanish churches. For Innocent, bishop of Rome, in a letter²⁶ to the council of Toledo, complains of an abuse then crept into the Spanish church, which was, that many who were exercised in pleading at the bar, were called to the priesthood. To correct which abuse, as he deemed it, he proposed this rule to them to be observed, that no one who had pleaded causes after baptism,²⁷ should be admitted to any order of the clergy. What particular reasons the church of Rome might then have for this prohibition, I cannot say; but it does not appear, that this was the general rule of the whole catholic church. For the council of Sardica²⁸ allows a lawyer even to be ordained bishop, if he first went regularly through the offices of reader, deacon, and presbyter. Which shows, that the custom, as to this particular, was not one and the same in all churches.

The reader may find several other cautions given by Gennadius,²⁹ against ordaining any who had been actors or stage-players; or enermungens, during the time of their being possessed; or such as had married concubines, that is, wives without formality of law; or that had married harlots, or wives divorced from a former husband. But I need not insist upon these, since the very naming them shows all such persons to have been in such a state of life, as might reasonably be accounted a just impediment of ordination. It will be more material to inquire, what the ancients meant by digamy, which after the apostle they always reckoned an objection against a man's ordination? And whether any vow of perpetual celibacy was exacted of the ancient clergy, when they were admitted to the orders of the church? Which because they are questions that come properly under this head, it will not be amiss to resolve them distinctly, but briefly, in the following chapter.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE STATE OF DIGAMY AND CELIBACY IN PARTICULAR: AND OF THE LAWS OF THE CHURCH ABOUT THESE, IN REFERENCE TO THE ANCIENT CLERGY.

As to what concerns digamy, it was a primitive apostolical rule, that a bishop or a deacon should be one who was the husband of one wife only: on which rule all the laws against digamy in the primitive church were founded. But then we are to observe, that the ancients were not exactly agreed about the sense of that apostolical rule; and that occasioned different notions and different practices among them in reference to the ordination of digamists.

²² Sozom. lib. 4. c. 24.

²³ Majorian. Novel. I. ad calcem Cod. Theod. Curiales servos esse reipublicæ ac viscera civitatum nullus ignorat, quorum cætum recte appellavit antiquitas minorem senatum.

²⁴ Conc. Carth. 1. c. 9. Obnoxii alienis negotiis non ordinentur.

²⁵ Ibid. c. 8. Procuratores et actores, etiam tutores pupillorum—si ante libertatem negotiorum vel officiorum, ab aliquo sine consideratione fuerint ordinati, ecclesia infamatur.

²⁶ Innoc. Ep. 23. ad Concil. Tolet. c. 2. Quantos ex eis, qui post acceptam baptismi gratiam, in forensi exercitatione versati sunt, et obtinendi pertinaciam susceperunt, accitos ad sacerdotium esse comperimus?

²⁷ Ibid. c. 4. Ne quisquam ad ordinem debeat clericatus admitti, qui causas post acceptum baptismum egerint.

²⁸ Conc. Sardic. c. 10. εἰάν τις σχολατικός ἀπὸ τῆς ἀγορᾶς ἀξιότιο ἐπίσκοπος γίνεσθαι, μὴ πρότερον καθίσασθαι, εἰάν μὴ καὶ ἀναγνώστου καὶ διακόνου καὶ πρεσβυτέρου ὑπηρσίαν ἐκτελέσῃ.

²⁹ Gennad. de Eccles. Dogm. c. 73.

One very common and prevailing notion was, that all persons were to be refused orders, as digamists, who were twice married after baptism, though legally and successively to two wives one after another. For though they did not condemn second marriages, as sinful and unlawful, with the Novatians and Montanists; yet, upon presumption that the apostle had forbidden persons twice married to be ordained bishops, they repelled such from the superior orders of the church. That this was the practice of some churches in the time of Origen, may appear from what he says in his Comments upon St. Luke, that not only¹ fornication, but marriages excluded men from the dignities of the church: for no digamist could be either bishop, or presbyter, or deacon, or deaconess in the church. Tertullian, when he became a Montanist, laid hold of this argument, and urged it to decry second marriages in all persons; pleading² that a layman could not in decency desire licence of the ecclesiastics to be married a second time, seeing the ecclesiastics themselves, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, were but once married. Which he repeats frequently³ in several parts of his writings. And it cannot be denied but that many other ancient writers, St. Ambrose,⁴ St. Jerom,⁵ Gennadius,⁶ Epiphanius,⁷ and the councils of Agde⁸ and Carthage,⁹ put the same sense upon the words of the apostle. Only Epiphanius puts a distinction between the superior and inferior orders, making the rule in this sense obligatory to the former, but not to the latter.

Some there are again, who gave the rule a stricter exposition, making it a prohibition not only of ordaining persons twice married after baptism, but also such as were twice married before it, or once before and once after; as many Gentiles and catechumens happened to be in those times, when baptism was administered to adult persons. St. Ambrose¹⁰ was of opinion, that even these were to be excluded from ordination: and so it was decreed by Innocent, bishop of Rome,¹¹ and the council of Valencia¹² in France. But this opinion was generally rejected by others, as furthest from the sense of the apostle.

The most probable opinion is that of those ancient writers, who interpret the apostle's rule as a prohibition of ordaining polygamists, or such as had married many wives at the same time; and such as had causelessly put away their wives, and married others after divorcing of the former; which were then very common practices both among Jews and Gentiles, but scandalous in themselves, and such as the apostles would have to be accounted just impediments of ordination. This is the sense which Chrysostom¹³ and Theodoret¹⁴ propose and defend, as most agreeable to the mind of the apostle. And it is certain, that second marriages in any other sense were not always an insuperable objection against men's ordination in the Christian church. For Tertullian owns¹⁵ that there were bishops among the catholics who had been twice married; though, in his style, that was an affront to the apostle. And it appears from the letters of Siricius,¹⁶ and Innocent,¹⁷ that the bishops of Spain and Greece made no scruple to ordain such generally among the clergy; for they take upon them to reprove them for it. Theodoret, agreeably to his own notion, ordained one Irenæus bishop, who was twice married: and when some objected against the legality of the ordination upon that account, he defended it by the common practice of other churches. Herein, says he,¹⁸ I followed the example of my predecessors. Alexander, bishop of the apostolical see of Antioch, with Acacius of Bæræa, ordained Diogenes, a digamist; and Praylius ordained Dominus of Cæsarea, a digamist likewise. Proclus, bishop of Constantinople, received and approved the ordination of many such; and so do the bishops of Pontus and Palestine, among whom no controversy is made about it. From hence it appears, that the practice of the church varied in this matter; and that therefore Bellarmine and other Romanists very much abuse their readers, when they pretend that the ordination of digamists, meaning persons twice lawfully married, is both against the rule of the apos-

Sect. 3.
2. Others extended the rule to all persons twice married, whether before or after baptism.

¹ Orig. Hom. 17. in Luc. p. 228. Ab ecclesiasticis dignitatibus non solum fornicatio, sed et nuptiæ repellunt: neque enim episcopus, nec presbyter, nec diaconus, nec vidua, possunt esse digami.

² Tertul. de Monogam. c. 11. Qualis es id matrimonium postulans, quod eis, a quibus postulas, non licet habere? ab episcopo monogamo, a presbyteris et diaconis ejusdem sacramenti, &c.

³ Vid. Tertul. de Pœnitent. c. 9. De Exhort. Castitat. c. 7. Ad Uxor. lib. 1. c. 7.

⁴ Ambros. de Offic. lib. 1. c. 50.

⁵ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian. Ep. 11. ad Geront. Ep. 83. ad Ocean.

⁶ Gennad. de Eccles. Dogm. c. 72.

⁷ Epiph. Expos. Fid. n. 21.

⁸ Conc. Agathen. c. 1.

⁹ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 69.

¹⁰ Ambros. Ep. 82. ad Vercellenses.

¹¹ Innoc. Ep. 2. c. 6. Ep. 22. c. 2. Ep. 24. c. 6.

¹² Conc. Valentin. c. 1.

¹³ Chrysost. Hom. 10. in 1 Tim. iii. 2. Hom. 2. in Tit. i. 6.

¹⁴ Theod. Com. in 1 Tim. iii. 2.

¹⁵ Tertul. de Monogam. c. 12. Quot enim et digami præsidit apud vos, insultantes utique apostolo?

¹⁶ Siric. Ep. 1. ad Himer. Tarracon. c. 8.

¹⁷ Innoc. Ep. 22. ad Episc. Maced. c. 1.

¹⁸ Theod. Ep. 110. ad Domnum.

Sect. 4.
3. The most probable opinion of those, who thought the apostle by digamists meant polygamists, and such as married after divorce.

tle, and the universal consent and practice of the church.

They still more abuse their readers, in pretending that a vow of perpetual celibacy, or abstinence from conjugal society, was required of the clergy, as a condition of their ordination, even from the apostolical ages. For the contrary is very evident from innumerable examples of bishops and presbyters, who lived in a state of matrimony without any prejudice to their ordination or function. It is generally agreed by ancient writers, that most of the apostles were married. Some say, all of them except¹⁹ St. Paul and St. John: others say, St. Paul was married also, because he writes to his yoke-fellow, whom they interpret his wife, Phil. iv. 3. This was the opinion of Clemens Alexandrinus,²⁰ wherein he seems to be followed by Eusebius,²¹ and Origen,²² and the author of the interpolated Epistle²³ to the Church of Philadelphia, under the name of Ignatius; whom some modern Romanists, mistaking him for the true Ignatius, have most disingenuously mangled, by erasing the name of Paul out of the text; which foul dealing Bishop Usher²⁴ has exposed, and Cotelerius²⁵ does in effect confess it, when he owns that the author himself wrote it, and that he therein followed the authority of Clemens, Origen, and Eusebius. But passing by this about St. Paul, (which is a matter of dispute among learned men, the major part inclining to think that he always lived a single life,) it cannot be denied that others of the apostles were married: and in the next ages after them we have accounts of married bishops, presbyters, and deacons, without any reproof or mark of dishonour set upon them. As to instance in a few, Valens, presbyter of Philippi, mentioned by Polycarp;²⁶ Chæremon, bishop of Nilus, an exceeding old man, who fled with his wife to Mount Arabion in time of persecution, where they both perished together, as Eusebius informs us.²⁷ Novatus was a married presbyter of Carthage, as we learn from Cyprian's epistles.²⁸ Cyprian himself was also a married man, as Mr. Pagi²⁹ confesses. And so was Cæcilius,³⁰ the presbyter that converted him. As also Numidicus, another presbyter of Carthage, of whom Cyprian³¹ tells us this remarkable story, That in the Decian persecution he saw his own wife with many other martyrs burned by his side; whilst he himself lying half burnt, and covered with stones, and left for dead, was found expiring by his own daughter, who drew him out of the rubbish, and brought him to life again. Eusebius assures us, that Phileas,³² bishop of Thmuis, and Philoromus, had both wife and children: for they were urged with that argument by the heathen magistrate to deny their religion in the Diocletian persecution; but they generously contemned his argument, and gave preference to the laws of Christ. Epiphanius³³ says, Marcion the heretic was the son of a bishop, and that he was excommunicated by his own father for his lewdness. Domnus also, bishop of Antioch,³⁴ is said to be son to Demetrian, who was bishop of the same place before him. It were easy to add abundance more such instances; but these are sufficient to show, that men of all states were admitted to be bishops and presbyters in the primitive ages of the church.

The most learned advocates of the Roman communion have never found any other reply to all this, save only a groundless pretence of their own imagination, that all married persons when they came to be ordained, promised to live separate from their wives by consent, which answered the vow of celibacy in other persons. This is all that Pagi³⁵ or Schelstrate³⁶ have to say in the case, after all the writers that have gone before them: which is said not only without proof, but against the clearest evidences of ancient history, which manifestly prove the contrary. For Novatus, presbyter of Carthage, whose case Pagi had under consideration, was certainly allowed to cohabit with his wife after ordination: as appears from the charge that Cyprian brings against him, that he had struck and abused his wife,³⁷ and thereby caused her to miscarry; for which crime he had certainly been thrust out not only from the presbytery, but the church also, had not the persecution coming on so suddenly prevented his trial and condemnation. Cyprian does not accuse him for cohabiting with his wife, or be-

Sec. 5. No vow of celibacy required of the clergy as a condition of their ordination for the three first ages.

Sec. 6. The vanity of the contrary pretences.

¹⁹ Ambros. ad Hilar. in 2 Cor. xi. Omnes apostoli, exceptis Johanne et Paulo, uxores habuerunt. Vid. Epiphan. Hær. 78. Antidicomarianit. n. 10. Cotelerius cites Eusebius, Basil, and some others for the same opinion. Not. in Ignat. Ep. ad Philadelph. Interpolat. n. 4.

²⁰ Clem. Alex. Strom. 3. p. 418.

²¹ Euseb. lib. 3. c. 30.

²² Orig. Com. in Rom. i. p. 459. Paulus ergo (sicut quidam tradunt) cum uxore vocatus est: de qua dicit, ad Philippenses scribens: Rogo te etiam germana compar, &c.

²³ Pseudo-Ignat. Ep. ad Philadelph. n. 4.

²⁴ Usser. Dissert. in Ignat. c. 17.

²⁵ Coteler. Not. in loc.

²⁶ Polycarp. Ep. ad Philip. n. 11.

²⁷ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 42.

²⁸ Cypr. Ep. 49. al. 52. ad Cornel.

²⁹ Pagi. Crit. in Baron. ad an. 248. n. 4.

³⁰ Pontius Vit. Cyprian.

³¹ Cypr. Ep. 35. al. 40. Numidicus presbyter uxorem adhærentem lateri suo, concrematam simul cum cæteris, vel conservatam magis dixerim, lætus aspexit, &c.

³² Euseb. lib. 8. c. 9.

³³ Epiphan. Hær. 42.

³⁴ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30.

³⁵ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 248. n. 6.

³⁶ Schelstrat. Eccles. Afric. Dissert. 3. c. 4. ap. Pagi, ibid.

³⁷ Cypr. Ep. 52. al. 49. p. 97. Uterus uxoris calce percussus, et abortione properante in parricidium partus expressus, &c.

getting children after ordination; but for murdering his children which he had begotten; which was indeed a crime that made him liable both to deposition and excommunication: but the other was no crime at all by any law then in force in the African, or in the universal church. There seems indeed in some places to have been a little tendency towards introducing such a law by one or two zealous spirits; but the motion was no sooner made, but it was quashed immediately by the prudence and authority of wiser men. Thus Eusebius observes, that Pinytus, bishop of Gnossum in Crete, was for laying the law of celibacy upon his brethren: but Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, wrote to him, that he should consider the weakness of men, and not impose³⁸ that heavy burden upon them. And thus matters continued for three centuries, without any law that we read of, requiring celibacy of the clergy at the time of their ordination.

In the council of Nice, anno 325, the motion was again renewed, that a law might pass to oblige the clergy to abstain from all conjugal society with their wives, which they had married before their ordination. But the proposal was no sooner made, but Paphnutius, a famous Egyptian bishop, and one himself never married, vigorously declaimed against it; saying, So heavy a burden was not to be laid upon the clergy; that the marriage bed was honourable, and that they should not by too great severity bring detriment on the church; for all men could not bear so severe an exercise, and the chastity of the wives so separated would be endangered also. Conjugal society, he said, was chastity; and it was enough, that such of the clergy as were not married before their ordination, should continue unmarried, according to the ancient tradition of the church; but it was not proper to separate any one from his wife, which he had married whilst he was a layman. This said, the whole council agreed to stifle the motion that had been made, and left every man to his liberty as before. So Socrates³⁹ and Sozomen tell the story. To which all that Valesius⁴⁰ after Bellarmine has to say, is, that he suspects the truth of the thing, and desires leave to dissent from his historians. Which is but a poor evasion, in the judgment of Du Pin himself, who thus⁴¹ reflects upon them for it: Some question the truth of this story, says he, but I believe they do it for fear the story might prejudice the present discipline, rather than from any solid proof they have for it. But they should consider, that this canon is purely a matter of discipline, and that the discipline of the church may change according to the times, and that it is not necessary for the defence of it, to prove that it was always uniform in all places. So that in the judgment of that learned Romanist there is no question to be made, but that the council of Nice decreed in favour of the married clergy, as the historians relate it did; and that then the practice was different from that of the present church of Rome, which others are so unwilling to have the world believe.

It is as evident from other councils of the same age, that the married clergy were allowed to continue in the service of the church, and no vow of abstinence required of them at their ordination. Socrates observes, that the council of Gangra anathematized Eustathius the heretic, because he taught men to separate⁴² from such presbyters as retained their wives, which they married while they were laymen, saying, their communion and oblations were abominable. The decree is still extant among the canons of that council,⁴³ and runs in these words: If any one separate from a married presbyter, as if it were unlawful to participate of the eucharist when such a one ministers, let him be anathema. The council of Ancyra gives leave to deacons to marry after ordination; if they protested,⁴⁴ at their ordination, that they could not continue in an unmarried state, they might marry, and yet continue in their office, having, in that case, the bishop's licence and permission to do it. And though the council of Neocæsarea in one canon forbids unmarried presbyters to marry after ordination;⁴⁵ yet such as were married before ordination, are allowed by another canon to continue without any censure,⁴⁶ being only obliged to separate from their wives in case of fornication. The council of Eliberis,⁴⁷ indeed, and some others in this age, began to be a little more rigorous toward the married clergy: but it does not appear that their laws were of any great force. For Socrates⁴⁸ says, even in his time, in the Eastern churches, many eminent bishops begat children of their lawful wives; and such as abstained, did it not by obligation of any law, but their own voluntary choice. Only in Thessaly, Macedonia, and Hellas, the clergy were obliged to abstain under pain of ecclesiastical cen-

Sect. 8.
And other councils of that age.

Sect. 7.
The clergy left to their liberty by the Nicene council.

³⁸ Dionys. Ep. ad Pinytum, ap. Euseb. lib. 4. c. 23. Μη βαρὺ φορτίον τὸ περὶ ἀγνείας ἐπαυαγκὲς τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς ἐπιτιθέναι.

³⁹ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 11. Sozom. lib. 1. c. 23.

⁴⁰ Vales. Not. in Socrat. lib. 1. c. 11.

⁴¹ Du Pin, Bibliothèque, vol. 2. p. 253. Edit. Anglic.

⁴² Socrat. lib. 2. c. 43. Πρεσβυτέρου γυναῖκα ἔχοντος, ἦν νόμῳ λαϊκὸς ὧν ἠγάγετο τὴν εὐλογίαν καὶ τὴν κοινωρίαν ὡς μῦθος ἐκκλίνειν ἐκέλευε.

⁴³ Conc. Grangr. c. 4. Εἰ τις διακρίνοιτο παρὰ πρεσβυτέρου γεγαμηκός, ὡς μὴ χρῆναι λειτουργήσαντος αὐτοῦ προσφορᾶς μεταλαμβάνειν, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω.

⁴⁴ Conc. Ancyg. c. 10. Εἰ ἐμαρτύρατο καὶ ἔφασαν χρῆναι γαμήσαι, μὴ δυνάμενοι οὕτως μένειν, οὗτοι μετὰ ταῦτα γαμήσαντες ἔστανον ἐν τῇ ὑπηρεσίᾳ, &c.

⁴⁵ Conc. Neocæs. c. 1.

⁴⁶ Ibid. c. 8. ⁴⁷ Conc. Elib. c. 33. Conc. Arelat. 2. c. 2.

⁴⁸ Socrat. lib. 5. c. 22.

sure, which, he says, was occasioned by Bishop Heliodore's writing his book called his Ethiopics. So that as yet there was no universal decree against married bishops in the Greek church, much less against presbyters and deacons. But the council of Trullo, anno 692, made a difference between bishops and presbyters; allowing presbyters, deacons, and all the inferior orders, to cohabit with their wives after ordination;⁴⁹ and giving the Roman church a smart rebuke for the contrary prohibition: but yet laying an injunction upon bishops to live separate from their wives,⁵⁰ and appointing the wives to betake themselves to a monastic life,⁵¹ or become deaconesses in the church. And so the matter was altered in the Greek church, as to bishops, but not any others. In the Latin church also the alteration was made but by slow steps in many places. For in Africa even bishops themselves cohabited with their wives at the time of the council of Trullo, as appears from one of the fore-mentioned canons of that council.⁵² But it is beyond my design to carry this inquiry any further; what has been already said, being sufficient to show, that the married clergy were allowed to officiate in the first and primitive ages; and that celibacy in those times was no necessary condition of their ordination, as is falsely pretended by the polemical writers of the present church of Rome. I have now gone through the several qualifications of the ancient clergy, concerning which inquiry was made before their ordination. I come now, in the next place, to consider the solemnity of the thing itself, together with the laws and customs which were generally observed at the time of ordination.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE ORDINATIONS OF THE PRIMITIVE CLERGY, AND THE LAWS AND CUSTOMS GENERALLY OBSERVED THEREIN.

WHEN the election of a person duly qualified according to the forementioned rules was made, then it was the bishop's office, or the metropolitan's, if the party elect was himself a bishop, to ordain him. But before they proceeded to ordina-

^{Sect. 1.}
The canons of the church to be read to the clerk, before the bishop ordained him.

⁴⁹ Conc. Trull. c. 13. ⁵⁰ Ibid. c. 12.
⁵¹ Ibid. c. 48. ⁵² Ibid. c. 12.
¹ See chap. 3. sect. 2 and 14.
² Conc. Carth. 3. c. 3. Placuit, ut ordinandis episcopis vel clericis prius ab ordinatoribus suis decreta conciliorum auribus eorum inculcentur; ne se aliquid contra statuta concilii fecisse pœniteat.
³ Cod. Eccles. Afr. c. 18.
⁴ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 8. Quod in seipso fieri non debuisset, tion, there were some other laws and rules to be observed. For not to mention here again the oath against simony, and the subscriptions, which, I have showed before,¹ were anciently required of persons to be ordained; I must not forget to note, that in the African church a rule was made in the third council of Carthage,² and thence transferred into the African Code,³ that before any bishop, or other clergyman, was ordained, the ordainers should cause the canons of the church to be read in his hearing; that they might not have cause to repent afterward, that they had transgressed any of them. This rule was made at the instance and request of St. Austin, as Possidius notes in his Life,⁴ who says, that because he was ordained bishop of Hippo while Valerius was alive, which was contrary to the rule of the council of Nice, which he was ignorant of at the time of his ordination, he therefore prevailed with the African fathers to make a decree, that the canons of the church should be read at every man's ordination. This rule implied a tacit promise, that the party ordained would observe the canons that were read to him: but for greater security, it was afterward improved into an explicit promise by a law of Justinian,⁵ which requires every clerk after the reading of the canons to profess, that as far as it was possible for man to do, he would fulfil what was contained in them. Whence, no doubt, came those later forms of professing obedience to the canons of the seven general councils in the Greek church, and the oath to St. Peter taken by the bishops of Rome in the Latin church, that they would observe the decrees of the eight general councils. The first of which forms may be seen at length in Habertus,⁶ and the other in Baronius,⁷ and the book called Liber Diurnus, by the reader that is curious to consult them.

Secondly, Another rule to be observed in this case was, that every man should be fixed to some church at his ordination, and not be left at liberty to minister wherever he would, because of several inconveniences that attended that practice. This rule concerned bishops as well as the inferior clergy; for the nullatenenses of later ages, as Panormitan calls titular and Utopian bishops, were rarely known in the primitive church. For though every bishop was in some sense ordained bishop of the catholic church, as I have showed before, yet, for order's sake, he was always confined to a certain district in the ordinary

^{Sect. 2.}
No clerk to be ordained ἀπολελυμένος.

ut vivo suo episcopo ordinaretur, postea et dixit et scripsit, propter concilii universalis vetitum, quod jam ordinatus didicit: nec quod sibi factum esse doluit, aliis fieri voluit. Unde etiam satagit, ut conciliis constitueretur episcoporum, ab ordinatoribus debere ordinandis, vel ordinatis, omnium statuta sacerdotum in notitiam esse deferenda.
⁵ Justin. Novel. 6. c. 1. n. 8.
⁶ Habert. Archieratic. p. 496.
⁷ Baron. an. 869. t. 10. p. 433.

exercise of his power. And so presbyters and all other inferior clergy were confined to the diocese of their own bishop, and might not be ordained unless they had some place wherein to exercise their function. This was the ancient custom of the church, which the council of Chalcedon confirmed by a canon, that no presbyter, or deacon, or any other ecclesiastic, should be ordained⁸ at large, but be assigned either to the city church, or some church or oratory in the country, or a monastery; otherwise his ordination to be null and void. This the Latins called, ordinatio localis, and the persons so ordained, locales, from their being fixed to a certain place. As in the council of Valentia⁹ in Spain we find a canon, that obliges every priest before his ordination to give a promise, that he will be localis; to the intent that no one should be permitted to transgress the rules and discipline of the church with impunity; which they might easily do, if they were allowed to rove about from one place to another. This, in the style of Leo, bishop of Rome, is, ordination¹⁰ founded upon a place, or, as we would say now, a title; without which, he says, the ordination was not to be looked upon as authentic. But it must be observed, that a title then did not always signify a parochial church, or distinct cure; for this was a rule before dioceses were divided into parishes: but the confinement laid upon men at their ordination was, that they should be fixed to their own bishop's diocese, and officiate in the place where he appointed them.

Sect. 3.
Exceptions to this rule very rare.

There were indeed some few exceptions to this rule, but very rare, and upon extraordinary occasions.

Paulinus and St. Jerom seem to have had the privilege granted them of being ordained without affixing to any church. Paulinus says¹¹ expressly of himself, that he was ordained presbyter at Barcelona with this condition, that he should not be confined to that church, but remain a priest at large. And St. Jerom gives the same account¹² of his own ordination at Antioch, that he was consecrated presbyter, with licence to continue a monk, and return to his monastery again. Sozomen¹³ relates the like of Barses and Eulogius, two monks of Edessa, that they were both ordained bishops, not of any city, but only honorary bishops within their own monasteries, out of respect to their eminent virtues. And it was such a sort of ordination that, Theodoret¹⁴ says, Flavian, bishop of Antioch, gave to Macedonius, the famous Syrian anchoret, whom he drew from his cell in the desert, only to ordain him presbyter, and so let him return to the desert again. These are all the instances of this kind which I remember in ancient history. It was not as yet the custom to ordain bishops partibus infidelium, that never meant to see their bishoprics. Though after ages despised this rule, as Zonaras¹⁵ complains of the Greek church, and Habertus¹⁶ cannot but lament it in the Latin; yet the ancient church was more punctual in observing the laws, scarce ever ordaining either bishop or inferior clerk without fixing them to a certain diocese, from which, without the consent of their superiors, they were not to remove to any other.

Thirdly, And from hence arose a third rule about ordinations, That no bishop should ordain, or admit into his church, any clerk belonging to another church, without the consent of the bishop to whom he formerly belonged. The councils¹⁷ are very peremptory in this decree; particularly the great council of Nice,¹⁸ and that of Sardica,¹⁹ and the second of Arles,²⁰ declare all such ordinations null and void. The first council of Carthage²¹ extends the prohibition even to laymen belonging to another diocese: for it decrees, that as no clerk shall be received by another bishop without the letters dimissory of his own bishop; so neither shall any bishop take a layman out of another people, and ordain him, without the consent of that bishop out of whose people he is taken. The reason of which laws was, that every bishop was supposed to have a peculiar right in all the clergy and people of his own diocese; and it was very conducive to the peace and good order of the church to have such rules maintained and observed. Only in the African church the bishop of Carthage was allowed a privilege in this case, as he was exarch or primate of all the African provinces. For by

Sect. 4.
No bishop to ordain another man's clerk without his consent.

⁸ Conc. Chalced. c. 6. μηδένα ἀπολελυμένους χειροτονεῖσθαι—εἰ μὴ ἰδικῶς ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ πόλεως, ἢ κόμης, ἢ μαρτυρίου ἢ μοναστηρίου ἐπικηρύττοιτο.

⁹ Conc. Valentin. c. 6. Nec ullum sacerdotem quisquam ordinet, qui localem se futurum primitus non sponderit: ut per hoc nullus a regula vel disciplina ecclesie deviare permittatur impune.

¹⁰ Leo, Ep. 92. ad Rustic. c. 1. Vana est habenda ordinatio, quæ nec loco fundata est, nec auctoritate munita.

¹¹ Paulin. Ep. 6. ad Sever. p. 101. Ea conditione in Barcinonensi ecclesia consecrari adductus sum, ut ipsi ecclesie non alligarer; in sacerdotium tantum Domini, non in locum ecclesie dedicatus.

¹² Hieron. Ep. 61. ad Pammach. t. 2. p. 181.

¹³ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 34.

¹⁴ Theod. Histor. Relig. c. 13. t. 3.

¹⁵ Zonar. Not. in Conc. Chalced. c. 6.

¹⁶ Habert. Archieratic. p. 351.

¹⁷ Vid. Conc. Carthag. 3. c. 21. Conc. Chalced. c. 20. Arausican. 1. c. 8. 9.

¹⁸ Conc. Nic. c. 16. ἀκνρος ἔστω ἡ χειροτονία.

¹⁹ Conc. Sardic. c. 15.

²⁰ Conc. Arelat. 2. c. 13. Si aliquis, invito episcopo suo, in aliena ecclesia habitans, ab episcopo loci clericus fuerit ordinatus, hujusmodi ordinatio irrita habeatur.

²¹ Conc. Carth. 1. c. 5. Non licere clericum alienum ab aliquo suscipi sine literis episcopi sui, neque apud se retinere, nec laicum usurpare sibi de plebe aliena, ut eum ordinet sine conscientia ejus episcopi, de cujus plebe est.

ancient custom, confirmed by a canon in the third council of Carthage,²² which is also inserted into the African Code,²³ the bishop of Carthage is allowed to take a clerk out of another church, and ordain him for the service of any church under his jurisdiction. But an exception in his particular case confirms the rule in all the rest.

Fourthly, Another rule for the preservation of order in this affair was, that every bishop should confine himself to his own church, and not assume to himself the power of ordaining in the diocese of another man. So the council of Antioch,²⁴ and those called the Apostolical Canons²⁵ determined, that a bishop should not presume to ordain out of his own bounds, in cities or countries not subject to him. St. Austin had occasion to insist upon this rule in the case of Pinianus, when the people of Hippo required him to ordain him presbyter against his will, and threatened that, if he would not, they would have another bishop to ordain him: St. Austin told²⁶ them, that no bishop could ordain him in his church without first asking his leave and permission; and that having given him a promise, that he would not ordain him against his will, he could not in honour consent that any other bishop should come and ordain him. Soerates²⁷ says, Epiphanius took upon him to ordain a deacon in the diocese of Chrysostom at Constantinople: but Chrysostom told him, that he acted contrary to canon, in ordaining in churches that were not under his jurisdiction. Which shows, that this was a universal law, prevailing both in the Eastern and Western churches. And by the same rule, all metropolitans with their provincial bishops were confined to their own province, and might not ordain any bishop in another province, except they were invited by the bishops of that province to come and give them their assistance. Which rule was made in the general council²⁸ of Constantinople, and confirmed in the council of Ephesus,²⁹ upon the controversy that arose between the churches of Cyprus and the patriarch of Antioch, who laid claim to the power of ordinations in those churches, but was rejected in his claim, because they were out of his district, and under another jurisdiction. But it is to be observed, that these rules were only made for ordinary cases, to preserve peace and a good understanding among the bishops of the church, whilst every one acted in his proper sphere, and kept to those bounds and limits which the laws appointed. For otherwise, as I have showed heretofore,³⁰ every bishop was a bishop of the whole catholic church, and in that capacity authorized to ordain, or perform any other acts of the episcopal office, in any part of the world, upon urgent necessity and extraordinary occasions. As Athanasius and Eusebius Samosatensis did in the times of the great prevalency of the Arian heresy; ordaining bishops and presbyters in any province or diocese, (though contrary to the letter of this law,) in order to preserve the catholic faith, and a succession of orthodox men in the service of the church. So that this was only a rule for common and ordinary cases. And in Cyprus, Epiphanius³¹ says, they did not insist upon the rule at all one among another, but any bishop ordained in any other man's diocese, as occasion required, without breach of charity; for they gave a sort of general leave to one another, as finding it most expedient for the church in that province to use such a liberty among themselves; though they stiffly maintained their privilege against the encroachments of all foreign sees, and more especially that of Antioch.

The next things to be noted in this affair, are such as concern the time and place of ordination. Concerning the time, there may several inquiries be made. 1. Whether they had originally any set and constant times of ordination, as the church now has four times a year? 2. Whether Sunday was always the day of ordination? 3. Whether ordinations were always confined to morning service? As to the first inquiry, it does not certainly appear, that the church had any constant annual times of ordination before the fourth century. For Habertus truly observes,³² that then it was more usual to ordain men singly, as the present occasions of every church required. Pope Leo indeed³³ derives the jejunia quatuor temporum, the fasts of the four seasons of the year, which are now commonly called ember-weeks, from apostolical tradition. But, as Mr. Pagi,³⁴ and Quesnel,³⁵ in their censures of that author, observe, ²² Concil. Carth. 3. c. 45.

²³ Cod. Can. Afric. c. 41. Περὶ τοῦ ἐξεῖναι τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ Καρχηδόνας, ὅθεν θέλει, κλήρικον χειροτονεῖν.

²⁴ Conc. Antioch. c. 22.

²⁵ Canon. Apost. c. 35. Ἐπίσκοπον μὴ τολμᾶν ἕξω τῶν ἑαυτοῦ ὄρων χειροτονίας ποιεῖσθαι εἰς τὰς μὴ ὑποκειμένας αὐτῷ πόλεις καὶ χώρας.

²⁶ Aug. Ep. 225. ad Albinam. Dicebam ego, quibus poteram, qui ad nos in absidem honoratiores et graviore ascederant, nec a promissi fide me posse dimoveri, nec ab alio episcopo in ecclesia mihi tradita, nisi me interrogato ac permittente, posse ordinari.

²⁷ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 12 et 14. ²⁸ Conc. Constant. c. 2.

²⁹ Conc. Ephes. Act. 7. Decret. de Episc. Cypr.

³⁰ Book II. chap. 5.

³¹ Eriphan. Ep. ad Johan. Hierosolym. t. 2. p. 313. Multi episcopi communionis nostrae presbyteros in nostra ordinaverunt provincia, &c.

³² Habert. Archieratic. par. 8. Observ. 4. p. 130. Tunc singuli, et quidem rari, non vero tam multi ac hodie ordinabantur.

³³ Leo, Sermon. 2. de Jejun. Pentecost. p. 77. It. Sermon. 9. de Jejun. 7. Mensis, sive de jejunio quatuor temporum. p. 88. It. Sermon. 7.

³⁴ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 67. n. 15.

³⁵ Quesnel, ap. Pagi, ibid.

Sect. 6.
The original of the four solemn times of ordination.

there is nothing more usual with him, than to call every thing an apostolical law, which he found either in the practice of his own church, or decreed in the archives of his predecessors, Damasus and Siricius. So that, all other authors before Leo being silent upon this matter, we can lay no great stress upon his authority for it. Beside, he does not so much as once intimate, that these fasts were appointed upon the account of any set and solemn times of ordinations, but upon other more general reasons. So that it is not certain, that the church had any fixed times of ordination when Leo wrote, anno 450. And in the ages before it is more evident she had not. For as to bishops, it is certain the church never confined herself to any set times for the ordination of them; but as soon as any bishop was dead, another was chosen and ordained in his room with all convenient speed; and in some places this was done within a day or two after his decease, as has been showed in a former book.³⁶ As to presbyters and deacons, and others below them, it is evident also, that for the three first ages they were ordained at all times, as the occasions of the church required. Cyprian ordained Aurelius a reader upon the 1st of December, as Bishop Pearson³⁷ computes by the critical rules of calculation; and he ordained Saturus a reader, and Optatus a subdeacon, in the month of August;³⁸ neither of which were solemn times of ordination. Paulinus, who lived in the fourth century, was ordained on Christmas day, as he himself³⁹ informs us: yet neither was that one of the four days, which afterwards became the stated times of ordination. The Roman Pontifical, under the name of Damasus, in the life of almost every bishop, takes notice of the ordinations which they made in the Roman province, of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, during their whole life; and always the ordinations are said to be made in the month of December. Which, if that book were of any great authority, would prove, that there was one fixed time of ordination at Rome; but not four. But I confess, the credit of that book cannot much be depended upon for the history of the primitive ages one way or other; it being of much later date than the title pretends; and perhaps the author only spake of ancient things according to the custom of his own times, when one of these four times might be brought into use:

which seems to have been before the time of Simplicius, anno 467. For the Pontifical in his life⁴⁰ adds February to December; as it does also in the life of Gelasius. And in one of the decrees of Gelasius,⁴¹ there are no less than five stated times of ordination appointed, viz. June, September, December, the beginning of Lent, and the middle of Lent, and Saturday in the evening in all these times to be the precise time of ordination. Amalarius Fortunatus⁴² takes notice of the change that was made in the time of Simplicius; telling us, that all the bishops of Rome before Simplicius, made their ordinations always in the month of December, and that he was the first that ordained in February. Which, no doubt, he had from the forementioned passages of the Pontifical, which in some places speaks of one, and in others of two solemn times of ordination, but never of four: which argues, that these four were not as yet determined when that book was written, which, with the interpolations that it has now, was not till after the time of Justinian, as learned men generally agree. So that I leave it to further inquiry, whether there were any such fixed times of ordination in the church of Rome, as these authors mention, for four or five of the first centuries. In other churches we read of none, but the instances that have been produced rather prove the contrary. The inquisitive reader will be able to furnish himself with many other such instances, from which it may be concluded, that the times of ordination were not fixed for four of the first centuries, since no ancient writer within that space makes any mention of them. And therefore there is no necessity, with Baronius⁴³ and Bellarmine,⁴⁴ to make the jejunia quatuor temporum an apostolical tradition, but it is sufficient to speak of them as a useful order of the church, founded upon ecclesiastical institution some ages after.

The same must be said in answer to the second question, whether Sunday was always the day of ordination? It is evident, that for the three first centuries it was not. For Mr. Pagi has unanswerably proved⁴⁵ against Papebrochius, from the most certain rules of chronology, that before the time of Constantine the ordinations of the bishops of Rome themselves were performed in-

Sect. 7.
Ordinations indifferently given on any day of the week for three centuries.

³⁶ Book II. chap. 11. sect. 2.

³⁷ Pearson, Annal. Cypr. an. 250. n. 20. p. 25.

³⁸ Pearson, ibid. n. 15.

³⁹ Paulin. Ep. 6. ad Sever. p. 101. Die Domini, quo nasci carne dignatus est, repentina yi multitudinis—presbyteratu initiatus sum.

⁴⁰ Pontifical. Vit. Gelas. Hic fecit ordinationes in urbe Roma tres, per mensem Decembrem et Februarium.

⁴¹ Gelas. Ep. 9. ad Episc. Lucaniae, c. 11. al. 13. Ordinationes etiam presbyterorum et diaconorum nisi certis temporibus et diebus exerceri non debent, id est, quarti mensis jejunio, septimi, et decimi, sed et etiam quadragesimalis iuniti, ac mediana quadragesimae die, sabbati jejunio circa vesperam noverint celebrandas.

⁴² Amalar. de Offic. Eccl. lib. 2. c. 1. Primi apostolici semper in Decembrio mense consecrationes ministrabant usque ad Simplicium, qui fuit a B. Petro quadragesimus nonus. Ipse primus sacrauit in Febuario.

⁴³ Baron. an. 57: n. 209.

⁴⁴ Bellarm. de Verbo Dei non scripto, lib. 4. c. 3. p. 206.

⁴⁵ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 67. n. 14 et 16.

differently upon any day of the week, and that the affixing them to the Lord's day and other solemn festivals was the business of the fourth century. So that when Pope Leo⁴⁶ says, that such ordinations as were made upon other days than Sundays, were against the canons and the tradition of the fathers, he is to be understood, as before, to mean only the custom of his own times; if yet it was the custom when Leo lived: for there is some reason to doubt of the authority either of Leo's epistle, or that of Gelasius, who lived not long after. For Gelasius says,⁴⁷ the ordinations of presbyters and deacons were to be made on Saturday in the evening. So that either one of these epistles is spurious, or else the custom varied in the same century in the church of Rome.

I confess Gelasius is singular in that part of his decree, which fixes ordinations to evening service. For though the ancients were not always precise to a certain day of the year, or a certain day of the week; yet they more punctually observed the time of the day, to give ordinations at morning service. This was a very ancient rule of the church, as we may learn from the objection that was made against Novatian, that among his other irregularities he was ordained at an uncanonical hour, ὥρα δεκάτη, at ten o'clock, or four in the afternoon, as Cornelius⁴⁸ in his epistle to Fabian lays the charge against him. The council of Laodicea is still more punctual to the time, that ordinations should not be given while the hearers or catechumens⁴⁹ were present, but at the time of the oblation. The reason of which was, that the person ordained might either consecrate, or at least participate of the eucharist at the time of his ordination. Whence Theodoret, speaking of the ordination of Macedonius the anchorite, says it was done,⁵⁰ τῆς μυστικῆς ιερουργίας προκειμένης, in the time of the mystical, that is, the communion service. And so Epiphanius⁵¹ represents the ordination of Paulinianus, St. Jerom's brother, whom he ordained presbyter, whilst he ministered in the holy sacrifice of the altar. But this is to be understood chiefly, if not only, of the three superior orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons: for as to the rest, it was indifferent what time they were ordained, so long as it was in the church in any part of Divine service.

But out of the church no ordination could be regularly performed. Though there was this difference between the superior and inferior orders, that the one were conferred within the sanctuary, or altar-part, and the other without; yet they both agreed in this, that the church was still the proper place to give birth to all such orders, as were to be employed in any ecclesiastical service. And therefore Gregory Nazianzen⁵² justly upbraids Maximus the cynic, who intruded himself into his see of Constantinople, that being excluded from the church, he was ordained in the house of a minstrel. Which was also objected to Ursinus, who was competitor with Damasus for the see of Rome, that he was not ordained⁵³ in a church, but in an obscure corner of the hall called Siconia.

As to the ceremonies used in the act of ordination itself, beside what has been noted before in speaking of each particular order, it will be proper to observe some things of them in general. As, first, That the ordinations of bishops, presbyters, and deacons were always received kneeling before the altar. So the author under the name of Dionysius⁵⁴ represents the matter in his Rationale upon the church's service. And Theodoret mentions it⁵⁵ as the customary rite, when speaking of the ordination of a bishop, he says, they brought him to the holy table, and made him kneel on his knees by force.

Secondly, The solemnity itself in giving the superior orders was always performed by imposition of hands and prayer. Which is evident from St. Jerom, who says, that imposition of hands was therefore added to complete the ordinations⁵⁶ of the clergy, lest any one by a silent and solitary prayer should be ordained without his knowledge. Gregory Nyssen⁵⁷ indeed tells us a very strange story of the ordination of Gregory Thaumaturgus, how Phædimus, bishop of Amasea, ordained him only by prayer without imposition of hands: for he was absent, being fled to the wilderness, to avoid ordination: notwithstanding which Phædimus consecrated him to the bishopric of Neocæsarea, which he afterwards accepted. But as a learned man conjectures,⁵⁸ it is most likely that he had another ordination; or if not, this act must pass for a singular instance, con-

Sect. 9.
The church the only regular place of ordination.

Sect. 8.
The ceremony usually performed in the time of the oblation at morning service.

Sect. 10.
Ordination received kneeling at the altar.

Sect. 11.
Given by imposition of hands and prayer.

⁴⁶ Leo, Ep. 81. ad Dioscorum, c. 1.

⁴⁷ Gelas. Ep. 9. ad Episc. Lucan. c. 11. Ordinationes sabbati jejunio circa vesperam noverint celebrandas.

⁴⁸ Ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

⁴⁹ Conc. Laodic. c. 5. Περὶ τῆ μὴ δεῖν τὰς χειροτονίας ἐπὶ παρῳσία ἀκροαμένων γίνεσθαι.

⁵⁰ Theod. Hist. Relig. c. 13.

⁵¹ Epiphanius. Ep. ad Johan. Hierosol. Cum ministraret in sanctis sacrificiis, ordinavit presbyterum.

⁵² Naz. Carm. de Vita, p. 15. Εἰς γὰρ χορὰν λυπρὸν οἰκητήριον, κυῶν τυπῶσι τὸν κάκιστον ποιμένα.

⁵³ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 29.

⁵⁴ Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccl. c. 5. Contempl. 3. n. 7 et 8.

⁵⁵ Theod. lib. 4. c. 15.

⁵⁶ Hieron. lib. 16. in Isai. c. 58. p. 265. Χειροτονία, id est, ordinatio clericorum non solum ad imprecationem vocis, sed ad impositionem impletur manus: ne scilicet vocis imprecatio clandestina clericos ordinet nescientes.

⁵⁷ Nyssen. Vit. Greg. Thaum. t. 3. p. 544.

⁵⁸ Cave, Hist. Literar. vol. 1. p. 91.

trary to the common rule and established order of the church. The Greeks call this imposition of hands both χειροτονία, and χειροθεσία, as may be seen in the canons of the council of Nice⁵⁹ and Chalcedon. Yet sometimes those words are distinguished, as in the author of the Constitutions, where⁶⁰ he says, πρεσβύτερος χειροθετεί, οὐ χειροτονεῖ, a presbyter gives imposition of hands, but does not ordain. Where it is plain, that imposition of hands means not ordination, but some other benediction of the church, wherein imposition of hands was used, as well as in ordination. Neither does χειροτονία always signify ordination in ancient writers; though it does most commonly so, as Fronto Ducæus⁶¹ and other learned persons have showed: but sometimes it denotes no more than designation or election; as when Ignatius uses the phrase, χειροτονῆσαι Θεοπρεσβύτην,⁶² only to signify the election or appointment of a messenger to go upon an errand of the church. Which I note to caution the reader against mistakes committed by some authors, who confound ordinations with elections, for want of distinguishing the critical senses of words, as the subject matter requires.

Sect. 12.
The sign of the cross used in ordination.

I must further observe, that as the sign of the cross was used upon many occasions by the primitive Christians, so particularly in their ordinations. Which we learn from Chrysostom, who more than once mentions it upon this occasion. If, says he, we are to be regenerated, the cross is used, viz. in baptism; or if we⁶³ are to eat the mystical food, the eucharist, or to receive an ordination, we are signed with the sign of the cross. Upon this account, Suicerus⁶⁴ notes out of the author under the name of Dionysius, that the imposition of hands in ordination was called σφραγίς, consignation, and στανροειδής σφραγίς, consignation in form of a cross,⁶⁵ because the sign of the cross was made on the head of him that was ordained.

As to the ceremony of unction, I have already had occasion to show its novelty⁶⁶ in another place; together with the custom of delivering some of the holy vessels into the hands of the person ordained. Which Habertus says was never used in giving any of the superior orders, but only the inferior, by the rule of the fourth council of Carthage, which makes that the chief part of their ordination. Though Habertus⁶⁷ and some others question the authority of that very council, and reckon all its canons spurious. But that only by the way.

Sect. 13.
But no unction, or the ceremony of delivering vessels into the hands of presbyters and deacons.

When the ceremony of consecration was ended, it was usual for the clergy then present to salute the person newly ordained with the kiss of peace.⁶⁸ And so being conducted to his proper station belonging to his office, if he was a bishop or a presbyter, he made his first sermon to the people. But of this, as it relates to bishops, I have given an account before; as it relates to presbyters in the Greek church, where it was more usual for presbyters to preach, the reader may find examples of such sermons among those of Chrysostom,⁶⁹ and Gregory Nyssen,⁷⁰ which they preached upon the day of their ordination.

Sect. 14.
Ordinations concluded with the kiss of peace.

I cannot omit to mention one thing more, which should have been mentioned in another place, because it was an honour peculiarly paid to the order of bishops; which was, that in many places the day of their ordination was solemnly kept among the anniversary festivals of the church. On these days they had church assemblies, and sermons, and all the other solemnities of a festival. Which appears from St. Austin's sermons, two of which⁷¹ were preached upon the anniversary of his own ordination. And in another,⁷² published by Sirmondus, he also mentions the day under the same title of his own anniversary. In a fourth he speaks also of the anniversary of Aurelius,⁷³ bishop of Carthage, inviting the people to come and keep the festival in Basilica Fausti, which was a noted church in Carthage. Among the homilies also of Leo, bishop of Rome, the three first are upon the anniversary day of his assumption to the pontificate. And a late learned critic⁷⁴ has observed, that in St. Jerom's, and some other ancient Martyrologies, there sometimes occur such festivals under the titles of Ordinatio episcopi, and Natale episcopatus N., that is, the ordination or birth-day of such or such a bishop. Which, doubtless, at first, were the anniversaries of their ordination, which they themselves kept in their life-time; and which were continued

Sect. 15.
The anniversary day of a bishop's ordination kept a festival.

⁵⁹ Conc. Nic. c. 19. Chalced. c. 15.

⁶⁰ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 28.

⁶¹ Fronto Ducæ. Not. in Chrysost. Hom. 1. ad Pop. Antioch. p. 1.

⁶² Ignat. Ep. ad Smyrn. n. 11. It. Ep. ad Philadelph. n. 10. Ep. ad Polycarp. n. 7.

⁶³ Chrys. Hom. 55. in Matth. Καὶ ἀναγεννηθῆναι δέη, στανρός παραγίνεταί κἀν τραφήναι τῆν μυστικὴν ἐκείνην τροφήν κἀν χειροτονηθῆναι, &c.

⁶⁴ Suicer. Thesaur. Voce σφραγίς, t. 2. p. 1199.

⁶⁵ Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccl. c. 5. p. 312 et 314.

⁶⁶ Book II. chap. 19. sect. 17.

⁶⁷ Habert. Archieratic. p. 323.

⁶⁸ Dionys. Hierarch. Eccl. c. 5. p. 367. Constitut. Apost. lib. 8. c. 5.

⁶⁹ Chrys. Homil. cum Presbyter esset designatus. t. 4. p. 953.

⁷⁰ Nyssen. Hom. in suam Ordinatio. t. 2.

⁷¹ Aug. Homil. 24 et 25. ex quinquaginta.

⁷² Hom. 39. edit. a Sirmond. t. 10. p. 841.

⁷³ Hom. 32. de Verb. Domini. Dies anniversarius ordinatio Domini Senis Aurelii crastinus illucessit. Rogat et admoñet per humilitatem meam charitatem vestram, ut ad Basilicam Fausti devotissime venire dignemini.

⁷⁴ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 67. n. 14.

in memory of them after death: by which means they came to be inserted into the Martyrologies as standing festivals, denoting there neither the day of their natural birth, nor their death, (as some mistake,) but the day of their ordination, or advancement to the episcopal throne. But of this more when we come to speak of the festivals of the church.

CHAPTER VII.

THE CASE OF FORCED ORDINATIONS AND RE-ORDINATIONS CONSIDERED.

Sect. 1.
Forced ordinations
very frequent in the primitive church. FOR the close of this book I shall add something concerning forced ordinations, and re-ordinations, which were things that very often happened in the primitive church. For, anciently, while popular elections were indulged, there was nothing more common than for the people to take men by force, and have them ordained even against their wills. For though, as Sulpicius Severus complains, many men were too ambitious in courting the preferments of the church; yet there were some who ran as eagerly from them as others ran to them; and nothing but force could bring such men to submit to an ordination. We have seen an instance or two of this already, in the cases of St. Austin¹ and Paulinus: and ecclesiastical history affords us many others. For not to mention such as only fled or absconded to avoid ordination; such as Cyprian,² and Gregory Thaumaturgus,³ and Athanasius,⁴ and Evagrius,⁵ and St. Ambrose;⁶ there were some who were plainly ordained against their wills: as Nepotian, of whom St. Jerom says, that when his uncle Heliodore ordained him presbyter, he wept⁷ and lamented his condition, and could not forbear expressing his anger against his ordainer, though that was the only time he ever had occasion to do it. St. Martin, bishop of Tours, was so averse from taking the bishopric, that he was forced to be drawn out of his cell by craft, and carried under a guard to his ordination, as the sacred historian informs us.⁸ And the ordination of Macedonius the anchorite, by Flavian, bishop of Antioch, was so much against his will, that they durst not let him know what they were about, till the ceremony was over; and when he came to understand that he was ordained presbyter, he broke forth into a rage against Flavian, and all that were concerned in the action, as thinking that his ordination would have obliged him to another sort of life, and deprived him of his retirement and return to the mountains. So Theodoret, in his Lives of the Eastern Ancho- rets,⁹ relates the story. And that this was a very common practice in those times, appears from what Epiphanius¹⁰ says of the custom in Cyprus, that it was usual, in that province, for persons that fled to avoid ordination by their own bishop, to be seized by any other bishop, and to be ordained by them, and then be returned to the bishop from whom they were fled. Which argues, that forced ordinations in those times were both practised and allowed.

Nor was it any kind of remonstrance or solicitation whatsoever, which the party could make, that would prevent his ordination in such cases, except he chanced to protest solemnly upon oath against ordination. For in that case he was to be set at liberty, and not to be ordained against so solemn a protestation. This is evident, from one of the canons of St. Basil, which says, that they who swear they will not be ordained,¹¹ are not to be compelled to forswear themselves by being ordained. And this, I think, also may be collected from the account which Epiphanius gives of his own transaction with Paulinianus, St. Jerom's brother, upon such an occasion. Paulinianus, he says, was one of those who fled from their bishop for fear of ordination, but providentially coming¹² where Epiphanius was, he caused him to be seized by his deacons, not dreaming or suspecting any thing of ordination; and when he came to it, he caused them to hold his mouth, for fear he should have abjured him by the name of Christ to set him free. Thus he ordained him deacon first, and presbyter some time after in the very same manner. Which seems to imply, that if he had suffered him to have made his protestation in the name of Christ, he could not

Sect. 2.
No excuse admitted
in that case, except a man protested upon oath that he would not be ordained.

¹ See before, chap. 2. sect. 8. ² Pontius, Vit. Cyr.

³ Greg. Nyssen. Vita Greg. Thaumaturg.

⁴ Sozomen. lib. 2. c. 17.

⁵ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 23.

⁶ Paulin. Vit. Ambros.

⁷ Hieron. Ep. 3. Epitaph. Nepotian. Presbyter ordinatur. Jesu bone, qui gemitus, qui ejulatus, quæ cibi interdictio, quæ fuga oculorum omnium? Tunc primum et solum avunculo iratus est.

⁸ Sulp. Sever. Vit. St. Martin. lib. 1. p. 224. Dispositus in itinere civium turbis, sub quadam custodia ad civitatem usque deducitur, &c.

⁹ Theod. Hist. Relig. c. 13.

¹⁰ Epiph. Ep. ad Johan. Hierosol. Multi episcoporum communionis nostræ et presbyteros in nostra ordinaverunt provincia, quos nos comprehendere non poteramus, et miserunt ad nos diaconos et hypodiatonos, quos suscepimus cum gratia.

¹¹ Basil. Ep. Canon. ad Amphilocho. c. 10. Οἱ ὀμνούντες μὴ καταδέχασθαι τὴν χειροτονίαν, ἐξομνύμενοι μὴ ἀναγκάζεσθαι ἐπιτορκεῖν.

¹² Epiph. ibid. Ignorantem eum, et nullam penitus habentem suspicionem, per multos diaconos apprehendi jussimus, et teneri os ejus, ne forte liberari se cupiens, adjuraret nos per nomen Christi, &c.

have proceeded to his ordination. But it seems nothing else but such an adjuration was available to set him free: and that is a further argument, that in those times men might be ordained against their wills, and yet their ordination stand good, and be accounted as valid as any others.

But in the next age this practice was prohibited, because of several inconveniences that were found to attend it. The emperors Leo and Majorian made a law with sanctions and penalties to prevent it. For they decreed, that no one should be ordained¹³ against his will. And whereas some bishops did impose the burden of orders upon men against their consent, they granted liberty in that case, either to the party himself, or any other accuser, to bring an action at law against the archdeacon, who was liable to be fined ten pounds of gold, to be paid to the injured party, or to the informers, or to the states of the city; the bishop also was to be censured by his superiors, and the party ordained to be set at liberty, as if he had never been ordained. Pursuant to this law, John, bishop of Ravenna, for a transgression of this kind, was threatened to be deprived of the power of ordination by Simplicius,¹⁴ bishop of Rome, anno 482. And the third council of Orleans,¹⁵ anno 538, made a decree for the French churches, that if any bishop ordained a clerk against his will, he should do penance for the fact a whole year, and remain suspended from his office till that term was expired. So great an alteration was there made in one age in the rules and practice of the church, from what they had been in the former.

But I must note, that after this correction was made, there was still some difference to be observed between the forced ordination of a bishop, and that of an inferior clerk, presbyter, deacon, or any other. For though the forementioned imperial law gave liberty to all inferiors so ordained, to relinquish their office that was forced upon them, if they pleased, and betake themselves to a secular life again, yet it peremptorily denied¹⁶ this privilege to bishops, decreeing that their ordination should stand good, and that no action brought against their ordainers should be of force to evacuate or disannul their consecration. Which seems to be grounded upon that ancient rule of the church mentioned in the council of Antioch,¹⁷ and confirmed in the council of Chalcedon,¹⁸ that if any bishop was ordained to a church to which he refused to go, he should be excommunicated till he complied, or something were determined in his case by a provincial synod. Which seems to authorize the using a sort of violence in compelling men to undergo the burden of the episcopal function; agreeably to that other law of Leo and Anthemius, in the Justinian Code,¹⁹ which puts this among other qualifications of a bishop, that he shall be so far from ambition, as to be one rather that must be sought for and compelled to take a bishopric. Such were anciently the laws of church and state relating to forced ordinations.

As to re-ordinations, before we can answer to the question about them, we must distinguish between the orders that were given regularly and canonically by persons rightly qualified in the church, and such as were given irregularly by persons unqualified, or by heretics and schismatics out of the church. As to such orders as were given regularly in the church, they were supposed, like baptism, to impress a sort of indelible character, so as that there was no necessity upon any occasion to repeat them, but on the contrary, it was deemed a criminal act so to do. The third council of Carthage, following the steps of the plenary council of Capua, or Capsa, decreed, that it was equally unlawful²⁰ to re-baptize and re-ordain. And those called the Apostolical Canons²¹ make it deposition both for the ordainer and ordained to give or receive a second ordination. St. Austin²² says it was not the custom of the catholic church to repeat either orders or baptism. For men did not lose their orders,²³ as to the internal character and virtue, though they were suspended from the execution of their office for some misdemeanor. Optatus testifies the same, telling us, that Donatus was condemned in the

Sect. 4.
Yet a bishop ordained against his will, had not the privilege to relinquish.

¹³ Leo. Novel. 2. in Append. Cod. Theod. Nonnullorum persuasio sacerdotum reluctantis onus istud imponit, &c. Eo ergo licentiam hujus præsumptionis excludimus, ut si quispiam probatus fuerit vi coactus sub contumelia publica clericatus officium successisse, spontaneis accusatoribus, vel si ipse voluerit allegare peressam licentiam, commodemus apud iudices competentes hujusmodi admissa damnare, ut si inter leges objecta constiterint, decem libras auri archidiaconus cogatur inferre ei qui pertulerit exsolvendam: dehinc si ille desistit, accusatoris censibus et civitatis ordini profuturas: illo sua reddito voluntati, qui coactus non potuit consecrari, &c.

¹⁴ Simplic. Ep. 2. ad Johan. Ravennatens.

¹⁵ Con. Aurelian. 3. c. 7. Episcopus qui invitum vel reclamantem præsumperit ordinare, annuali pœnitentiæ subditus missas facere non præsumat.

¹⁶ Leo, Novel. 2. ibid. Si qui sane episcopus invitus fuerit ordinatus, hanc consecrationem nulla violari accusatione permittimus.

¹⁷ Conc. Antioch. c. 17. ¹⁸ Conc. Chalced. Act. 11.

¹⁹ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 31. Tantum ab ambitu debet esse sepositus, ut quaratur cogendus, &c.

²⁰ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 33. In Capsens plenaria synodo statutum, quod non liceat fieri rebaptizationes, et reordinationes, vel translationes episcoporum.

²¹ Canon. Apost. c. 67.

²² Aug. cont. Parmen. lib. 2. c. 13. In catholica utrumque non licet iterari.

²³ Id. de Bona Conjugal. c. 21. t. 6. Manet in illis ordinatis sacramentum ordinationis; et si aliqua culpa quisquam ab officio removeatur, sacramento Domini semel imposito non carebit, &c.

Sect. 5.
Re-ordinations generally condemned.

council of Rome under Melchiades, for re-ordaining such bishops as had lapsed in time of persecution;²¹ which was contrary to the custom of the catholic church. And others²² accuse the Arians upon the same account, for re-ordaining such of the catholic clergy as went over to their party.

There is indeed a passage in Optatus concerning Cæcilian, bishop of Carthage, which at first view seems to import as if Cæcilian had been willing to have submitted to a re-ordination. For Optatus²⁶ says, Cæcilian sent this message to the Donatist bishops, That if Felix had given him no true ordination, as they pretended, they should ordain him again, as if he were still only a deacon. But St. Austin, who perhaps best understood Cæcilian's meaning, says²⁷ he only spoke this ironically to deride them, not that he intended to submit to a second ordination, but because he was certain that Felix and the rest of his ordainers were no traditors, as they accused them. So that we have no instances of re-ordaining such as were regularly ordained in the catholic church: it being esteemed unlawful, as Theodoret²⁸ words it, to give any man the same ordination twice. Whence neither in the translation of bishops from one church to another do we ever read of a new ordination, but only of an enthronization or instalment; as of a new matriculation of presbyters and deacons, when they were taken out of one church to be settled in another. Cyprian, speaking of his admission of Numidicus into his own church from another, where he was presbyter before, does not say, he gave him a new ordination, but only²⁹ a name and a seat among the presbyters of Carthage. And this was the constant practice of the church in all such cases, for any thing that appears to the contrary.

As to such as were ordained out of the church by schismatical or heretical bishops, the case was a little different. For the church did not always allow of their ordinations, but sometimes, for discipline's sake, and to put a mark of infamy upon their errors, made them take a new ordination. This was decreed by the great council of Nice in the case of those bishops and presbyters, whom Meletius the schismatical ordained in Egypt, after he had been deposed by his metropolitan of Alexandria. They were not to be admitted to serve in the catholic church, till they were first authorized by a more sacred ordination,³⁰ as that council words it in her synodical epistle or directions to the church of Alexandria. In pursuance of this decree, Theodore, bishop of Oxyrinchus, re-ordained the Meletian presbyters upon their return to the church; as Valesius³¹ shows out of Marcellinus and Faustinus's petition to the emperor Theodosius; and other learned men³² are of the same opinion. Yet in some cases the church consented to receive schismatical bishops and presbyters without obliging them to take a new ordination. As in Africa, St. Austin³³ assures us, it was the custom to allow of the ordinations of the Donatists, and to admit them to officiate in whatever station they served before their return to the unity of the church, without repeating their ordination any more than their baptism. He repeats this in several places of his writings. And that it was so, appears both from the canons of the African councils,³⁴ and the concessions made in the collation of Carthage,³⁵ where the proposal was, that the Donatist bishops should enjoy their honours and dignities, if they would return to the unity of the catholic church. This had before been determined in the Roman council under Melchiades, where the Donatists had their first hearing. For there, St. Austin informs us,³⁶ it was also decreed, that only Donatus the author of the schism should be cashiered; but for all the rest, though they were ordained out of the church, they should be received upon their repentance, in the very same offices and quality, which they enjoyed before. So that the rigour of church discipline was quickened or abated in this respect, according as the benefit or necessities of the church seemed to require.

And the treatment of persons ordained by heretics was much of the same nature. Some canons require all such without exception to be re-

Sect. 7. Schismaticus sometimes re-ordained.

Sect. 8. And heretics also upon their return to the church, in some places.

²¹ Optat. lib. 1. p. 44. In Donatum sunt hæ sententiæ latæ: quod confessus sit se rebaptizasse, et episcôpis lapsis manum imposuisse: quod ab ecclesiâ alienum est.

²² Vid. Vales. Not. in Sozom. lib. 6. c. 26. ex Marcellin. Libel. Precum.

²⁶ Optat. lib. 1. p. 41. A Cæciliano mandatum est, ut si Felix in se, sicut illi arbitrabantur, nihil contulisset, ipsi tanquam adhuc diaconum ordinarent Cæcilianum.

²⁷ Aug. Brevic. Collat. Die 3. c. 16. Quod quidem si dictum est, ideo dici potuit ad illos deridendos, quibus hoc mandasse perhibetur, quoniam certus erat ordinatoris suos non esse traditores.

²⁸ Theod. Histor. Relig. c. 13. Οὐ δυνατόν δις τὴν αὐτὴν ἐπιτελεῖσθαι χειροτονίαν.

²⁹ Cypr. Ep. 35. al. 40. Admonitos nos et instructos sciat dignatione divina, ut Numidicus presbyter adscribatur presbyterorum Cathaginiensium numero, et nobiscum sedeat in clero.

³⁰ Ep. Synod. ap. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 9. et Theodor. lib. 1. c. 9. Μυστικώτερα χειροτονία βεβαιοθέντας, &c.

³¹ Vales. Not. in Socrat. lib. 1. c. 9.

³² Du Pin, Biblioth. Cent. 4. p. 251.

³³ Aug. cont. Parmen. lib. 2. c. 13. Si visum est opus esse, ut eadem officia gererent quæ gerebant, non sunt rursus ordinati, sed sicut baptismus in eis, ita ordinatio mansit integra, &c. Vid. cont. Crescon. lib. 2. c. 11. It. Ep. 50. p. 87. Ep. 162. p. 279.

³⁴ Cod. Can. Afr. c. 69 et 70. ³⁵ Coll. Carth. Die 1. c. 16.

³⁶ Aug. Ep. 50. ad Bonifac. p. 87. Damnato uno quodam Donato, qui author schismaticus fuisse manifestatus est, ceteros correctos, etiamsi extra ecclesiam ordinati essent, in suis honoribus recipiendos esse censuerunt.

ordained. It was so in the Greek church, at the time when those called the Apostolical Canons were made. For the same canon³⁷ that condemns re-ordinations in the church, makes an exception in the case of such as were ordained by heretics; pronouncing their ordination void, and requiring them to be ordained again. And this was generally the practice of all those churches in the third century, which denied the validity of heretical baptism; for by much stronger reason they denied their ordinations. Therefore Firmilian, who was of this opinion, tells us also, that the council³⁸ of Iconium, anno 256, decreed, that heretics had no power to minister either baptism, or confirmation, or ordination. Nay, some of those who allowed the baptism of heretics, yet still continued to condemn their ordinations. As Innocent, bishop of Rome, who determines against such as³⁹ were ordained by the Arians and such other heretics, that they were not to be admitted with their honours in the catholic church; though their baptism might stand good, being administered in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. In another place⁴⁰ he says, it was the ancient rule of the church of Rome to cancel and disannul all such ordinations; though in some places, he owns, they were allowed: for Anisius, bishop of Thessalonica, with a council of his provincial bishops, agreed to receive those whom Bonosus, an heretical bishop of Macedonia, had ordained; that they might not continue to strengthen his party, and thereby bring no small damage upon the church. Liberius not only admitted the Macedonian bishops to communion, but also allowed them to continue in their office, upon their subscription to the Nicene creed, and abjuration of their former heresy; as Socrates,⁴¹ and Sozomen,⁴² and St. Basil,⁴³ and others testify. In France, the custom was in the time of Clodoveus to give a new imposition of hands to the Arian clergy that returned to the catholic faith; as appears from the first council of Orleans, which made a decree⁴⁴ about it: but that, perhaps, does not mean a new ordination, but only such a reconciliatory imposition of hands, as was used to be given to penitents in absolution. But if otherwise, it proves that the church had different methods of proceeding in this case, as she judged it most expedient and beneficial for her service; sometimes reversing and disannulling the ordinations of heretics for discipline's sake, and to show her resentments of their errors; and sometimes allowing them to stand good for her own sake, to prevent greater scandals, and to encourage the straying people to return with their leaders to the unity of the catholic faith. Upon which account the general council of Ephesus⁴⁵ made an order concerning the Messalian heretics, otherwise called Euchites and Enthusiasts, that if any of their clergy would return to the church, and in writing anathematize their former errors, they should continue in the same station they were in before; otherwise they should be degraded, and enjoy neither clerical promotion nor communion in the church. The council of Nice is thought to have made the like decree⁴⁶ in favour of the Novatian clergy, only giving them a reconciliatory imposition of hands by way of absolution, not re-ordination. And there is nothing more certain than that the African fathers so treated the Donatists; particularly St. Austin in all his writings pleads as much for the validity of heretical ordinations, as heretical baptism; and says further, that when the church⁴⁷ judged it expedient not to suffer the Donatist bishops to officiate upon their return to the church, she did not thereby intend to deny the reality or validity of their ordination, but supposed that to remain still perfect and entire in them. And this is what St. Austin meant by the sacrament of ordination, as he words it, or the indelible character which was thereby imprinted; that though a man turned apostate, or was suspended or deprived for any crime, yet if upon his repentance and satisfaction the church thought fit to admit him to officiate again, there was no necessity of giving him a new ordination, no more than a new baptism; for the character of both remained entire. This was the doctrine and practice of the African church, and most others, in the time of St. Austin.

³⁷ Canon. Apost. c. 67.

³⁸ Firmil. Ep. 75. ap. Cyprian, p. 221. Hæretico sicut ordinare non licet, nec manus imponere, ita nec baptizare.

³⁹ Innoc. Ep. 18. ad Alexand. c. 3. Non videtur clericos eorum cum sacerdotii aut ministerii eujuspiam suscipi debere dignitate; quoniam iis solum baptisma ratum esse permittimus, &c.

⁴⁰ Id. Ep. 22. ad Episc. Macedon. c. 5. Anisii quondam fratris nostri, aliorumque consacerdotum summa deliberatio hæc fuit, ut quos Bonosus ordinaverat, ne cum eodem remanerent, ac ne fieret mediocre scandalum, ordinati reciperentur.—Jam ergo quod pro remedio ac necessitate temporis statutum est, constat primitus non fuisse.

⁴¹ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 12.

⁴² Sozom. lib. 6. c. 10.

⁴³ Basil. Ep. 74. ad Episcopos Occident.

⁴⁴ Conc. Aurel. 1. c. 12. De hæreticis clericis, qui ad fidem catholicam plena fide et voluntate venerint, id censuræ observarii—ut officium, quo eos episcopus dignos esse censuerit, cum impositæ manus benedictione suscipiant.

⁴⁵ Conc. Ephes. Act. 7. Decret. cont. Messalian. t. 3. p. 809. Si clerici fuerint, maneat clerici.—Quod si renuerint anathematizare, si presbyteri vel diaconi fuerint, vel in alio quopiam gradu ecclesiæ, excidant et a clero et a gradu et a communione.

⁴⁶ Conc. Nic. c. 8.

⁴⁷ Aug. cont. Parmen. lib. 2. c. 13. Cum expedire hoc judicatur ecclesiæ, ut præpositi eorum venientes ad catholicam societatem, honores suos ibi non administrent; non eis tamen ipsa ordinationis sacramenta detrahuntur, sed manent super eos.

BOOK V.

OF THE PRIVILEGES, IMMUNITIES, AND REVENUES OF THE CLERGY IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

SOME INSTANCES OF RESPECT WHICH THE CLERGY PAID MUTUALLY TO ONE ANOTHER.

Sect. 1.
The clergy obliged to give entertainment to their brethren, travelling upon necessary occasions.

HAVING thus far discoursed of the necessary qualifications of the clergy, and the several customs observed in the designation of them to the ministerial office; it will be proper, in the next place, to speak of the respect and honour that was generally paid them upon the account of their office. Under which head I shall comprise whatever relates to the privileges, exemptions, immunities, and revenues of the ancient clergy. Some particular marks of honour, as they were peculiar to this or that order, have already been mentioned in speaking of those orders: but now I shall treat of those which were more universal, and common to all orders. And here it will not be amiss, in the first place, to say something of that courteous treatment and friendship, wherewith the clergy of the ancient church were obliged to receive and embrace one another. Two or three instances of which it will be sufficient to observe at present. First, That wherever they travelled upon necessary occasions, they were to be entertained by their brethren of the clergy in all places, out of the public revenues of the church: and it was a sort of crime for a bishop or other clerk to refuse the hospitality of the church, and take it from any other. The historians, Socrates and Sozomen,¹ tacitly reflect upon Epiphanius for an action of this nature, that when he came to Constantinople, where Chrysostom showed him all imaginable respect and honour, sending his clergy out to meet him, and inviting him to an apartment, according to custom, in his house, he refused the civility, and took up his habitation in a separate mansion. This was interpreted the same thing as breaking catholic communion with him; as it proved in effect; for he came on purpose, by the instigations of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, to form an accusation against him. On the other hand, to deny any of the clergy the hospitality of the church upon such occasions was a more unpardonable crime, and looked upon as the rudest way of denying communion. Therefore Firmilian² smartly reproves the behaviour of Pope Stephen, both as insolent and unchristian, towards the African bishops, who were sent as legates from their churches to him, that he neither admitted them to audience himself, nor suffered any of the brethren to receive them to his house; so not only denying them the peace and communion of the church, but the civility of Christian entertainment also. Which was so much the greater despite and affront to them, because every private Christian travelling with letters of credence from his own church, might have challenged that privilege upon the contesseration of hospitality, as Tertullian³ words it; and much more the bishops and clergy from one another. By the laws of the African church, every bishop that went as legate of a provincial synod to that which they called a general or plenary synod, was to be provided of all things necessary in his travels from this liberality of the church: as appears from a canon in the third council of Carthage, which orders,⁴ that no province should send above two or three legates; that so they might appear with less pomp and envy, and be less charge to their entertainers. This implies that every church was obliged, by custom at least, to give them entertainment in their passage.

Another instance of customary respect, which the clergy were obliged to show to one another, was, that when any bishop or presbyter came to a foreign church, they were to be complimented with the honorary privilege of performing Divine offices, and consecrating the eucharist in the church. This was a very ancient custom, as appears from

Sect. 2.
And to give them the honorary privilege of consecrating the eucharist in the church.

¹ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 12. Sozom. lib. 8. c. 14.
² Firmil. Ep. 75. ap. Cypr. p. 228. Ut venientibus non solum pax et communicio, sed et tectum et hospitium negaretur.

³ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 20.

⁴ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 2. Ut et minus invidiosi, minusque hospitibus sumptuosi existant.

what Irenæus says of Anicetus, bishop of Rome, that when Polycarp came to settle the paschal controversy with him, παρεχώρησεν τὴν εὐχαριστίαν τῷ Πολυκάρπῳ,⁵ which does not barely signify, he gave him the eucharist, as the first translators of Eusebius render it; but, he gave place to him, or liberty to consecrate the eucharist in his church. The council of Arles, which turned this custom into a law, uses the very same expression about it, that in every church they should give place⁶ to the bishop that was a stranger, to offer the oblation or sacrifice. And the fourth council of Carthage more plainly, that a bishop or presbyter⁷ visiting another church, shall be received each in their own degree, and be invited to preach, and consecrate the oblation. So they were to be admitted to all the honours which the church could show them; the bishop was to seat his fellow bishop in the same throne with himself, and the presbyters to do the same by their fellow presbyter. For that the canon means by receiving them in their own degree. Which custom is referred to by the catholic bishops in the collation of Carthage,⁸ where they promise the Donatist bishops, that if they would return to the church, they should be treated by them as fellow bishops, and sit upon the same thrones with them, as strangers were used to do. The author of the Constitutions joins all these things together, saying, Let the bishop that is a stranger sit with the bishop, and be invited to preach; let him also be permitted to offer the eucharist; or if in modesty he refuses it, let him at least be constrained to give the blessing to the people.

But then it is to be observed, that these honours were not to be showed to strangers, as mere strangers, but as they could someways give proof of their orthodoxy and catholicism to the church to which they came. And in this respect the literæ systaticæ, or commendatory letters, as they called them, were of great use and service in the church. For no strange clergyman was to be admitted so much as to communicate, much less to officiate, without these letters of his bishop, in any church where he was a perfect stranger, for fear of surreptitious or passive communion, as the canons⁹ call it. And bishops were under the same obligations to take the letters of their metropolitan, if they had occasion to travel into a foreign country, where they could not otherwise be known. The third council of Carthage has a canon¹⁰ to this purpose, that no bishop should go beyond sea without consulting the primate of his province, that he might have his formate, or letters of commendation. And that the same discipline was observed in all churches, seems clear from one of those canons of the Greek church, among those which go by the name of Apostolical, which says, no strange bishops,¹¹ presbyters, or deacons shall be received ἀνευ συστατικῶν, unless they bring commendatory letters with them: but without them they shall only be provided of necessaries, and not be admitted to communicate, because many things are surreptitiously obtained. The translation of Dionysius Exiguus indeed denies them necessaries also: but that is a manifest corruption of the Greek text, which allows them to communicate in outward good things, but not in the communion of the church. And this is what some think the ancients meant by communio peregrina, the communion of strangers, when such as travelled without letters of credence, were hospitably entertained, and provided of sustenance, but not admitted to participate of the eucharist, because they had no testimonials of their life and conversation. But others give a different account of this, which I shall more nicely examine, when I come to speak of the discipline of the church, under which head the communio peregrina will come to be considered, as a species of ecclesiastical censure.

Sect. 3.
The use of the literæ formatæ, or commendatory letters in this respect.

A third instance of respect which the clergy showed to one another, was, that if any controversies happened among themselves, they freely consented to have them determined by their bishops and councils, without having recourse to the secular magistrate for justice. Bishops, as I have had occasion to show before,¹² were anciently authorized by the imperial laws to hear and determine secular pecuniary causes even among laymen, when both the litigants would agree upon compromise to take them for arbitrators: but among the clergy there needed no such particular compromise, but by the rules and canons of the church they were brought under a general obligation not to molest one another before a secular magistrate, but to end all their controversies under the cognizance of an ecclesiastical tribunal. The case was somewhat different when a layman and a clergyman had occa-

Sect. 4.
The clergy obliged to end all their own controversies among themselves.

⁵ Iren. Ep. ad Victor. ap. Euseb. lib. 5. c. 24.

⁶ Conc. Arelat. 1. c. 20. Ut peregrino episcopo locus sacrificandi detur.

⁷ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 33. Ut episcopi vel presbyteri, si causa visendæ ecclesiæ alterius episcopi, ad ecclesiam venerint, et in gradu suo suscipiantur, et tam ad verbum faciendum, quam ad oblationem consecrandam invitentur.

⁸ Collat. Carthag. Die 1. c. 16. Sicut peregrino episcopo juxta considente collega.

⁹ Conc. Carthag. 1. c. 7. Clericus vel laicus non communicet in aliena plebe sine literis episcopi sui. Nisi hoc observatum fuerit, communio fiet passiva. Vid. Conc. Laodiceen. c. 41. Conc. Antioch. c. 7. Agathens. c. 38. Chalcedon. c. 11.

¹⁰ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 28. Ut episcopi trans mare non proficiscantur, nisi consulto primæ sedis episcopo, ut ab episcopo præcipuè (leg. præcipuo) possint sumere formatam vel commendationem.

¹¹ Canon. Apost. c. 11.

¹² Book II. chap. 7.

sion to go to law together: for then the layman was at liberty to choose his court, and was not obliged to refer his cause to any ecclesiastical judge, unless by compromise he brought himself under such an obligation. For so the imperial laws¹³ in this case had provided. Though in France in the time of the Gothic kings it was otherwise: for laymen there were not to sue a clerk in a secular court without the bishop's permission; as appears from a canon of the council¹⁴ of Agde, made under Alaric, anno 506, which equally forbids a clergyman to sue a layman in a secular court, or to answer to any action brought against him there, without the bishop's permission. But whatever difference there was betwixt the Roman and Gothic laws in this particular, it is evident, that as to any controversies arising among the clergy themselves, they were to be determined before ecclesiastical judges; as appears from a canon of the council of Chalcedon, which is in these words: If any clergyman hath a controversy with another, he shall not leave his own bishop, and betake himself¹⁵ to any secular court, but first have a hearing before his own bishop, or such arbitrators as both parties should choose with the bishop's approbation. Otherwise he should be liable to canonical censure. Which censure in the African church was the loss of his place, whether he were bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or any other inferior clerk, that declined the sentence of an ecclesiastical court, either in a civil or criminal cause, and betook himself to a secular court for justice: though he carried his cause, and sentence were given on his side, in a criminal action, yet he was to be deposed; or if it was a civil cause, he must lose whatever advantage he gained by the action, as the third council of Carthage¹⁶ in this case determined, because he despised the whole church, in that he could not confide in any ecclesiastical persons to be his judges. Many other councils determined the same thing, as that of Vannes,¹⁷ Chalons,¹⁸ and Mascon.¹⁹ And the council of Milevis²⁰ decreed, that no one should petition the emperor to assign him secular judges, but only ecclesiastical,²¹ under pain of deprivation. So great confidence did the clergy generally place in one another, and pay such a deference to the wisdom, integrity, and judgment of their brethren, that it was then thought they had no need to have recourse to secular courts for justice, but they were willing to determine all controversies of their own among themselves: and as the imperial laws did not hinder this, but encourage it; so we seldom find any ecclesiastics inclined to oppose it, but either some factious and turbulent men, or such whose crimes had made them so obnoxious, that they had reason to dread an ecclesiastical censure.

I shall but observe one thing more upon this head, which is, the great care the clergy had of the reputation and character of one another; which being a sacred and necessary thing in persons of their function, they did not think fit to let it be exposed to the malicious calumnies and slanders of every base and false accuser. But first, in all accusations, especially against bishops, the testimony of two or three witnesses was required, according to the rule of the apostle. Therefore when the synod of Antioch proceeded to condemn Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, upon a single testimony, the historian censures it²² as an arbitrary proceeding in them against that apostolical canon, "Receive not an accusation against an elder, but before two or three witnesses." Secondly, The character of the witnesses was to be examined, before their testimony was to be allowed of. A heretic was not to give evidence against a bishop, as may be collected from those canons which bear the name of the Apostles', one of which joins these two things together: Receive²³ not a heretic to testify against a bishop; nor a single witness, though he be one of the faithful: for the law saith, "In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established." Athanasius pleaded the privilege of this law, when he was accused for suffering Macarius his presbyter to break the communion cup; he urged,²⁴ that his accusers were Meletians, who ought not to be credited, being schismatics, and enemies of the church. By the second council of Carthage, not only heretics, but any others that were known to be guilty²⁵ of scandalous crimes, were to be rejected from giving tes-

Sect. 5.
What care was taken in receiving accusations against the bishops and clergy of the church.

¹³ Valentin. Novel. 12. ad calcem Cod. Th. In clerico petitore consequens erit, ut secundum leges pulsati forum sequatur, si adversarius suus ad episcopi vel presbyteri audientiam non præstat adsensum.

¹⁴ Conc. Agathens. c. 32. Clericus nec quenquam præsumat apud sæcularem judicem, episcopo non permittente, pulsare. Sed si pulsatus fuerit, non respondeat, nec proponat, nec audeat criminale negotium in judicio seculari proponere.

¹⁵ Conc. Chalced. c. 9. Εἴ τις κληρικὸς πρὸς κληρικὸν πρᾶγμα ἔχει, μὴ ἐγκαταλιμπανέτω τὸν οἰκείον ἐπίσκοπον, καὶ ἐπὶ κοσμικὰ δικάστῃρια κατατρέχέτω, &c.

¹⁶ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 9. Quisquis episcoporum, presbyterorum, et diaconorum seu clericorum, cum in ecclesia ei criminis fuerit intentatum, vel civilis causa fuerit commota, si derelicto ecclesiastico judicio publicis judiciis purgari voluerit, etiamsi pro ipso prolata fuerit sententia, locum suum amittat, et hoc in criminali actione. In civili vero perdat quod evicerit, si locum suum obtinere maluerit, &c.

¹⁷ Conc. Venetic. c. 9.

¹⁸ Conc. Cabillon. c. 11.

¹⁹ Conc. Matiscon. c. 8.

²⁰ Conc. Milev. c. 19.

²¹ Conc. Milev. c. 19. Quicumque ab imperatore cognitionem judiciorum publicorum petierit, honore proprio privetur: si autem episcopale iudicium ab imperatore postulerit, nihil ei obsit.

²² Theod. Hist. lib. 1. c. 20.

²³ Canon. Apost. c. 75.

²⁴ Athan. Apol. ad Constant. t. 1. p. 731.

²⁵ Conc. Carth. 2. c. 6. Qui aliquibus sceleribus irretitus est, vocem adversus majores natu non habeat accusandi. Vid. Cod. Can. Afric. c. 8.

timony against any elder of the church. The first general council of Constantinople distinguishes the causes, upon which an accusation might be brought against a bishop: for a man might have a private cause of complaint against him, as that he was defrauded in his property, or in any the like case injured by him; in which case his accusation was to be heard, without considering at all the quality of the person or his religion. For a bishop was to keep a good conscience, and any man that complained of being injured by him, was to have justice done him, whatever religion he was of. But if the crime was purely ecclesiastical that was alleged against him, then the personal qualities of the accusers were to be examined; so that no heretics should be allowed to accuse²⁶ orthodox bishops in causes ecclesiastical; nor any excommunicate persons, before they had first made satisfaction for their own crimes; nor any who were impeached of crimes, of which they had not proved themselves innocent. The council of Chalcedon²⁷ adds, that no clergyman or layman should be admitted to impeach a bishop or a clerk, till his own reputation and character were first inquired into and fully examined. So careful were they in this matter not to expose the credit of the clergy to the malicious designs or wicked conspiracies of any profligate wretches, whom malice or bribery might induce to accuse them. Thirdly, In case of false accusation, whether public or private, the penalty against the offender was very severe. If any clergyman, says one²⁸ of the Apostolical Canons, unjustly reproach a bishop, he shall be deposed: for it is written, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people." And by a canon²⁹ of the council of Eliberis, for any man to charge a bishop, presbyter, or deacon with a false crime, which he could not make good against them, was excommunication, without hopes of reconciliation at the hour of death. Which was the usual penalty that was inflicted by that council upon very great and notorious offenders; for which some have censured the Spanish church as guilty of Novatianism, but without reason, as I shall show when I come to discourse of the discipline of the church. Here it may be sufficient to observe, that they thought this crime one of the first magnitude, since they refused to give the external peace of the church to such offenders, even at their last hour. Many other instances of the like respect might here be added, but by these few the reader will be able to judge, with what candour and civility the clergy of the primitive church were obliged to receive and treat one another. And it would have been happy for all ages, had they walked in the same steps, and copied after so good an example.

CHAPTER II.

INSTANCES OF RESPECT SHOWED TO THE CLERGY BY THE CIVIL GOVERNMENT. WHERE PARTICULARLY OF THEIR EXEMPTION FROM THE COGNIZANCE OF THE SECULAR COURTS IN ECCLESIASTICAL CAUSES.

NEXT to the respect which the clergy showed to one another, it will be proper to speak of the honours which were done them by the civil magistrates, which were more or less, according as either the inclination and piety of the emperors led them, or as the state of the times required. These honours chiefly consisted in exempting them from some sort of obligations to which others were liable, and in granting them certain privileges and immunities which others did not enjoy. Of this kind was that instance of respect, which by the laws of Justinian was granted to all bishops, that no secular judge should compel¹ them to appear in a public court to give their testimony before him, but he should send one of his officers to take it from their mouth in private. This law is also repeated in the Justinian Code,² and there said to be enacted first by Theodosius the Great, a law of whose is still extant in the same words in the Theodosian Code.³ But Gothofred will have it, that this law, as first enacted by Theodosius, meant no more than to exempt the clergy from being bound to give an account to the civil magistrates, of what judgments or sentences they passed upon any secular causes that were referred to their arbitration. And indeed it is evident, that the law terms, ad testimonium devocari, and εἰς μαρτυρίαν επικαλεῖσθαι, are taken in this sense by the African fathers in the fifth council of Carthage, where it was agreed⁴ to petition the emperors to make a decree, that if any persons referred a civil cause to the arbitration of the church, and one of the parties chanced to be displeased with the de-

Sect. 1.
Bishops not to be called into any secular court to give their testimony.

²⁶ Conc. Constant. Gen. l. c. 6.

²⁷ Conc. Chalced. c. 21.

²⁸ Canon. Apost. c. 47.
²⁹ Conc. Eliber. c. 75. Si quis episcopum, presbyterum, vel diaconum falsis criminibus appetierit, et probare non potuerit, nec in fine dandam ei communionem.

¹ Justin. Novel. 123. c. 7. Nulli iudicium licebit Deo amabiles episcopos cogere ad iudicium venire pro exhibendo testimonio; sed iudex mittat ad eos quosdam ex personis ministrantium sibi, &c.

² Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 7. Imperator Theodosius dixit, Nec honore nec legibus episcopus ad testimonium dicendum flagitetur.

³ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 39. de Fide Testium, Leg. 8.

⁴ Conc. Carth. 5. c. 1. It. Cod. Can. Afr. c. 59. Et Conc. vulgo dict. Africanum. c. 26. Petendum ut statueretur dignetur, ut si qui forte in ecclesia quamlibet causam, jure apostolico ecclesiis imposito, agere voluerint, et fortasse decisio clericorum uni parti displicuerint; non liceat clericision or sentence that was given against him; it should not be lawful to draw the clergyman, who was judge in the cause, into any secular court, to make him give any testimony or account of his determination. This was not intended to exempt clergymen in general from being called to be witnesses in a secular court, but only to free them from the prosecutions of vexatious and troublesome men, who, when they had chosen them for their arbitrators, would not stand to their arbitration, but prosecuted them in the civil courts, as if they had given a partial sentence against them: and though it was contrary to the law to give them any such trouble; because, as I have showed⁵ in another place, all such determinations were to be absolutely decisive and final without appeal; yet it is probable some secular judges in Africa might give encouragement to such prosecutions: which made the African fathers complain of the grievance, and desire to have it redressed, in the forementioned canon, to which Gothofred thinks the law of Theodosius refers. But whether the law of Theodosius be thus to be limited, is a matter that may admit of further inquiry. Gothofred himself confesses that Justinian took it in a larger sense; and that is enough for me to found this privilege of bishops upon, that they were not to be called into a secular court, to give their testimony there in any case whatsoever.

Sect. 2.
Nor obliged to give their testimony upon oath, by the laws of Justinian.

Another privilege of this kind, which also argued great respect paid to bishops, was, that when their testimony was taken in private, they were not obliged to give it upon oath, as other witnesses were, but only upon their word, as became the priests of God, laying the holy Gospels before them. For the same law of Justinian⁶ which grants them the former privilege, enacted this in their favour and behalf also. And in pursuance of that law probably the council of Tribur some ages after⁷ decreed, that no presbyter should be questioned upon oath, but instead of that only be interrogated upon his consecration; because it did not become a priest to swear upon a light cause. But it does not appear, that this indulgence was granted to bishops before the time of Justinian. For the council of Chalcedon⁸ exacted an oath in a certain case of the Egyptian bishops; and the council of Tyre⁹ required the same of Ibas, bishop of Elessa. And there are many other instances of the like nature.

Constantine the Great granted many privileges to the clergy; but there are some that go under his name, which were certainly never granted by him: as his famed donation to the bishops of Rome, which Baronius¹⁰ himself gives up for a forgery, and De Marca¹¹ and Pagi¹² prove it to be a spurious fiction of the ninth century, invented most probably by the same Isidore Mercator, who forged the decretal epistles of the ancient bishops of Rome. There are other privileges fathered upon Constantine, which though not such manifest forgeries as the former, are yet by learned men reputed of a doubtful nature; such as that which is comprised in a law under the name of Constantine¹³ at the end of the Theodosian Code, where all judges are commanded to take the single evidence of one bishop as good in law, against all others whatsoever. Gothofred is of opinion, that this whole title in the Theodosian Code is spurious; and for this law in particular, there are two arguments that seem to prove it not genuine. First, Because Constantine himself in another law says,¹⁴ the testimony of a single witness shall not be heard in any case, no, not though the witness be a senator. Secondly, Because the ecclesiastical laws, as well as the civil, require two witnesses, as has been noted in the last chapter. Which, I think, are sufficient arguments to prove, that no such extravagant privilege could be granted to bishops by Constantine: but I leave the reader to judge for himself, if he can find better arguments to the contrary.

We have better proof for another privilege that we find granted to presbyters, which was, that if any of them were called to give testimony in a public court, they should not be examined by scourging or torture, as the law directed in other cases. For by the Roman laws witnesses might be examined upon the rack in some cases, to make them declare the whole truth: as we learn not only from the laws¹⁵ themselves, but from St. Austin,¹⁶ and Synesius,¹⁷ who mentions several new sorts of

Sect. 3.
Whether the single evidence of one bishop was good in law against the testimony of many others.

Sect. 4.
Presbyters privileged against being questioned by torture, as other witnesses were.

cum in iudicium ad testimonium devocari eum, qui cognitor vel præsens (forsan præsens) fuerit. Et nulla ad testimonium dicendum ecclesiastici eujuslibet persona pulsetur.

⁵ Book II. chap. 7. sect. 3 and 4.

⁶ Justin. Novel. 123. c. 7. Propositis SS. evangelii, secundum quod decet sacerdotes, dicant quod noverint, non tamen jurent.

⁷ Conc. Tribur. c. 21. Presbyter vice juramenti per sanctam consecrationem interrogetur; quia sacerdotes ex levi causa jurare non debent, &c.

⁸ Conc. Chalced. Act. 4. t. 4. p. 518.

⁹ Conc. Tyr. in Act. 9. Concil. Chalced. p. 629.

¹⁰ Baron. an. 324. n. 118.

¹¹ Marca, de Concord. lib. 6. c. 6. n. 6.

¹² Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 324. n. 13.

¹³ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 12. de Episc. Audient. Leg. I. Testimonium etiam ab uno licet episcopo perhibito, omnes iudices indubitanter accipiant, nec alius audiatur, cum testimonium episcopi a qualibet parte fuerit repromissum.

¹⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 39. de Fide Testium, Leg. 3. Sancimus, ut unus omnino testis responsio non audiatur, etiamsi præclara curiæ honore præfulgeat.

¹⁵ Vid. Cod. Justin. lib. 9. Tit. 41. de Quæstionibus. It. Cod. Theod. lib. 13. Tit. 9. de Naufragiis, Leg. 2.

¹⁶ Aug. Serm. 49. de Divers. t. 10. p. 520.

¹⁷ Synes. Ep. 58.

torture, which Andronicus, the tyrannical prefect of Ptolemais, invented, beyond what the law directed. But now nothing of this kind could be imposed upon any presbyter of the church: for they were exempted from it by a law of Theodosius the Great, which is still extant in both the Codes,¹⁸ by which it also appears that it was a peculiar privilege granted to bishops and presbyters, but to none below them: for the rest of the clergy are excepted, and left to the common way of examination, which in other cases the law directed to be used.

But the next privilege I am to mention, was a more universal one, that extended to all the clergy; which was their exemption from the ordinary cognizance of the secular courts in several sorts of causes. To understand this matter aright, we must carefully distinguish two things. First, The different kinds of causes in which the clergy might be concerned; and, secondly, The different powers of the inferior courts from that of the supreme magistrate, who was invested with a peculiar prerogative power above them. The want of attending to which distinctions is the thing that has bred so much confusion in modern authors upon this subject, and especially in the Romish writers, many of which are intolerably partial in their accounts, and highly injurious to the civil magistrates, under pretence of asserting and maintaining the rights and liberties of the church. In the first place, therefore, to have a right understanding in this matter, we must distinguish the several sorts of causes in which ecclesiastical persons might be concerned. Now these were of four kinds. First, Such as related to matters purely ecclesiastical, as crimes committed against the faith, or canons, and discipline, and good order of the church, which were to be punished with ecclesiastical censures. Secondly, Such as related to mere civil and pecuniary matters between a clergyman and a layman. Thirdly, Such as related to political matters, as gross and scandalous crimes committed against the laws, and to the detriment of the commonwealth, as treason, rebellion, robbery, murder, and the like, which in the laws are called atrocia delicta. Fourthly, Such as related to lesser crimes of the same nature, which the law calls levia delicta, small or petty offences. Now, according to this distinction of causes, the clergy were, or were not, exempt from the cognizance of the civil courts by the laws of the Roman empire. In all matters that were purely ecclesiastical they were absolutely exempt, as Gothofred,¹⁹ the great civilian, scruples not to own. For all causes of that nature were reserved to the hearing of bishops and their councils, not only by the canons of the church, but the laws of the state also.

This may be evidenced from the rescripts of several emperors successively one after another, most of which are extant in both the Codes. Constantius, anno 355, published a law,²⁰ wherein he prohibited any accusation to be brought against a bishop before a secular magistrate; but if any one had any complaint against him, his cause should be heard and tried by a synod of bishops. This at least must signify in ecclesiastical causes; though Gothofred and some others say, it extended also to civil and criminal causes; and that though it looked like a privilege, yet it was intended as a snare to the catholic bishops, to oppress them by his Arian synods, in those times when the majority of bishops in any synod were commonly such as favoured the Arian party; and a catholic bishop might expect more favour and justice from a secular court than from them. But whether this law extended to all civil and criminal causes is not very easy to determine: thus much is certain, that if it did, it was not long after in that part revoked, whilst in the other part it stood good, and was confirmed by the laws of the succeeding emperors.

For Valentinian granted the clergy the same immunity in all ecclesiastical causes. As appears from what St. Ambrose writes to the younger Valentinian concerning his father, saying, Your father, of august memory,²¹ did not only say it in words, but enacted it into a law, that in matters of faith and ecclesiastical order they ought to judge who were qualified by their office, and of the same order. For those are the words of his rescript. That is, he would have priests to judge of priests. This law is not now extant in the Code, but there is another of Valentinian and Gratian to the same purpose; wherein it is decreed,²² that the same custom should be observed in ecclesiastical business, as was in civil ¹⁸ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 39. de Fide Testium, Leg. 10. Presbyteri citra injuriam quæstionis testimonium dicant; ita tamen ut falsa non simulent. Cæteri vero clerici, qui eorum gradum vel ordinem subsequantur, si ad testimonium dicendum petiti fuerint, prout leges præcipiunt, audiantur. Vid. Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. Leg. 8.

¹⁹ Gothofr. Comment. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 23.

²⁰ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 12. Mansuetudinis nostræ lege prohibemus in judiciis episcopos accusari. — Si quid est igitur querelarum, quod quispiam defert, apud alios potissimum episcopos convenit explorari, &c.

²¹ Ambros. Ep. 32. Augustæ memoriæ pater tuus non solum sermone respondit, sed etiam legibus suis sanxit, in causa fidei, vel ecclesiastici alicujus ordinis eum judicare debere, qui nec munere impar, nec jure dissimilis. Hæc enim verba rescripti sunt. Hoc est, sacerdotes de sacerdotibus voluit judicare.

²² Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 23. Qui mos est causarum civilium, iidem in negotiis ecclesiasticis obtinendi sunt: ut si qua sunt ex quibusdam dissensionibus, levibusque delictis, ad religionis observantiam pertinentia, locis suis, et a suæ diœceseos synodis audiantur: exceptis quæ causes: that if there arose any controversies about matters of religion, either from the dissensions of men, or other small offences, they should be heard and determined in the places where they arose, or in the synod of the whole diocese, except only such criminal actions as were reserved to the hearing of the ordinary judges, the proconsuls and prefects of every province, or the extraordinary judges of the emperor's own appointing, or the illustrious powers, viz. the praefectus-pretorio of the diocese. Here it is plain, that though criminal actions against the state-laws are excepted, yet all matters ecclesiastical were to be heard by ecclesiastical judges, and no other.

In the last title of the Theodosian Code, there is a law under the name of Theodosius the Great to the same purpose, wherein it is decreed, that no bishop,²³ or any other minister of the church, shall be drawn into the civil courts of any ordinary or extraordinary judges, about matters or causes of an ecclesiastical nature; because they have judges of their own, and laws distinct from those of the state. This law is cited in Gratian's decree, but the words, quantum ad causas ecclesiasticas tamen pertinet, are there²⁴ fraudulently left out, to serve the current doctrine and hypothesis of his own times, and make the reader believe, that the clergy anciently enjoyed an exemption not only in ecclesiastical causes, but all others. I the rather mention this corruption, because none of the correctors of Gratian have taken any notice of it. The Roman censors silently pass it over, and it has escaped the diligence of Antonius Augustinus and Baluzius also. Gothofred indeed questions the authority of the law itself; but I shall not stand to dispute that, since there is nothing in it contrary to the preceding laws, or those that followed after.

For Arcadius and Honorius continued the same privilege to the clergy, confirming the ancient laws, that whenever any cause relating to religion was debated, the bishops²⁵ were to be judges; but other causes, belonging to the cognizance of the ordinary judges, and the use of the common laws, were to be heard by them only.

Theodosius junior and Valentinian III. refer to this law of Honorius, as the standing law then in force concerning the immunities and liberties of the clergy, saying in one of their decrees, that²⁶ bishops and presbyters had no court of secular laws, nor any power to judge of other causes, except such as related to religion, according to the constitutions of Arcadius and Honorius inserted into the Theodosian Code. So that all the same laws which denied them power in secular causes, allowed them the privilege of judging in ecclesiastical causes; and the very excepting of other causes is a manifest proof, that there was no contest made about these to the time of Justinian, who confirmed the privilege which so many of his predecessors had granted before him. For in one of his Novels²⁷ we find it enacted, That all ecclesiastical crimes, which were to be punished with ecclesiastical penalties and censures, should be judged by the bishop; the provincial judges not intermeddling with them. For, saith he, it is our pleasure that such matters shall not be heard by the civil judges.

Gothofred is also of opinion,²⁸ that some of the lesser criminal causes of ecclesiastics were to be determined by the bishops and their synods likewise. For in the forementioned law of Gratian, (see before, sect. 7,) the levia delicta, or lesser crimes, are reserved to the hearing of bishops. And St. Ambrose having spoken of the decree of Valentinian, that orders all ecclesiastical causes to be judged by bishops only, adds also, that if in other respects a bishop was to be censured, and his morals²⁹ came under examination, such causes as those likewise should appertain to the episcopal judgment. Which seems to put some distinction between ecclesiastical and civil criminal causes, and reserve both to the hearing of bishops and their synods. But then, as Gothofred rightly observes, this must only be understood of lesser criminal causes: for in greater criminal actions the clergy were liable to the cognizance of the secular judges as well as all others. Which is freely owned by De Marca, and some other ingenuous writers of the Romish church. For De Marca³⁰ quits the positions of Baronius and the canonists, and confesses,

Sect. 10.
And Valentinian III. and Justinian.

Sect. 11.
The clergy also exempt in lesser criminal causes.

actio criminalis ab ordinariis extraordinariisque iudicibus, aut illustribus potestatibus audientia (leg. audienda) constituit.

²³ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 12. de Episc. Judicio, Leg. 3. Continua lege sancimus, ut nullus episcoporum, vel eorum qui ecclesiae necessitatibus serviunt, ad iudicia sive ordinariorum sive extraordinariorum iudicium (quantum tamen ad causas ecclesiasticas pertinet) pertrahatur, &c.

²⁴ Gratian. Caus. 11. Quæst. 1. c. 5.

²⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 11. de Religione, Leg. 1. Quotiens de religione agitur, episcopos convenit iudicare: cæteras vero causas, quæ ad ordinarios cognitores, vel ad usum publici juris pertinent, legibus oportet audiri.

²⁶ Valentin. Novel. 12. ad calcem Cod. Theod. Constat episcopos et presbyteros forum legibus non habere: nec de aliis causis, secundum Arcadii et Honorii divalia constituta, quæ Theodosianum corpus ostendit, præter religionem posse cognoscere.

²⁷ Justin. Novel. 83. Si vero ecclesiasticum sit delictum, egens castigatione ecclesiastica et multa, Deo amabilis episcopus hoc discernat, nihil communicantibus clarissimis provinciæ iudicibus. Neque enim volumus talia negotia omnino scire civiles iudices.

²⁸ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 23.

²⁹ Ambr. Ep. 32. Quinetiam si alias quoque argueretur episcopus, et morum esset examinanda causa, etiam hanc voluit ad episcopale iudicium pertinere.

³⁰ Marca, Dissert. in Cap. Clericus, ad calcem Antonii Au-that as it appears from the Theodosian Code, that the ecclesiastical crimes, and lesser civil crimes of the clergy, were left to the hearing of bishops, and the synods of every diocese or province; so the greater civil crimes of the clergy, which he reckons five in number, were reserved to the hearing of the public courts and civil judges; which, he says, appears from the laws published by Sirmondus in his Appendix to the Theodosian Code.

Some reckon those laws to be of Sect. 12. But not in greater criminal cases. no very great authority, and therefore I shall rather choose to confirm this position from the undoubted laws which occur in the body of the Theodosian Code. Such as that of Theodosius and Gratian, which particularly excepts these greater criminal actions,³¹ and reserves them to the hearing of the ordinary or extraordinary judges, or the præfectus-prætorio of the diocese; and those other laws of Theodosius, and Arcadius, and Honorius, and Valentinian III., which have been cited in the foregoing sections,³² and need not here be repeated. To which we may add that law of the elder Valentinian, which orders³³ all such ecclesiastics to be prosecuted in the civil courts, that were found guilty of creeping into the houses of widows and orphans, and so insinuating into their affections, as to prevail upon them to disinherit their relations, and make them their heirs. And that other law of the emperor Marcian, which in criminal causes exempts the clergy of Constantinople³⁴ from the cognizance of all inferior courts, but not from the high court of the præfectus-prætorio of the royal city. Which appears also to have been the practice at Rome. For Socrates³⁵ observes, that when, in the conflict which happened at the election of Pope Damasus, some persons were slain, many both of the laity and clergy upon that account were punished by Maximinus, who was then præfectus-prætorio at Rome. It appears further from the Novels³⁶ of Valentinian III., that in such criminal actions as those of murder, robbing of graves, or the like, bishops, as well as any other clerks, were bound to answer before the civil magistrate by their proctors. But Justinian a little enlarged the privilege with respect to bishops, making a decree,³⁷ that no one should draw a bishop in any pecuniary or criminal cause before a secular magistrate against his will, unless the emperor gave particular order to do it. This was the plain state of the matter, as to what concerned the exemption of the clergy in this sort of criminal causes, notwithstanding what Baronius or any others of that strain have said to the contrary. Nay, some ages after, such crimes as murder, theft, and witchcraft were brought before the secular judges in France, as appears from the council of Mascon,³⁸ anno 581.

The case was much the same in all Sect. 13. Nor in pecuniary causes with laymen. civil pecuniary controversies which the clergy had with laymen. For though they might end all such causes which they had one with another, in their own courts, or before a synod of bishops; and the canons obliged them so to do, as has been noted in the last chapter;³⁹ yet if their controversy happened to be with a layman, the layman was not bound to refer the hearing of his cause to an ecclesiastical court, unless he voluntarily consented by way of compromise to take some ecclesiastical persons for his arbitrators. This is evident from one of the Constitutions of Valentinian III., which says, That if the plaintiff was a layman, he might compel any clergyman, with whom he had a civil contest, to answer in a civil court, if he⁴⁰ rather chose it. And the council of Epone,⁴¹ according to the reading of Sirmond's edition, says the same, that the clergy, if they were sued in a secular court, should make no scruple to follow the plaintiff thither. But Justinian, at the instance of Mennas, patriarch of Constantinople, gustini de Emendat. Gratiani, p. 577. In Codice Theodosiano controversiæ quæ ad religionem pertinent, in quibus sunt crimina ecclesiastica, et minora delicta e civilium numero, episcopus et cujusque diocæseos sive provinciæ synodis relinquuntur: servatâ judiciis publicis atrocium criminum, quæ numero quinque, adversus clericos cognitione; ut docent leges aliquot editæ cura Sirmondi in Appendice Codicis Theodosiani.

³¹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 23. Exceptis quæ actio criminalis ab ordinariis extraordinariisque judiciis, aut illustribus potestatibus audienda constituit.

³² See sect. 8, 9, 10.

³³ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 20. Ecclesiastici—viduarum ac pupillarum domos non adeant: sed publicis exterminentur judiciis, si posthac eos affines earum vel propinquii putaverint deferendos.

³⁴ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 25. Actor in nullo alio foro, vel apud quenquam alterum judicem eosdem clericos litibus irretire, et civilibus vel criminalibus negotiis tentet innectere.

³⁵ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 29. Διὰ τοῦτο πολλοὺς λαϊκοὺς τε καὶ κληρικοὺς ὑπὸ τοῦ τότε ἐπάρχου Μαξιμίνου τιμωροῦσθαι.

³⁶ Valent. Novel. 5. de Sepulcr. Violat. ad calcem Cod. Theod. It. Novel. 12. Quam formam etiam circa episcoporum personam observari oportere censemus. Ut si in hujusmodi ordinis homines actionem pervasionis et atrocium injuriarum dirigi necesse fuerit, per procuratorem solemniter ordinatum, apud judicem publicum inter leges et jura configant.

³⁷ Justin. Novel. 123. n. 8. Sed neque ut episcopus pro pecuniaria aliqua aut criminali causa ad civilem militaremve magistratum invitus perducatur, sistaturve sine imperiali jussione concedimus.

³⁸ Conc. Matiscon. I. can. 7.

³⁹ Chap. I. sect. 4.

⁴⁰ Valent. Novel. 12. Petitor laicus, seu in civili seu in criminali causa, cujuslibet loci clericum adversarium suum, si id magis eligat, per auctoritatem legitimam in publico judicio respondere compellat.

⁴¹ Conc. Epaunens. c. II. Si pulsati fuerint, sequi ad seculare judicium non moventur. Yet note that other editions, as that of Crab and Binus, read it to a contrary sense sequi ad seculare judicium non præsumant.

granted the clergy of the royal city a peculiar privilege, that in all pecuniary matters⁴² their cause should first be brought before the bishop; and if the nature of the cause happened to be such that he could not determine it, then recourse might be had to the civil judges, but not otherwise. From all which it appears, that anciently exemptions of this nature were not challenged as matters of Divine right, but depended wholly upon the will and pleasure of Christian princes, however after ages came to put another kind of gloss upon them.

Nay, it must be observed, that even in ecclesiastical causes, a great difference was always observed between the power of the prince or supreme magistrate, and that of the subordinate and inferior judges. For though the ordinary judges were bound by the laws not to intermeddle with ecclesiastical causes; yet in some cases, the prince himself interposed and appointed extraordinary judges, and sometimes heard and decided the causes himself, or reversed the decisions of ecclesiastics by his sovereign power, which no ordinary judges were qualified to do. But this belongs to another subject, that will have a more proper place in this work, when we come to speak of the power of Christian princes.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE IMMUNITIES OF THE CLERGY IN REFERENCE TO TAXES AND CIVIL OFFICES, AND OTHER BURDENSOME EMPLOYMENTS IN THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

ANOTHER privilege which the clergy enjoyed by the favour of Christian princes, was, that in some certain cases, according to the exigence of times and places, they were exempt from some of the taxes that were laid upon the rest of the Roman empire. But whatever they enjoyed of this kind, they did not pretend to as matter of Divine right, but freely acknowledged it to be owing to the pious munificence and favour of Christian emperors. Therefore¹ Baronius does them great injustice, and is guilty of very great prevarication, in pretending that they claimed a freedom from tribute by the law of Christ; and that no emperor ever imposed any tax upon them, except only Julian the apostate, and Valens the Arian, and the younger Valentinian, who was wholly governed by his mother Justina, an Arian empress; that when St. Ambrose paid tribute under this Valentinian, he did it only out of his Christian meekness, not that he was otherwise under any obligation to have done it. How true this representation is, the reader may judge in part from the words of St. Ambrose, which are these:² If the emperor demands tribute of us, we do not deny it: the lands of the church pay tribute. We pay to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. Tribute is Cæsar's, and therefore we do not refuse to pay it. This is so far from challenging any exemption by Divine right, that it plainly asserts the contrary. As in another place he argues, that all men are under an obligation to pay tribute, because³ the Son of God himself paid it, Matt. xvii. 27. And yet Baronius cites⁴ that very passage of the evangelist to prove that the clergy are jure Divino exempt, because our Saviour says, "Then are the children free." For if, says he, the children be free, much more so are the fathers, that is, the pastors, under whose care princes are. Bellarmine is much more ingenuous in handling this question; for he asserts⁵ against the canonists, (whose opinion Baronius labours to maintain,) that the exemption of the clergy in political matters, whether relating to their persons or their goods, was introduced by human right only, and not Divine: and that, in fact, they were never exempted from any other but personal tribute, till the time of Justinian, when they were freed from taxes upon their estates and possessions also. So little agreement is there betwixt these two great cardinals of the Romish church in their accounts of this matter, either as to fact or right, that in every thing their assertions are point blank contrary to one another.

To set the matter in a clear light, it will be necessary for me to give the reader a distinct account of the several sorts of tribute that were imposed upon subjects in the Roman empire, and to show how far the clergy were concerned in each of them; which will be best done by having recourse to the Theodosian Code, where most of the laws relating to this affair are still extant. And this I shall the rather do, because Baronius makes use of the same authority, but with great partiality, dis-

⁴² Justin. Novel. 83. ¹ Baron. an. 387. t. 4. p. 538.

² Ambr. Orat. cont. Auxent. de tradend. basilicis post Ep. 32. Si tributum petit imperator, non negamus; agri ecclesiæ solvunt tributum.—Solvimus quæ sunt Cæsaris Cæsari, et quæ sunt Dei Deo. Tributum Cæsaris est, non negatur.

³ Ambr. lib. 4. in Luc. v. et ap. Gratian. Caus. 11. qu. 1.

c. 28. Si census filius Dei solvit, quis tu tantus es, qui non putes esse solvendum?

⁴ Baron. an. 387. n. 12. p. 538.

⁵ Bellarm. de Clericis, lib. 1. c. 28. Exceptio clericorum in rebus politicis, tam quoad personas, quam quoad bona, jure humano introducta est, non Divino. Hæc propositio est contra canonistas.

Sect. 14.
Of the necessary distinction between the supreme and subordinate magistrates in this business of exemptions.

Sect. 1.
No Divine right pleaded by the ancient clergy to exempt themselves from taxes.

Sect. 2.
Yet generally excused from personal taxes, or head-money.

sembling every thing that would not serve the hypothesis he had undertaken to maintain.

Now, the first sort of tribute I shall take notice of, is that which is commonly called census capitum, or personal tribute, to distinguish it from the census agrorum, or tribute arising from men's estates and possessions. That the clergy were generally freed from this sort of tribute is agreed on all hands, only Gothofred has a very singular notion about it. For he asserts⁶ that under the Christian emperors there was no such tribute as this paid by any men; so that the exemption of the clergy in this case was no peculiar privilege belonging to them, but only what they enjoyed in common with all other subjects of the Roman empire. But in this that learned man seems evidently to be mistaken. For, first, he owns there was such a tribute under the heathen emperors, from which, as Ulpian⁷ relates, none were excused, save only minors under fourteen, and persons superannuated, that is, above sixty-five: nor does he produce any law to show when or by whom that tribute was ordered to be laid aside. Secondly, Theodosius junior, the author of the Theodosian Code, makes express mention of it, when, in one of his Novels,⁸ he distinguishes betwixt the census capitum and census agrorum. Thirdly, there are several laws in the Theodosian Code, exempting the clergy from tribute, which cannot fairly be understood of any other tribute but this sort of capitation. As when Constantius grants the clergy the same immunity from tribute as minors had, he plainly refers to the old law about minors mentioned by Ulpian, and puts the clergy upon the same foot with them, granting them this privilege, that not only they themselves, but⁹ their wives and children, their men-servants and their maid-servants, should all be free from tribute; meaning personal tribute, or that sort of capitation called capitis census. After the same manner we are to understand those two laws of Valentinian,¹⁰ where he grants to devoted virgins, and widows, and orphans under twenty years of age, the same immunity from tribute, or, as it is there called, the capitation of the vulgar. As also that other law¹¹ of his, where he grants the like privilege to painters, together with their wives and children. From all which we may very reasonably conclude, that this exemption from personal taxes was not a thing then common to all, but a peculiar privilege of some certain arts and professions, among which the most honourable was that of the clergy.

This may be further confirmed from an observation or two out of Gregory Nazianzen and Basil. Nazianzen, in one of his epistles¹² to Amphilocheus, complains, that the officers of the government had made an illegal attempt upon one Euthalius a deacon, to oblige him to pay taxes: therefore he desires Amphilocheus not to permit this injury to be done him; since otherwise¹³ he would suffer a hardship above other men, not being allowed to enjoy the favour of the times, and the honour which the emperors had granted to the clergy. Here he plainly refers to some immunity from tribute, which the imperial laws granted particularly to the clergy; which could not be any exemption of their estates from tribute, for there was no such law then in force to be appealed to: it must therefore mean their exemption from personal taxes, from which they were freed by the laws of Valentinian and Constantius already mentioned. This will still receive greater light and confirmation from the testimony of St. Basil, who had occasion to make a like complaint to Modestus, (who was præfectus-prætorio Orientis under Valens,) of some who had infringed the privilege of the clergy in exacting tribute of them against the laws. The ancient way of taxing, says he, excused such as were consecrated to God,¹⁴ presbyters and deacons, from paying tribute: but now they who are set over this affair, pretending to have no warrant from your Eminency to excuse them, have taxed them all, except such as could claim a privilege from their age. Therefore his request to him was, συχχωρηθήναι κατά τὸν παλαιὸν νόμον τῆς συντελείας τοῦς ἱερατεύοντας, that the clergy might be exempt from tribute according to the ancient laws. St.

⁶ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 1. de Annon. et Tribut. Leg. 15. It. Com. in lib. 13. Tit. 10. de Censu, Leg. 4.

⁷ Digest. lib. 50. Tit. 15. de Censibus, Leg. 3. Quibusdam ætas tribuit, ne tributo onerentur. Veluti in Syriis a quatuordecim annis masculi, a duodecim feminæ usque ad sexagesimum quintum annum tributo capitis onerentur.

⁸ Theodos. Novel. 21.

⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 10 et 14. Clericis ac juvenibus præbeatur immunitas—Quod et conjugibus et liberis eorum et ministeriis majoribus pariter ac feminis indulgemus; quos a censibus etiam jubemus perseverare immunes.

¹⁰ Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 10. de Censu, Leg. 4. In virginitate perpetua viventes, et eam viduam de qua ipsa maturitas pollicetur ætatis nulli jam eam esse nupturam, a plebeie capitationis injuria vindicandas esse decernimus: item pupillos in virili sexu usque ad viginti annos ab istius-modi functione immunes esse debere; mulieres autem donec virum unaquæque sortitur. Ibid. Leg. 6. Nulla vidua, nemo pupillus exactionem plebis agnoscat, &c.

¹¹ Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 4. de Excusat. Artific. Leg. 4. Picturae professores, si modo ingenui sunt, placuit, neque sui capitisensione, neque uxorum, aut etiam liberorum nomine, tributis esse munificos.

¹² Naz. Ep. 159. Διαγράφειν ἐπιχειροῦσι χρυσὸν οἱ τῆς ἡγεμονικῆς τάξεως.

¹³ Ibid. Δεινότερα ἂν πάσῳ, μόνος ἀνθρώπων μὴ τυγχάνων τῆς τῶν καιρῶν φιλανθρωπίας, καὶ τῆς δεδομένης τοῖς ἱερατικοῖς παρὰ τῶν βασιλείων τιμῆς.

¹⁴ Basil. Ep. 279. ad. Modest. Τοὺς τῷ Θεῷ ἱερωμένους, πρεσβυτέρους καὶ διακόνους ὁ παλαιὸς κῆρυξ ἀτελεῖς ἀφῆκεν· οἱ δὲ σὺν ἀπογραφήμενοι, ὡς οὐ λαβόντες παρὰ τῆς ὑπερφουδῶς σου ἔξουσίας πρόσταγμα, ἀπεγυράψαντο, πλὴν εἰ μὴ που τινὲς ἄλλως εἶχον ὑπὸ τῆς ἡλικίας τῆ ἀφῆσει.

Basil in this passage refers to two sorts of laws exempting persons from tribute; the one, those ancient laws of the heathen emperors, which only excused minors and superannuates from personal tribute; the other, those laws of Constantius and Valentinian, which exempted the clergy also, granting them that immunity which only minors enjoyed before. And this is the thing he complains of, that the clergy were not allowed the benefit of Christian laws, but only those laws of the heathen emperors, whereby, if they chanced to be minors or superannuated, that is, under twenty, or above sixty-five, they were excused, but not otherwise. From all which it evidently appears, that the clergy might claim a peculiar privilege by the laws to be exempted from personal tribute, and that this was not common to all the subjects of the empire, whatever Gothofred and Pagi¹⁵ from him have suggested to the contrary.

Sect. 3.
But not excused for their lands and possessions.

The next sort of tribute was that which was exacted of men for their lands and possessions, which goes by several names in the civil law and ancient writers. Sometimes it is called καρῶν, as by Athanasius,¹⁶ where he complains how he was unjustly accused of imposing a tax upon Egypt for the use of the church of Alexandria. So in the Theodosian Code¹⁷ there is a whole title, De canone frumentario urbis Romæ, which signifies the tribute of corn that was exacted of the African provinces for the use of the city of Rome. It is otherwise called jugatio, from juga, which, as Gothofred notes,¹⁸ signifies as much land as a yoke of oxen could plough in a year: and, because the taxation was made according to that rate, it had, therefore, the name of jugatio and juga. It has also frequently the name of capitatio and capita: and because men's servants and cattle were reckoned into their taxable possessions as well as their lands, therefore, in some laws¹⁹ the one is called capitatio terrena, and the other capitatio humana et animalium, or animarum descriptio. These taxes were usually paid three times a year, once every four months; whence Sidonius Apollinaris²⁰ styles them tria capita, or the monster with three heads, which he desired the emperor Majorianus to free him from, that he might live and subsist the better: for thus he addresses himself to him in his poetical way:

Geryones nos esse puta, monstrumque tributum:
Hic capita, ut vivam, tu mihi tolle tria.

In which words, which none of the commentators rightly understood, he refers to a law²¹ of Valentinian's, and several others in the Theodosian Code, where this sort of tribute is required to be paid by three certain portions in a year, or once in four months, which, in his phrase, is the tria capita, or monster with three heads. The collectors of this tax were also hence called cephaleotæ, collectors of the capitation,²² in some laws of the Theodosian Code. And because this tribute was commonly paid in specie, as in corn, wine, oil, iron, brass, &c., for the emperor's service, therefore it is often called specierum collatio. And, being the ordinary standing tax of the empire, it is no less frequently styled indictio canonica,²³ in opposition to the superindicta et extraordinaria, that is, such taxes as were levied upon extraordinary occasions. I have noted these things here all together, that I may not be put to explain the terms at every turn hereafter, as I have occasion to make use of them, which are indeed a little uncommon, and not easily understood, but by such as are conversant in the civil law.

Now to the question in hand, whether the clergy in general were exempt from this ordinary canonical tribute laid upon men's goods and possessions? I answer in the negative, against Baronius, who asserts the contrary. Some particular churches, indeed, had special favours granted them by indulgent princes, to exempt them from all tribute of this kind: but those very exceptions prove, that what was matter of grace to some particular churches, could not be the common privilege of all churches. Theodosius junior granted a special exemption to the church of Thessalonica, that she should pay no capitation for her own estate,²⁴ provided she did not take other lands into her protection, to the detriment of the commonwealth, under the pretence of an ecclesiastical title. He also allowed the churches of Constantinople and Alexandria the same privilege,²⁵ upon the like condition, that they should not take any villages, great or small, into ¹⁵ Pagi, Crit. in Baron. an. 353. n. 10.

¹⁶ Athan. Apol. 2. p. 778. Ὡς ἐμὲ καρῶνα τοῖς Αἰγυπτίοις ἐπιβάλλοντος, &c.

¹⁷ Cod. Th. lib. 14. Tit. 15.

¹⁸ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Theod. lib. 13. Tit. 10. de Censu, Leg. 2. p. 118. Ego juga putem dicta terræ modum, cui colendo per annum jugo boum opus est.

¹⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 20. de Conlat. Donat. Leg. 6.

²⁰ Sidon. Carm. 13. ad Majorian.

²¹ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 1. de Annona et Tribut. Leg. 15. Unusquisque annonarias species, pro modo capitationis et sortium, præbiturus, per quaternos menses anni curriculo distributo, tribus vicibus summam conlationis implebit.

²² Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 24. de Patrocin. Vicor. Leg. 5.

²³ Cod. Th. lib. 6. Tit. 26. de Proximis Comitib. &c. Leg. 14.

²⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 1. de Annona et Tribut. Leg. 33. Sacrosancta Thessalonicensis ecclesia civitatis excepta: ita tamen ut aperte sciat, propriæ tantummodo capitationis modum beneficio mei numinis sublevandum: nec externorum gravamine tributorum rempublicam ecclesiastici nominis abusione lædendam.

²⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 24. de Patrocin. Vicorum, Leg. 5. Quicquid ecclesiæ venerabiles, (id est, Constantinopolitana et Alexandrina,) possidisse deteguntur, id pro intuitu religionis ab his præcipuis firmiter retineri: sub ea videlicet their patronage, to excuse them from paying their ancient capitation. Gothofred is also of opinion, that in the beginning of Constantine's reign, while the church was poor, and her standing revenues but small, her estates and possessions were universally excused from tribute: for there is a law in the Theodosian Code which may be interpreted to this purpose; though the words are so obscure,²⁶ that, without the help of so wise an interpreter, one would hardly find out the sense of them. However, admitting them to signify such a privilege, it is certain it lasted not many years: for in the next reign, under Constantius, when the church was grown pretty wealthy, all the clergy that were possessed of lands, were obliged to pay tribute, in the same manner as all others did: as appears from a law of Constantius, directed to Taurus, præfectus-prætorio, which is still extant in both the Codes.²⁷ This is further evident from the testimony of Valentinian, who, in an epistle to the bishops of Asia, recorded by Theodoret,²⁸ says, all good bishops thought themselves obliged to pay tribute, and did not resist the imperial power. And thus matters continued to the time of Honorius, and Theodosius junior, in one of whose laws²⁹ the church lands are still made liable to this ordinary or canonical tribute, as it is there worded, though excused from all other. So little reason had Baronius to assert with that confidence, that no prince, except Julian the apostate, and Valens the Arian, and the younger Valentinian, who was under the conduct of an Arian woman, ever exacted any tribute of the clergy; whenas it appears, that every emperor after Constantine did exact it; and Baronius could not be ignorant of this, having viewed and perused the Theodosian Code, where these things are recorded.

If in any thing of this tribute they were exempt, it must be from the obligation some provinces lay under to furnish the emperors with new soldiers, called tirones, and fresh horses for the wars, which, because they were exhibited by way of tribute, they are called in the law equi canonici, from the civil law term canon, and canonica, which, as I observed before, signifies the tribute that was laid upon men's lands and possessions. Sometimes this tribute was exacted in money instead of horses, and then it was called³⁰ equorum canonicorum adæratio, horse-money: in like manner as the sum that was paid instead of the tirones was called aurum tironicum, et stratioticum, soldiers' money, which we find mentioned in Synesius, where, speaking³¹ of Andronicus, governor of Ptolemais, he says, He set one Thoas to collect this aurum tironicum, which the editor by mistake says was so called, quia solvebatur tironibus, because it was paid to the tirones, whereas indeed it was the money that was paid instead of the tirones by way of tribute into the treasury of the empire. Now, that some bishops, at least in Africa, were excused from this tribute, is concluded by some learned men from a law³² of Theodosius junior, which excuses certain persons from it under the title of sacerdotales in the proconsular Africa, and that because they were otherwise obliged to be at great expenses in that province. But now the question is, who are meant by the name sacerdotales. The learned Petit³³ says it denotes Christian bishops; and if so, the case would be clear as to their exemption: but Gothofred rather inclines³⁴ to think it means the high priests among the heathens, who were still in being, and obliged by their office to be at great expenses in exhibiting the ludi sacerdotales to the people. I will not venture to decide so nice a dispute betwixt two such learned men, but think, however, I may safely infer even from Gothofred's notion, that if the Christian emperors were so liberal to the heathen high priests, they would at least be as liberal to their own bishops, and grant them the same immunity. But I leave this matter to further inquiry.

Sect. 4.
Of the tribute called, aurum tironicum, equi canonici, &c.

One thing is more certain, that whatever burdens any lands were originally encumbered with, they were liable to the same even after their do-

Sect. 5.
The church obliged to such burdens as lands were tied to before their donation.

sorte, ut in futurum functiones omnes quæ metrocomiæ debent, et publici vici pro antiquæ capitationis professione debent, sciant subeundas.

²⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 1. de Annon. et Tribut. Leg. 1. Præter privatas res nostras, et ecclesias catholicas, et domum clarissimæ memoriæ Eusebii ex-consule, et Arsacis regis Armeniorum, nemo ex nostra jussione præcipuis emolumentis familiaris juvetur substantiæ.

²⁷ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 15. De his sane clericis qui prædia possident, sublimis auctoritas tua non solum eos aliena juga nequaquam statuet excusare, sed etiam his quæ ipsi possident eodem ad pensitanda fiscalia perurgeri: universos namque clericos possessores duntaxat provinciales pensitationes recognoscere jubemus. Vid. Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. Leg. 3.

²⁸ Theod. lib. 4. c. 8. Ἐὰν δημόσια κατὰ νόμους εἰσκομίζων ἴσασι, καὶ οὐκ ἀντιλέγουσι τῇ τοῦ κρατοῦντος ἐξουσίᾳ.

²⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 40. Nihil præter canonicam inlationem—ejus functionibus adscribatur.

³⁰ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 17. de Equor. Conlat. Leg. 3. Equos canonicos militaris dioceseos Africanæ—jussimus adærari, &c.

³¹ Synes. Ep. 79. ad Anastas. p. 293. Ταῖς ἀπαιτήσεσιν ἔταξε τοῦ στρατιωτικοῦ χρυσίου τοῦ καλουμένου Τιρωνικοῦ.

³² Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 13. de Tironibus, Leg. 22. Præcipimus proconsularis provinciæ non eandem sacerdotium, quæ est de cæteris, in præbendis tironibus habendam esse rationem: non inique siquidem ea potissimum ab hoc officio provincia videtur excepta, quæ omnium intra Africam provinciarum obtinet principatum, cujusque majoribus fatigantur expensis.

³³ Petit. Variar. Lection. lib. 3. c. 1. p. 28.

³⁴ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. 7. Tit. 13. Leg. 22.

nation to the church, unless discharged of them by some particular grant and favour of the emperors. This we learn from a memorable instance in a particular case wherein St. Austin was concerned, the account of which we have from his own relation. For the right understanding of which I must first acquaint the reader, that by the laws of the Roman polity many times a company of tradesmen were so incorporated into a society for the service of the empire, that their estates were tied to that office and duty, so that whoever had the propriety of them, he was bound to the duty annexed to them. Thus it was particularly with the incorporated company of the navicularii of Africa and Egypt, who were concerned in transporting the yearly tribute of corn from those provinces to Rome and Constantinople. Their estates were tied to the performance of this service, as appears from a title in the Theodosian Code,³⁵ which is De prædiis naviculariorum: and they were so tied, that if any ship chanced to be lost in the passage, the whole body was obliged to make good the effects to the emperor's coffers; and the master of the ship was obliged³⁶ to give up his men that escaped the shipwreck, to be examined by torture afterwards; otherwise he must have borne the whole burden himself alone, on presumption that he was guilty of some fraud in the matter against the rest of his society. Now it happened while St. Austin was bishop of Hippo, that one of these navicularii, Boniface, a master of a ship, left his whole estate to the church; which yet St. Austin refused to receive, because of these burdens that lay upon it. For, says he,³⁷ I was not willing to have the church of Christ concerned in the business of transportation. It is true indeed there are many who get estates by shipping; yet there is one temptation in it, if a ship should chance to go and be lost, then we should be required to give up our men to the rack, to be examined by torture according to law about the drowning of the ship, and the poor wretches that had escaped the waves must undergo a new severity from the hands of the judge: but we could not thus deliver them up; for it would not become the church so to do. Therefore she must answer the whole debt to the exchequer. But whence should she do this? For our circumstances do not allow us to keep a treasury. A bishop ought not to lay up gold in bank, and meanwhile refuse to relieve the poor. These words of St. Austin do plainly evince what has been observed, that the donation of an estate to the church did not ordinarily free it from the tribute or duty, that the public otherwise demanded of it; but if the church would receive it, she must take it with the usual burdens that lay upon it. I confess, indeed, the sense of the passage, as it lies in St. Austin without a comment, is not very easy to be understood; nor have any of his editors, no, not the last Benedictins, thought fit to expound it; but for that reason, as well as to make good my own observation, I have recited it in this place, and explained it from those laws and customs of the empire, to which it manifestly refers. And such a digression, if it were a digression, I presume would not be unacceptable to the curious reader.

But now to proceed. Another sort of tribute, in which the clergy had some concern, was the tax upon trade and commerce. This in ancient writers³⁸ is known by the name of χρυσάργυρον, chrysargyrum, the silver and gold tax, because it was paid in those coins. Zosimus³⁹ indeed makes the chrysargyrum another thing, viz. a scandalous tax exacted of lewd men and women; and in his spite to Christianity he represents Constantine as the author of it; in which his groundless calumny he is abundantly refuted by Baronius,⁴⁰ and more especially by the learned Gothofred, and Pagi,⁴¹ whom the curious reader may consult. Here I take the chrysargyrum in the common notion only, for the tax upon lawful trade and commerce, which St. Basil calls⁴² πραγματευτικὸν χρυσίον, commerce-money. In the civil law it is known by the name of lustralis collatio, the lustral tax, because it was exacted at the return of every lustrum, or four years' end. It was indeed a very grievous tax, especially upon the poor; for not the meanest tradesman was exempted from it. Evagrius⁴³ says it was exacted even of those who made begging their trade, ἐξ ἐράνου τὴν τροφήν πορίζουσι. Whence Libanius⁴⁴ calls it the intolerable tax of silver and gold, that made men dread the terrible pentaeteris, or return of every fifth year. And for the same reason, as the author under the name of St. Austin takes notice, it

Sect. 6.
Of the chrysargyrum, or lustral tax, and the exemption of the clergy from it.

³⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 6.

³⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 9. de Naufragiis, Leg. 2. Si quando causatio est de impetu procellarum, medium ex his nautis numerum navicularius exhibeat questionem—Quo eorum tormentis plenior veritas possit inquiri.

³⁷ Aug. Serm. 49. de Diversis. t. 10. p. 520. Bonifacii hæreditatem suscipere nolui; non misericordia, sed timore. Navicularium nolui esse ecclesiam Christi. Multi sunt quidem qui etiam de navibus acquirunt: tamen una tentatio est, si iret navis et naufragaret, homines ad tormenta daturi eramus, et de submersione navis secundum consuetudinem quæretur: et torquerentur a iudice qui essent a fluctibus liberati: sed non eos daremus: nullo enim pacto hoc facere deceret ecclesiam. Onus ergo fiscale persolveret. Sed unde persolveret? Enthecam nobis habere non licet, &c.

³⁸ Evagr. Hist. Eccles. lib. 3. c. 39.

³⁹ Zosim. lib. 2.

⁴⁰ Baron. an. 330. n. 36.

⁴¹ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 1. de lustrali Collatione, Leg. 1. Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 330. n. 6.

⁴² Basil. Ep. 213.

⁴³ Evagr. lib. 3. c. 39.

⁴⁴ Liban. Orat. 14. cont. Florent. t. 2. p. 427. Φόρος ἀφόρητος, ἀργυρος καὶ χρυσὸς, φρίττειν προσιοῦσας ποιῶν τὰς δεινὰς πενταετηρίδας.

was commonly called, aurum pannosum,⁴⁵ the poor man's tax, or, as some editions read it, aurum pennisum, the cruel tax, because it was exacted of the poor. But now a particular respect was paid to the church in this matter; for when her revenues were scanty, and not sufficient to give all the clergy a decent maintenance, the inferior orders, the clerici, were allowed to traffic to support themselves, without paying any tribute of this nature. This indulgence was first granted by Constantius without any restriction, That if any of them⁴⁶ was minded to follow a calling to maintain themselves, they should be freed from custom. But, that none of them might abuse this privilege to covetousness, they were confined afterwards by several laws to trade within a certain sum, which if they exceeded, they were to pay custom for it. This appears from a second law of the same Constantius,⁴⁷ and another of Gratian's,⁴⁸ where the Italian and Illyrican clerici are confined to the sum of ten solids, and the Gallican to fifteen. Yet if any would trade further, only with a charitable design, to raise funds and Monte-Pio's for the use of the poor, they were allowed by two⁴⁹ other laws of Constantius to employ what sums they pleased, and pay none of this tribute for them. It is to be noted further, that this immunity was granted by Honorius to the catholic clergy only,⁵⁰ and to no others. And the privilege was esteemed so great, that some covetous tradesmen would use means to get themselves admitted to a titular office among the inferior clergy of the church, with no other design but to enjoy this immunity, and to follow their trade without paying the lustral duty. Against whose fraudulency and corruptions the emperor Arcadius made a severe law,⁵¹ commanding all such, if they followed their merchandise, to be deprived of this immunity of the clergy; or if they would devote themselves to the sacred service, then they should abstain from all such fraudulent and crafty ways of gain: for, saith he, the wages of religion and craft are very different from one another. And for this reason, probably, when the revenues of the church were become sufficient to maintain all the clergy, Valentinian III.⁵² enacted a law, that none of the clergy should negotiate as formerly; otherwise they should come under the cognizance of the secular judges, and not enjoy the privilege of the clergy. Evagrius⁵³ adds, that the emperor Anastasius quite abolished the chrysargyrum, or lustral tax, itself; and that is the reason why there is no mention at all made of it afterward in the Justinian Code.

Another sort of duty incumbent on the subjects of the empire, was the burden and charge of giving entertainment to the emperor's court and retinue, when they had occasion to travel; or to the judges, or soldiers, as they passed from one place to another. This the civil law calls metatum,⁵⁴ and the Greeks μῆταρον, from the word, metatores, which signifies the emperor's harbingers or forerunners, which were sent before to provide lodging and entertainment for them. In allusion to which, Cyprian,⁵⁵ speaking of Rogatian, an eminent presbyter of Carthage, who was the first martyr that was sent to prison in the Decian persecution, says, he was metator to the rest, their harbinger, that went before them to prepare a place in prison for them. And in the same sense Lucian, the martyr in Cyprian, elegantly styles Decius himself⁵⁶ metatorem antichristi, the harbinger of antichrist, who by that terrible persecution made preparation for his coming into the world. From this notion of the word, metator, that duty of yielding entertainment to the emperor's retinue, &c. has the name of metatum in the two Codes of the civil law. But the clergy were

Sect. 7.
Of the metatum.
What meant thereby, and the exemption of the clergy from it.

⁴⁵ Aug. Quæst. Vet. et Nov. Test. c. 75. Didrachma capitum vel tributis exactio intelligitur; quod nunc pannosum aurum appellatur, quia et pauperes exiguntur.

⁴⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 8. Si qui de vobis alimonie causa negotiationem exercere volunt, immunitate potientur. It. Cod. lib. 13. Tit. 1. de lustrali Collatione, Leg. 1. Negotiatores omnes protinus convenit aurum argentumque præbere: clericos excipi tantum, (et) qui copiatæ appellantur, nec alium quenquam esse immunem.

⁴⁷ Ibid. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 15. Clerici vero, vel hi quos copiatas recens usus instituit nuncupari, ita a sordidis muneribus debent immunes atque a collatione præstari, si exiguis admodum mercimoniis tenuem sibi victum vestitumque conquirent.

⁴⁸ Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 1. de lustrali Collat. Leg. 11. Etsi omnes mercatores spectat lustralis auri depensio, clerici tamen intra Illyricum et Italiam in denis solidis; intra Galliam in quinque denis solidis immunem hunc conversationis exerceant. Quicquid autem supra hunc modum negotiationis versabitur, id oportet ad functionem aurariam devocari.

⁴⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 10.

Negotiatorum dispendiis minime obligentur (clerici), cum certum sit, quæstus quos ex tabernaculis (leg. tabernis) atque ergasteriis colligunt, pauperibus profuturos. Ibid. Leg. 14. Si quid mercatura congesserint, in usum pauperum atque egentium ministrari, oportet, &c.

⁵⁰ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 36. Catholica religionis clerici, — ab auraria pensione habeantur immunes.

⁵¹ Ibid. lib. 13. Tit. 1. de lustrali Collat. Leg. 16. Omnes corporatos — præcipimus conveniri, ut aut commoda negotiatorum sequentes, a clericorum excusatione discedant: aut sacratissimo numini servientes, versutis quæstibus abstinant; distincta enim stipendia sunt religionis et calliditatis.

⁵² Valentin. Novel. 12. ad calcem Cod. Theod. Jubemus ut clerici nihil prorsus negotiationis exerceant. Si velint negotiari, scient se iudicibus subditos, clericorum privilegio non muniti.

⁵³ Evagr. lib. 3. c. 39.

⁵⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 8. de Onere Metati. Cod. Justin. lib. 12. Tit. 41. de Metatis.

⁵⁵ Cypr. Ep. 81. al. 6. edit. Oxon. Primum hospitium vobis in carcere præparavit, et metator quodammodo vester nunc quoque vos antecedit.

⁵⁶ Lucian. ap. Cypr. Ep. 20. al. 22.

excused from this by a law of Constantius,⁵⁷ where he says they should not be obliged to entertain strangers; by which he cannot be supposed to excuse them from the Christian duty of hospitality to the indigent, but from this civil duty of the Roman state, to which other subjects were obliged. Whence Gothofred⁵⁸ very truly observes, that the clergy in this respect had equal privileges with senators' houses, and Jewish synagogues, and Christian churches; all which were exempt from this duty of entertaining. And if the Greek collector of the ecclesiastical constitutions out of the Code, published by Fabrotus, mistake not, this immunity extended to their servants also. For he says⁵⁹ neither the clergy nor their servants were subject to any new impositions, or to this burden called the metatum.

And hence it appears further, that they were freed from all exactions which went by the name of superindicta, and extraordinaria, that is, such impositions as the emperors thought necessary to lay upon the empire, or any part of it, beyond the ordinary canonical taxes, upon great exigencies and extraordinary occasions. For as the ordinary taxes were called indictions, so these extraordinary were called superindictions.⁶⁰ From these the clergy were universally exempted by several laws of Christian emperors. As by that of Constantius⁶¹ in the Theodosian Code, where he refers to a preceding law to the same purpose. According to the decree, says he, which you are said to have obtained heretofore, no one shall impose any new taxes upon you or your servants, but you shall enjoy a perfect immunity in that respect. Gothofred upon the place says, by this law they were freed from all extraordinary tribute, and only bound to the ordinary and canonical taxes. And so it was in the time of Honorius and Theodosius junior, anno 412, when by a law granting many other privileges to the church relating to her possessions, they insert this among the rest, that no extraordinary tribute or superindiction, but only the common⁶² canonical tax, should be required of her. Which was finally confirmed by Justinian,⁶³ and made the standing law of the Roman empire.

As to some other duties and burdens, the laws a little varied: for sometimes the clergy were exempted, and sometimes not; as particularly in the case of contributing to the maintenance and reparation of public ways and bridges. By the forementioned law of Honorius, anno 412, all church lands are excused⁶⁴ from those duties, and it is called an injury to bind them to any contribution toward them. Yet not long after, anno 423, Theodosius junior made a law for the Eastern empire, which excepts no order of men from bearing a share in this matter, but obliges as well his own possessions (called domus divinæ, in the style and language of those times) as churches⁶⁵ to take their proportion in it. And about the same time Valentinian III. made a law⁶⁶ to the same effect in the West. Justinian confirmed the law of Theodosius, by inserting it⁶⁷ into his Code, and added another law of his own among his Novels, where,⁶⁸ though he grants the clergy an immunity from extraordinary taxes, yet he adds, that if there was occasion to make a way, or build or repair a bridge, then churches as well as other possessors should contribute to those works, if they had possessions in any city where such works were to be done.

The laws varied likewise in another instance of duty required of the subjects, which was to furnish out horses and carriages for conveying of corn for the soldiers, and such other things as belonged to the emperor's exchequer. This duty in the civil law⁶⁹ goes by the name of cursus publicus, and angarie, and parangarie, and translatio, and vectio;

Sect. 9.
The clergy sometimes exempt from contributing to the reparation of high-ways and bridges.

Sect. 10.
As also from the duty called angarie, and parangarie, &c.

⁵⁷ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 8. Prætearea neque hospites suscipietis.

⁵⁸ Gothofred. Paratitlon ad Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 8. de Onere Metati, t. 2. p. 264. Immunes erant a metato clerici, senatorum domus, synagogæ Judæorum, et religionum loca. ⁵⁹ Collat. Constit. Eccles. ex Cod. lib. 1. Tit. 3. sect. 1. Οἱ κληρικοὶ καὶ τὰ ἀνδράποδα αὐτῶν οὐχ ὑποκεινται καινῆς εἰσφορᾷς ἢ μετὰτοις.

⁶⁰ Vid. Cod. Theod. lib. 11. Tit. 6. de Superindicto, et Cod. Justin. lib. 10. Tit. 18. de eodem.

⁶¹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 8. Juxta sanctionem quam dudum meruisse perhibemini, et vos et mancipia vestra nullus novis collationibus obligavit (id est, obligabit,) sed vacatione gaudebitis. Gothofred. in loc. Ab extraordinariis collationibus immunes facti fuerunt, at nondum ab ordinariis et canonicis.

⁶² Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 40. Nihil extraordinarium ab hac superindictitiumve flagitetur.—Nihil præter canonicam inlationem ejus functionibus ascribitur.

⁶³ Justin. Novel. 131. c. 5. Sancimus omnium sanctorum ecclesiarum possessiones, neque sordidas functiones, neque extraordinarias descriptiones sustinere.

⁶⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 40. Nullam jugationem, quæ talium privilegiorum sorte gratulatur, muniendi itineris constringat injuria.—Nulla pontium instauratio; nulla translationum sollicitudo gignatur.

⁶⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 15. Tit. 3. De Itin. muniendo, Leg. 6. Ad instructiones reparationesque iterum pontiumque nullum genus hominum—cessare oportet. Domos etiam divinas, ac venerandas ecclesias tam laudabili titulo libenter adscribimus.

⁶⁶ Valentin. Novel. 21. ad calcem Cod. Th.

⁶⁷ Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 2. Leg. 7.

⁶⁸ Just. Novel. 131. c. 5. Si tamen itineris sternendi aut pontium ædificii vel reparationis opus fuerit, ad instar aliorum possessorum, hujusmodi opus et sanctas ecclesias et venerabiles domos complere, dum sub illa possident civitate, sub qua tale fit opus.

⁶⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 8. Tit. 5. de Cursu Publico, Angariis, et Parangariis. Cod. Justin. lib. 12. Tit. 51.

and the horses used in this service are particularly called paraveredi, and equi cursuales. Now, the clergy at first were exempt from this service by two laws of Constantius,⁷⁰ made in the former part of his reign, which expressly excuse both their persons and their estates from the duty of the parangarie. But by another law made in the last year of his reign, anno 360, he revoked this privilege, obliging the clergy to the duty of translation, as it is there worded,⁷¹ by which he means this duty of furnishing horses and carriages for the emperor's service. And this he did, notwithstanding that the council of Ariminum had petitioned for an immunity, being at a time when Constantius was displeased with them. However, this law continued in force, not only under Julian, but under Valentinian and Theodosius, till by a contrary⁷² law about twenty years after, anno 382, they restored the clergy to their ancient privilege. Which was further confirmed to them by Honorius, anno 412, whose law is still extant⁷³ in both the Codes. Yet Theodosius junior and Valentinian III., anno 440, took away their privilege again, and by two laws⁷⁴ made church lands liable to these burdens of the angarie, parangarie, &c., (whenever the emperor should be upon any march or expedition,) as well as all others. From all which it appears, that there was no certain rule observed in this matter, but the clergy had or had not this privilege, according as the state of affairs would bear, or as the emperors were inclined to grant it.

Besides these public taxes and duties, there was also one private tax, from which all lands given to the church, or to any charitable use, were exempt by the laws of the empire.

This, in the civil law, is called denarismus, or uncia,

Sect. 11.
Of the tribute called denarismus, uncia, and descriptio lucratorum: and the church's exemption from it.

and descriptio lucratorum. The reason of which names will be understood by explaining the nature of the tribute. It was a sort of tax paid, not to the emperors, but to the curia or curiales of every city, that is, to that body of men who were obliged, by virtue of their estates, to be members of the court or common council, and bear the offices of their country. Now, it sometimes happened, that one of these curiales left his estate to another that was not of the curia; and an estate so descending was said to come to him ex causa lucrativa, which being opposed to causa onerosa, is when a man enjoys an estate by gift or legacy, and not by purchase. But now, lest in this case the giving away an estate from the curia might have brought a greater burden upon the remaining part of the curiales, the person so enjoying it was obliged to pay an annual tribute to the curia of the city, which, from the nature of his tenure, was called descriptio lucratorum, the lucrative tax. And because every head of land, every jugum or caput, as the law terms it, was obliged to pay annually a denarius, or ounce of silver, therefore the tax itself was called uncia, and denarismus: as in the laws of Theodosius M.,⁷⁵ cited in the margin. Theodosius junior and Valentinian III. made this tax double, laying four siliquæ,⁷⁶ which is two ounces of silver, upon every head of land. According to which rate, every possessor who held any estate by the aforesaid tenure, was obliged to pay tribute out of it to the curia of the city to which it belonged. But if any such estate was given to the church, it was exempt from this tribute, if not before, yet at least in the time of Justinian. For there are two laws of his to this purpose,⁷⁷ the one in his Code, the other in his Novels, in both which such lands as any of the curiales gave to a church, or a monastery, or hospital of any kind, ⁷⁰ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 10. Parangarium quoque parili modo (a clericis) cesset exactio. Ibid. Leg. 14. Ad parangarium quoque præstationem non vocentur, nec eorundem facultates atque substantiæ.

⁷¹ Cod. Th. ibid. Leg. 15. Ut præterea ad universa munia sustinenda, translationesque faciendas, omnes clerici debeant adtineri.

⁷² Cod. Theod. lib. 11. Tit. 16. de Extraord. et Sordidis Muner. Leg. 15. Circa ecclesias, rhetores, atque grammaticos eruditionis utriusque, vetusto more durante.—Ne paraveredorum hujusmodi viris aut parangariarum præbitio mandetur, &c.

⁷³ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 40. Nulla translationum sollicitudo gignatur, &c. al. signetur, as it is in the Justin. Code, lib. 1. Tit. 2. de Sacrosanct. Eccl. Leg. 5.

⁷⁴ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 2. Leg. 11. Neminem ab angariis, vel parangariis, vel plaustris, vel quolibet munere excusari præcipimus, cum ad felicissimam expeditionem nostri numinis, omnium provincialium per loca, qua iter arripimus, debeant solita nobis ministeria exhiberi: licet ad sacrosanctas ecclesias possessiones pertineant. It. lib. 12. Tit. 51. de Cursu Publico, Leg. 21. Nullus penitus cujus-libet ordinis seu dignitatis, vel sacrosancta ecclesia, vel domus regia tempore expeditionis excusationem angariarum seu parangariarum habeat.

⁷⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurionibus, Leg. 107. Quicumque hæres curiali—vel si quem liberalitas locupletaverit forte viventis, quos a curiæ nexu conditio solet dirimere, sciant, pecuniariis descriptionibus—ad denarismum sive uncias, sese auctoris sui nomine retinendum. It. Leg. 123. ibid.

⁷⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 4. de Imponenda Lucrativis Descriptione, Leg. unic. Hi qui ex lucrativa causa possessiones detinent, quæ aliquando curialium fuerint, pro singulis earum jugis et capitibus quaternas siliquas annuæ (leg. annuas) ordinibus nomine descriptionis exsolvant.

⁷⁷ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 2. de Sacrosanct. Eccles. Leg. 22. Sancimus res ad venerabiles ecclesias, vel xenones, vel monasteria, vel orphanotrophia, vel gerontocomia, vel ptochotrophia, &c., descendentes ex quacunque curiali liberalitate—a lucratorum inscriptionibus liberas immunesque esse.—Cur enim non faciamus discrimen inter res Divinas et humanas? Id. Novel. 131. c. 5. Si que vero res ex curialium substantiis ad quamlibet sacrosanctam ecclesiam, aut aliam venerabilem domum secundum leges venerunt, aut postea venerint, liberas eas esse sancimus descriptione lucratorum.

are particularly excepted from this lucrative tax; and that pietatis intuitu, as it is there worded, in regard to religion, and because it was fit to put some difference between things human and Divine. But whether the church enjoyed this immunity under any other prince before Justinian, is what I leave the curious to make the subject of a further inquiry; whilst I proceed to consider another sort of immunity of the clergy, which was their exemption from civil offices in the Roman empire.

Of these offices some were personal, and others predial, that is, such as were tied to men's estates and possessions: some, again, were called honores, honourable offices; and others, munera sordida, mean and sordid offices. Now, from all these, as well patrimonial as personal, honourable as well as sordid, by the first laws of Constantine the clergy were universally and entirely exempt: but after ages made a little distinction as to such of the clergy who enjoyed patrimonial secular estates of their own, distinct from those of the church: for such of the clergy were sometimes forced to leave their ecclesiastical employment, and bear the civil offices of the empire; of which more by and by. But as to offices which were purely personal, the clergy were entirely exempt from them; as appears from a law of Valentinian and Gratian,⁷⁸ still extant in both the Codes, where every order of the clergy, not only presbyters and deacons, but subdeacons, exorcists, readers, door-keepers, and acolythists, are specified as exempt from personal offices. And that is the meaning of that law of Constantius, mentioned both by Athanasius,⁷⁹ and Socrates,⁸⁰ and Sozomen,⁸¹ where they say he granted the clergy of Egypt ἀλειουργησίαν, and ἀτέλειαν λειτουργημάτων, exemption from such offices as had been forced upon them in the Arian persecution.

Again, for those called sordid offices, not only the persons of the clergy, but the estates of the church, were discharged of all burdens of that nature. Constantius made two laws⁸² to this purpose, which Valentinian and Theodosius confirmed, granting the clergy, and some other orders of men, the same immunity in this respect, as they did to the chief officers and dignitaries of the empire: and they intimate⁸³ also, that this was no new privilege, but what by ancient custom they had always enjoyed. The same is said by Honorius, that this was an ancient privilege of the church, conferred upon her by his royal ancestors, and that it ought not to be diminished: therefore he made two laws particularly in behalf⁸⁴ of the bishop of Rome, that no extraordinary office or sordid function should be imposed upon him. Nor do we ever find the clergy called to bear any such office in the empire. For though Gothofred, in his notes upon the forementioned law⁸⁵ of Theodosius, where several of these offices are specified, reckons the angaria, and building and repairing of ways and bridges, among sordid offices; yet I have showed before, that what was exacted of the clergy in reference to those two things, was under the notion of a tribute, and not an office: and the laws which require the clergy to contribute toward them say expressly,⁸⁶ that they are not to be looked upon as sordid offices, nor any duty to be exacted under that notion.

As to the other sort of offices, called honores, honourable or municipal offices, which are otherwise termed curial offices, because they who bare them were called curiales et decuriones, men of the court or curia of every city; all the clergy, who had no lands of their own, but lived upon the revenues and possessions of the church, were entirely exempt from them; because the duties of the church and state were not thought well consistent in one and the same person; and it was deemed unreasonable to burden the lands of the church with the civil duties of the empire. When Constantine was first quietly settled in his government, immediately after the great decennial, commonly called the Diocletian persecution, he seems to have granted a full and unlimited immunity in this respect to all the clergy, as well those who had lands or patrimony of their own, as those who lived wholly upon the revenues of the church. For thus he expresses himself in a law directed to Anulinus, proconsul of Africa, recorded by Eusebius, which bears date anno 312, or 313: Our pleasure is, that all those in your province, who minister in the catholic church, over which

Sect. 12.
The clergy exempt from all civil personal offices.

Sect. 14.
Also from curial or municipal offices.

Sect. 13.
And from sordid offices both predial and personal.

⁷⁸ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. et Cler. Leg. 24. Presbyteros, diaconos, subdiaconos, exorcistas, lectores, ostiarios etiam, et omnes perinde qui primi sunt, personalium munerum expertes esse præcipimus. The Justinian Code, lib. 1. Tit. 3. Leg. 6, has the same, only instead of the words, omnes qui primi sunt, it reads acolythos.

⁷⁹ Athan. Apol. 2. t. 1. p. 772. ⁸⁰ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 23.

⁸¹ Sozom. lib. 3. c. 21.

⁸² Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 10 et 14. Re- pellatur ab his exactio munerum sordidorum.

⁸³ Ibid. lib. 11. Tit. 16. de Extraord. et Sordid. Muner. Leg. 15. Maximarum culmina dignitatum—ab omnibus sordidis muneribus vindicentur.—Circa ecclesias, rhetores, atque grammaticos eruditionis utriusque vetusto more durante, &c.

⁸⁴ Ibid. Leg. 21 et 22. Privilegia venerabilis ecclesiae, quæ divi principes contulerunt, imminui non oportet: proinde etiam quæ circa urbis Romæ episcopum, observatio intemerata custodiet: ita ut nihil extraordinarii muneris vel sordidæ functionis agnoscat.

⁸⁵ Gothofred. in Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 16. Leg. 15.

⁸⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 15. Tit. 3. de Itin. muniendo, Leg. 6. Honor. et Theodos. jun. Absit ut nos instructionem viæ publicæ, et pontium, stratarumque operam—inter sordida munera numeremus, &c. Vid. Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 2. de SS. Eccles. Leg. 7. Ejusdem Honorii et Theodos.

Cæcilian presides, who are commonly called the clergy, be exempted⁸⁷ from all public offices whatsoever, that they may not be let or hindered in the performance of Divine service by any sacrilegious distraction. Anulinus has also an epistle still extant in St. Austin,⁸⁸ written to Constantine not long after, wherein he mentions this grant as sent to him, to be intimated to Cæcilian and the catholic clergy, viz. That by the kind indulgence of his Majesty they were exempt from all manner of offices, that they might with due reverence attend Divine service. And this epistle of Anulinus is also related, but not so correctly, in the collation⁸⁹ of Carthage. In this grant it is very observable, that this privilege was only allowed to the catholic clergy: which made the Donatists very uneasy, because they could not enjoy the same favour: and upon this they became tumultuous and troublesome to the catholics, procuring the clergy in some places to be nominated to public offices, and to be made receivers of the public revenues, &c. But complaint hereof being made to Constantine, it occasioned the publishing of a new order in Africa, pursuant to the former, that whereas he was given to understand, that the clergy of the catholic church were⁹⁰ molested by the heretical faction, and by their procurement nominated to public offices, and made susceprors or receivers of tribute, in derogation of the privileges which he had formerly granted them; he now signified his pleasure again, that if the magistrates found any persons so aggrieved, they should substitute another in his room, and take care for the future that no such injuries should be offered to the men of that profession. This law was published anno 313, and it is the first of this kind that is extant in the Theodosian Code. About six years after, anno 319, he put forth another, upon a like complaint made in Italy, that the clergy were called away from their proper function to serve in public offices; and in this he grants them the same⁹¹ general immunity as before. So again, anno 330, a complaint being made against the Donatists in Numidia, that when they could not have their will upon the superior clergy by reason of the former immunity that was granted them, they, notwithstanding, forced the inferior clergy to bear offices in curia, upon pretence that the exemption did not extend to them: Constantine, to cut off all dispute, published another law, wherein⁹² he particularly exempts the inferior clergy, readers, subdeacons, and the rest, from bearing offices in curia; and orders, that they should enjoy in Africa the same perfect immunity as they did in the Oriental churches.

Now, this immunity was so great a privilege, that it not only became the envy of heretics, but also provoked some catholic laymen (who were possessed of estates qualifying them to bear the offices of their country) to get a sort of titular ordination to some of the inferior offices of the church, on purpose to enjoy this immunity, when yet they neither designed to do the duty of that office, nor to arise to any higher order in the church. Which being interpreted a mere fraudulent collusion to deprive the state of fit men to serve the commonwealth, and no ways benefit the church, it was presently re-sented by Constantine as an abuse, and various laws were made both by him and his successors, as occasion required, to restrain and correct it. Constantine at first, as I observed before, granted this immunity indifferently to all the clergy, as well possessors as not possessors of private estates, whom he found actually engaged in the service of the church when he came to the quiet possession of the empire; nor did he for some years after perhaps restrain any sorts of men from taking orders in the church: but when he found this indulgence to the church, by the artifice of cunning men, only turned to the detriment of the state, and that rich men sheltered themselves under an ecclesiastical title, only to avoid the offices of their country, he then made a law, that no rich plebeian who was qualified by his estate to serve in curia, and bear civil offices in any city, should become an ecclesiastic; or if he did, he should be liable from the time that law was made to be fetched back and returned in curiam, to bear the offices of his country as a layman. What year that law was made is not very certain, save only that it was before anno 320, when a

Sect. 15.
But this last privilege confined to such of the clergy as had no estates, but what belonged to the church, by the laws of Constantine.

⁸⁷ Const. Ep. ad Anulin. ap. Euseb. lib. 10. c. 7. Οἵσπερ κληρικὸς ἐπονομάζειν εἰώσασιν, ἀπὸ πάντων ἀπαξαρλώστων λειτουργιῶν βάλωμαι ἀλειτωργήτης διαφυλαχθήναι, &c.

⁸⁸ Anulin. Ep. ad Constant. ap. Aug. Ep. 68. Scripta cœlestia majestatis vestrae accepta atque adorata, Cæciliano et his qui sub eodem agunt, quique clerici appellantur, devotio parvitatæ meæ insinuare curavit, eosdemque hortata est, ut unitate consensu omnium facta, cum omni omnino munere indulgentia majestatis vestrae liberati esse videantur catholici, custodita sanctitate legis, debita reverentia Divini rebus inserviant.

⁸⁹ Collat. Carth. Die 3. c. 216 et 220.

⁹⁰ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 1. Hæreticorum factione comperimus ecclesiæ catholicæ clericos ita vexari, ut nominationibus seu susceptionibus aliquibus, quas publicus mos exposcit, contra indulta sibi privilegia, prægraventur. Ideoque placet, si quem tua gravitas invenit ita vexatum, eidem alium subrogari, et deinceps a supradictæ religionis hominibus hujusmodi injurias prohiberi.

⁹¹ Cod. Th. ibid. Leg. 2. Qui divino cultui ministeria religionis impendunt, id est, hi qui clerici appellantur, ab omnibus omnino muneribus excusentur: ne sacrilego livore quorundam a divinis obsequiis avocentur.

⁹² Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 7. Lectores divinorum apicum, et hypodiaconi, cæterique clerici, qui per injuriam hæreticorum ad curiam devocati sunt, absolvantur: et de cætero ad similitudinem Orientis minime ad curias devocentur, sed immunitate plenissima potiantur.

second law was made upon the same subject, referring to the first. And from this we learn what was the import of both; that it was Constantine's design to put a distinction betwixt such of the clergy as were ordained before that first law, and such as were ordained afterward; the former he exempted from civil offices, though they were possessed of estates, but not the latter; which plainly appears from the words of the second law, which are these:⁹³ Whereas by a former law we ordained, that from henceforward no counsellor, or counsellor's son, or any one who by his estate was sufficiently qualified to bear public offices, should take upon him the name or function of the clergy, but only such whose fortune is small, and they not tied to any civil offices; we are now given to understand, that such of the clergy who were ordained before the promulgation of that law, are molested upon that account: wherefore our command is, that those be discharged of all further trouble; and that such only as entered themselves among the clergy since the law was made, with intention to decline public offices, shall be returned to the curia and states of their city, to serve in the civil offices of their country. There is another law of Constantine's published after this,⁹⁴ anno 326, a year after the council of Nice, which speaks to the same effect, and shows that this was the standing rule of the latter part of Constantine's reign, to exempt none among the clergy, who were qualified by estates of their own, from bearing personally the public offices of the empire.

But however this might be well designed at first by him to prevent some abuses, yet in process of time it became very prejudicial to the church. For by this means sometimes presbyters and deacons, after they had been twenty or thirty years in the church's service, were called upon by litigious men to bear civil offices inconsistent with the spiritual, and thereupon they were forced to forsake their ecclesiastical function. This was so great an inconvenience, that it well became the wisdom of the following emperors to find out some suitable remedy for it: which they did by new-modifying Constantine's law, and abating something of the rigour of it. For they did not lay the burden of civil offices upon the persons of the clergy, but only upon their patrimonial estates, not belonging to the church, and in some cases they excused those also. Constantius acquitted all bishops of this burden both as to their estates and persons; for by his laws⁹⁵ they might keep their estates to themselves, and neither be obliged to bear civil offices in person, nor substitute any other in their room. And he allowed the same privilege to presbyters and deacons and all others, provided they were ordained by the consent of the civil court or curia, and the general request of the people. But if they were not so ordained, all that they were obliged to do was only to part with two-thirds of their estate to their children or next relations, and substitute them in their room: or, in defect of such relations, to give up two parts of their estate to the curia, and retain the third to themselves. Valentinian, in the first year of his reign, anno 364, made the law a little stricter, that such persons,⁹⁶ when they were ordained, should give all their estate to one of their relations, and substitute him as a curialis in their room, or else give it up to the curia itself: otherwise they should be liable to be called back to serve in civil offices as laymen. But he extended this obligation no further than to the beginning of his own reign; for by another law made seven years after, anno 371, he exempted all such as were in the service of the church⁹⁷ when he came to the crown, though they had estates of their own qualifying them to bear civil offices. Valens exempted all such as had been ten years⁹⁸ in the church's service; so that if they were not called upon by the civil courts within that term, they were for ever after to be excused. Valentinian II. exempted them,⁹⁹ provided they put a substitute in their room. Theodosius exempted all that were ordained¹⁰⁰ before the year 388,

Sect. 16.
Constantine's laws a little altered by the succeeding emperors in favour of the church.

⁹³ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 3. Cum constituto emissa præcipiat, nullum deinceps decurionem, vel ex decurione progenitum, vel etiam instructum idoneis facultatibus, atque obeundis publicis muneribus opportunum, ad clericorum nomen obsequiumque confugere; sed eos—qui fortuna tennes, neque muneribus civilibus teneantur obstricti: cognovimus illos etiam inquietari, qui ante legis promulgationem clericorum se consortio sociaverint: ideoque præcipimus, his ab omni molestia liberatis, illos qui post legem latam obsequia publica declinantes, ad clericorum numerum confugerunt, curiæ ordinibusque restitui, et civilibus obsequiis inservire.

⁹⁴ Ibid. Leg. 6. Si inter civitatem et clericos super aliqujus nomine dubitetur, si eum æquitas ad publica trahat munera, et progenie municeps, vel patrimonio idoneus dignoscatur, exemptus clericis civitati tradatur: opulentos enim sæculi subire necessitates oportet, pauperes ecclesiarum divitiis sustentari.

⁹⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 49. Episcopum facultates suas curiæ, sicut ante fuerat constitutum, nullus adigat mancipare, sed antistes maneant, nec faciat substantiæ cessionem, &c.

⁹⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 59. Qui partes eligit ecclesiæ, aut in propinquum bona propria conferendo eum pro se faciet curialem, aut facultatibus curiæ cedat, quam reliquit; ex necessitate revocando eo qui neutrum fecit, cum clericus esse cœpisset, &c.

⁹⁷ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 21. Qui ecclesiæ jure obsequium deputarunt, curiis habeantur immunes, si tamen ante ortum imperii nostri ad cultum se legis nostræ contulisse constiterit.

⁹⁸ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 19. Si in consortio clericatus decennium quietis impleverit, cum patrimonio suo habeatur immunis: si vero intra finitos annos fuerit a curia revocatus, cum substantia sua functionibus subjaceat civitatis.

⁹⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 99.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid. Leg. 121 et 123.

which was the tenth year of his reign: and of those that were ordained afterward he only required¹⁰¹ the aforesaid conditions, that they should either provide a proper substitute, or give up their estates to the court at their ordination. Which is also taken notice of by St. Ambrose in his answer to Symmachus, where he shows¹⁰² how unreasonable it was for him to plead for the exemption of the heathen priests in this respect, when the laws did not grant it to the Christian clergy but upon such conditions. Arcadius indeed, by the instigation of Eutropius, anno 398, cancelled all these favourable laws, and brought the clergy again to the hard rule of Constantine, that if any¹⁰³ of the curiales were ordained in the church, they should by force be returned to the civil courts again in person, and not enjoy the benefit of those laws, which allowed them to take orders, provided they disposed of their estates to proper substitutes, who might bear offices in their stead. But this law was but very short-lived; for Chrysostom and some others very justly declaiming against it, Arcadius disannulled it the year following by a new law, wherein¹⁰⁴ he granted such of the clergy as were taken and ordained out of the body of the curiales, the same privilege that they had under his father Theodosius, which was, That all that were ordained before the second consulship of Theodosius, anno 388, should enjoy a perfect immunity without any molestation: and such as were ordained after that term, if they were of the superior clergy, bishops, presbyters, or deacons, they might continue in the church's service, either providing a substitute to bear the offices of the curia for them, or giving up their estates to the curia, as former laws in that case had directed. Only it was required that the inferior clergy, readers, subdeacons, &c., should be returned to the curia again, and obliged to bear offices in person. And the same was determined by Theodosius junior,¹⁰⁵ and Valentinian III.,¹⁰⁶ and Majorian,¹⁰⁷ whose laws are extant at the end of the Theodosian Code. Justinian also has a Novel to the same purpose, wherein¹⁰⁸ he orders such of the inferior clergy, as were taken out of any curia, to be returned thither again, unless they had lived fifteen years a monastic life; and then they were to give three parts of their patrimony to the curia, and retain one for themselves: but he allowed bishops to put in a substitute, and be free from bearing civil offices in person, as Julianus Antecessor¹⁰⁹ in his Epitome of the Authentics understands him. Though I confess there is something to incline a man to think Justinian at first was a little more severe to such bishops, because he revived that antiquated law of Arcadius¹¹⁰ in his Code. But however this be, upon the whole matter it appears, that the Christian princes from first to last always made a wide difference between the public patrimony of the church, which was properly ecclesiastical, and the private estates of such of the clergy as had lands of a civil or secular tenure; for the one the clergy were obliged to no duty or burden of civil offices, but for the other they were, and could not be excused from them, but either by parting with some portion of their estates, or providing proper substitutes to officiate for them. The reason of which was, that such of the clergy were looked upon as irregularly promoted; it being as much against the rules of the church, as the laws of the state, to admit any of the curiales to an ecclesiastical function, without first giving satisfaction to the curia whence they were taken, as has been showed in another place. I have been the more curious in searching to the bottom this business about tribute and civil offices, and given a particular and distinct account of them from the grounds of the civil law, because but few men have recourse to those fountains, whence this matter is to be cleared; and the reader will scarce find this subject handled, but either very imperfectly, or with some partiality, or some confusion, in modern authors.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE REVENUES OF THE ANCIENT CLERGY.

THE next thing that comes in order to be considered, is the maintenance of the ancient clergy. Where it will be proper first to inquire into the ways and methods that were taken for raising of funds for their subsistence. And here, to set aside a little the consideration of tithes, which will be spoken of in the next chapter, we find other

Sect. 1.
Several ways of providing a fund for the maintenance of the clergy. 1st, by oblations. Some of which were weekly.

¹⁰¹ Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 101 et 115.

¹⁰² Ambros. cont. Symmach.

¹⁰³ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. de his qui ad Eccles. config. Leg. 3. Decuriones manu mox injecta revocentur: quibus ulterius legem prodesset non patimur, quæ cessione patrimonii subsequuta, decuriones esse clericos non vetabat.

¹⁰⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 163. Si qui ex secundo divi patris nostri consulatu curiam relinquentes, clericorum se consortio manciparunt, si jam episcopi, vel presbyteri, vel diaconi esse meruerunt, in sacris quidem et secretioribus Dei mysteriis perseverent, sed aut substitutum pro se curiæ offerre cogantur, aut juxta legem dudum latum tradant curiæ facultates. Residui omnes, lectores, subdiaconi, vel hi clerici quibus clericorum privilegia non debentur, debitis mox patriæ muneribus præsententur.

¹⁰⁵ Theod. Novel. 26 et 38.

¹⁰⁶ Valentin. Novel. 12.

¹⁰⁷ Majorian. Novel. 1.

¹⁰⁸ Justin. Novel. 123. c. 15. Ex. Epitom. Julian. Antecess.

¹⁰⁹ Vid. Julian. Epit. Novel. 123. c. 4. post Leg. 38. Cod. de Episc. Episcopalis ordo liberat a fortuna servili, sed non a curiali sive officiali; nam et post ordinationem durat; ita ut per subjectam vel interpositam personam officium adimpleatur, &c.

¹¹⁰ Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 12.

ways, by which in ancient times a decent provision was made for them. As, first, by the voluntary oblations of the people, of which some learned persons think there were two sorts; 1. The weekly or daily oblations that were made at the altar; 2. The monthly oblations that were cast into the treasury of the church. The first sort of oblations were such as every rich and able communicant made at his coming to partake of the eucharist; where they offered not only bread and wine, out of which the eucharist was taken, but also other necessaries, and sometimes sums of money for the maintenance of the church and relief of the poor. As is evident from those words of St. Jerom in his Comments upon Ezekiel,¹ where he tells us, that thieves and oppressors made their oblations among others, out of their ill-gotten goods, that they might glory in their wickedness, while the deacon in the church publicly recited the names of those that offered: Such a one offers so much, such a one hath promised so much: and so they please themselves with the applause of the people, while their own conscience lashes and torments them. Those called the Apostolical Canons² speak also of the oblation of fruits, and fowls, and beasts, but order such to be sent home to the bishop and presbyters, who were to divide them with the deacons and the rest of the clergy.

Another sort of oblations were made Sect. 2. And others monthly. monthly, when it was usual for persons that were able and willing, to give as they thought fit something to the ark or treasury of the church. Which sort of collation is particularly taken notice of by Tertullian,³ who says, it was made menstrua die, once a month, or when every one pleased, and as they pleased; for no man was compelled to it: it was not any stated sum, but a voluntary oblation. Baronius⁴ thinks this ark or treasury was called the corban of the church, because Cyprian⁵ uses that word when he speaks of the offerings of the people; rebuking a rich and wealthy matron for coming to celebrate the eucharist without any regard to the corban, and partaking of the Lord's supper without any sacrifice of her own. Others⁶ conceive, that corban is not a name for the treasury, but signifies the gift or oblation itself; and that Cyprian so uses it, making it the same with the sacrifices or offerings of the people. But the evangelist, Matt. xxvii. 6, seems rather to favour the opinion of Baronius: for when he says the chief priests did not think it lawful to put Judas his money εις τον κορβαν, it is evident, he there by corban means the treasury, as most translators render it.

But however this be, it is very probable, that hence came the custom of dividing these oblations once a month among the clergy. For as Tertullian speaks of a monthly collation, so Cyprian frequently mentions⁷ a monthly division, in which the presbyters had their shares by equal portions, and other orders after the same manner. Whence the clergy are also styled in his language,⁸ sportulantes fratres, partakers of the distribution; and what we now call, suspensio a beneficio, is in his style,⁹ suspensio a divisione mensurna, suspension from the monthly division. Which plainly implies, that this sort of church revenues was usually divided once a month among the clergy. And perhaps in conformity to this custom it was, that the Theodotian heretics having persuaded one Natalius, a confessor, to be ordained a bishop among them, promised him a monthly salary of one hundred and fifty denarii, μηνιαία δυνάρια εκατόν πενήκοντα, as Eusebius words it,¹⁰ referring to the usual way of distribution once a month among the clergy.

Another sort of revenues which the clergy enjoyed, were such as arose annually from the lands and possessions which were given to the church. Sect. 4. 23ly. Other revenues arising from the lands and possessions of the church. These, indeed, at first were but small, by reason of the continual vexations and persecutions which the church underwent for the three first ages, when immovable goods were always most exposed to danger. It was the custom of the church of Rome therefore never to keep any immovable possessions, no, not for many ages, if we may credit Theodorus Lecter,¹¹ who speaks of it as customary in his own time, anno 520. But if any such were given to the church, they immediately sold them, and divided

¹ Hieron. Com. in Ezek. xviii. p. 537. Multos conspiciamus, qui opprimunt per potentiam, vel furta committunt, ut de multis parva pauperibus tribuant, et in suis sceleribus gloriantur, publiceque diaconus in ecclesia recitet offerentium nomina: tantum offert ille, tantum ille pollicitus est; placente sibi ad plausum populi, torquente conscientia.

² Canon. Apost. c. 3, 4, 5.

³ Tertul. Apol. c. 39. Si quod arcae genus est, non de ordinaria summa, quasi redemptæ religionis congregatur: modicam uniusquisque stipem menstrua die, vel quum velit, et si modo velit, et si modo possit, apponit: nam nemo compellitur, sed sponte confert.

⁴ Baron. an. 44. n. 69.

⁵ Cyr. de Oper. et Eleemos. p. 203. Locuples et dives es, et Dominicum celebrare te credis, quæ carbonam omnino non respicis; quæ in Dominicum sine sacrificio venis; quæ partem de sacrificio, quod pauper obtulit, sumis?

⁶ Basnag. Exercit. in Baron. p. 597.

⁷ Cyr. Ep. 31. al. 39. Ut et sportulis iisdem cum presbyteris honorentur, et divisiones mensurnas æquatis quantitatibus partiantur.

⁸ Id. Ep. 66. al. 1. Sportulantes fratres, tanquam decimas ex fructibus accipientes.

⁹ Id. Ep. 28. al. 31. Interim se a divisione mensurna tantum contineant, &c.

¹⁰ Euseb. lib. 5. c. 28.

¹¹ Theodor. Lect. Collectan. lib. 2. p. 567. Ἐξος τῆ ἐκκλησίας τῆς Ῥώμης ἀκίτητα μὴ κρατεῖν δίκαια, &c.

the price into three parts, giving one to the church, another to the bishop, and the third to the rest of the clergy. And Valesius finds no exception to this till near the time of Gregory the Great. But if this was the custom of the church of Rome, it was a very singular one. For other churches had their immovables, both houses and lands, even in the times of persecution: as appears from the edicts of Maximinus, wherein he revoked his former decrees that had raised the persecution, and in these latter edicts granted the Christians liberty not only to rebuild their churches, but also ordered, that if any houses or lands belonging to them had been confiscated, or sold, or given away,¹² they should be restored to them again. That this was meant of houses and lands belonging to the church, as well as private Christians, is evident from the decree of Constantine and Licinius published the same year, anno 313. Wherein they give orders, that whereas the Christians were known to have not only places of assembly, but also other places belonging not to any private man, but to the whole body, all such places¹³ should be restored to the body and to every particular assembly among them. Which is repeated again in Constantine's letter to Anulinus,¹⁴ and other public acts of his recorded by Eusebius¹⁵ in his Life, where he makes mention of houses, gardens, lands, and other possessions belonging to the church, of which she had been plundered and despoiled in the late persecutions. These are undeniable evidences, that some part of the ecclesiastical revenues were anciently raised from houses and lands settled upon the church, even before any Christian emperors could give encouragement to them.

But when Constantine was quietly settled upon the throne, the church revenues received great augmentations in this kind. For he enacted a law at Rome, which is still extant in both the Codes,¹⁶ that any one whatsoever should have liberty at his death to bequeath by will what part of his goods he pleased to the holy catholic church. By which means, the liberality of pious persons was very much encouraged, and great additions were made to the standing revenues of the church. Therefore Baronius is very injurious¹⁷ to the memory of Constantine, and justly corrected by Gothofred¹⁸ and Mr. Pagi¹⁹ for it, in that he insinuates as if Constantine had relapsed toward heathenism at this very time, anno 321, when he published this law so much in favour of the church.

Others are no less injurious to some of his successors, when they represent them as injurious to the church, in forbidding widows and orphans to leave any legacies to the church. Baronius cannot help complaining also upon this point, though he contradicts himself about it. For in one place²⁰ he says, the foresaid law of Constantine did so augment the church's wealth, that the following emperors began to dread the consequences of it, that it would turn to the detriment and poverty of the commonwealth; and therefore they made laws to restrain the faithful from being so profuse in their donations to the church. Yet when he comes to speak particularly of those laws, he owns they were not designed²¹ against the church, but only to correct the scandalous practices of some sordid monks and ecclesiastics, who being of an avaricious and parasitical temper, made a gain of godliness, and under pretence of religion, so screwed themselves into the favour and affections of some rich widows and orphans, that they prevailed upon them to leave them great legacies, and sometimes their whole estates, to the prejudice of the right heirs and next relations. Which was so dishonest and unbecoming a practice in such persons, that Valentinian made a law to prevent it; decreeing, that²² no ecclesiastics, or any that professed the monastic life, should frequent the houses of widows or orphans; nor be qualified to receive any gift or legacy from the donation or last will of any such persons. Which law, as Gothofred²³ rightly observes, did not prohibit them from leaving any thing to the church; though some learned men so misunderstand it; but only tended to correct this unworthy practice of some particular persons, which is equally complained of by the ancient writers of the church. St. Ambrose, and St. Jerom, and others mention this law, but they do not at all inveigh against it, but against those vices that occasioned it. I do not complain of the law, says St. Jerom,²⁴ but am grieved that we should deserve such a law; that when idol-

Sect. 6.
Whose laws were confirmed, and not revoked by the succeeding emperors, as some mistake.

Sect. 5.
These very much augmented by the laws of Constantine.

¹² Euseb. lib. 9. c. 10.

¹³ Ap. Euseb. lib. 10. c. 5.

¹⁴ Constant. Ep. ad Anulin. ap. Euseb. ibid.

¹⁵ Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. 2. c. 37 et 39.

¹⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 4. It. Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 2. de Sacrosanct. Eccles. Leg. 1. Habeat unusquisque licentiam sanctissimo catholico venerabilique concilio, decedens bonorum quod optaverit relinquere.

¹⁷ Baron. an. 321. n. 18.

¹⁸ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 10. de Pagani, Leg. 1.

¹⁹ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 321. n. 4 et 5.

²⁰ Baron. an. 321. n. 17.

²¹ Baron. an. 371. t. 4. p. 270. Qua quidem sanctione nequaquam prohibentur ecclesie hereditates accipere vel legata, sed ecclesiasticæ personæ, sive clerici, sive monachi. — ut plane intelligas hosce nebulones, tanquam harpyas quasdam inhiantes matronarum divitiis, &c.

²² Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 20. Ecclesiastici, vel qui continentium se volunt nomine nuncupari, viduarum aut pupillarum domos non adeant. — Censemus etiam, ut memorati nihil de ejus mulieris liberalitate quancunque vel extremo judicio possint adipisci.

²³ Gothofred. in loc.

²⁴ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian. Sacerdotes, dicere pudet, priests, and stage-players, and carters, and harlots may inherit, only clerks and monks are prohibited; and that not by persecuting emperors, but Christian princes. He adds, that it was a very prudent caution in the law, but yet it did not restrain the avarice of such persons, who found out an artifice to elude the law, per fidei-commissa, by getting others to receive in trust for them. Which shows us the sense St. Jerom had of this matter, that he did not think the emperors were injurious to the church in making such a law, but those persons were only to be blamed, whose avarice and sordid flatteries compelled them to make it. And any one that will consult St. Ambrose,²⁵ or the author under his name,²⁶ will find that they give the same account of it. Theodosius indeed some years after made a law, relating particularly to such deaconesses of the church as were of noble families, that they should not²⁷ dispose of their jewels, or plate, or furniture, or any other such things as were the ancient marks of honour in their families, under pretence of religion, while they lived; nor make any church, or clerk, or poor, their heirs when they died. But as this law was made upon some particular reasons of state, so it did no harm to the church; for within two months the same emperor recalled²⁸ it by a contrary law, which granted liberty to such deaconesses to dispose of their goods in their life-time to any church or clerk whatsoever. And Marcian made the law a little more extensive, allowing²⁹ deaconesses and all other religious women, to dispose of any part of their estate, by will or codicil, to any church, or oratory, or clerk, or monk, or poor whatsoever. Which law Justinian also confirmed and inserted it into his Code.³⁰ So that Constantine's law continued always in its full force, and the succeeding princes did not derogate from the privilege which he had granted the church in this respect, for fear (as Baronius pretends) lest the liberality of the subject to the church should impoverish the commonwealth. Men were very liberal indeed in their gifts and donations to the church in this age, but yet not so profuse as to need statutes of mortmain to restrain them.

Sect. 7.
3rdly, Another part of church reve-
For besides the liberality of the subjects, the emperors in these ages found it necessary to make the clergy an allowance out of the public revenues of the empire; which was another way of providing a maintenance for them. Constantine both gave the clergy particular largesses, as their occasions required, and also settled upon them a standing allowance out of the exchequer. In one of his epistles to Cæcilian, bishop of Carthage, recorded by Eusebius,³¹ he acquaints Cæcilian with his orders which he had given to Ursus, his general receiver in Africa, to pay him three thousand polles, τρισεχλιῶς φόλλεις, to be divided at his discretion among the clergy of the provinces of Africa, Numidia, and the two Mauritanias. And if this sum would not answer all their present necessities, he gave him further orders to demand of his procurator Heraclides whatever he desired more. I need not stand here to inquire critically what this sum of three thousand polles was, (though it may be computed above twenty thousand pounds,) since Constantine gave the bishop unlimited orders, to demand as much as the needs of the clergy should require. But he not only supplied their present necessities, but also gave orders for a standing allowance to be made them out of the public treasury. For Theodoret³² and Sozomen³³ say, he made a law requiring the chief magistrates in every province to grant the clergy, and virgins, and widows of the church, an annual allowance of corn, ἐτήσια σιτηρέσια, out of the yearly tribute of every city. And thus it continued to the time of Julian, who withdrew the whole allowance. But Jovian restored it again in some measure, granting them a third part of the former allowance only, because at that time the public income was very low, by reason of a severe famine; but he promised them the whole, so soon as the famine was ended, and the public storehouses were better replenished. But either Jovian's death prevented his design, or the necessities of the clergy did not afterward require it. For though Sozomen seems to say the whole was restored; yet Theodoret, who is more accurate, affirms, that it was only τριτημόριον, a third part; and that so it continued to his own times. In this sense therefore we are to understand that law of the emperor Marcian, which Justinian has inserted into his idolorum, mimi, et aurigæ, et scorta hæreditates capiunt; solis clericis et monachis prohibetur: et prohibetur non a persecutoribus, sed a principibus Christianis. Nec de lege conqueror, sed doleo cur meruimus hanc legem, &c.

²⁵ Ambros. Ep. 31. ad Valentin. p. 145.

²⁶ Idem, Homil. 7.

²⁷ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 27. Nihil de monilibus et suppellectili, nihil de auro, argento, cæterisque claræ domus insignibus, sub religionis defensione consumat. —Ac si quando diem obierit, nullam ecclesiam, nullum clericum, nullum pauperem scribat hæredes, &c.

²⁸ Ibid. Leg. 28. Legem, quæ diaconissis vel viduis nuper est promulgata, ne quis videlicet clericus, neve sub ecclesiæ nomine, mancipia, prædam, velut infirmi sexus despoliator, et remotis adfinibus et propinquis, ipse sub prætextu catholice disciplinæ se ageret viventis hæredem, eatenus animadvertat esse revocatum.

²⁹ Marcian. Novel. 5. ad calcem Cod. Th. Generali lege sancimus, sive vidua, sive diaconissa, sive virgo Deo dicata, vel sanctimonialis mulier, sive quocunque alio nomine religiosi honoris vel dignitatis femina nuncupetur, testamentum vel codicillo suo—ecclesiæ, vel martyrio, vel clerico, vel monacho, vel pauperibus aliquid vel ex integro vel ex parte, in quacunque re vel specie creditit relinquendum, id modis omnibus ratum firmumque constet.

³⁰ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 2. de Sacrosanct. Eccl. Leg. 13.

³¹ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 6.

³² Theod. lib. 1. c. 11.

³³ Sozomen, lib. 5. c. 5.

ness raised by allowances out of the emperor's exchequer.

Code,³¹ decreeing, that the salaries which had been always given to the churches in divers sorts of grain out of the public treasures, should be allowed them, without any diminution. This did not entitle them to the whole allowance first made them by Constantine, (as some may be apt to imagine from the general words of the law,) but only to the third part, which had been the customary allowance from the time of Jovian.

Another way by which some small addition was made to the revenues of the church, was from a law of Constantine mentioned by Eusebius³⁵ in his Life, where he tells us, that as he ordered all the estates of martyrs and confessors, and whoever had suffered in time of persecution, to be restored to their next relations; so if any of them died without relations, the church should become their heir, and in every place where they lived, succeeded to their inheritance.

Theodosius junior and Valentinian III. made such another law in reference to the temporal possessions of the clergy: That if any presbyter, or deacon,³⁶ or deaconess, or subdeacon, or other clerk, or any man or woman professing a monastic life, died without will and without heirs, the estates and goods they were possessed of should fall to the church or monastery to which they belonged, unless they were antecedently tied to some civil service. This implies that the clergy were at liberty to dispose of their own temporal estates as they pleased; and they fell to the church only in case they died intestate. But the council of Agde, in France, under Alaric the Goth, anno 506, went a little further, and decreed, that every bishop,³⁷ who had no children or nephews, should make the church his heir, and no other: as Caranza's edition, and Gratian, and some others, read it. And the council of Seville³⁸ made a like decree for the Spanish churches; upon which Caranza³⁹ makes this remark, That the canon was fit to be renewed in council, that the church should be the bishop's heir, and not the pope. And that it was against the mind of those fathers, that bishops should set up primogenitures, or enrich their kindred out of the revenues of the church. Which reflection, among other things, might perhaps contribute towards his being brought into the Spanish inquisition, though he was archbishop of Toledo; after which he underwent a ten years' imprisonment at Rome, and had some of his books prohibited in the Roman Index, of which Spondanus,⁴⁰ in his Annals, will give the reader a further account. But I return to the primitive church.

Where we may observe another addition made to the revenues of the clergy, by the donation of heathen temples, and sometimes the revenues that were settled upon them. For though the greatest part of these went commonly to the emperor's coffers, or to favourites that begged them, upon the demolishing of the temples; as appears from the laws of Honorius⁴¹ and Gratian, and several others in the Theodosian Code; yet some of them were given to the church: for Honorius⁴² takes notice of several orders and decrees of his own, whereby such settlements had been made upon the church, which were to continue the church's property and patrimony for ever. And it is probable some other emperors might convert the revenues of the temples to the same use. At least the fabrics themselves, and the silver and golden statues that were in them, were sometimes so disposed of. For Sozomen⁴³ says, the μῆτριον, or temple of the sun at Alexandria, was given to the church by Constantius. And we learn from Socrates,⁴⁴ that in the time of Theodosius, the statues of Serapis, and many other idols at Alexandria, were melted down for the use of the church; the emperor giving orders that the gods should help to maintain the poor.

Honorius made a like decree, anno 412, in reference to all the revenues belonging to heretical conventicles, that both the churches or conventicles themselves, and all the lands⁴⁵ that were settled upon them, should be forfeited, and become the possession and property of the catholic church, as by former decrees he had appointed. And I suppose it was by virtue of these laws, that Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, shut up all the Novatian churches, and seized

³¹ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 2. de SS. Eccles. Leg. 12. Salaria quæ sacrosanctis ecclesiis in diversis speciebus de publico hæcenus ministrata sunt, jubemus nunc quoque inconcussa, et a nullo prorsus imminuta præstari.

³⁵ Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. 2. c. 36.

³⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 5. Tit. 3. de Bonis Clericor. Leg. 1. Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 20.

³⁷ Conc. Agathen. c. 24. al. 33. ap. Gratian. Caus. 12. qu. 2. c. 34. Episcopus qui filios aut nepotes non habuerit, alium quam ecclesiam non relinquit hæredem.

³⁸ Conc. Hispalens. 1. c. 1.

³⁹ Caranz. in loc. Hic canon erat renovandus in concilio, ut hæres defuncti episcopi esset ecclesia, non tamen papa.

Secundo alienum est a sententia horum patrum licere episcopo instituere primogenituras, vel locupletare consanguineos.

⁴⁰ Spondan. Annal. Eccl. an. 1559. n. 29.

⁴¹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 10. de Paganis, Leg. 19 et 20.

⁴² Ibid. Leg. 20. Ea autem quæ multiplicibus constitutis ad venerabilem ecclesiam volumus pertinere, Christiana sibi merito religio vindicavit, id est, vindicabit.

⁴³ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 7.

⁴⁴ Socrat. lib. 5. c. 16.

⁴⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 5. de Hæret. Leg. 52. Ecclesiis eorum vel conventiculis, prædiisque, siqua in eorum ecclesias hæreticorum largitas prava contulit, proprietati potestatis catholice, sicut jamdudum statuimus, vindicatis.

Sect. 8.
4thly, The estates of martyrs and confessors dying without heirs settled upon the church by Constantine.

Sect. 9.
5thly, The estates of clergymen dying without heirs and will, settled in like manner.

Sect. 10.
6thly, Heathen temples and their revenues sometimes given to the church.

Sect. 11.
7thly, As also heretical conventicles and their revenues.

upon all their revenues, and deprived Theonas, their bishop, of his substance; though Socrates,⁴⁶ in telling the story, represents the matter a little more invidiously, as if Cyril had done all this by his own private usurped authority and arbitrary power: which will hardly gain credit with any one that considers, that those laws of Honorius were published before Cyril came to the episcopal throne, which was not till the year 412, when those laws were re-enforced by the imperial power.

While I am upon this head, it will not be improper to observe further, that, by Justinian's laws,⁴⁷ if any clergymen or monks, who were possessed of temporal estates, forsook their church or monastery, and turned seculars again, all their substance was forfeited to the church or monastery to which they belonged. These were the several methods that were anciently taken for augmenting and improving the revenues of the church, besides those of first-fruits and tithes, of which more hereafter.

But I must observe, that as these methods were generally reputed legal and allowable, so there were some other as generally disallowed and condemned. Particularly we find in St. Austin's time, that it was become a rule in the African church, to receive no estates that were given to the church to the great detriment and prejudice of the common rights of any others. As if a father disinherited his children to make the church his heir, in that case no bishop would receive his donation. Possidius tells⁴⁸ us St. Austin refused some estates so given, because he thought it more just and equal, that they should be possessed by the children, or parents, or next kindred of the deceased persons. And that he did so, is evident from his own words in his discourse de Vita Clericorum,⁴⁹ where he says he had returned an estate to a son, which an angry father at his death had taken from him: and he thought he did well in it; professing for his own part, that if any disinherited his son, to make the church his heir, he should seek some one else to receive his donation, and not Austin; and he hoped by the grace of God there would be none that would receive it. He adds in the same place a very remarkable and laudable instance of great generosity and equity in Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, in a case of the like nature. A certain man⁵⁰ having no children, nor hopes of any, gave away his whole estate to the church, only reserving to himself the use of it for life. Now it happened afterwards, that he had children born to him; upon which the bishop generously returned him his estate, when he did not at all expect it. The bishop indeed, says St. Austin, had it in his power to have kept it, sed jure fori, non jure poli, only by the laws of man, but not by the laws of Heaven. And therefore he thought himself obliged in conscience to return it. This shows how tender they were of augmenting the revenues of the church by any methods that might be thought unequitable, or such as were not reputable, honest, or of good report; herein observing the apostle's rule, to let their moderation, τὸ ἐπιεικὲς, their equity, be known to all men; not doing any hard thing for lucre's sake, nor taking advantages by rigour of law, when conscience and charity were against them.

To avoid scandal also, and to provide things honest in the sight of all men, they forbade any thing to be demanded for administering the sacraments of the church. The council of Eliberis seems to intimate, that it was customary with some persons at their baptism to cast money into a bason, by way of gratuity to the minister; but even this is there forbidden by the canon, lest the priest⁵¹ should seem to sell what he freely received. Whence we may conclude, that if the people might not offer, the priest might much less exact or demand any thing for administering the sacrament of baptism. In other churches a voluntary oblation was allowed of, from persons that were able and willing to make it; but all exactions of that nature from the poor were still prohibited, for fear of discouraging them from offering themselves or their children to baptism. Thus it was in the Roman church in the time of Gelasius, as we learn from his epistles;⁵² and in the Greek church in the time of Gregory Nazianzen, who takes occasion to answer this objection which poor men made against Sect. 12. Ethly, The estates of clerks deserting the church, to be forfeited to the church.

Sect. 13. No disreputable ways of augmenting church-revenues encouraged. Fathers not to disinherit their children to make the church their heirs.

Sect. 14. Nothing to be demanded for administering the sacraments of the church, nor for consecrating churches, nor interment of the dead.

⁴⁶ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 7.

⁴⁷ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 53. Si illi monasteria aut ecclesias relinquunt, atque mundani fiant; omne ipsorum jus ad monasterium aut ecclesiam pertinet. Vid. Novel. 5. c. 4 et 6. It. Novel. 123. c. 42.

⁴⁸ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 24.

⁴⁹ Aug. Serm. lib. 49. de Diversis, t. 10. p. 520. Quando donavi filio, quod iratus pater moriens abstulit, bene feci. — Quid plura, fratres mei? Quicumque vult exheredato filio heredem facere ecclesiam, quærat alterum qui suscipiat, non Augustinum; imo Deo propitio neminem inveniat.

⁵⁰ Id. ibid. Quidam cum filios non haberet, neque speraret, res suas omnes, retento sibi usufructu, donavit ecclesia. Nati sunt illi filii, et reddidit episcopus nec opinanti quæ ille donaverat. In potestate habebat episcopus non reddere; sed jure fori, non jure poli.

⁵¹ Conc. Eliber. c. 48. Emendari placuit, ut hi qui baptizantur (ut fieri solebat) nummos in concham non mittant; ne sacerdos, quod gratis accepit, pretio distrahere videatur.

⁵² Gelas. Ep. 1. al. 9. ad Episc. Lucaniæ, c. 5. Baptizandis consignandisque fidelibus pretia nulla presbyteri præfigant, nec illationibus quibusdam impositis exagitate cupiant renascentes; quoniam quod gratis accipimus, gratis dare mandamur. Et ideo nihil a predictis exigere moliantur, quo vel paupertate cogente deterriti, vel indignatione revocati, redemptionis suæ causas adire despiciant.

coming immediately to baptism,⁵³ because they had not wherewith to make the usual present that was then to be offered, or to purchase the splendid robe that was then to be worn, or to provide a treat for the minister that baptized them. He tells them, no such things would be expected or exacted of them: they need only make a present of themselves to Christ, and entertain the minister with their own good life and conversation, which would be more acceptable to him than any other offerings. This implies, that it was then the custom for the people to make a voluntary oblation at their baptism; but not the custom for ministers to demand it, as a matter of right, for fear of giving scandal. Some editions of Gratian⁵⁴ and Vicecomes⁵⁵ allege a canon of the third or fourth council of Carthage to the same purpose; which, if the allegation were true, would prove that the same custom obtained in the African church. But, as Antonius Augustinus⁵⁶ and the Roman correctors of Gratian⁵⁷ have observed, there is no such canon to be found in any African council; but it is a canon of the second council of Bracara in Spain, which finding a corrupt practice crept in among the clergy, (notwithstanding the former prohibition of the Eliberitan council,) that ministers did exact pledges of the poor, who had not ability to make any offering, endeavoured to redress this corruption, by passing a new order, that though⁵⁸ voluntary oblations might be received, yet no pledge should be extorted from the poor who were not able to offer, because many of the poor for fear of this kept back their children from baptism. The same council of Bracara made a decree, that no bishop should exact⁵⁹ any thing as a due of any founders of churches for their consecration; but if any thing was voluntarily offered, he might receive it. And so in like manner for confirmation,⁶⁰ and administering the eucharist,⁶¹ all bishops and presbyters are strictly enjoined not to exact any thing of the receivers, because the grace of God was not to be set to sale, nor the sanctification of the Spirit to be imparted for money. St. Jerom assures us further, that it was not very honourable in his time to exact any thing for the burying-places of the dead, for he censures those that practised it, as falling short⁶² of the merit of Ephron the Hittite, whom Abraham forced to receive money for the burying-place which he bought of him: but now, says he, there are some who sell burying-places and take money for them, not by compulsion, as Ephron did, but by extortion rather from those that were unwilling to pay. By which we may understand, that in his time it was hardly allowable to demand any thing for the use of a public or private cemetery: nor was this any part of the church revenues in those days, when as yet the custom of burying in churches was not generally brought in, but was the practice of later ages; of which more when we come to speak of the funeral rites of the church.

If any one is desirous to know what part of the church revenues was anciently most serviceable and beneficial to the church, he may be informed from St. Chrysostom and St. Austin, who give the greatest commendations to the offerings and oblations of the people, and seem to say, that the church was never better provided than when her maintenance was raised chiefly from them. For then men's zeal prompted them to be very liberal in their daily offerings; but as lands and possessions were settled upon the church, this zeal sensibly abated; and so the church came to be worse provided for under the notion of growing richer. Which is the thing that St. Chrysostom complains of in his own times, when the ancient revenue arising from oblations was in a great measure sunk, and the church, with all her lands, left in a worse condition than she was before. For now her ministers were forced to submit to secular cares, to the management of lands and houses, and the business of buying and selling, for fear the orphans, and virgins, and widows of the church should starve. He exhorts the people therefore to return to their ancient liberality of oblations, which would at once ease the ministry of all such cares, and make a good provision for the poor, and take off all the little scoffs and objections that some were so ready to make and cast upon the clergy, that they were too much given to secular cares and employments, when indeed it was not choice, but necessity, that forced them to it. There are, says he, in this place, (at Antioch he means,) by the grace of God a hundred thousand persons that come to church. Now, if every one⁶³ of these would but give one loaf of bread

Sect. 15.
The oblations of the people anciently one of the most valuable parts of church revenues.

⁵³ Naz. Orat. 40. de Bapt. t. 1. p. 655.

⁵⁴ Gratian. Caus. 1. qu. 1. c. 108.

⁵⁵ Vicecom. de Ritib. Bapt. lib. 4. c. 2.

⁵⁶ Anton. Aug. de Emend. Gratiani, lib. 1. Dial. 14.

⁵⁷ Gratian. ibid. Edit. Rom. an. 1582.

⁵⁸ Conc. Bracar. 2. c. 7. edit. Crab. al. 3. Bracar. Ed. Labbe. Qui infantes suos ad baptismum offerunt, si quid voluntarie pro suo offerunt voto, suscipiatur ab eis; si vero per necessitatem paupertatis aliquid non habent quod offerant, nullum illis pignus violenter tollatur a clericis. Nam multi pauperes hoc timentes, filios suos a baptismo retrahunt.

⁵⁹ Ibid. can. 5.

⁶⁰ Gelas. Ep. 1. al. 9. ad Episc. Lucan. c. 10.

⁶¹ Conc. Trul. c. 23.

⁶² Hieron. Quæst. Hebraic. in Gen. xxiii. t. 3. p. 214. Postquam pretio victus est, ut sepulcrum venderet, &c., appellatus est Ephran: significante scriptura, non eum fuisse consummatæ perfectæque virtutis, qui potuerit memorias vendere mortuorum. Sciant igitur qui sepulcra venditant, et non coguntur ut accipiant pretium, sed a nolentibus etiam extorquent, immutari nomen suum, et perire quid de merito eorum, &c.

⁶³ Chrys. Hom. 86. in Matth.

daily to the poor, the poor would live in plenty. If every one would contribute but one halfpenny, no man would want; neither should we undergo so many reproaches and derisions, as if we were too intent upon our possessions. By this discourse of Chrysostom's it plainly appears, that he thought the oblations of the people in populous cities, when men were acted with their primitive zeal, was a better provision for the clergy than even the lands and possessions of the church. And St. Austin seems to have had the same sense of this matter. For Possidius⁶⁴ tells us in his Life, that when he found the possessions of the church were become a little invidious, he was used to tell the laity, that he had rather live upon the oblations of the people of God than undergo the care and trouble of those possessions; and that he was ready to part with them, provided all the servants and ministers of God might live as they did under the Old Testament, when, as we read, they that served at the altar were made partakers of the altar. But though he made this proposal to the people, they would never accept of it. Which is an argument, that the people also thought, that the reducing the clergy's maintenance to the precise model of the Old Testament would have been a more chargeable way to them than the other; since the oblations of the Old Testament included tithes and first-fruits; concerning the state and original of which, as to what concerns the Christian church, I come now to make a more particular inquiry.

CHAPTER V.

OF TITHES AND FIRST-FRUITS IN PARTICULAR.

Sect. 1.
Tithes anciently reckoned to be due
by Divine right.

CONCERNING tithes, so far as relates to the ancient church, it will be proper to make three inquiries. First, ⁶⁴ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 23. Dum forte (ut adsolet) de possessionibus ipsis invidia clericis fieret, alloquebatur plebem Dei, malle se ex collationibus plebis Dei vivere quam illarum possessionum curam vel gubernationem pati; et paratum se illis cedere, ut eo modo omnes Dei servi et ministri viverent, quo in Veteri Testamento leguntur altari deservientes de eodem comparticipari. Sed nunquam id laici suscipere voluerunt.

¹ Bellarmin. de Clericis, lib. 1. c. 25.

² Rivet, Exerc. 80. in Gen. xiv. p. 386.

³ Selden, Hist. of Tithes, c. 4.

⁴ Andrews, de Decimis, inter Opuscula.

⁵ Carleton, Divine Right of Tithes, c. 4.

⁶ Montague, Diatribæ, &c. ⁷ Tillesly, Answ. to Selden.

⁸ Orig. Hom. 11. in Num. xviii. t. 1. p. 210. Quomodo ergo abundat justitia nostra plusquam scribarum et Phariseorum, si illi de fructibus terræ suæ gustare non audent, plusquam primitias suas sacerdotibus offerant et Levitis decimæ separantur? Et ego nihil horum faciens, fructibus terræ ita abutar, ut sacerdos nesciat, Levites ignoret, Divinum altare non sentiat?

Whether the primitive fathers esteemed them to be due by Divine right? Secondly, If they did, why they were not always strictly demanded? Thirdly, In what age they were first generally settled upon the church? As to the first inquiry, it is generally agreed by learned men, that the ancients accounted tithes to be due by Divine right. Bellarmine indeed,¹ and Rivet,² and Mr. Selden,³ place them upon another foot: but our learned Bishop Andrews⁴ and Bishop Carleton,⁵ who wrote before Mr. Selden, and Bishop Montague⁶ and Tillesly,⁷ who wrote in answer to him, (not to mention many others who have written since,) have clearly proved, that the ancients believed the law about tithes not to be merely a ceremonial or political command, but of moral and perpetual obligation. It will be sufficient for me in this place to present the reader with two or three of their allegations. Origen, in one of his homilies⁸ on Numbers, thus delivers his opinion about it: How does our righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, if they dare not taste of the fruits of the earth, before they offer the first-fruits to the priests, and separate the tithes for the Levites? Whilst I do nothing of this, but only so abuse the fruits of the earth, that neither the priest, nor the Levite, nor the altar of God shall see any of them? St. Jerom⁹ says expressly, that the law about tithes and first-fruits was to be understood to continue in its full force in the Christian church; where men were commanded not only to give tithes, but to sell all that they had, and give to the poor. But, says he, if we will not proceed so far, let us at least imitate the Jewish practice, and give part of the whole to the poor, and the honour that is due to the priests and Levites. Which he that does not, defrauds God, and makes himself liable to a curse. St. Austin as plainly favours the same opinion, telling men,¹⁰ that they ought to separate something out of their yearly fruits, or daily income; and that a tenth to a Christian was but a small proportion. Because it is said, the Pharisees gave tithes: "I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess." And our Lord saith, "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." But if he, whose righteousness you are to exceed, give tithes; and you give not a thousandth part; how can you be said to exceed him, whom you do not so much as equal? By these few allegations the reader may be able to judge, what notion the ancients had of tithes, as due by Divine right under the gospel, as well as under the law; and that the precept concerning them was not a mere ceremonial or political command given to the Jews only.

⁹ Hieron. Com. in Mal. iii. Quod de decimis primitiisque diximus, quæ olim dabantur a populo sacerdotibus ac Levitis, in ecclesiæ quoque populis intelligite: Quibus præceptum est, non solum decimas dare et primitias, sed et vendere omnia quæ habent et dare pauperibus, et sequi Dominum salvatorem. Quod si facere nolumus, saltem Judæorum imitemur exordia, ut pauperibus partem demus ex toto, et sacerdotibus et Levitis honorem debitum deferamus. Quod qui non fecerit, Deum fraudare et supplantare convincitur, &c.

¹⁰ Aug. Com. in Psal. cxlvi. t. 8. p. 698. Præcidite ergo aliquid, et deputate aliquid fixum vel ex annis fructibus, vel ex quotidianis quæstibus vestris.—Decimas vis? Decimas exime, quanquam parum sit. Dictum est enim, quia Pharisei decimas dabant, &c. Et quid ait Dominus? Nisi abundaverit justitia vestra plusquam scribarum et Phariseorum, non intrabitis in regnum cælorum. Et ille, super quem debet abundare justitia tua, decimas dat: tu autem nec millesimam das. Quomodo superabis eum, cui non æquaris?

But why, then, it may be said, were not tithes exacted by the apostles at first, or by the fathers in the ages immediately following? For it is generally believed that tithes were not the original maintenance of ministers under the gospel. To this Bishop Carleton¹¹ has returned several very satisfactory answers, which the reader may take in his own words. First, That tithes were paid to the priests and Levites in the time of Christ and his apostles: now, the synagogue must first be buried, before these things could be orderly brought into use in the church. Secondly, In the times of the New Testament, and somewhat after, there was an extraordinary maintenance by a community of all things, which supplied the want of tithes: but this community was extraordinary, and not to last always. Thirdly, The use of paying tithes, as the church then stood, was so inconvenient and cumbersome, that it could not well be practised. And therefore, as circumcision was laid aside for a time, whilst Israel travelled through the wilderness, not because the people of right ought not then also to have used it, but because it was so inconvenient for that estate and time of the church, that it could not without great trouble be practised; even so the use of tithes in the time of Christ and his apostles was laid aside, not because it ought not, but because it could not, without great encumbrance, be done. And as circumcision was resumed, as soon as the estate of the church could bear it; so tithes were re-established, as soon as the condition of the church could suffer it. For tithes cannot well be paid, but where some whole state or kingdom receiveth Christianity, and where the magistrate doth favour the church, which was not in the time of the apostles. To these reasons some other learned persons¹² have added a fourth, which is also worth noting, That the tithes of fruits were not so early paid to Christian priests, because the inhabitants of the country were the latest converts; whence also the name pagans stuck by the heathens, because the greatest relics of them were in country villages.

As to the last inquiry, when tithes began first to be generally settled upon the church? the common opinion is, that it was in the fourth century, when magistrates began to favour the church, and the world was generally converted from heathenism. Some think¹³ Constantine settled them by law upon the church: so Alsted, who cites Hermannus Gigas for the same opinion. But there is no law of Constantine's now extant that makes express mention of any such thing. That which comes the nearest to it, seems to be the law about an annual allowance of corn to the clergy in all cities out of the public treasuries, which has been spoken of in the last chapter: but this was not so much as a tenth of the yearly product; for the whole tribute itself seems to have been no more: for in some laws of the Theodosian Code¹⁴ the emperor's tribute is called decimæ, tithes; and the publicans, who collected it, are, upon that account, by Tully¹⁵ called decumani; and in Hesychius, the word δεκατέειν, to tithe, is explained by τελωνεῖν and δεκάτην εἰσπραττεσθαι, to pay tribute, or pay their tithes to the collectors of the tribute. Unless, therefore, we can suppose that Constantine settled the whole tribute of the empire upon the church, (which it is evident he did not,) we cannot take that law for a settlement of tithes upon the clergy. Yet it might be a step towards it: for before the end of the fourth century, as Mr. Selden¹⁶ himself not only confesses, but proves out of Cassian, Eugippius, and others, tithes were paid to the church. St. Austin lived in this age, and he says, tithes were paid before his time, and much better than they were in his own time, for he makes a great complaint of the non-payment of them. Our forefathers, says he,¹⁷ abounded in all things, because they gave tithes to God, and tribute to Cæsar. But now, because our devotion to God is sunk, the taxes of the state are raised upon us. We would not give God his part in the tithes, and therefore the whole is taken away from us. The exchequer devours what we would not give to Christ. St. Chrysostom,¹⁸ and the author of the *Opus Imperfectum*¹⁹ on St. Matthew, that goes under his name, testify for the practice of other

Sect. 3.
In what age they were first generally settled upon the church.

Sect. 2.
Why not exacted in the apostolical age and those that immediately followed.

¹¹ Carlton, Div. Right of Tithes, cap. 4. p. 21.

¹² Bishop Fell, Not. in Cypr. Ep. 66. al. 1.

¹³ Alsted, Supplement. Chamier de Membris Eccles. c. 10.

¹⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 10. Tit. 19. de Metallis, Leg. 10 et 11.

¹⁵ Vid. Cicer. Orat. 3. in Ver. n. 21 et 22.

¹⁶ Selden, Hist. of Tith. c. 5. p. 47, &c.

¹⁷ Aug. Hom. 48. ex 50. t. 10. p. 201. Majores nostri ideo copiis omnibus abundabant, quia Deo decimas dabant, et Cæsari census reddebant. Modo autem quia decessit devotio Dei, accessit indictio fisci. Nolumus partiri cum Deo decimas, modo totum tollitur. Hoc tollit fiscus, quod non accipit Christus.

¹⁸ Chyrs. Hom. 4. in Ephes. p. 1058.

¹⁹ Opus Imperf. in Matt. Hom. 44. Si populus decimas non obtulerit, murmurant omnes: at si peccantem populum viderint, nemo murmurat contra eum.

churches about the same time. And it were easy to add a list of many other fathers and councils of the next age, which speak of tithes²⁰ as then actually settled upon the church: but since they who dispute most against the Divine right of them, do not deny this as to fact, it is needless to prosecute this matter any further; which they that please may see historically deduced through many centuries by Mr. Selden.²¹

There is one part more of church revenues, whose original remains to be inquired into, and that is first-fruits, which are frequently mentioned in the primitive writers. For not only those called the Apostolical Canons²² and Constitutions²³ speak of them as part of the maintenance of the clergy; but writers more ancient and more authentic, as Origen and Irenæus, mention them also as oblations made to God. Celsus, says Origen,²⁴ would have us dedicate first-fruits to demons; but we dedicate them to him, who said, "Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind." To whom we give our first-fruits, to him also we send up our prayers, having a great High Priest that is entered into heaven, &c. In like manner Irenæus says,²⁵ Christ taught his disciples to offer the first-fruits of the creatures to God, and that this was the church's continual oblation with thanksgiving for the enjoyment of all the rest. Which implies, either that they had a particular form of thanksgiving, as there is in both the Greek and Latin rituals; or else that these first-fruits were offered with other oblations at the time of the eucharist. However this be, it is evident, that as they were principally designed for agnizing the Creator, so they were secondarily intended for the use of his servants. And therefore we find the Eustathian heretics censured by the synod of Gangra, anno 324, for that they took the first-fruits, which were anciently given to the church, and divided them among the saints of their own party;²⁶ in opposition to which practice there are two canons made by that council,²⁷ forbidding any one to receive or distribute such oblations out of the church, otherwise than by the directions of the bishop, under pain of excommunication. Some other rules are also given by one of the councils²⁸ of Carthage, inserted into the African Code, concerning these first-fruits, that they should be only of grapes and corn; which shows that it was also the practice of the African

Sect. 4.
The original of first-fruits, and the manner of offering them.

church. Nazianzen likewise mentions the first-fruits of the winepress and the floor, which were to be dedicated to God.²⁹ And the author of the Constitutions has a form of prayer,³⁰ ἐπίκλησις ἐπὶ ἀπαρχῶν, an invocation upon the first-fruits, to be used at their dedication. So that it seems very clear, that the offering of first-fruits was a very ancient and general custom in the Christian church, and that this also contributed something toward the maintenance of the clergy; whose revenues I have now considered so far as concerns the several kinds and first original of them.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE MANAGEMENT AND DISTRIBUTION OF THE REVENUES OF THE ANCIENT CLERGY.

THE next thing to be considered is, the ancient way of managing and distributing these revenues among the clergy, and such others as were dependants upon the church. Which being a little different from the ways of later ages, since settlements were made upon parochial churches; for the right understanding of it we are in the first place to observe, that anciently the revenues of the whole diocese were all in the hands of the bishop; who, with the advice and consent of his senate of presbyters, distributed them as the occasions of the church required. This will appear evident to any one that will consider these two things (which will hereafter be proved, when we come to speak of parochial churches and their original): first, That there were anciently no presbyters or other clergy fixed upon particular churches or congregations in the same city or diocese; but they were served indifferently by any presbyter from the ecclesia matrix, the mother or cathedral church, to which all the clergy of the city or diocese belonged, and not to any particular congregation. Secondly, That when presbyters were fixed to particular churches or assemblies in some cities, yet still those churches had no separate revenues; but the maintenance of the clergy officiating in them was from the common stock of the mother church, into which all the oblations of particular churches were put, as into a common fund, that from thence there might be

Sect. 1.
The revenues of the whole diocese anciently in the hands of the bishop.

²⁰ Conc. Aurelian. 1. an. 511. can. 17. Conc. Matiscon. 2. an. 588. c. 5.

²¹ Selden, Hist. of Tithes, c. 5, &c. ²² Canon. Apost. c. 4.

²³ Constit. lib. 2. c. 25. lib. 8. c. 30.

²⁴ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 8. p. 400.

²⁵ Iren. lib. 4. c. 32. Sed et suis discipulis dans consilium primitias Deo offerre ex suis creaturis, &c. Ibid. c. 31. Offerre igitur oportet Deo primitias ejus creaturæ, &c.

²⁶ Conc. Gangr. in Præfat. Καρποφορίας τε τὰς ἐκκλησιαστικὰς τὰς ἀνεκαθευ διδομένας τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, ἑαυτοῖς καὶ τοῖς συν αὐτοῖς, ὡς ἀγίοις, τὰς διαδόσεις ποιούμενοι.

²⁷ Ibid. can. 7 et 8.

²⁸ Cod. Can. Afr. c. 37. al. 40. Conc. African. c. 4.

²⁹ Naz. Ep. 80. ³⁰ Constit. lib. 8. c. 40.

made a general distribution. That thus it was at Constantinople till the middle of the fifth century, is evident from what we find in Theodorus Lector, who says,¹ that Marcian, the æconomus or guardian of that church under Gennadius, anno 460, was the first that ordered the clergy of every particular church to receive the offerings of their own church, whereas before the great church received them all.

Now, this being the ancient custom, it gives us a clear account how all the revenues of the church came to be in the hands of the bishop, and how it was made one part of his office and duty by the canons to concern himself in the care and distribution of them. Of which because I have already spoken elsewhere,² I shall say no more in this place, save only that the bishop himself, to avoid suspicion and prevent mismanagement, was obliged to give an account of his administration in a provincial synod;³ as also at his election to exhibit a list of his own goods and estate, that such things as belonged to him⁴ might be distinguished from those that belonged to God and the church. And for the same reason the great council of Chalcedon⁵ ordered, that every bishop should have an æconomus, or guardian of the church, and he to be chosen by the vote of all the clergy, as has been noted in another place. See Book III. chap. 12. sect. 4.

As to the distribution itself, in the most primitive ages we find no certain rules about it; but as it was in the apostles' days, so it continued for some time after: what was collected, was usually deposited with the bishop, and distribution was made to every man according as he had need. But the following ages brought the matter to some certain rules, and then the revenues were divided into certain portions, monthly or yearly, according as occasion required, and these proportioned to the state or needs of every order. In the Western church, the division was usually into three or four parts; whereof one fell to the bishop; a second to the rest of the clergy; a third to the poor; and the fourth was applied to the maintenance of the fabric and other necessary uses of the church. The council of Bracara⁶ makes but three parts, one for the bishop, another for the clergy, and the third for the fabric and lights of the church. But then it was supposed, that the bishop's hospitality should out of such a proportion provide for the necessities of the poor. By other rules the poor, that is, all distressed people, the virgins and widows of the church, together with the martyrs and confessors in prison, the sick and strangers, have one fourth⁷ in the dividend expressly allotted them. For all these had relief (though not a perfect maintenance) from the charity of the church. At Rome there were fifteen hundred such persons, besides the clergy,⁸ provided for this way in the time of Cornelius; and above three thousand at Antioch⁹ in the time of Chrysostom: by which we may make an estimate of the revenues and charities of those populous churches.

In some churches they made no such division, but lived all in common, the clergy with the bishop, as it were in one mansion, and at one table. But this they did not by any general canon, but only upon choice, or particular combination and agreement in some particular churches. As Sozomen¹⁰ notes it to have been the custom at Rinocurura in Egypt, and Possidius affirms¹¹ the same of the church of St. Austin. What was the practice of St. Austin and his clergy we cannot better learn than from St. Austin himself, who tells us, that all his clergy¹² laid themselves voluntarily under an obligation to have all things in common; and therefore none of them could have any property, or any thing to dispose of by will; or, if they had, they were liable to be turned out, and have their names expunged out of the roll of the clergy: which he resolved to do, though they appealed to Rome, or to a thousand councils, against him; by the help of God, they should not be clerks where he was bishop. For his own part, he tells us, he was so punctual to this rule, that if any one presented him with a robe finer than ordinary, he was used to sell it; that since his clergy could not wear the same in kind, they might at least¹³ partake of the benefit, when it was sold and made common. But as this way of living would not comport with the state of all churches, so there were but few that embraced it; and those that did, were not compelled to it by any

Sect. 3.
Rules about the division of church revenues.

¹ Theod. Lect. lib. 1. p. 553.

² Book II. chap. 4. sect. 6.

³ Canon. Apost. c. 39. al. 40.

⁵ Conc. Chalced. c. 25.

⁶ Conc. Bracar. l. c. 25. Placuit, ut de rebus ecclesiasticis fiant tres æquæ portiones, id est, una episcopi, alia clericorum, tertia in reparatione vel in luminariis ecclesie.

⁷ Gelas. Ep. l. al. 9. ad Episc. Lucanie, c. 27. Quatuor tam de redditu quam de oblatione fidelium—convenit fieri portiones: quarum sit una pontificis, altera clericorum tertia pauperum, quarta fabricis applicanda. Vid. Simplicii Ep. 3. ad Florent. Gregor. Magn. lib. 3. Ep. 11.

⁸ Cornel. Ep. ad Fab. ap. Euseb. lib. 6. c. 43.

⁹ Chrys. Hom. 67. in Matth.

¹⁰ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 31.

¹¹ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 25.

¹² Aug. Ser. 50. de Diversis sive de Communi Vita Clericorum, t. 10. p. 523. Quia placuit illis socialis hæc vita, quisquis cum hypocrisi vixerit, quisquis inventus fuerit habens proprium, non illi permitto ut inde faciat testamentum, sed delebo eum de tabula clericorum. Interpellet contra me mille concilia, naviget contra me quo voluerit, sit certe ubi potuerit, adjuvabit me Deus, ut ubi ego episcopus sum, illic clericus esse non possit.

¹³ Ibid. Si quis meliorem dederit, vendo, quod et facere soleo, ut quando non potest vestis esse communis, pretium vestis sit commune.

Sect. 4.
In some churches
the clergy lived all in common.

general law, but only by local statutes of their own appointment.

Yet in one of these two ways the clergy were commonly provided for out of the revenues of the great church, till such times as endowments and settlements began to be made upon parochial churches; which was not done in all places at the same time, nor in one and the same way: but it seems to have had its rise from particular founders of churches, who settled manse and glebe upon the churches which they builded, and upon that score were allowed a right of patronage, to present their own clerk, and invest him with the revenues of the church, wherewith they had endowed it. This practice was begun in the time of Justinian, anno 500, if not before, for there are two of his laws which¹⁴ authorize and confirm it. About the same time, a settlement of other revenues, as oblations, &c., was also made in some places upon parochial churches, as has been observed before out of Theodorus Lector's accounts of the churches of Constantinople. Yet the change is thought by some¹⁵ to be much later in England: for they collect out of Bede,¹⁶ that the ancient course of the clergy's officiating only pro tempore in parochial churches, whilst they received maintenance from the cathedral church, continued in England more than a hundred years after the coming of Austin into England, that is, till about the year 700. For Bede plainly intimates, that at that time the bishop and his clergy lived together, and had all things common, as they had in the primitive church in the days of the apostles.

I have but one thing more to observe upon this head, which is, that such goods or revenues as were once given to the church, were always esteemed devoted to God; and therefore were only to be employed in his service, and not to be diverted to any other use, except some extraordinary case of charity absolutely required it. As if it was to redeem captives, or relieve the poor in time of famine, when no other succours could be afforded them: in that case, it was usual to sell even the sacred vessels and utensils of the church, to make provision for the living temples of God, which were to be preferred before the ornaments of the material buildings. Thus St. Ambrose melted down the communion-plate of the church of Milan to redeem some captives, which otherwise must have continued in slavery: and when the Arians objected this to him invidiously as a crime, he wrote a most elegant apology and vindication for himself, where, among other things worthy the reader's perusal, he pleads his own cause after this manner: Is it not better that the bishop¹⁷ should melt the plate to sustain the poor, when other sustenance cannot be had, than that some sacrilegious enemy should carry it off by spoil and plunder? Will not our Lord expostulate with us upon this account? Why did you suffer so many helpless persons to die with famine, when you had gold to provide them sustenance? Why were so many captives carried away and sold without redemption? Why were so many suffered to be slain by the enemy? It had been better to have preserved the vessels of living men, than lifeless metals. What answer can be returned to this? For what shall a man say? I was afraid lest the temple of God should want its ornaments. But Christ will answer, My sacraments do not require gold, nor please me the more for being ministered in gold, which are not bought with gold. The ornament of my sacraments is the redemption of captives: and those are truly precious vessels, which redeem souls from death. Thus that holy father goes on to justify the fact, which the Arians called sacrilege, but he by a truer name, charity and mercy; for the sake of which he concludes, it was no crime for a man to break, to melt, to sell the mystical vessels of the church, though it were a very great offence for any man to convert them to his own private use. After the same example, we find¹⁸ St. Austin disposed of the plate of his church for the redemption of captives. Acacius, bishop of Amida, did the same for the redemption of seven thousand Persian slaves from the hands of the Roman soldiers, as Socrates¹⁹ informs us. From whence we also learn, that in such cases they did not consider what religion men were of, but only whether they were indigent and necessitous men, and such as stood in need of their assistance. We have the like instances in the practice of Cyril of Jerusalem, mentioned by Theodoret²⁰ and Sozomen, and in Deogratias, bishop of Carthage, whose charity is extolled by Victor Uticensis²¹ upon the same occasion. For he sold the communion-plate to redeem the Roman soldiers, that were taken captives in their wars with the Vandals. This was so far from being esteemed sacrilege, or unjust alienation, that the laws against sacrilege excepted this case, though they did no other whatsoever. As may be seen in the law of Justinian, which²² forbids the selling or pawning the church plate, or vestments, ¹⁴ Justin. Novel. 57. c. 2. Novel. 123. c. 18.

¹⁵ Cawdrey, Disc. of Patronage, c. 2. p. 8. Selden, of Tithes, c. 9. p. 255.
¹⁶ Bede, Hist. Gentis Anglor. lib. 4. c. 27.
¹⁷ Ambros. de Offic. lib. 2. c. 28.
¹⁸ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 24. ¹⁹ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 21.

²⁰ Theod. lib. 2. c. 27. Sozom. lib. 4. c. 25.
²¹ Victor. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 1. Bibl. Patr. t. 7. p. 591.
²² Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 2. de Sacrosanct. Eccles. Leg. 21. Sancimus, nemini licere sacratissima atque arcana vasa, vel vestes, cæteraque donaria, quæ ad Divinam religionem ne-or any other gifts, except in case of captivity or famine, to redeem slaves, or relieve the poor; because in such cases the lives or souls of men were to be preferred before any vessels or vestments whatsoever. The poverty of the clergy was a pitiable case of the same nature: and therefore, if the annual income of the church would not maintain them, and there was no other way to provide them of necessaries; in that case some canons²³ allowed the bishop to alienate or sell certain goods of the church, to raise a present maintenance.

But that no fraud might be committed in any such cases, the same canons did specially provide, that when any urgent necessity compelled the bishop to take this extraordinary course, he should first consult his clergy, and also the metropolitan, and others his comprovincial bishops, that they might judge of the necessity, and whether it were a reasonable ground for such a proceeding. The fourth council of Carthage²⁴ disannuls all such acts of the bishop, whereby he either gives away, or sells, or commutes any goods of the church, without the consent and subscription of his clergy. And the fifth council of Carthage²⁵ requires him to intimate the case and necessity of his church first to the primate of the province, that he with a certain number of bishops may judge whether it be fitting to be done. The council of Agde²⁶ says, he should first consult two or three of his neighbouring bishops, and take their approbation. Thus stood the laws of the church, so long as the bishop and his clergy had a common right in the dividend of ecclesiastical revenues: nothing could be alienated without the consent of both parties, and the cognizance and ratification of the metropolitan or provincial synod. So that the utmost precaution was taken in this affair, lest, under the pretence of necessity or charity, any spoil or devastation should be made of the goods and revenues of the church.

Sect. 7.
And that with the joint consent of the bishop and his clergy, with the approbation of the metropolitan or some provincial bishops.

cessaria sunt—vel ad venditionem vel ad hypothecam vel ad pignus trahere—excepta causa captivitatis et famis in locis quibus hoc contigerit. Nam si necessitas fuerit in redemptione captivorum, tunc et venditionem præfatarum rerum divinarum, et hypothecam et pignorationes fieri concedimus; quoniam non absurdum est, animas hominum quibuscunque vasis vel vestimentis præferri.

²³ Conc. Carthag. 5. c. 4. Conc. Agathen. c. 7.

²⁴ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 32. Irrita erit donatio episcoporum, vel venditio vel commutatio rei ecclesiasticæ, absque conventiva et subscriptione clericorum.

²⁵ Conc. Carth. 5. c. 4. Si aliqua necessitas cogit, hanc insinuandam esse primati provinciæ ipsius, ut cum statuto numero episcoporum, utrum faciendum sit, arbitretur.

²⁶ Conc. Agathen. c. 7. Apud duos vel tres comprovinciales vel vicinos episcopos, causa qua necesse sit vendi, primitus comprobetur.

BOOK VI.

AN ACCOUNT OF SEVERAL LAWS AND RULES, RELATING TO THE EMPLOYMENT, LIFE, AND CONVERSATION OF THE PRIMITIVE CLERGY.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE EXCELLENCY OF THESE RULES IN GENERAL, AND THE EXEMPLARINESS OF THE CLERGY IN CONFORMING TO THEM.

Sect. 1.
The excellency of the Christian rules
attested and envied
by the heathens.

I HAVE in the two foregoing Books given an account of the great care of the primitive church in providing and training up fit persons for the ministry, and of the great encouragements that were given them by the state, as well to honour and distinguish their calling, as to excite and provoke them to be sedulous in the discharge of their several offices and functions. There is one thing more remains, which is, to give an account also of the church's care in making necessary laws and canons, obliging every member of the ecclesiastic body to live conformable to his profession, and exercise himself in the duties of his station and calling. These rules were many of them so excellent in their own nature, and so strictly and carefully observed by those who had a concern in them, that some of the chief adversaries of the Christian religion could not but take notice of them, and with a sort of envy and emulation bear testimony to them. Among the works of Julian there is a famous epistle of his to Arsacius, high priest of Galatia, (which is recorded also¹ by Sozomen,) wherein he takes occasion to tell him, that it was very visible that the causes of the great increase of Christianity were chiefly their professed hospitality toward strangers, and their great care in burying the dead, joined with a pretended sanctity and holiness of life. Therefore he bids him, as high priest of Galatia, to take care that all the priests of that region that were under him, should be made to answer the same character; and that he should either by his threatenings or persuasions bring them to be diligent and sober men, or else remove them from the office of priesthood: that he should admonish the priests, neither to appear at the theatre, nor frequent the tavern, nor follow any calling or employment that was dishonourable and scandalous; and such as were observant of his directions he should honour and promote them, but discard and expel the refractory and contumacious. This is plainly to say, (and it is so much the more remarkable for its coming from the mouth of an adversary,) that the Christian clergy of those times were men that lived by excellent rules, diligent in their employment, grave and sober in their deportment, charitable to the indigent, and cautious and reserved in their whole conversation and behaviour toward all men. Which, as it tended mightily to propagate and advance Christianity in the world, so it was what Julian upon that account could not but look upon with an envious eye, and desire that his idol-priests might gain the same character; thereby to eclipse the envied reputation of the other, and reflect honour and lustre upon his beloved heathen religion. We have the like testimonies in Ammianus Marcellinus² and others, concerning the frugality, temperance, modesty, and humility of Christian bishops in their own times; which coming from the pens of professed heathens, and such as did neither spare the emperors themselves, nor the bishops of Rome, who lived in greater state and affluence, may well be thought authentic relations, and just accounts of those holy men, whose commendations and characters so ample nothing but truth could have extorted from the adversaries of their religion.

This being so, we may the more easily give credit to those noble panegyrics and encomiums, which some ancient Christian writers make upon the clergy, and their virtues and discipline in general. Origen says,³ it was the business of their life to traverse every corner of the world, and make converts and proselytes to godliness both in cities and villages: and they were so far from making a gain hereof, that many of them took nothing for their service; and those that did, took only what was necessary for their present subsistence, though there wanted not persons enough, who in their liberality were

Sect. 2.
The character of the clergy from Christian writers.

¹ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 16.

² Ammian. Marcel. lib. 27.

³ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 3. p. 116.

ready to have communicated much more to them. St. Austin⁴ gives the like good character of the bishops and presbyters of his own time, making them the chief ornament of the catholic church, and extolling their virtues above those of a monastic life, because their province was more difficult, having to converse with all sorts of men, and being forced to bear with their distempers in order to cure them. He that would see more of this general character, must consult the ancient apologists, where he will find it interwoven with the character of Christians in general; whose innocence, and patience, and charity, and universal goodness was owing partly to the institutions, and partly to the provoking examples of their guides and leaders; who lived as they spake, and first trod the path themselves, which they required others to walk in. Which was the thing that set the Christian teachers so much above the philosophers of the Gentiles. For the philosophers indeed discoursed and wrote very finely about virtue in the theory, but they undid all they said in their own practice. Their discourses, as Minucius⁵ observes, were only eloquent harangues against their own vices; whereas the Christian philosophers expressed their profession not in their words or habit, but in the real virtues of the soul: they did not talk great, but live well; and so attained to that glory, which the philosophers pretended always to be offering at, but could never happily arrive to. Lactantius⁶ triumphs over the Gentile philosophers upon the same topic: and so Gregory Nazianzen,⁷ Tertullian,⁸ Cyprian,⁹ and many others; whose arguments had been easily retorted, had not the Christian teachers been generally men of a better character, and free from those imputations which they cast upon the adverse party.

Sect. 3.
Particular exceptions no derogation to their general good character.

Some few instances indeed, it cannot be denied, are to be found of persons, who in these best ages were scandals and reproaches to their profession. The complaints that are made by good men will not suffer us to believe otherwise. Cyprian¹⁰ and Eusebius¹¹ lament the vices of some among the clergy, as well as laity, and reckon them among the causes that moved the Divine Providence to send those two great fiery trials upon the church, the Decian and the Diocletian persecutions; thereby to purge the tares from the wheat, and correct those enormities and abuses, which the ordinary remedy of ecclesiastical discipline, through the iniquity of the times, was not able to redress. The like complaints are made by Chrysostom,¹² Gregory Nazianzen,¹³ and St. Jerom,¹⁴ of some ecclesiastics in their own times, whose practices were corrupt, and dishonourable to their profession. And indeed it were a wonder if all ages should not afford some such instances of unsound members in so great a body of men, since there was a Judas even among the apostles. But then it is to be considered, that a few such exceptions did not derogate from the good character, which the primitive clergy did generally deserve: and the faults of those very men were the occasion of many good laws and rules of discipline, which the provincial synods of those times enacted; out of which I have chiefly collected the following account, which concerns the lives and labours of the ancient clergy.

To these the reader may join those excellent tracts of the ancients, which purposely handle this subject; such as St. Chrysostom's six books de Sacerdotio; St. Jerom's second epistle to Nepotian, which is called, De Vita Clericorum; and Gregory Nazianzen's apology for his flying from the priesthood; in all which the duties of the clergy are excellently described. Or if any one desires rather to see them exemplified in some living instances and great patterns of perfection, which commonly make deeper impressions than bare rules, he must consult those excellent characters of the most eminent primitive bishops, which are drawn to the life by the best pens of the age; such as the Life of Ignatius by Chrysostom; the Life of St. Basil and Athanasius by Gregory Nazianzen; the Life of St. Austin by Possidius; the Life of Gregory Thaumaturgus and Meletius by Gregory Nyssen; in all which the true character and idea of a Christian bishop is set forth and described with this advantage, that a man does not barely read of rules, but sees them, as it were, exemplified in practice. The chief of these discourses in both kinds are already translated into our own language by other pens,¹⁵ and they are too prolix to be inserted into a discourse of this nature, which proceeds in a different method from them. I shall therefore only extract such observations from them, as fall in with the public and general laws of the church, (of which I give an account in the following chapters,) and leave the rest to the curious diligence of the inquisitive reader.

Sect. 4.
An account of some ancient writers which treat of the duties of the clergy.

⁴ Aug. de Moribus Eccles. Cathol. c. 32. t. 1. p. 330.

⁵ Minuc. Octav. p. 110.

⁶ Lact. lib. 4. c. 23. lib. 3. c. 15.

⁷ Naz. Invect. 1. in Julian. ⁸ Tertul. Apol. c. 46.

⁹ Cyprian, de Bono Patient. p. 210.

¹⁰ Cypr. de Lapsis, p. 124.

¹¹ Euseb. lib. 8. c. 1.

¹² Chrys. Hom. 30. in Act.

¹³ Naz. Carm. Cygn. de Episcopis, t. 2.

¹⁴ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian.

¹⁵ See Bishop Burnet's Pastoral Care, c. 4. and Seller's Remarks on the Lives of the Primitive Fathers.

CHAPTER II.

OF LAWS RELATING TO THE LIFE AND CONVERSATION OF THE PRIMITIVE CLERGY.

Sect. 1.
Exemplary purity required in the clergy above other men.
Reasons for it.

THE laws of the church which concerned the clergy, I shall, for distinction's sake, consider under three heads; speaking, first, Of such laws as concerned their life and conversation. Secondly, Of such as more particularly related to the exercise of the several offices and duties of their function. Thirdly, Of such as were a sort of outguards or fences to both the former. The laws which related to their life and conversation, were such as tended to create in them a sublimity of virtue above other men; forasmuch as they were to be examples and patterns to them; which, if good, would be both a light and a spur to others; but if bad, the very pests and banes of the church. It is Gregory Nazianzen's reflection¹ upon the different sorts of guides which he had observed then in the church. Some, he complains, did with unwashed hands and profane minds press to handle the holy mysteries, and affect to be at the altar, before they were fit to be initiated to any sacred service. They looked upon the holy order and function, not as designed for an example of virtue, but only as a way of subsisting themselves; not as a trust, of which they were to give an account, but a state of absolute authority and exemption. And these men's examples corrupted the people's morals, faster than any cloth can imbibe a colour, or a plague infect the air; since men were more disposed to receive the tincture of vice than virtue from the example of their rulers. In opposition to such he lays down this as the first thing to be aimed at by all spiritual physicians, that they should draw the picture of all manner of virtues in their own lives, and set themselves as examples to the people; that it might not be proverbially said of them, that they set about curing others, while they themselves were full of sores and ulcers. Nor were they to draw this image of virtue slightly and to a faint degree, but accurately and to the highest perfection: since nothing less than such degrees and measures of virtue were expected by God from the rulers and governors of his people: and then there would be hopes, that such heights and eminences would draw the multitude at least to a mediocrity in virtue, and allure them to embrace that voluntarily by gentle persuasions, which they would not be brought to so effectually and lastingly by force and compulsion. He urges further² the necessity of such a purity, from the consideration of the sacredness and majesty of the function itself. A minister's office sets him in the same rank and order with angels themselves; he celebrates God with archangels; transmits the church's sacrifices to the altar in heaven, and performs the priest's office with Christ himself; he reforms the work of God's hands, and presents the image to his Maker; his workmanship is for the world above: and therefore he should be exalted to a divine and heavenly nature, whose business is to be as a god himself, and make others gods also. St. Chrysostom³ makes use of the same argument: That the priesthood, though it be exercised upon earth, is occupied wholly about heavenly things; that it is the ministry of angels put by the Holy Ghost into the hands of mortal men; and therefore a priest ought to be pure and holy, as being placed in heaven itself in the midst of those heavenly powers. He presses likewise the danger and prevalency of a bad example.⁴ Subjects commonly form their manners by the pattern of their princes. How then should a proud man be able to assuage the swelling tumours of others? or an angry ruler hope to make his people in love with moderation and meekness? Bishops are exposed, like combatants in the theatre, to the view and observation of all men; and their faults, though never so small, cannot be hid: and therefore, as their virtuous actions profit many, by provoking them to the like zeal; so their vices will render others unfit to attempt or prosecute any thing that is noble and good. For which reason their souls ought to shine all over with the purest brightness, that they may both enlighten and extimulate the souls of others, who have their eyes upon them. A priest should arm himself all over with purity of life, as with adamantine armour: for if he leave any part naked and unguarded, he is surrounded both with open enemies and pretended friends, who will be ready to wound and supplant him. So long as his life is all of a piece, he needs not fear their assaults; but if he be overseen in a fault, though but a small one, it will be laid hold of and improved to the prejudice of all his former virtues. For all men are most severe judges in his case, and treat him not with any allowance for being encompassed with flesh, or as having a human nature; but expect he should be an angel, and free from all infirmities. He cannot indeed (as the same father argues⁵ in another place) with any tolerable decency and freedom discharge his office in punishing and reproving others, unless he himself be blameless and without rebuke. The priest's office is a more difficult province⁶ than that of leading an army, or governing a kingdom, and requires an angelic virtue. His soul ought to be purer than the rays of the sun, that the Holy

¹ Naz. Orat. 1. Apologet. de Fuga, t. 1. p. 5.

² Naz. ibid. p. 31. ³ Chrys. de Sacerdot. lib. 3. c. 4.

⁴ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 3. c. 14.

⁵ Ibid. lib. 5. c. 3.

⁶ Chrys. ibid. lib. 6. c. 2.

Spirit may never leave him desolate; but that he may be always able to say, "I live, yet not I, but Christ that liveth in me." He there goes on to draw the comparison⁷ at large between the clerical and the monastic life, and shows how much more difficult it is to take care of a multitude of men immersed in secular business, than of a single person, that lives retired and free from temptation. And upon the whole matter he concludes,⁸ that as God requires greater purity in those that serve at his altar, so he will exact a more ample account of them, and more severely punish their offences. By these and many other such like arguments did those holy fathers try to raise both in themselves and others a just sense of that universal purity, which becomes the sacred function.

And to the strength of these arguments the church added the authority of her sanctions, inflicting severer penalties upon offending clergymen than any others. For whereas all other offenders were allowed, by the benefit of public penance, to regain the privileges of their order; this favour was commonly denied by the church to such of her sons among the clergy as were notorious for any scandalous crimes, whereby they became a reproach to their profession. For such delinquents were usually deposed from their office, and sometimes excommunicated also, and obliged to do penance among the laymen; but with this difference, that though repentance would restore them to the peace of the church, yet it would not qualify them to act in their office and station again; but they must be content thenceforth to communicate only as laymen. Some canons indeed did not oblige them to do public penance in the church, because they thought it punishment enough to degrade them; others required them to submit to that part of discipline also. But still the result and consequence of both was the same, that such persons for ever after were only to be treated in the quality of laymen. Those called the Apostolical Canons are sometimes for the former way; for one of them⁹ says, If a bishop, presbyter, or deacon is taken in fornication, perjury, or theft, he shall be deposed, but not excommunicated; for the scripture saith, Thou shalt not punish twice for the same crime. I do not now stand to inquire whether there be any such scripture as these canons refer to, but only observe what was the practice of the Greek church when these canons were made; which is also taken notice of in St. Basil's¹⁰ canons, and those of Peter of Alexandria,¹¹ and some others, which show it to have been the customary practice of their churches. Yet for simony,¹² and some other¹³ crimes, the same Apostolical Canons order both deposition and excommunication. And in the African church both punishments were inflicted also for one and the same crime, in the time of Cyprian, as appears from his epistle¹⁴ to Cornelius, where speaking of Novatus, who was guilty of murder, in causing his own wife, by a blow, to miscarry, he says, For this crime he was not only to be degraded, or expelled the presbytery, but to be deprived of the communion of the church also. From whence we may collect the severity of the ancient canons against such crimes of the clergy in general, as were committed to the flagrant scandal of the church.

Hence also we may observe in particular, what sort of crimes were thought worthy to be punished with degradation, namely, such as theft, murder, perjury, fraud, sacrilege, fornication and adultery, and such like gross and scandalous offences. For in this case they distinguished between peccatum and crimen, little faults and crimes of a more heinous nature. For St. Austin observes,¹⁵ it was not all manner of failings that hindered men's ordination at first; for if the apostle had required that as a qualification in persons to be ordained, that they should be without sin, all men must have been rejected, and none ordained, since no man lives without sin; but he only requires that they should be blameless in respect to criminal and scandalous offences. And this was the rule the church observed in canvassing the lives of her clergy after ordination, when they were actually engaged in her service. It was not every lesser failing or infirmity that was punished with degradation; but only crimes of a deeper dye, such as theft, murder, fraud, perjury, sacrilege, fornication, and adultery. Concerning the last of which there are these two things further observable in some of the ancient canons. First, That if any clergyman's wife was convicted of adultery, he himself was obliged to show his resentment and detestation of the fact by putting her away, under pain of deposition, if he continued to live with her. For so the council¹⁶

⁷ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 6. c. 3.

⁸ Ibid. lib. 6. c. 10 et 11.

⁹ Canon. Apost. c. 24.

¹⁰ Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 3, 32, 51.

¹¹ Pet. Alex. Ep. Canon. c. 10. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2.

¹² Canon. Apost. c. 28.

¹³ Ibid. c. 29 et 50.

¹⁴ Cypr. Ep. 49. al. 52. p. 97. Propter hoc se non de presbyterio tantum, sed et communicatione prohiberi pro certo tenebat, &c.

¹⁵ Aug. Tract. 41. in Joh. t. 9. p. 126. Apostolus Paulus, quando elegit ordinandos vel presbyteros vel diaconos, et quicumque ordinandus est ad præposituram ecclesiæ, non ait, si quis sine peccato est; hoc enim si diceret, omnis homo reprobaretur, nullus ordinaretur; sed ait, si quis sine crimine est, sicut est homicidium, adulterium, aliqua immunditia fornicationis, furtum, fraus, sacrilegium, et cætera hujusmodi.

¹⁶ Conc. Neocæs. c. 8. 'Εάν μετὰ τὴν χειροτονίαν μοι χευθῆ, ὀφείλει ἀπολύσαι αὐτήν· ἐάν δὲ συζῆ, οὐ δύναται ἔχσθαι τῆς ἐγχειρισθείσης αὐτῷ ὑπηρεσίας.

of Neocæsarea words it: A man whose wife is evidently convicted of adultery while he is a layman, shall not be ordained: but if she commit adultery after his ordination, he ought to put her away; and if he cohabit with her, he may not retain her and his ministry together. The council of Eliberis¹⁷ is still more severe in the case, denying communion to such persons even at their last hour, who retained wives guilty of adultery; because, says the canon, they who ought to be examples of good conversation to others, do by this means teach others the way to sin. Secondly, The other thing to be observed is, that if a bishop neglected to inflict the censures of the church upon any of his clergy, who were guilty of fornication, he made himself liable to be deposed: as Socrates¹⁸ observes the Arians themselves deposed Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, for this reason among others, that he had admitted a deacon to communion, who had been taken in fornication.

Another crime, which brought many clerks under this kind of ecclesiastical censure, was that of lapsing in time of persecution. In which case repentance was allowed to restore them to the peace of the church as laymen, if they pleased, but not to officiate or communicate as ecclesiastics any longer. Thus Trophimus was treated in the time of Cornelius and Cyprian; he was admitted to communicate as a layman,¹⁹ but not to retain his office of priesthood. And this, Cyprian says,²⁰ was then the rule at Rome and over all the world, if bishops or any other lapsed in time of persecution, to admit them to do penance in the church, but, withal, to remove them from the function of the clergy and honour of the priesthood: as the African synod, in whose name he writes to the Spanish churches, determined, in the case of Basilides and Martial, two Spanish bishops, who, when they had lapsed, thought to qualify themselves by repentance to retain their bishoprics; but this, he tells them, was contrary to the rule and practice of the universal church. He repeats this in several other epistles,²¹ where he has occasion to speak of persons in the same unhappy circumstances with them. We find the same order in the canons of Peter,²² bishop of Alexandria, and the first council of Arles,²³ where not only such as fell by sacrificing, or open denial of their faith, but also all traditors are included in the number of lapsers, that is, all such as either gave up their Bibles, or the holy vessels of the church, or the names of their brethren to the persecutors; and all such who were of the clergy, are for ever excluded from the exercise and benefit of their order and function. Such was the discipline of the ancient church in reference to those guides, who set their people an ill example by their apostacy in time of persecution: it was not thought fit to trust them to be guides and leaders for the future. Though I do not deny, but that some exceptions may be found to this general rule, either when the discipline of the church was not so strict, or when it was otherwise found more for the benefit of the church to restore lapsers to their honours, than to degrade and remove them wholly from them. For I have noted before, that both lapsers, and heretics, and schismatics, were sometimes more favourably treated, when the church thought she might find her account in showing favour to them.

But to proceed with the laws of the church relating to other misdemeanors: as the life of a clergyman was a continual attendance upon the altar, and constantly to be employed in the exercise of Divine and heavenly things; so upon that account the utmost sobriety was required of him, together with a strict care to spend his time aright, and lay it out usefully; so as might best answer the ends of his calling, and those spiritual employments he was daily to be engaged in. And for this reason drinking and gaming, those two great consumers of time, and enemies of all noble undertakings and generous services, were strictly prohibited the clergy under the same penalty of deprivation. For so the Apostolical Canons word it,²⁴ A bishop, presbyter, or deacon, that spends time in drinking or playing at dice, shall either reform, or be deposed. Where we may observe this difference between this and the former laws, that it does not make every single act of these crimes, ipso facto, deprivation, but only continuance therein without reforming. And by Justinian's law,²⁵ the penalty for playing at tables is changed from deprivation to a triennial suspension, and intrusion into a monastery for the performance of repentance. Some perhaps will wonder at the severity of these laws, in prohibiting the exercise

Sect. 4.
Also lapsing in time of persecution.

Sect. 5.
And drinking and gaming.

¹⁷ Conc. Eliber. c. 65. Si cujus clerici uxor fuerit mœchata, et sciat eam maritus suus mœchari, et eam non statim projecerit, nec in fine accipiat communionem: ne ab his qui exemplum bonæ conversationis esse debent, videantur magisteria scelerum procedere.

¹⁸ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 42.

¹⁹ Cypr. Ep. 52. al. 55. ad Antonian. p. 106. Sic tamen admissus est Trophimus, ut laicus communicet—non quasi locum sacerdotis usurpet.

²⁰ Id. Ep. 68. al. 67. ad Pleb. Hispan. p. 174. Frustra tales episcopatum sibi usurpare conantur, &c.

²¹ Cypr. Ep. 55. al. 59. ad Cornel. p. 133. It. Ep. 64. al. 65. ad Epictet.

²² Petr. Alex. Ep. Canon. c. 10. "Οτε δὲ ἔπταισαν, οὐκ ἔτι δύνανται λειτουργεῖν.

²³ Conc. Arelat. 1. c. 13. De his qui Scripturas Sanctas tradidisse dicuntur, vel vasa Dominica, vel nomina fratrum suorum, placuit nobis, ut quicumque eorum ex actis publicis fuerit detectus, non verbis nudis, ab ordine cleri amoveatur.

²⁴ Can. Apost. 41. Κύβοις σχολάζων καὶ μέθαις, ἢ πανσάσθω, ἢ καθαιρέσθω.

²⁵ Justin. Novel. 123. c. 10.

of tables under such a penalty: but their wonder will cease, when they are told, that it was equally prohibited to the laity under pain of excommunication. For the council of Eliberis²⁶ orders, that a Christian playing at dice or tables shall not be admitted to the holy communion, but after a year's penance and abstinence, and his total amendment. And there was good reason for the church to make such a law in those times, because this kind of gaming was prohibited both by the old and new civil law²⁷ among the Romans, and many other nations, of which the reader may find a particular account in our learned Bishop Taylor,²⁸ together with the reasons of the prohibition, viz. the evils that commonly attended this sort of play, blasphemies, and swearing, and passion, and lying, and cursing, and covetousness, and fraud, and quarrels, and intemperance of all sorts, the consumption of time, and ruin of many families; which excesses had made it infamous and scandalous among all nations. So that what was so universally prohibited at that time by the laws of all nations, the church could not but in decency prohibit by her own laws to the laity, and more especially to the clergy, to prevent scandal, and obviate those objections, which might otherwise have justly been raised against her. Not that the thing was simply unlawful in itself, when used only as an innocent recreation; but the many evil appendages that commonly attended the use of it, had made it scandalous, and consequently inexpedient; and the spending of time upon it did much alter the nature of it, and make it so much the more unlawful.

Another crime for which a clergyman was liable to be deposed, was the taking of usury, which by the ancient canons is frequently condemned as a species of covetousness and cruelty, and upon that score so strictly prohibited to the clergy, who were rather to study to excel in the practice of the contrary virtues, charity, mercifulness, and contempt of the world and all filthy lucre. The laws condemning this vice are too many to be here transcribed: it will be sufficient to repeat the canon of the council of Nice, which contains the sum, and speaks the sense of all the rest. Now the words of

Sec. 6.
And negotiating upon usury. The nature of this crime inquired into.

that canon are these: Forasmuch²⁹ as many clerks, following covetousness and filthy lucre, and forgetting the Holy Scriptures, (which speak of the righteous man as one that hath not given his money upon usury,) have let forth their money upon usury, and taken the usual monthly increase: it seemed good to this great and holy synod, that if any one after this decree shall be found to take usury, or demand the principal with half the increase of the whole, or shall invent any other such methods for filthy lucre's sake, he shall be degraded from his order, and have his name struck out of the roll of the church. The reader will find the same practice censured by those called the Apostolical Canons,³⁰ the council of Eliberis,³¹ the first and second of Arles,³² the first and third of Carthage,³³ the council of Laodicea,³⁴ and Trullo,³⁵ not to mention private writers, Cyprian,³⁶ Sidonius Apollinarius,³⁷ St. Jerome,³⁸ and many others. Nor need this seem strange to any one, that usury should be so generally condemned in the clergy; since it is apparent, that the practice of it was no less disallowed in the laity: for the first council of Carthage³⁹ condemns it in them both, but only makes it a more aggravating crime in the clergy. The council of Eliberis also,⁴⁰ that orders clergymen to be degraded for it, makes it a high misdemeanor in laymen; which, if they persisted in the practice of it after admonition, was to be punished with excommunication. We are here therefore in the next place to inquire into the nature of this practice, and the grounds and reasons upon which it was so generally condemned both in clergymen and laymen. As to the nature of the thing, we are to observe, that among the ancient Romans there were several sorts or degrees of usury. The most common was that which they called centesimæ: the council of Nice⁴¹ calls it ἑκατοσταί, and the council of Trullo⁴² uses the same word, which signifies the hundredth part of the principal paid every month, and answers to twelve in the hundred by the year. For the Romans received usury by the month, that is, at the kalends or first day of every month. Whence St. Basil⁴³ calls the months the parents of usury. And St. Ambrose⁴⁴ says, the Greeks gave usury the name of τόκος, upon this account, because the ²⁶ Conc. Eliber. c. 79. Si quis fidelis alea, id est, tabula luserit, placuit eum abstinere: et si emendatus cessaverit, poterit post annum communionem reconciliari.

²⁷ Digest. lib. 11. Tit. 5. de Aleator. It. Cod. Justin. lib. 3. Tit. 43. de Aleator.

²⁸ Taylor, Duct. Dubitant. lib. 4. c. 1. p. 776.

²⁹ Conc. Nic. c. 17.

³⁰ Can. Apost. c. 43.

³¹ Conc. Eliber. c. 20.

³² Conc. Arelat. 1. c. 12. Arelat. 2. c. 14.

³³ Conc. Carthag. 1. c. 13. Carthag. 3. c. 16.

³⁴ Conc. Laodic. c. 4.

³⁵ Conc. Trull. c. 10.

³⁶ Cypr. de Lapsis, p. 124.

³⁷ Sidon. lib. 1. Ep. 8.

³⁸ Hieron. in Ezek. cap. 18.

³⁹ Conc. Carth. 1. c. 13. Quod in laicis reprehenditur, id multo magis in clericis oportet prædamnari.

⁴⁰ Conc. Eliber. c. 20. Si quis etiam laicus accepisse probatur usuram—si in ea iniquitate duraverit, ab ecclesia sciat se esse projiciendum. Vid. Chrysost. Hom. 55. in Mat.

⁴¹ Conc. Nic. c. 17.

⁴² Conc. Trull. c. 10. Chrysost. Hom. 56. in Mat.

⁴³ Basil. in Psalm xiv. t. 3. p. 137. Φοβέεται τοὺς μῆνας ὡς τόκων πατέρας.

⁴⁴ Ambr. de Tobia, c. 12. Τόκους Græci appellaverunt usuram, eo quod dolores partus animæ debitoris excitare videantur. Veniunt kalendæ, parit sors centesimam. Veniunt menses singuli, generantur usuræ.

kalends bring forth one in the hundred, and every month begets new usury. And hence, as the poet acquaints us,⁴⁵ it became a proverb among the Romans, to say, A man trembles like a debtor, when the kalends are a coming; because that was the time of paying interest. Now this sort of usury is generally proscribed by the laws of the church, because it was esteemed great oppression. Though the civil law allowed the practice of it: for Constantine, anno 325, the same year that the council of Nice was held, published a law, stating the rules and measures of usury, wherein⁴⁶ the creditor is allowed to take this centesimal usury, or one in the hundred every month, and no more. For it seems the old Roman laws granted a greater liberty before this regulation of Constantine. Afterward a new regulation was made, and it was only allowed in some certain cases, as where the creditor seemed to run some hazard, as appears from the laws of Justinian,⁴⁷ where he settles the business of interest and usury in his Code. For in trajectitious contracts, as the law terms them, that is, when a creditor lent money, suppose at Rome, to receive interest for it only upon condition of the debtor's safe arrival with it at Constantinople; because in that case the creditor ran a great hazard, he was allowed to receive a centesimal interest upon that account. Secondly, Another sort of usury was that which the canons call ἡμολία, or sescuplum, the whole and half as much more. St. Jerom takes notice⁴⁸ of this kind of usury, and condemns it. For men, he says, were used to exact usury for the loan of corn, wine, oil, millet, and other fruits of the ground; lending ten bushels in winter, on condition to receive fifteen in harvest, that is, the whole and half as much more. Which sort of usury, being a very grievous extortion and great oppression, is condemned not only in the clergy by the councils of Nice⁴⁹ and Laodicea,⁵⁰ under the name of ἡμολία; but also in laymen by the law of Justinian,⁵¹ which allows nothing above centesimal interest to be taken by any person in any case whatsoever. Though Justinian intimates that formerly the laws allowed it. And it is evident from the law of Constantine still extant in the Theodosian Code, which determined, That if any creditor lent to the indigent any fruits of the earth,⁵² whether wet or dry, he might demand again the principal, and half as much more by way of usury: as, if he lent two bushels, he might require three. Thirdly, Another sort of usury is called by the civil law, bessis centesima, which is two-thirds of centesimal interest, and the same as eight in the hundred. And this the law allowed masters⁵³ of workhouses and other tradesmen to take in their negociations with others. Fourthly, All other persons were only allowed to receive half the centesimal interest by the same law of Justinian:⁵⁴ which is the same as six in the hundred. Fifthly, Persons of quality were bound to take no more but a third part of the centesima,⁵⁵ which is only four in the hundred. Sixthly, and lastly, Interest upon interest was absolutely forbidden⁵⁶ by the Roman laws to all persons in any case whatsoever, as is evident from an edict of Justinian's, which both mentions and confirms the ancient prohibition of it by the laws of the emperors that were before him. So that several of these kinds of usury being prohibited to the laity in general by the laws of the state, it was no wonder that they should be more severely forbidden to the clergy by the laws of the church. Then for the other sorts of usury, which the state allowed, the church had two reasons for discouraging the practice of them in the clergy. First, Because usury was most commonly exacted of the poor, which the church reckoned an oppression of them, who were rather to be relieved by the charity of lending without usury, as the gospel requires. Secondly, The clergy could not take usury of the rich and trading part of the world, but that must needs engage them in secular business and worldly concerns, more than the wisdom of the church in those times thought fit to allow. And this I take to be the true state of the case, and the sum of the reasons for prohibiting the clergy the practice of usury in the primitive church. Usury was generally a ⁴⁵ Horat. lib. 1. Sat. 3. Odisti et fugis, ut Drusonem debitor aris—quum tristes misero venere kalendæ.

⁴⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 2. Tit. 33. de Usuris, Leg. 1. Pro pecunia ultra singulas centesimas creditor vetatur accipere.

⁴⁷ Cod. Just. lib. 4. Tit. 32. de Usuris, Leg. 26. In trajectitiis autem contractibus, vel specierum fœnori dationibus, usque ad centesimam tantummodo licere stipulari, nec eam excedere, licet veteribus legibus hoc erat concessum.

⁴⁸ Hieron. Com. in Ezek. xviii. p. 537. Solent in agris frumenti et milli, vini et olei, cæterarumque specierum usuræ exigi.—Verbi gratia, ut hyemis tempore demus decem modios, et in messe recipiamus quindecim, hoc est, amplius partem mediam.

⁴⁹ Conc. Nic. c. 17.

⁵⁰ Conc. Laod. c. 4.

⁵¹ Cod. Just. ubi supra. It. Novel. 32, 33, 34.

⁵² Cod. Th. lib. 2. Tit. 33. Leg. 1. Quicumque fruges, aridas vel humidas, indigentibus mutuas dederint, usuræ nomine tertiam partem superfluum consequantur: Id est, ut si summa crediti in duobus modiis fuerit, tertium modium amplius consequantur.

⁵³ Cod. Just. lib. 4. Tit. 32. de Usuris, Leg. 26. Illos, qui ergasteriis præsumt, vel aliquam licitam negotiationem gerunt, usque ad bessem centesimæ, usurarum nomine, in quocunque contractu suam stipulationem moderari.

⁵⁴ Cod. Just. ibid. Cæteros omnes homines dimidium tantummodo centesimæ usurarum nomine posse stipulari.

⁵⁵ Ibid. Jubemus illustribus quidem personis, sive eas præcedentibus, minime licere ultra tertiam partem centesimæ in quocunque contractu stipulari.

⁵⁶ Cod. Just. lib. 4. Tit. 32. Leg. 28. Ut nullo modo usuræ usurarum a debitoribus exigantur, veteribus quidem legibus constitutum fuerat, &c.

great oppression to the poor, as the ancient writers who speak against it⁵⁷ commonly complain: or else it was thought to argue, and proceed from, a covetous and worldly mind; which made men forsake their proper employment, and betake themselves to other business, which was beside their calling, and could not then be followed without some reproach and dishonour to it. Therefore Cyprian, speaking of some bishops who were the reproach of his age, in enumerating their miscarriages, joins all these things together; That they who ought to have been examples and encouragers to the rest, had cast off the care of Divine service⁵⁸ to manage secular affairs; and leaving their sees, and deserting their people, they rambled into other provinces, to catch at business that would bring them in gain: meanwhile the poor brethren of the church were suffered to starve without relief, whilst their minds were set upon hoarding up silver in abundance, and getting estates by fraudulent arts, and exercising usury to augment their own treasures. When usury was ordinarily attended with such concomitants as these, it was no wonder it should be utterly proscribed by the holy fathers of the church. Besides, St. Chrysostom⁵⁹ plainly intimates, that in his time all senators and persons of quality were absolutely forbidden to take usury by the laws of the commonwealth. And that consideration probably so much the more inclined the fathers of the church to forbid it to the clergy, lest they should seem to be outdone by men of a secular life; and it might be objected to them, that the laws of the church in this respect were more remiss than the laws of the state.

Indeed the necessities of the poor and fatherless, and strangers and widows, in those early times, were so importunate and craving in every church, that their revenues would seldom answer all their demands. The church, as St. Austin says,⁶⁰ had very rarely any thing to lay up in bank. And then it did not become a bishop to hoard up gold, and turn away the poor empty from him. They had daily so many

Sect. 7.
Of the hospitality of the clergy.

Sect. 8.
Of their frugality and contempt of the world.

poor petitioners, so many in distress and want continually applying to them, that they were forced to leave some in their sorrows, because they had not wherewith to relieve them all. Now, in this case, where there was need of greater charities than they had funds or abilities to bestow, there could be no room for usury, but with great neglect and uncharitableness to the poor. And therefore, instead of lending upon usury, they were obliged to be exemplary in the practice of the contrary virtues, hospitality and charity; which the ancients call lending upon Divine usury, not to receive⁶¹ one in the hundred, but a hundred for one from the hands of God. It was then one of the glories of a bishop, St. Jerom tells us,⁶² to be a provedore for the poor; but a disgrace to the holy function, to seek only to enrich himself. And therefore he gives this direction to Nepotian, among other good rules which he prescribes him, that his table should be free to the poor and strangers, that with them he might have Christ for his guest. St. Chrysostom speaks nobly⁶³ of his bishop Flavian upon the account of this virtue: he says, his house was always open to strangers, and such as were forced to fly for the sake of religion; where they were received and entertained with that freedom and humanity, that his house might as properly be called, the house of strangers, as the house of Flavian. Yea, it was so much the more his own, for being common to strangers; for whatever we possess, is so much the more our property for being communicated to our poor brethren: there being no place where we may so safely lay up our treasure, as in the hands and bellies of the poor.

Now, the better to qualify them to perform this duty, every clergyman was required to lead a frugal life; that is, to avoid profuseness, as well in their own private concerns, as in giving great entertainments to the rich; which is but a false-named hospitality, and a great usurper upon the rights and revenues of the poor. We may judge of the simplicity of those times by the character which Ammianus Marcellinus,⁶⁴

⁵⁷ Vide Chrysost. Hom. 56. in Mat. Basil. Hom. in Psal. xiv. p. 136, &c.

⁵⁸ Cypr. de Lapsis, p. 123. Episcopi plurimi, quos et hortamento esse oportet cæteris et exemplo, Divina procuratione contempta, procuratores rerum sæcularium fieri, derelicta cathedra, plebe deserta, per alienas provincias oberrantes, negotiationis quæstuosæ nundinas aucupari, esurientibus in ecclesia fratribus non subvenire, habere argentum largiter velle, fundos insidiosis fraudibus rapere, usuris multiplicantis fenus angere.

⁵⁹ Chrys. Hom. 56. in Mat. Τοὺς γούρνεν ἀξιώμασιν ὄντας, καὶ εἰς τὴν μεγάλην τελοῦντας βουλήν, ἣν συγκλητὸν καλοῦσιν, οὐ ζέμει τοιοῦτοις κέρδεσιν κατασχόμεσθαι. Honorius, an. 397, published a law which implies the same. Cod. Theod. lib. 2. Tit. 33. de Usuris, Leg. 3. though by a following law, an. 405, he allowed senators half the centesimal interest.

⁶⁰ Aug. Serm. 49. de Diversis sive de Vita Clericor. t. 10.

v. 520. Enthecum nobis habere non licet. Non enim est episcopi servare aurum, et revocare a se mendicantis manum. Quotidie tam multi petunt, tam multi gemunt, tam multi nos inopes interpellant; ut plures tristes relinquamus, quia quod possimus dare omnibus, non habemus.

⁶¹ Pet. Chrysolog. Serm. 25. p. 269. Usura mundi centum ad unum, Deus unum accipit ad centum. Vid. Chrysost. Hom. 56. in Mat. xvii. p. 507. ed. Commelin.

⁶² Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian. Gloria episcopi est pauperum opibus providere: ignominia omnium sacerdotum est propriis studere divitiis.

⁶³ Chrys. Ser. 1. in Gen. t. 2. p. 886. ed. Front. Ducaei.

⁶⁴ Ammian. lib. 27. p. 458. Antistites quosdam provinciales tenuitas edendi potandique parcissime. Vilitas etiam indumentorum, et supercilia humum spectantia, perpetuo numini verisque ejus cultoribus, ut puros commendant et verecundos.

the heathen historian, gives of the Italian bishops, as it is probable, from his own observation: he says, their spare diet and frugal way of living, their cheap clothing and grave deportment, did recommend them to God and his true worshippers, as persons of pure and modest souls. This made those country bishops more honourable, in his opinion, than if they had lived in the riches, and state, and splendour of the bishops of Rome. By a canon of the fourth council of Carthage,⁶⁵ all the African bishops were obliged to live after this manner; not to affect rich furniture, or sumptuous entertainments, or a splendid way of living, but to seek to advance the dignity and authority of their order by their faith and holy living. Some indeed were for that other sort of hospitality, for entertaining the rich, and especially the magistrates, on pretence that they might keep an interest in them, and be able to intercede with them for poor criminals when they were condemned. But St. Jerom particularly considers and answers this pretence in his instructions to Nepotian. You must avoid, says he,⁶⁶ giving great entertainments to secular men, and especially those that are in great offices. For it is not very reputable to have the lictors and guards of a consul stand waiting at the doors of a priest of Christ, who himself was crucified and poor; nor that the judge of a province should dine more sumptuously with you than in the palace. If it be pretended, that you do this only to be able to intercede with him for poor criminals, there is no judge but will pay a greater deference and respect to a frugal clergyman than a rich one, and show greater reverence to your sanctity than your riches. Or if he be such a one as will not hear a clergyman's intercessions but only among his cups, I should freely be without this benefit, and rather beseech Christ for the judge himself, who can more speedily and powerfully help than any judge. St. Jerom, in the same place,⁶⁷ advises his clerk not to be over-free in receiving other men's entertainments neither. For the laity, says he, should rather find us to be comforters in their mournings than companions in their feasts. That clerk will quickly be contemned, that never refuses any entertainments, when he is frequently invited to them. Such were the ordinary rules and directions given by the ancients for regulating the hospitality and frugality of the clergy. But many bishops and others far exceeded these rules in transcendent heights of abstinence, and acts of self-denial, freely chosen and imposed upon themselves, that they might have greater plenty and superfluities to bestow upon others. Gregory Nazianzen⁶⁸ gives us this account of St. Basil, that his riches was to possess nothing; to live content with that little which nature requires; to despise delicacies and pleasures, and set himself above the slavery of that cruel and sordid tyrant the belly: his most delicious and constant food was bread, and salt, and water; his clothing but one coat and one gown; his lodging upon the ground; not for want of better accommodations, for he was metropolitan of Cæsarea, and had considerable revenues belonging to his church; but he submitted to this way of living in imitation of his Saviour, who became poor for our sakes, that we through his poverty might be made rich. And therefore both the same author,⁶⁹ and the church historians also,⁷⁰ tell us, that when in the time of the Arian persecution under Valens he was threatened by one of the emperor's agents, that unless he would comply, he should have all his goods confiscated; his answer was, that no such punishment could reach him, for he was possessed of nothing, unless the emperor wanted his threadbare clothes, or a few books, which was all the substance he was master of. St. Jerom gives the like character of Exuperius, bishop of Thoolouse, who made other men's wants always his own; and, like the widow of Sarepta, pinched and denied himself to feed the poor, bestowing all his substance upon the bowels of Christ. Nay, such was his frugality, that he ministered the body of Christ in a basket of osiers, and the blood in a glass cup: but nothing, says our author,⁷¹ could be more rich or glorious than such a poverty as this. It were easy to give a thousand instances of the same nature in the Cyprians, the Austins, the Nazianzens, the Paulinuses, and other such like generous spirits of the age they lived in, who contemned the world with greater pleasure than others could admire or enjoy it. But as such heights of heroic virtues exceeded the common rule, they are not proposed as the strict measures of every man's duty, but only to excite the zeal of the forward and the good. It may be said of this, as our Saviour says of a parallel case, "All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given; but he that is able to receive it, let him receive it."

Some indeed would fain turn this prudential advice into a law, and attempt to prove that anciently the clergy were under an obligation to quit their temporal possessions, when they betook themselves to the service of the church. But this is to outface the sun at noon-day. For as there is no just ground for this assertion, so there

Sect. 9.
Whether the clergy were anciently obliged by any law to part with their temporal possessions.

⁶⁵ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 15. Ut episcopus vilem supellectilem et mensam ac victum pauperem habeat, et dignitatis suæ auctoritatem file et meritibus vitæ quærat.

⁶⁶ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian.

⁶⁷ Ibid. Facile contemnitur clericus, qui, sæpe vocatus ad prandium, ire non recusat.

⁶⁸ Naz. Orat. 20. de Laud. Basil. p. 357.

⁶⁹ Naz. ibid. p. 349.

⁷⁰ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 16.

⁷¹ Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Nihil illo ditius, qui corpus Domini canistro vimineo, sanguinem portat in vitro.

are the plainest evidences to the contrary. Among those called the Apostolical Canons,⁷² there is one to this purpose: Let the goods of the bishop, if he has any of his own, be kept distinct from those of the church; that when he dies he may have power to dispose of them to whom he pleases, and as he pleases, and not receive damage in his private effects upon pretence that they were the goods of the church. For perhaps he was a wife, or children, or relations, or servants: and it is but just both before God and man, that neither the church should suffer for want of knowing what belonged to the bishop, nor the bishop's relations be damaged by the church, or come into trouble upon that account, which would be to the scandal and reproach of the deceased bishop. Many other canons both of the Greek and Latin church⁷³ are to the same effect. Nor can it be pretended, that this is to be understood only of such estates as they got in the service of the church. For St. Ambrose plainly intimates, that the law left the clergy in the full possession of their patrimony, or temporal estates, which they had before. For he brings in some malcontents among the clergy thus complaining: What advantage⁷⁴ is it to me to be of the clergy, to suffer injuries, and undergo hard labour, as if my own estate would not maintain me? This implies, that men of estates were then among the clergy. And, indeed, there was but one case, in which any clerk could be compelled to quit his possessions, and that was when his estate was originally tied to the service of the empire, of which I have given a full account before. In all other cases it was matter of free choice, and left to his liberty, whether he would dispose of his estate to any pious use or not. Only if he did not, it was expected he should be more generous in his charities, and less burdensome to the church, his needs being supplied another way. Though neither was this forced upon him by any law, but only urged upon reasons of charity;⁷⁵ leaving him judge of his own necessities, and not forbidding him to have his dividend in the church, if in his own prudence he thought fit to require it. Socrates⁷⁶ commends Chrysanthus, a Novatian bishop, upon this account, that, having an estate of his own, he never took any thing of the church, save two loaves of the eulogia, or offerings on Sunday; though he does not once intimate, that there was any law to compel him to do so. As neither does Prosper, who speaks most of any other against rich men's taking their portion in the charities of the church. He reckons it, indeed,⁷⁷ a dishonourable act and a sin in them, because it was to deprive others of the church's charity, who stood more in need of it: and he thinks, though a rich clergyman might keep his own estate without sin, because there was no law but the law of perfection to oblige him to renounce it; yet it must be upon condition that he required none of the maintenance of the church:⁷⁸ but he only delivers this as his own private opinion, and does not signify that there was then any such standing law in the church. In Africa they had a peculiar law against covetousness in the time of St. Austin, which was, that if any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or any other clerk, who had no estate when they were ordained, did afterward⁷⁹ purchase lands in their own name, they should be impleaded as guilty of invading the Lord's revenue, unless upon admonition they conferred the same upon the church. For in those times the church-revenues being small, no one's dividend was more than a competent maintenance: and therefore it was presumed, that he who could purchase lands in such circumstances, must have been some way injurious to the public revenues of the church. But in the same law it was provided, that if any estate was left them by donation or inheritance, they might dispose of it as they pleased themselves: for the church made no rules, but only gave her advice, in such cases as these; exhorting her wealthy clergy to greater degrees of liberality, but not demanding their estates to have them at her own disposal. On the other hand, when clergymen, who had no visible estates of their own, and were single men, and had no poor families to provide for, were busily intent upon growing rich out of the revenues of the church; this was always esteemed a scandalous covetousness, and accordingly prosecuted with sharp invectives by St. Jerom⁸⁰ and others of the ancient writers. So much of the laws of charity, which concerned the ancient clergy.

I might here give a character of their meekness, modesty, gravity, humility, and several other virtues, which

Sect. 10.
Of their great care
to be inoffensive with their tongues.

⁷² Can. Apost. c. 40. Ἔστω φανερά τὰ ἴδια τοῦ ἐπισκόπου πράγματα (εἶγε καὶ ἴδια ἔχει) καὶ φανερά τὰ κυριακά, &c.

⁷³ Conc. Antioch. c. 24. Conc. Agathen. c. 48. Conc. Carth. 3. c. 49.

⁷⁴ Ambr. Ep. 17. Quid mihi prodest in clero manere, subire injurias, labores perpeti, quasi non possit ager meus me pascere.

⁷⁵ Vide Can. Apost. c. 41. Conc. Antioch. c. 25.

⁷⁶ Socrat. lib. 7. c. 12.

⁷⁷ Prosper. de Vit. Contempl. lib. 2. c. 12. Noverint esse deformius, possessores de elemosynis pauperum pasci.

⁷⁸ Ibid. Illi qui tam infirmi sunt, ut possessionibus suis renunciare non possint; si ea quæ accepturi erant, dispensatori relinquunt, nihil habentibus conferenda, sine peccato possident sua.

⁷⁹ Conc. Carthag. 3. c. 49. Placuit, ut episcopi, presbyteri, diaconi, vel quicumque clerici, qui nihil habentes ordinantur, et tempore episcopatus vel clericatus sui, agros vel quæcunque prædia nomine suo comparant, tanquam rerum divinarum invasionis crimine teneantur obnoxii, nisi admoniti ecclesiæ eadem ipsa contulerint.

⁸⁰ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian. Nonnulli sunt ditiores monachi, quam fuerant sæculares: et clerici qui possideant Nazianzen describes in the person of his own father: but I shall but take notice of two things more which concerned the conduct of their lives, and those are the laws relating, first, to their words, and secondly, to their fame and reputation. For their words, they who were to teach others the most difficult part of human conduct, the government of the tongue, were highly concerned to be examples to the people as well in word as action. And to this purpose the laws were very severe against all manner of licentious discourse in their conversation. The fourth council of Carthage has three canons together upon this head; one of which forbids scurrility,⁸¹ and buffoonery, or that foolish talking and jesting with obscenity, which the apostle calls, βωμολογία, under the penalty of deprivation. Another threatens such with excommunication,⁸² as use to swear by the name of any creature. And a third canon⁸³ menaces the same punishment to such as sing at any public entertainments. St. Jerom particularly cautions his clerk against detraction, because of the temptation he may lie under either to commit the sin himself, or give way to it in others, by hearkening to and reporting false suggestions after them. Which is much the same thing; for no slanderer tells his story to one that is not willing to hear him.⁸⁴ An arrow, says he, never fixes upon a stone, but often recoils back, and wounds him that shoots it. Therefore let the detractor learn to be less forward and busy, by your unwillingness to hear his detraction. St. Chrysostom⁸⁵ takes notice of this vice, as most incident to inferiors, whom envy and emulation too often prompt to detract from the authority and virtues of their bishop; especially when they are grown popular, and admired for their own eloquent preaching; then, if they be of a bold and arrogant and vain-glorious temper, their business is to deride him in private, and detract from his authority, and make themselves every thing by lessening his just character and power. Upon this hint our author also takes occasion to show, what an extraordinary courage and spirit, and how divine and even a temper a bishop ought to have, that by such temptations, and a thousand others of the like nature, he be not overwhelmed either with anger or envy on the one hand, or insuperable sorrow and dejection of mind on the other. St. Jerom recommends another virtue of the tongue to his clerk, which is of great use in conversation; and that is, the keeping of secrets, and knowing when to be silent, especially about the affairs of great men. Your office, says he, requires you to visit the sick, and thereby you become acquainted with the families of matrons and their children,⁸⁶ and are intrusted with the secrets of noble men. You ought therefore to keep not only a chaste eye, but also a chaste tongue. And as it is not your business to be talking of the beauties of women, so neither to let one house know from you what was done in another. For if Hippocrates adured his disciples, before he taught them, and made them take an oath of silence; if he formed them in their discourse, their gait, their meekness and modesty, their habit, and their whole morals; how much more ought we, who have the care of souls committed to us, to love the houses of all Christians as if they were our own! He means, that the clergy should be formed to the art of silence, as carefully as Hippocrates taught his scholars; that the peace and unity of Christian families might not be disturbed or discomposed by revealing the secrets of one to another; which it is certain no one will do, that has the property which St. Jerom requires, of loving every Christian family as his own.

Secondly, As they were thus taught to be inoffensive both in word and deed, and thereby secure a good name and reputation among men; which was necessary for the due exercise of their function: so, because it was possible their credit might be impaired not only by the commission of real evil, but by the very appearance and suspicion of it; the laws of the church upon this account were very exact in requiring them to set a guard upon their whole deportment, and avoid all suspicious actions, that might give the least umbrage or handle to an adversary to reproach them. It was not enough in this case, that a man kept a good conscience in the sight of God, but he must provide or forecast for honest things in the sight of men. And this was the more difficult, because men are apt to be querulous against the clergy, as St. Chrysostom observes, some through weakness and imprudence, others through malice, easily raising complaints and accusations without any just ground, and difficultly hearkening to any reasons or apologies that they can offer in their own defence. But the more querulous and suspicious men are, the more watchful it becomes the clergy to be against unjust surmises, that they may cut off occasion from them that desire occasion to accuse or reproach them. To this end they are to use the utmost diligence and pre-

Sect. 11.
Of their care to guard against suspicion of evil.

opes sub Christo paupere, quas sub locuplete et fallace diabolo non habuerant: ut suspiret eos ecclesia divites, quos mundus tenuit ante mendicos.

⁸¹ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 60. Clericum scurrilem, et verbis turpibus jocularorem, ab officio detrahendum.

⁸² Ibid. c. 61. Clericum per creaturas jurantem acerrime objurgandum. Si perstiterit in vitio, excommunicandum.

⁸³ Ibid. c. 62. Clericum inter epulas cantantem supradictæ sententiæ severitate coercendum.

⁸⁴ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepot. Neque vero illa justa est excusatio, referentibus aliis, injuriam facere non possum. Nemo invito auditori libenter refert, &c.

⁸⁵ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 5. c. 8.

⁸⁶ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian.

caution to guard against the ill opinions of men, by avoiding all actions that are of a doubtful or suspicious nature. For, says St. Chrysostom,⁸⁷ if the holy apostle St. Paul was afraid lest he should have been suspected of theft by the Corinthians; and upon that account took others into the administration of their charity with himself, that no one might have the least pretence to blame him; how much more careful should we be to cut off all occasions of sinister opinions and suspicions, however false or unreasonable they may be, or disagreeable to our character! For none of us can be so far removed from any sin, as St. Paul was from theft: yet he did not think fit to condemn the suspicions of the vulgar: he did not trust to the reputation, which both his miracles and the integrity of his life had generally gained him: but, on the contrary, he imagined such suspicions and jealousies might arise in the hearts of some men, and therefore he took care to prevent them; not suffering them to arise at all, but timely foreseeing, and prudently forestalling them: providing, as he says, for honest things not only in the sight of God, but also in the sight of men. The same care and much greater should we take, not only to dissipate and destroy the ill opinions men may have entertained of us, but to foresee afar off from what causes they may spring, and to cut off beforehand the very occasions and pretences from whence they may grow: which is much easier to be done, than to extinguish them when they are risen, which will then be very difficult, perhaps impossible: besides that their being raised will give great scandal and offence, and wound the consciences of many. Thus that holy father argues upon this point, according to his wonted manner, nervously and strenuously, to show the clergy their obligations to use their utmost prudence to foresee and prevent scandal, by avoiding all actions of a doubtful and suspicious nature. St. Jerom⁸⁸ gives his clerk the same instructions, to guard against suspicions, and take care beforehand to minister no probable grounds for raising any feigned stories concerning him. If his office required him to visit the widows or virgins of the church, he should never go to them alone, but always take some other persons of known probity and gravity with him, from whose company he would receive no defamation.

Nor was this only the private direction of St. Jerom, but a public rule of the church. For in the third council of Carthage this canon was enacted, that neither bishop,⁸⁹ nor presbyter, nor any other clerk should visit the widows and virgins alone, but in the company and presence of some other of the clergy, or some grave Christians. And in the first council of Carthage⁹⁰ and the council of Epone⁹¹ there are canons to the same purpose.

The great council of Nice made another order upon the same grounds, to prevent all sinister opinions, that none of the unmarried clergy, bishop, presbyter, deacon, or any other,⁹² should have any woman that was a stranger, and not one of their kindred, to dwell with them; save only a mother, a sister, or an aunt, or some such persons, with whom they might live without suspicion. They who hence conclude, that the clergy were forbidden to cohabit with their wives, which they had married before ordination, are sufficiently exposed by Gothofred,⁹³ as ignorant of the true import of the original word, συνείσακτος, which never denotes a wife, but always a stranger, in opposition to those of one's kindred: and it is evident, the canon was made not upon the account of the married clergy, but the unmarried, to prevent suspicion and evil reports, that might easily arise from their familiar conversation with women that were not of their kindred or near relations. We may be satisfied of this from a law of Honorius and Theodosius junior, which was made in pursuance of the Nicene canon, and is still extant in both the Codes,⁹⁴ where first having forbidden the clergy to cohabit with any strange women, who by some were taken in under the title and appellation of sisters; and having named what persons they might lawfully entertain in their houses, viz. mothers, daughters, and sisters, because natural consanguinity would prevent all suspicion of these: lest the not excepting of wives might seem to exclude them also, a particular clause is added concerning them, that such as were married before their husbands were ordained,

Sect. 12.
Laws relating to this matter.

Sect. 13.
An account of the agapete, and συνείσακτος and the laws of the church made against them.

⁸⁷ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 6. c. 9.

⁸⁸ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepot. Caveto omnes suspiciones; et quicquid probabiliter fingi potest, ne fingatur, ante devita, &c.

⁸⁹ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 25. Nec episcopi aut presbyteri soli habeant accessum ad hujusmodi feminas, nisi aut clerici presentes sint, aut graves aliqui Christiani.

⁹⁰ Conc. Carth. 1. c. 3.

⁹¹ Conc. Epauensis. c. 20.

⁹² Conc. Nicen. c. 3. Μὴ ἐξείναι συνείσακτου ἕχειν, πλὴν εἰ μὴ ἄρα μητέρα, ἢ ἀδελφὴν, ἢ θείαν, &c.

⁹³ Gothofred. Not. in Cod. Theodos. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 44.

⁹⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 44. It. Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 3. Leg. 19. Eum qui probabilem seculo disciplinam agit, decolorari consortio sororiæ appellationis non decet. Quicumque igitur cujuscunque gradus sacerdotio fulciuntur, vel clericatus honore censentur, extranearum sibi mulierum interdicta consortio cognoscant: hac eis tantum facultate concessa, ut matres, filias, atque germanas intra domorum suarum septa contineant. In his enim nihil sævi criminis existimari fœdus naturale permittit. Illas etiam non relinqui castitatis hortatur affectio, quæ ante sacerdotium maritorum legitimum meruerit conjugium. Neque enim clericis incompetenter adjunctæ sunt, quæ dignos sacerdotium viros sua conversatione fecerunt.

should not be relinquished upon pretence of chastity, but rather be retained upon that account; it being but reasonable that they should be joined to their husbands, who by their conversation made their husbands worthy of the priesthood. The συνείσακτοι then, or strangers, who in these laws are forbidden to cohabit with the clergy, are not their lawful wives, but others who were taken in under the name of sisters, as that law of Honorius, and other ancient writers,⁹⁵ intimate they were called by those that entertained them. St. Jerom⁹⁶ and Epiphanius⁹⁷ tell us, they were also known by the name of αγαπετα, αγαπηται, that is, beloved. So that all these several names signify but that one sort of persons, most commonly called strangers, extraneæ, and συνείσακτοι, whose conversation was suspicious, and therefore so often prohibited by the laws of the church. They were commonly some of the virgins belonging to the church, whom they that entertained pretended only to love as sisters with a chaste love. But their manner of conversing was sometimes so very scandalous, that it justly gave great offence to all sober and modest persons; and had not the church always interposed with her severest censures, it must have made her liable to as great reproach. For it appears from the complaints of St. Cyprian,⁹⁸ St. Jerom,⁹⁹ and others, that the practice of some was very intolerable: for they not only dwelt together in the same house, but lodged in the same room, and sometimes in the same bed; and yet would be thought innocent, and called others uncharitable and suspicious, that entertained any hard thoughts of them. But the church did not regard vain words, but treated them as they justly deserved, as persons that used a scandalous and indecent liberty, and who were the very pests and plagues of the church. Cyprian¹⁰⁰ commends Pomponius for excommunicating a deacon, who had been found guilty in this kind. And the council of Antioch¹⁰¹ alleged this among other reasons for their deposing Paulus Samosatensis from his bishopric. In the following ages, besides the councils of Nice and Ancyra already mentioned, we meet with many other canons made upon this account, as in the second council of Arles,¹⁰² the first, third, and fourth councils of Carthage,¹⁰³ the council of Eliberis,¹⁰⁴ and Lerida,¹⁰⁵ and many others, prohibiting the clergy to entertain any women, who were strangers, and not of their near relations, under pain of deprivation. The intent of all which canons was to oblige the clergy not only to live innocently in the sight of God, but also unblamably, and without suspicion and censure, in the sight of men. It being more especially necessary for men of their function to maintain not only a good conscience, but a good name; the one for their own sake, the other for the sake of their neighbours:¹⁰⁶ that men might neither be tempted to blaspheme the ways of God, by suspecting the actions of holy men to be impure, when they were not so; nor be induced to imitate such practices, as they at least imagined to be evil: either of which would turn to the destruction of their souls. So that it was cruelty and inhumanity, as St. Austin concludes, for a man in such circumstances to neglect and disregard his own reputation.

But it might happen, that a man, after the utmost human caution and prudence that could be used, might not be able to avoid the malevolent suspicions of ill-disposed men: for our blessed Lord, whose innocence and conduct were both equally Divine, could not in his converse with men wholly escape them. Now, in this case the church could prescribe no other rule, but that of patience and Christian consolation given by our Saviour to his apostles: "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven."¹⁰⁷ When we have done, says St. Austin,¹⁰⁸ all that in justice and prudence we could to preserve our good name; if after that some men notwithstanding will endeavour to blemish our reputation, and blacken our character, either by false suggestions or unreasonable suspicions; let conscience be our comfort, nay, plainly our joy, that great is our reward in heaven. For this reward is the wages of our warfare, whilst we behave ourselves as good soldiers of Christ, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, by honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report. So much of the laws of the church, relating to the life and conversation of the ancient clergy.

Sect. 14.
Malevolent and unavoidable suspicions to be condemned.

⁹⁵ Vid. Conc. Ancyr. c. 19.

⁹⁶ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. p. 138.

⁹⁷ Epiphan. Hær. 63. Origen. n. 2.

⁹⁸ Cypr. Ep. 6. al. 14. Ep. 7. al. 13. Ep. 62. al. 4.

⁹⁹ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. de Virgin. Servand. Unde in ecclesias agapetarum pestis introit? Unde sine nuptiis aliud nomen uxorum? Imo unde novum concubinarum genus? Plus inferam: unde meretrices univire? Quæ eadem domo, uno cubiculo, sæpe uno tenentur et lectulo; et suspiciosos nos vocant, si aliquid existimamus.

¹⁰⁰ Cypr. Ep. 62. al. 4. ad Pompon.

¹⁰¹ Epist. Synod. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30.

¹⁰² Conc. Arelat. 2. c. 3.

¹⁰³ Conc. Carth. 1. c. 3 et 4. Carth. 3. c. 17. Carth. 4. c. 46.

¹⁰⁴ Conc. Eliber. c. 27.

¹⁰⁵ Conc. Ilerdens. c. 15.

¹⁰⁶ Aug. de Bono Viduitat. c. 22. t. 4. Nobis necessaria est vita nostra, aliis fama nostra, &c.

¹⁰⁷ Matt. v. 11, 12.

¹⁰⁸ Aug. ibid.

CHAPTER III.

OF LAWS MORE PARTICULARLY RELATING TO THE EXERCISE OF THE DUTIES AND OFFICES OF THEIR FUNCTION.

I COME now to speak of such laws as more immediately related to their function, and the several offices and duties belonging to it. In speaking of which, because many of these offices will come more fully to be considered hereafter, when we treat of the liturgy and service of the church, I shall here speak chiefly of such duties as were required of them by way of general qualification, to enable them the better to go through the particular duties of their function. Such was, in the first place, their obligation to lead a studious life. For since, as Gregory Nazianzen¹ observes, the meanest arts could not be obtained without much time, and labour, and toil spent therein; it were absurd to think, that the art of wisdom, which comprehends the knowledge of things human and Divine, and comprises every thing that is noble and excellent, was so light and vulgar a thing, as that a man needed no more but a wish or a will to obtain it. Some indeed, he complains,² were of this fond opinion, and therefore, before they had well passed the time of their childhood, or knew the names of the books of the Old and New Testament, or how well to read them, if they had but got two or three pious words by heart, or had read a few of the Psalms of David, and put on a grave habit, which made some outward show of piety, they had the vanity to think, they were qualified for the government of the church. They then talked nothing but of Samuel's sanctification from his cradle, and thought themselves profound scribes, and great rabbies and teachers, sublime in the knowledge of Divine things, and were for interpreting the Scripture not by the letter, but after a spiritual way, propounding their own dreams and fancies, instead of the Divine oracles to the people. This, he complains, was for want of that study and labour, which ought to be the continual employment of persons who take upon them the offices of the sacred function. St. Chrysostom pursues this matter a little further, and shows the necessity of continual labour and study in a clergyman, from the work and business he has upon his hand, each part of which requires great sedulity and application. For, first, he ought to be qualified to minister suitable remedies to the several maladies and distempers³ of men's souls; the cure of which requires greater skill and labour, than the cure of their bodily distempers: and this is only to be done by the doctrine of the gospel, which therefore required that he should be intimately acquainted with every part of it. Then, again, he must be able to stop the mouths of all gainsayers,⁴ Jews, Gentiles, and heretics, who had different arts and different weapons to assault the truth by; and unless he exactly understood all their fallacies and sophisms, and knew the true art of making a proper defence, he would be in danger not only of suffering each of them to make spoil and devastation of the church, but of encouraging one error, whilst he was opposing another. For nothing was more common, than for ignorant and unskilful disputants to run from one extreme to another; as he shows in the controversies which the church had with the Marcionites and Valentinians on the one hand, and the Jews on the other, about the law of Moses; and the dispute about the Trinity between the Arians and Sabellians. Now, unless a man was well skilled and exercised in the word of God, and the true art and rules of disputation, which could not be attained without continual study and labour, he concludes, it would be impossible for him to maintain his ground, and the truth, as he ought, against so many subtle and wily opposers. Upon this he inculcates⁵ that direction of St. Paul to Timothy, 1 Tim. iv. 13, "Give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine: meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear to all men." Thirdly, he shows⁶ how difficult and laborious a work it was to make continual homilies and set discourses to the people, who were become very severe judges of the preacher's composures, and would not allow him to rehearse any part of another man's work, nor so much as to repeat his own upon a second occasion. Here his task was something the more difficult, because men had generally nice and delicate palates, and were inclined to hear sermons as they heard plays, more for pleasure than profit: which added to the preacher's study and labour; who though he was to condemn both popular applause and censure, yet was he also to have such a regard to his auditory, as that they might hear him with pleasure to their edification and advantage. And the more famed and eloquent the preacher was, so much the more careful⁷ and studious ought he to be, that he may always answer his character, and not expose himself to the censures and accusations of the people. These and the like arguments does that holy father urge, to show how much it concerns men of the sacred calling to devote themselves to a studious and laborious life, that they may be the better qualified thereby to answer the several indispensable duties of their functions.

¹ Naz. Orat. 1. de Fuga. t. 1. p. 22.² Ibid. p. 21.³ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 4. c. 3.⁴ Ibid. lib. 4. c. 4.⁵ Chrys. ibid. lib. 4. c. 8.⁶ Ibid. lib. 5. c. 1.⁷ Ibid. lib. 5. c. 5.

Sect. 2.
No plea allowed as just apologies for the contrary.

Some indeed, St. Chrysostom says, were ready to plead even the apostle's authority for their ignorance, and almost value themselves for want of learning, because the apostle says of himself, that he was rude in speech. But to this the holy father justly replies, that this was a misrepresentation of the great apostle, and vainly urged to excuse any man's sloth and negligence⁸ in not attaining to those necessary parts of knowledge which the clerical life required. If the utmost heights and perfections of exotic eloquence had been rigidly exacted of the clergy; if they had been to speak always with the smoothness of Isocrates, or the loftiness of Demosthenes, or the majesty of Thucydides, or the sublimity of Plato; then indeed it might be pertinent to allege this testimony of the apostle: but rudeness of style, in comparison of such eloquence, may be allowed, provided men be otherwise qualified with knowledge, and ability to preach and dispute accurately concerning the doctrines of faith and religion; as St. Paul was, whose talents in that kind have made him the wonder and admiration of the whole world; and it would be unjust to accuse him of rudeness of speech, who, by his discourses, confounded both Jews and Greeks, and wrought many into the opinion that he was the Mercury of the Gentiles. Such proofs of his power of persuasion were sufficient evidence that he had spent some pains in this way, and therefore his authority was fondly abused to patronize ignorance and sloth, whose example was so great a reproach to them. Others, again, there were who placed the whole of a minister in a good life, and that was made another excuse for the want of knowledge, and study, and the art of preaching and disputing. But to this St. Chrysostom⁹ also replies, that both these qualifications were required in a priest; he must not only do, but teach the commands of Christ, and guide others by his word and doctrine, as well as his practice: each of these had their part in his office, and were necessary to assist one another in order to consummate men's edification. For otherwise, when any controversy should arise about the doctrines of religion, and Scripture was pleaded in behalf of error, what would a good life avail in this case? What would it signify to have been diligent in the practice of virtue, if, after all, a man, through gross ignorance and unskilfulness in the word of truth, fell into heresy, and cut himself off from the body of the church? as he knew many that had done so. But admit a man should stand firm himself, and not be drawn away by the adversaries, yet when the plain and simple people, who are under his care, shall observe their leader to be baffled, and that he has nothing to say to the arguments of a subtle opposer, they will be ready to impute this not so much to the weakness of the advocate, as the badness of his cause: and so by one man's ignorance a whole people shall be carried headlong to utter destruction, or at least be so shaken in their faith, that they shall not stand firm for the future. St. Jerom gives also a smart rebuke to this plea, telling his clerk,¹⁰ that the plain and rustic brother should not value himself upon his sanctity, and despise knowledge; as neither should the artful and eloquent speaker measure his holiness by his tongue. For though, of two imperfections, it was better to have a holy ignorance than a vicious eloquence; yet, to consummate a priest, both qualifications were necessary, and he must have knowledge as well as sanctity to fit him for the several duties of his function. Thus did those holy instructors plead against ignorance in the clergy, and urge them with proper arguments to engage them upon a studious life, which was the only way to furnish them with sufficient abilities to discharge many weighty duties of their function.

But it was not all sorts of studies that they equally recommended, but chiefly the study of the Holy Scriptures, as being the fountains of that learning which was most proper for their calling, and which upon all occasions they were to make use of. For, as St. Chrysostom observes,¹¹ in the way of administering spiritual physic to the souls of men, the word of God was instead of every thing that was used in the cure of bodily distempers. It was instrument, and diet, and air; it was instead of medicine, and fire, and knife; if caustics or incisions were necessary, they were to be done by this; and if this did not succeed, it would be in vain to try other means. This was it that was to raise and comfort the dejected soul, and take down and assuage the swelling tumours and presumptions of the confident. By this they were both to cut off what was superfluous, and supply what was wanting, and do every thing that was necessary to be done in the cure of souls. By this all heretics and aliens were to be convinced, and all the plots of Satan to be countermined; and therefore it was necessary that the ministers of God should be very diligent in studying the Scriptures, that the word of Christ might dwell richly in them. This was necessary to qualify them especially for preaching; since, as St. Jerom rightly notes,¹² the

Sect. 3.
Their chief studies to be the Holy Scriptures, and the approved writers and canons of the church.

⁸ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 4. c. 6.

⁹ Ibid. lib. 4. c. 8 et 9.

¹⁰ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian. Nec rusticus et tamen simplex frater ideo se sanctum putet, si nihil noverit: nec peritus et eloquens in lingua æstimet sanctitatem. Multoque melius est e duobus imperfectis rusticitatem sanctam habere, quam eloquentiam peccatricem.

¹¹ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 4. c. 3 et 4.

¹² Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepot. Sermo presbyteri Scripturarum lectione conditus sit. Nolo te declamatore esse, best commendation of a sermon was to have it seasoned well with Scripture rightly applied. Besides, the custom of expounding the Scripture occasionally many times as it was read, required a man to be well acquainted with all the parts of it, and to understand both the phrase, and sense, and doctrines and mysteries of it, that he might be ready, upon all occasions, to discourse pertinently and usefully upon them. And to this purpose some canons¹³ appointed, that their most vacant hours, the times of eating and drinking, should not pass without some portion of Scripture read to them; partly to exclude all other trifling and unnecessary discourse, and partly to afford them proper themes and subjects to exercise themselves upon to edification and advantage. St. Jerom commends his friend Nepotian for this, that at all feasts¹⁴ he was used to propound something out of the Holy Scripture, and entertain the company with some useful disquisition upon it. And next to the Scriptures, he employed his time upon the study of the best ecclesiastical authors, whom, by continual reading and frequent meditations, he had so treasured up in the library of his heart, that he could repeat their words upon any proper occasion, saying, Thus spake Tertullian, thus Cyprian, so Lactantius, after this manner Hilary, so Minucius Felix, so Victorinus, these were the words of Arnobius, and the like. But among ecclesiastical writings, the canons of the church were always reckoned of greatest use; as containing a summary account, not only of the church's discipline, and doctrine, and government, but also rules of life and moral virtues: upon which account, as some laws directed that the canons should be read over at every man's ordination; so others required the clergy¹⁵ afterward to make them part of their constant study, together with the Holy Scripture. For the canons were then a sort of directions for the pastoral care, and they had this advantage of any private directions, that they were the public voice and rubrics of the church, and so much the more carefully to be read upon that account. In after ages, in the time of Charles the Great, we find some laws obliging the clergy¹⁶ to read together with the canons, Gregory's book de Cura Pastoralis.

As to other books and writings, they were more cautious and sparing

Sect. 4.
How far the study of heathen or here.

et rabulam, garrulumque sine ratione, sed mysteriorum peritum, &c.

¹³ Conc. Tolet. 3. c. 7. Quia solent crebro mensis otiosæ fabulæ interponi, in omni sacerdotali convivio lectio Scripturarum Divinarum misceatur: per hoc enim et animæ ædificantur in bonum, et fabulæ non necessariæ prohibentur.

¹⁴ Hieron. Epitaph. Nepot. Ep. 3. ad Heliodor. Sermo ejus et (leg. per) omne convivium de Scripturis aliquid proponere, &c.

¹⁵ Conc. Tolet. 4. c. 25. Sciant sacerdotes Scripturas Sanctas, et canones meditentur—ut ædificent cunctos tam in the study and use of them. Some ^{tical books was allowed.} fical books was allowed. canons¹⁷ forbade a bishop to read heathen authors: nor would they allow him to read heretical books, but only upon necessity, that is, when there was occasion to confute them, or to caution others against the poison of them. But the prohibition of heathen learning, though it seem to be more peremptory, was to be understood likewise with a little qualification. For men might have very different views and designs in reading heathen authors. Some might read them only for pleasure, and make a business of that pleasure, to the neglect of Scripture and more useful learning: and all such were highly to be condemned. St. Jerom¹⁸ says of these, that when the priests of God read plays instead of the Gospels, and wanton bucolics instead of the prophets, and loved to have Virgil in their hands rather than the Bible; they made a crime of pleasure, and turned the necessity of youthful exercise into a voluntary sin. Others could not relish the plain and unaffected style of Scriptures, but conversed with heathen orators to bring their language to a more polite or Attic dialect. And these also came under the censures of the church. It is remarkable what Sozomen¹⁹ tells us of Triphyllius, a Cyprian bishop, (who was one of these nice and delicate men, who thought the style of Scripture not so elegant as it might be made,) that having occasion in a discourse before Spiridion, and some other Cyprian bishops, to cite those words of our Saviour, ἀρον σου τὸ κράββατον καὶ περιπάτει, "Take up thy bed and walk," he would not use the word κράββατον, but instead of it put σκήμποδα, as being a more elegant word in his opinion. To whom Spiridion with a holy indignation and zeal replied, Art thou better than Him that said κράββατον, that thou shouldst be ashamed to use his words? Thereby admonishing him to be a little more modest, and not give human eloquence the preference before the Holy Scriptures. Another sort of men conversed with heathen authors rather than the Scriptures, because they thought them more for their turn, to arm them with sophistry to impose their errors upon the simplicity of others. As the anonymous author in Eusebius,²⁰ who writes against the Theodotian heretics, observes of the leading men of that party, that leaving the Holy Scriptures, they generally spent their time in Euclid and Aristotle, Theo-fidei scientia, quam operum disciplina.

¹⁶ Concil. Turon. 3. c. 3. Concil. Cabillon. 2. c. 1.

¹⁷ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 16. Ut episcopus Gentilium libros non legat; hæreticorum autem pro necessitate et tempore.

¹⁸ Hieron. Ep. 146. ad Damasum de Filio Prodigio. t. 3. p. 129. Sacerdotes Dei omissis evangelis et prophetis, videmus comœdias legere, amatoria bucolicorum versuum verba canere, Virgilium tenere; et id quod in pueris necessitatis est, crimen in se facere voluptatis.

¹⁹ Sozom. lib. 1. c. 11.

²⁰ Euseb. lib. 5. c. 28.

phrastus and Galen; using the quirks and sophisms of infidel writers to palliate their heresy, and corrupt the simplicity of the Christian faith. Now, in all these cases, the reading of heathen authors for such unworthy ends was very disallowable, because it was always done with a manifest neglect and contempt of the Holy Scriptures, and therefore upon such grounds deservedly forbidden by the canons of the church. But then, on the other hand, there were some cases, in which it was very allowable to read Gentile authors, and the church's prohibition did not extend to these. For sometimes it was necessary to read them, in order to confute and expose their errors, that others might not be infected thereby. Thus St. Jerom observes of Daniel,²¹ that he was taught in the knowledge of the Chaldeans; and Moses, in all the wisdom of the Egyptians: which it was no sin to learn, so long as they did not learn it to follow it, but to censure and refute it. St. Ambrose²² says, he read some books that others might not read them; he read them to know their errors, and caution others against them. This was one reason why sometimes heathen writers might be read by men of learning, in order to set a mark upon them. Another reason was, that many of them were useful and subservient to the cause of religion, either for confirming the truth of the Scriptures, and the doctrines of Christianity, or for exposing and refuting the errors and vanities of the heathen themselves. Thus St. Jerom observes,²³ that both the Greek and Latin historians, such as Diodorus Siculus, Polybius, Trogus Pompeius, and Livy, are of great use as well to explain as confirm the truth of Daniel's prophecies. And St. Austin²⁴ says the same of the writings of Orpheus and the Sibyls, and Hermes, and other heathen philosophers, that as they said many things that were true, both concerning God and the Son of God, they were in that respect very serviceable in refuting the vanities of the Gentiles. Upon which account not only St. Austin and St. Jerom, but most of the ancient writers of the church, were usually well versed in the learning of the Gentiles, as every one knows that knows any thing of them. St. Jerom in one short epistle²⁵ mentions the greatest part of those that lived before his own time, both Greeks and Latins, and says of them all in general, that their books are so filled with the sentences and opinions of philosophers, that it is hard to say which is most to be admired, their secular learning, or their knowledge in the Scriptures. And herein is comprised the plain state of this matter: the clergy were obliged in the first place to be very diligent in studying the Scriptures, and after them the canons, and approved writers of the church, according to men's abilities, capacities, and opportunities: for the same measures could not be exacted of all. Beyond this, as there was no obligation on them to read human learning, so there was no absolute prohibition of it; but where it could be made to minister as a handmaid to divinity, and not usurp or encroach upon it, there it was not only allowed, but commended and encouraged; and it must be owned, that though the abuse of secular learning does sometimes great harm, yet the study of it rightly applied did very great service to religion in the primitive ages of the church.

From their private studies pass we on next to view them in their more public capacities, as the people's orators to God, and God's ambassadors to the people: in regard to which offices and character, I have showed before²⁶ they were esteemed a sort of mediators in a qualified sense between God and men. In all their addresses to God as the people's orators, their great care was to offer all their sacrifices and oblations of prayer and thanksgiving in such a rational, decent, and becoming way, as best suited the nature of the action; that is, with all that gravity and seriousness, that humility and reverence, that application of mind and intensesness and fervency of devotion, as both became the greatness of that Majesty to whom they addressed, and was proper for raising suitable affections in the people. This is the true meaning of that famous controverted passage in Justin Martyr's Second Apology, where describing the service of the church, and the manner of celebrating the eucharist, he says, The bishop sent up prayers and praises, ὄση δύναμις,²⁷ with the utmost of his abilities to God. Some misconstrue this passage, and interpret the abilities of the minister officiating so as if they meant no more but his invention, expression, or the like; making it by such a gloss to become an argument

Sect. 5.
Of their piety and devotion in their public addresses to God.

²¹ Hieron. Com. in Dan. c. 1. Nunquam acquiescerent discere quod non licebat. Discunt autem non ut sequantur, sed ut judicent atque convincant.

²² Ambros. Proem. in Luc. Evang. Legimus aliqua, ne legantur; legimus, ne ignoremus; legimus, non ut teneamus, sed ut repudiemus.

²³ Hieron. Prolog. in Daniel. Ad intelligendas extremas partes Daniellæ, multiplex Græcorum historia necessaria est, &c. Et si quando cogimur litterarum sæcularium recordari, et aliqua ex his discere quæ olim omisimus; non nostræ est voluntatis, sed ut ita dicam, gravissimæ necessitatis: ut probemus ea quæ a sanctis prophetis ante multa sæcula prædicta sunt, tam Græcorum quam Latinorum et aliarum Gentium literis contineri.

²⁴ Aug. cont. Faust. lib. 13. c. 15. Sibyllæ et Orpheus, et nescio quis Hermes, et si qui alii Vates, vel theologi, vel sapientes, vel philosophi Gentium, de Filio Dei, aut de Patre Deo vera prædixisse seu dixisse perhibentur; valet quidem aliquid ad paganorum vanitatem revincendam.

²⁵ Hieron. Ep. 84. ad Magnum. In tantum philosophorum doctrinis atque sententiis suos referciunt libros, ut nescias quid in illis primum admirari debeas, eruditionem sæculi, an scientiam Scripturarum.

²⁶ Book II. chap. 19. sect. 16. ²⁷ Justin. Apol. 2. p. 98.

against the antiquity of public liturgies, or set forms of prayer; whereas, indeed, it signifies here a quite different thing, viz. that spiritual vigour, or intenceness and ardency of devotion, with which the minister offered up the sacrifices of the church to God; being such qualifications as are necessary to make our prayers and praises acceptable unto Him, who requires them to be presented with all our soul and might; which may be done in set forms, as well as any other way: and so Gregory Nazianzen and Justin Martyr himself use the phrase, ὕψη δύναμις, where they speak of set forms of praising and serving God; of which more hereafter in its proper place. St. Chrysostom is very earnest²⁸ in recommending this same duty to the priests of God, under the name of σπουδή and εὐλάβεια, care and reverence. With what exact care, says he, ought he to behave himself, who goes in the name of a whole city, nay, in the name of the whole world, as their orator and ambassador to intercede with God for the sins of all! But especially when he invokes the Holy Ghost, and offers up τὴν φοικωδέσατην θυσίαν, the tremendous sacrifice of the altar: with what purity, with what reverence and piety should his tongue utter forth those words! whilst the angels stand by him, and the whole order of the heavenly powers cries aloud, and fills the sanctuary in honour of Him, who is represented as dead and lying upon the altar. Thus that holy father argues with a warmth and zeal suitable to the subject, and such as is proper to raise our devotion, and kindle our affections into a holy flame, whenever we present the supplications of the church on earth to the sacred Majesty of heaven.

And this ardency of devotion was continually to be cherished and preserved. To which purpose the church had her daily sacrifices, wherever it was possible to have them; and on these every clergyman was indispensably obliged to attend; and that under pain of suspension and deprivation, whether it was his duty to officiate or not. For so the first council of Toledo determined for the Spanish churches, that if any presbyter, or deacon, or other clerk, should be in any city or country where there was a church, and did not come to church to the daily sacrifice or service,²⁹ he should no longer be reputed one of the sacred function. The council of Agde orders such to be reduced to the communion of strangers,³⁰ which at least implies suspension from their office. And the law of Justinian punishes them with degradation,³¹ because of the scandal they give to the laity by such neglects or contempts of Divine service. So careful were the ancient lawgivers of the church to cut off all indecencies and abuses of this nature, and make the clergy provoking examples of piety to the people.

Next to their office in addressing God as the people's orators, we are to view them as God's ambassadors, addressing themselves in his name to the people. Which they did by public preaching and private application; in both which their great care was to perform the duty of watchmen over God's flock, and of good stewards over his household. In their preaching their only aim was to be, the edification of the people. To which purpose the great masters of rules in this kind, Gregory Nazianzen, Chrysostom, and St. Jerom, lay down these few directions. First, That the preacher be careful to make choice of a useful subject. Gregory Nazianzen³² specifies the rule in some particular instances, such as the doctrine of the world's creation, and the soul of man; the doctrine of providence, and the restoration of man; the two covenants; the first and second coming of Christ, his incarnation, sufferings, and death; the resurrection, and end of the world, and future judgment, and different rewards of heaven and hell; together with the doctrine of the blessed Trinity, which is the principal article of the Christian faith. Such subjects as these are proper for edification, to build up men in faith and holiness, and the practice of all piety and virtue. But then, secondly, They must be treated on in a suitable way; not with too much art or loftiness of style, but with great condescension to men's capacities, who must be fed with the word as they are able to bear it. This is what Gregory Nazianzen so much commends in Athanasius,³³ when he says, he condescended and stooped himself to the mean capacities, whilst to the acute his notions and words were more sublime. St. Jerom also observes³⁴ upon this head, that a preacher's discourse should always be plain, intelligible, and affecting; and rather adapted to excite men's groans and tears by a sense of their sins, than their admiration and applause, by speaking to them what neither they, nor he himself perhaps, do truly understand.

Sect. 7.
Rules about preaching to edification.

Sect. 6.
The censure of such as neglected the daily service of the church.

²⁸ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 6. c. 4.

²⁹ Conc. Tolet. l. c. 5. Presbyter, diaconus, &c. qui intra civitatem fuerit, vel in loco in quo ecclesia est, si in ecclesiam ad sacrificium quotidianum non venerit, clericus non habeatur.

³⁰ Conc. Agathens. c. 2. Clericis qui ecclesiam frequentare, vel officium suum implere neglexerint, peregrina communio tribuatur.

³¹ Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 42. n. 10.

³² Naz. Orat. 1. de Fuga, t. 1. p. 15.

³³ Naz. Orat. 21. de Laud. Athan. t. 1. p. 396.

³⁴ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian. Docente te in ecclesia, non clamor populi, sed gemitus suscitetur; lachrymæ auditorum laudes tuæ sint.—Celeritate dicendi apud imperitum vulgus admirationem sui facere indoctorum hominum est. Attrita frons interpretetur sæpe quod nescit; et cum aliis persuaserit, sibi quoque usurpat scientiam.

For it is ignorant and unlearned men chiefly, that affect to be admired for their speaking above the capacities of the vulgar. A bold forehead often interprets what he himself does not understand; and yet he has no sooner persuaded others to they know not what, but he assumes to himself the title of learning upon it: when yet there is nothing so easy as to deceive the ignorant multitude, who are always most prone to admire what they do not understand. Upon this account St. Chrysostom spends almost a whole book in cautioning the Christian orator against this failing; that he should not be intent on popular applause, but with a generous mind raise himself above it;³⁵ seeking chiefly to advantage his hearers, and not barely to delight and please them. To this purpose, he concludes, it would be necessary for him to despise both the applauses and censures of men, and all other things that might tempt him rather to flatter his hearers, than edify them. In a word, his chief end,³⁶ in all his compositions, should be to please God: and then if he also gained the praise of men, he might receive it; if not, he needed not to court it, nor torment himself that it was denied him. For it would be consolation enough for all his labours, that in adapting his doctrine and eloquence he had always sought to please his God. Thirdly, A third rule given in this case was, that men should apply their doctrine and spiritual medicines according to the emergent and most urgent necessities of their hearers. Which was the most proper duty of a watchman, to perceive with a quick eye where the greatest danger lay; which was men's weakest and most unguarded side; and then apply suitable remedies to their maladies and distempers. St. Chrysostom, in speaking of this part of a minister's duty, says, he should be νηφάλιος και διορατικός, watchful and perspicacious,³⁷ and have a thousand eyes about him, as living not for himself alone, but for a multitude of people. To live retired in a cell is the business of a monk; but the duty of a watchman is to converse among men of all degrees and callings; to take care of the body of Christ, the church, and have regard both to its health and beauty; curiously observing, lest any spot or wrinkle or other defilement should sully the grace and comeliness of it. Now, this obliged spiritual physicians to apply their medicines, that is, their doctrines, as the maladies of their patients chiefly required; to be most earnest and frequent in encountering those errors and vices which were most reigning, or which men were most in danger of being infected by. And this is the reason why, in the homilies of the ancients, we so often meet with discourses against such heresies, as the world now knows nothing of; such as those of the Marcionites, and Manichees, and many others, which it would be absurd to combat now in popular discourses; but then it was necessary to be done, because they were the prevailing heresies of the age, and men were in danger of being subverted by them. And it is further observable, that the most formidable heresies, and prevailing factions, such as that of the Arians, when armed with secular power, could never either force or court the catholic preachers into silence, to let the wolves devour the sheep by such a tame and base compliance. In this case no worldly motives could prevail with them, when they saw the danger, not to give warning of it. They thought they could not otherwise answer the character of watchmen, and stewards of the mysteries of God, since it was required in stewards that a man be found faithful.

But their fidelity was not only expressed in their public discourses, but also in their private addresses and applications to men, who had either cut themselves off from the body of Christ by heresies and schisms, or by their sins made themselves unsound members of the body, whilst they seemed to continue of it. With what fidelity, and meekness, and diligence they addressed themselves to the former sort, we may learn from the good effects which their applications often had upon them. Theodoret³⁸ tells us of himself, in one place, that he had converted a thousand souls from the heresy of the Marcionites, and many others from the heresies of Arius and Eunomius, in his own diocese. And in another place³⁹ he augments the number of converted Marcionites to ten thousand, whom, with indefatigable industry, in a diocese of forty miles in length and breadth, containing eight hundred churches in it, he had reduced from their straying to the unity of the catholic church. What wonders also St. Austin wrought in Africa upon the Donatists and others in the same way, by private letters and conferences and collations with them, the reader may learn from Possidius,⁴⁰ the author of his Life, who frequently mentions his labours in this kind, and the great advantage that accrued to the church by this means. For he lived to see the greatest part of the Manichees, Donatists, Pelagians, and pagans, converted to the catholic church. They were no less careful to apply themselves in private to persons within the church, as occasion required. And here great art and prudence, as well as fidelity and diligence, was necessary to give success to their endeavours. For mankind, as Nazianzen⁴¹ observes, is so various and uncertain a sort of creature, that it requires the greatest art and skill to manage him. For the tempers of men's minds differ more than

Sect. 8.
Of fidelity, diligence, and prudence in private addresses and applications.

³⁵ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 5. c. 1.

³⁶ Ibid. c. 7.

³⁷ Chrys. ibid. lib. 3. c. 12. lib. 4. c. 2 et 3.

³⁸ Theod. Ep. 113. ad Leon.

³⁹ Id. Ep. 145. p. 1026.

⁴⁰ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 9, 13, 18.

⁴¹ Naz. Orat. 1. de Fuga, p. 14

the features and lineaments of their bodies: and as all meats and medicines are not proper for all bodies, so neither is the same treatment and discipline proper for all souls. Some are best moved by words, others by examples; some are of a dull and heavy temper, and so have need of the spur to extimulate them; others, that are brisk and fiery, have more need of the curb to restrain them. Praise works best upon some, and reproof upon others, provided each of them be ministered in a suitable and seasonable way; otherwise they do more harm than good. Some men are drawn by gentle exhortations to their duty; others by rebukes and hard words must be driven to it. And even in the business of reproof, some are affected most with open rebuke, others with private. For some men never regard a secret reproof, who yet are easily corrected if chastised in public. Others, again, cannot bear a public disgrace, but grow either morose, or impudent and implacable upon it; who perhaps would have hearkened to a secret admonition, and repaid their monitor with their conversion, as presuming him to have accosted them out of mere pity and love. Some men are to be so nicely watched and observed, that not the least of their faults are to be dissembled; because they seek to hide their sins from men, and arrogate to themselves thereupon the praise of being politic and crafty: in others it is better to wink at some faults, so that seeing we will not see, and hearing we will not hear, lest by too frequent chiding we bring them to despair, and so make them cast off modesty, and grow bolder in their sins. To some men we must put on an angry countenance, and seem to contemn them, and despair of them as lost and deplorable wretches, when their nature so requires it: others, again, must be treated with meekness and humility, and be recovered to a better hope by more promising and encouraging prospects. Some men must be always conquered, and never yielded to, whilst to others it will be better sometimes to concede a little. For all men's distempers are not to be cured the same way, but proper medicines are to be applied, as the matter itself, or occasion, or the temper of the patient, will admit of. And this is the most difficult part of the pastoral office, to know how to distinguish these things nicely with an exact judgment, and with as exact a hand to minister suitable remedies to every distemper. It is a masterpiece of art, which is not to be perfectly attained but by good observation, joined with experience and practice. What our author thus here at large discourses by way of rule and theory, he in another place sums up more briefly in the example of the great Athanasius, whose pattern he proposes to men's imitation, as a living image of this admirable prudence and dexterity in dealing with men according to this great variety of tempers; telling us,⁴² that his design was always one and the same, but his methods various; praising some, moderately correcting others; using the spur to some dull tempers, and the reins to others of a more hot and zealous spirit; in his conversation master of the greatest simplicity, but in his government master of the greatest artifice and variety of skill; wise in his discourses, but much wiser in his understanding, to adapt himself according to the different capacities and tempers of men. Now, the design of all this was not to give any latitude or licence to sin, but by all prudent and honest arts to discourage and destroy it. It was not to teach the clergy the base and servile arts of flattery and compliance; to become time-servers and men-pleasers, and soothe the powerful or the rich in their errors and vices; but only to instruct them in the different methods of opposing sin, and how, by joining prudence to their zeal, they might make their own authority most venerable, and most effectually promote the true ends of religion. St. Chrysostom puts in this caution, in describing this part of a bishop's character: He ought to be wise, as well as holy; a man of great experience, and one that understands the world: and because his business is with all sorts of men, he should be ποικίλος, one that can appear with different aspects, and act with great variety of skill. But when I say this, I do not mean, says he,⁴³ that he should be a man of craft, or servile flattery, or a dissembling hypocrite; but a man of great freedom and boldness, who knows notwithstanding how to condescend and stoop himself for men's advantage, when occasion requires, and can be as well mild as austere: for all men are not to be treated in the same way: no physician uses the same method with all his patients. The true mean and decorum, he thinks, which a bishop should observe in his converse and applications to men, is to keep between too much stiffness and abjectness. He must be grave without pride;⁴⁴ awful, but courteous; majestic, as a man of authority and power, yet affable and communicative to all: of an integrity that cannot be corrupted, yet officious and ready to serve every man; humble, but not servile; sharp and resolute, but yet gentle and mild. By such prudence he will maintain his authority, and carry any point with men, whilst he studies to do every thing without hatred or favour, only for the benefit and edification of the church. We must reduce to this head of prudence in making proper address and application to offenders, that direction given by St. Paul, and repeated in several ancient canons, that a bishop be no smiter, μη πλῆκτῆν, which the twenty-

⁴² Naz. Orat. 21. de Laud. Athan. p. 396.

⁴³ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 6. c. 4. Ποικίλον αὐτὸν εἶναι δεῖ, ποικίλον δὲ λέγω, ἔχ ὑπαλον, ἔ κόλακα, ἔχ ὑποκριτῆν, &c.

⁴⁴ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 3. c. 16.

seventh of those called the Apostolical Canons thus paraphrases: If any bishop, presbyter, or deacon smite either an offending Christian, or an injurious heathen, we order him to be deposed. For our Lord did not teach us this discipline, but the contrary; for he was smitten, but did not smite any; when he was reviled, he reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not. Justinian forbids⁴⁵ the same in one of his Novels, as a thing unbecoming the priests of God, to smite any man with their own hands. The word πλήσσειν signifies also smiting with the tongue, by reproachful, bitter, and contumelious language, as St. Chrysostom, St. Jerom, and others understand it. In which sense also it was forbidden, as a thing indecent, and unbecoming the gravity and prudence of the Christian clergy.

St. Chrysostom enlarges upon several other parts of prudence, which I need not here insist upon, because they have either already been mentioned, or will hereafter be considered in other places; such as prudence⁴⁶ in opposing heresies; prudence⁴⁷ in managing the virgins and widows, and the revenues of the church; prudence⁴⁸ in hearing and determining secular causes; and prudence⁴⁹ in the exercise of discipline and church censures, which last will be spoken to under another head. I shall here therefore only add one instance more of their prudence in allaying unnecessary disputes, which rose among catholics and men of the same opinion in the church. Which indeed was rather a complication of many noble virtues, prudence, candour, ingenuity, moderation, peaceableness, and charity, joined together, which, like a constellation of the brightest qualities, always shined with the greatest lustre. This is what Gregory Nazianzen chiefly admired in the conduct of Athanasius, and therefore he gives it the highest commendation, and preference before all his other virtues, as thinking there was no one thing whereby he did greater service to the church of God. It happened in the time of Athanasius, that the catholics were like to be divided about mere words; a warm dispute arising about what names the three Divine Persons were to be called by: some were for calling them only τρία πρόσωπα, three persons, to avoid Arianism; others called them τρεις ὑποστάσεις, three hypostases, to avoid Sabellianism. Now they all meant the same thing, but not understanding each other's terms, they mutually charged one another with the heresies of Arius and Sabellius. The one party, in the heat of disputation, could understand nothing by three hypostases but three substances or essences, in the Arian sense; for they made no distinction between hypostasis and essence, and therefore charged their opposites with Arianism. The other party were afraid that τρία πρόσωπα signified no more than nominal persons, in the sense of Sabellius, (who himself had used those very terms in an equivocal sense to impose upon the vulgar,) and therefore they inveighed against their adversaries as designing to promote Sabellianism. And so, says Nazianzen,⁵⁰ this little difference in words making a noise as if there had been difference in opinion, the love of quarrelling and contention fomenting the dispute, the ends of the earth were in danger of being divided by a few syllables. Which, when Athanasius, the true man of God, and great guide of souls, both saw and heard, he could not endure to think of so absurd and unreasonable a division among the professors of the same faith, but immediately applied a remedy to the distemper. And how did he make his application? Having convened both parties with all meekness and humility, and accurately weighed the intention and meaning of the words on both sides, after he found them agreeing in the things themselves, and not in the least differing in point of doctrine, he ended their dispute, allowing the use of both names, and tying them to unity of opinion. This, says our author, was a more advantageous act of charity to the church, than all his other daily labours and discourses: it was more honourable than all his watchings and humicubations, and not inferior to his applauded flights and exiles. And therefore he tells his readers in ushering in the discourse, that he could not omit the relation without injuring them, especially at a time when contentions and divisions were in the church; for this action of his would be an instruction to them that were then alive, and of great advantage if they would propound it to their own imitation; since men were prone to divide not only from the impious, but from the orthodox and pious, and that not only about little and contemptible opinions, (which ought to make no difference,) but about words that tended to one and the same sense. The caution is of use in all ages, and had it always been strictly observed it would have prevented many wild disputes and fierce contentions about words in the Christian church.

But now we are to observe, on the other hand, that as they were eminent for their candour and prudence in composing unnecessary and verbal disputes; so where the cause was weighty, and any material point of religion concerned, they were no less famous for their zeal and courage in standing up in the defence of truth against all opposers. It was neither the artifice and subtlety, nor the power and malice of their enemies could make them yield,

Sect. 9.
Of prudence and candour in composing unnecessary controversies in the church.

Sect. 10.
Of their real and courage in defending the truth.

⁴⁵ Just. Novel. 123. c. 11. Sed neque propriis manibus liceat episcopo quenquam percutere: hoc enim alienum est a sacerdotibus.

⁴⁶ Chrys. de Sacerd. lib. 4. c. 4. ⁴⁷ Ibid. lib. 3. c. 16.

⁴⁸ Ibid. lib. 3. c. 18. ⁴⁹ Ibid. lib. 3. c. 18.

⁵⁰ Naz. Orat. 21. de Laud Athan. t. 1. p. 395.

where they thought the faith was in danger to be destroyed. In other cases, says Nazianzen,⁵¹ there is nothing so peaceable, so moderate as Christian bishops; but in this case they cannot bear the name of moderation, to betray their God by silence and sitting still; but here they are exceeding eager warriors, and fighting champions that are not to be overcome. He does not mean that the weapons of their warfare were carnal, that they used any pious frauds, or plotted treasons, or rebellions, or took up arms in defence of religion; but that with an undaunted courage and brave resolution they stood up firm in defence of truth, and mattered not what names they were called by, (contentious, unpeaceable, immoderate, factious, turbulent, incendiaries, or any thing of the like nature,) nor yet what they suffered in any kind, whilst they contended for that faith which was once delivered to the saints. Church history abounds with instances of this nature; but it will be sufficient to exemplify the practice of this virtue in a single instance, which Gregory Nazianzen⁵² gives us in the Life of St. Basil, where he relates a famous dialogue that passed between Modestus, the Arian governor under Valens, and that holy man. Modestus tried all arts to bring him over to the party, but finding all in vain, he at last threatened him with severity. What, said he, dost thou not fear this power which I am armed with? Why should I fear? said Basil; what canst thou do, or what can I suffer? What canst thou suffer? said the other; many things that are in my power: confiscation of thy goods; banishment, torment, and death. But thou must threaten me with something else, said Basil, if thou canst, for none of these things can touch me. As for confiscation of goods, I am not liable to it; for I have nothing to lose, unless thou wantest these tattered and threadbare garments, and a few books, which is all the estate I am possessed of. For banishment, I know not what it means, for I am tied to no place; I shall esteem every country as much my own, as that where I now dwell; for the whole earth is the Lord's, and I am only a pilgrim and a stranger in it. As for torments, what can they do to him, who has not a body that can hold out beyond the first stroke? And for death, it will be a kindness to me, for it will but so much the sooner send me unto God, to whom I live and do the duty of my station; being in a great measure already dead, and now of a long time hastening unto him. The governor was strangely surprised at this discourse, and said, No man ever talked at this free and bold rate to Modestus before. Perhaps, said Basil, thou didst never meet with a bishop before: for if thou hadst, he would have talked just as I do, when he was put to contend about such matters as these. In other things we are mild and yielding, and the humblest men on earth, as our laws oblige us to be; we are so far from showing ourselves supercilious or haughty to magistrates in power, that we do not do it to persons of the meanest rank and condition. But when the cause of God is concerned, or in danger, then indeed we esteem all other things as nothing, and fix our eyes only upon him. Then fire and sword, wild beasts and instruments of torture to tear off our flesh, are so far from being a terror, that they are rather a pleasure and recreation to us. Therefore reproach and threaten us, do your pleasure, use your power to the utmost, and let the emperor know all this: yet you shall never conquer us, or bring us to assent to your impious doctrine, though you threaten us ten thousand times more than all this. The governor hearing this, and finding him to be a man of invincible and inflexible courage, dismissed him now not with threatenings, but with a sort of reverence and submission, and went and told the emperor, that the bishop of that church was too hard for them all; for his courage was so great, his resolution so firm, that neither promises nor threatenings could move him from his purpose. Nor was it only open violence they thus bravely resisted, but also the more crafty attempts of the enemies of truth, who many times went artificially to work against it; partly by blackening the characters of its champions and defenders, and representing them as base and intolerable men; and partly by smoothing their own character, and pretending unity in faith with the orthodox, and that their designs were only designs of peace, to remove unscriptural words and novel terms out of the way, that all men might be of the same opinion. These were the two grand artifices of the Arian party, whereby the leading and politic men among them, Eusebius of Nicomedia, Valens, Ursacius, and others, always laboured to overthrow the truth. Upon this account Athanasius was forced to undergo a thousand calumnies and slanderous reproaches. He was accused to Constantine, as one that assumed to himself imperial authority to impose a tax upon Egypt: as one guilty of murder, in cutting off the hand of Arsenius, a Meletian bishop; as guilty of treason, in siding with Philumenus the rebel, and furnishing him with money; as an enemy to the public, for attempting to hinder the transportation of corn from Egypt to Constantinople: which accusation so far prevailed upon the emperor, that he banished him to Triers upon it. In the next reign he was accused again of repeated murders; and of sacrilege, in diverting Constantine's liberality to the widows of Egypt and Libya, to other uses;

⁵¹ Naz. Orat. 21. de Laud. Athan. p. 388. Οἱ κἀν πᾶλλα ὤσιν εἰρημικοί τε καὶ μέτροι, τοῦτ' ὅ γε οὐ φέρουσιν ἐπιεικῆς εἶναι, Θεὸν προδιδόναι διὰ τῆς ἡσυχίας· ἀλλὰ

καὶ λίαν εἰσὶν ἐν ταῦθα πολεμικοί τε καὶ δόσπραχοι.

⁵² Naz. Orat. 20. de Laud. Basil. p. 349.

of treason, in joining interest with Magnentius the tyrant; and many other such charges were spitefully and diabolically levelled against him. St. Basil was likewise variously accused both by professed enemies and pretended friends; who, as is usual in such cases, brought charges against him directly contrary to one another. Some accused him of Tritheism, for defending the doctrine of three hypostases against the Sabellians; others, of Semiarianism, or heterodoxy in the article about the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, because in his church he sometimes used a different form of doxology from what was used in other churches. Some, again, accused him of Arianism, because he had received Eustathius of Sebastia into communion upon his professing the catholic faith; others said he communicated with Apollinaris the heretic, because upon some occasions he wrote letters to him. Thus were two of the greatest and best of men maliciously traduced and wounded in their reputation; both indeed for the same cause, but with this difference, that the one was prosecuted by open enemies without the church, the other chiefly by secret enemies within; of whom therefore he had reason to take up the prophet's complaint, and say, "These are the wounds with which I was wounded in the house of my friends." And these were such temptations as might have unsettled any weak and wavering minds, and made them turn their backs upon religion: but true zeal is above temptation, and can equally despise the wounds of the sword and the wounds of the tongue; having always the consolation, which Christ gives in his gospel, ready at hand to support it; "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake: rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven." Such examples show us, that innocence itself cannot always exempt men from calumny, but sometimes is accidentally the occasion of it: but then it has this advantage, that being joined with a suitable zeal, it never sinks under the weight and pressure of its burden, but always comes off conqueror at the last, as we see in the instances now before us.

The other artifice, which I said the Arians used to destroy the faith, was the specious pretence of peace and unity. The politic and crafty men among them in the time of Constantius, pretended that they had no quarrel with the catholic doctrine of the Trinity itself, but only were aggrieved at the novel and unscriptural words, such as the ὁμοούσιον, consubstantial, &c., which the council of Nice had used to express it by: these, they said, were dividing terms, and the cause of all the quarrel and combustion: and therefore they still urged the removing these terms, as the great stumblingblock, out of the way, that the peace and unity of the church might follow upon it. But Athanasius and other wise catholics easily perceived whither this sly stratagem tended; being very sensible that their design was not against the bare terms, but the faith itself, and therefore they always stoutly and zealously opposed it. Nor could the Arians ever gain this point upon the catholics, till at last in the council of Ariminum, anno 359, by great importunity, and clamours for unity and peace, they were prevailed upon to sink the word consubstantial, and draw up a new creed without it, yet, as they thought, containing the very same doctrine, and in as full terms as could be expressed, save that the word consubstantial was not in it. But here it must be owned, these catholic bishops were wanting in their zeal, as they themselves were quickly after convinced. For no sooner was this concession made, but the Arians immediately gave out and boasted over all the world, that the Nicene faith was condemned, and Arianism established in a general council, though nothing was less intended by the catholic bishops that were present at it. But now they were sensible they had made a false step, by suffering themselves thus to be imposed upon by designing men: they now saw that they ought to have stuck to the Nicene terms, as well as the faith, since the faith itself so much depended on them. They now began to complain of the fraud, and asked pardon of their brethren for their want of foresight and caution in a case so tender and material. St. Jerom, who gives us this account of the whole transaction, from the acts of the synod and other records extant in his time, brings them in making this apology for themselves: The bishops, says he,⁵³ who had been imposed upon by fraud at Ariminum, and who were reputed heretics without being conscious to themselves of any heresy, went about every where protesting by the body of Christ, and all that is sacred in the church, that they suspected no evil in their creed: they thought the sense had agreed with the words, and that men had not meant one thing in their hearts, and uttered another thing with their lips. They were deceived by entertaining too good an opinion of base and evil men. They did not suppose the priests of Christ could so treacherously have fought against Christ. In short, they lamented their mistake now with tears, and offered to condemn as well in corde clausum esse, aliud in labiis proferri timuimus. Decepit nos bona de malis existimatio. Non sumus arbitrati sacerdotes Christi adversus Christum pugnare multaque alia quæ brevitatis studio prætereo, flentes asserebant, parati et subscriptionem pristinam et omnes Arianorum blasphemias condemnare.

⁵³ Hieron. Dial. cont. Lucif. t. 2. p. 143. Concurrebant episcopi, qui Ariminensibus dolis irretiti, sine conscientia hæretici ferebantur, contestantés corpus Domini, et quicquid in ecclesia sanctum est, se nihil mali in sua fide suspicatos. Putavimus, aiebant, sensum congruere cum verbis; nec in ecclesiis ubi simplicitas, ubi pura confessio est, aliud

their own subscription, as all the Arian blasphemies. Any one that reads St. Jerom carefully, will easily perceive, that these bishops were no Arians, nor ever intended to subscribe an Arian creed; but their fault was want of zeal in parting with the Nicene creed, to take another instead of it without the word consubstantial; which though they subscribed in the simplicity of their hearts as an orthodox creed, (and indeed the words, as Jerom describes them, in their plain sense are sound and orthodox, as St. Jerom says in their excuse,) yet the Arians put an equivocal and poisonous sense upon them; giving out after the council was ended, that they had not only abolished the word consubstantial, but with it condemned the Nicene faith also. Which was strange, surprising news to the bishops that had been at Ariminum. Then, says St. Jerom, Ingemuit totus orbis, et Arianum se esse miratus est. The whole world groaned, and was amazed to think she should be reputed Arian. That is, the catholic bishops of the whole world (for there were three hundred of them present at that council) were amazed to find themselves so abused, and represented as Arians, when they never intended in the least to confirm the Arian doctrine. But now by this the reader will be able to judge, what kind of zeal the catholic church required then in her clergy, viz. that they should not only contend for the faith itself, but also for those catholic forms and ways of expressing it, which had been prudently composed and settled in general councils, as a barrier against heretics; the giving up of which to subtle and dangerous adversaries, would always give them advantage to make fiercer attacks upon the faith itself, and prove destructive to the catholic cause; as those bishops found by woeful experience, who were concerned in the concession made at Ariminum. It is candour indeed, when good catholics are divided only about words, to bring them to a right understanding of one another, which will set them at peace and unity again: but it is tameness to give up the main bulwarks of the faith to fallacious adversaries and designing men, whose arts and aims, however disguised, are always known to strike at the foundation of religion. And therefore, though no man was ever more candid than Athanasius toward mistaken catholics, yet neither was any more zealous in opposing the arts and stratagems of the Arian party; always sticking close to the definition of the Nicene council, and never yielding that any title or syllable of that creed should be erased or altered.

Whilst I am upon this head, I cannot but take notice of the obligations the clergy lay under to maintain the unity of the church, both in faith and discipline, and what penalties were inflicted on such as made a breach therein, whether by falling into heresy or schism themselves, or giving encouragement to them in others. I shall not need to state the nature of church unity and communion in this place any further, than by saying, that to maintain the purity of the catholic faith, and live under the discipline and government of a catholic bishop, who himself lived in communion with the catholic church, were then, as it were, the two characteristic notes of any man's being in the communion of the church: and therefore, as every member was obliged to maintain the unity of the church in both these parts; so much more the clergy, who were to be the chief guardians of it: and if they failed in either kind, that is, if they lapsed either into heresy or schism, by the laws of the church they were to be deposed from their office; and though they repented and returned to the unity of the church again, yet they were not to act in their former station, but to be admitted to communicate only in the quality of laymen. This was the rule of the African church in the time of Cyprian, as appears from the synodical epistle⁵⁴ of the council of Carthage, to which his name is prefixed. For, writing to Pope Stephen, they tell him, their custom was to treat such of the clergy as were ordained in the catholic church, and afterward stood up perfidiously and rebelliously against the church, in the same manner as they did those that were first ordained by heretics; that is, they admitted them to the peace of the church, and allowed them the communion of laymen, but did not permit them to officiate again in any order of the clergy. And this, he says, they did to put a mark of distinction between those that always stood true to the church, and those that deserted it. Yet if any considerable advantage accrued to the church by the return of such a heretic or schismatic; as if he brought over any considerable part of the deluded people with him, or if he was generally chosen by the church, or the like; in such cases the rule was so far dispensed with, that the deserter might be admitted to his pristine dignity, and be allowed to officiate in his own order again. Upon this account, Cornelius, bishop of Rome, received Maximus the presbyter to his former honour upon his return from the Novatian schism.⁵⁵ And in after ages both the

Sect. 11.
Of their obligations to maintain the unity of the church; and of the censure of such as fell into heresy or schism.

⁵⁴ Cyp. Ep. 62. p. 197. Si qui presbyteri aut diaconi qui vel in ecclesia catholica prius ordinati fuerint, et postmodum perfidi ac rebelles contra ecclesiam steterint, vel apud hereticos a pseudo-episcopis et antichristis contra Christi dispositionem profana ordinatione promoti sunt—eos quoque hac conditione suscipi cum revertuntur, ut communicent laici, et satis habeant quod admittuntur ad pacem, qui hostes pacis extiterint, &c.

⁵⁵ Cornel. Ep. 46. al. 49. ad Cyp. p. 93. Maximum presbyterum locum suum agnoscere jussimus. See other instances in Socrates, lib. 7. c. 3.

Novatians and Meletians were particularly favoured with this privilege by the council of Nice, and the Donatists by the African fathers in the time of St. Austin, as I had occasion to note more than once before.⁵⁶ But if they continued obstinate in their heresy or schism, then many times an anathema was pronounced against them, as in the second council of Carthage. If a presbyter, says the canon,⁵⁷ that is reproved or excommunicated by his bishop, being puffed up with pride, shall presume to offer the oblation in a separate assembly, or set up another altar against him, let him be anathema. The council of Antioch,⁵⁸ and those called the Apostolical Canons,⁵⁹ have several decrees of the like nature. Yea, so careful were the clergy to be of the unity of the church, that they were not to give any encouragement to heretics or schismatics, or excommunicated persons, by communicating with them in prayer or other holy offices of the church, or so much as frequenting their society, feasting with them, or the like. But I do not enlarge upon these things here, because, being matters of discipline, they will come again to be considered under that head in another place.

I have now gone through some of the chief general duties, which more immediately concerned the office and function of the clergy; and by mixing public rules with private directions and great examples, have made such an essay towards the idea and character of a primitive clerk, as may (I hope) in some things excite both the emulation and curiosity of many of my readers, who may be concerned to imitate the pattern I have been describing. If here it be not drawn so full, or so exactly to the life in all its beauties, as they could wish, they will find their account in satisfying their curiosity, by having recourse to the fountains themselves, from whence these materials were taken. For many things, that might here have been added, were purposely omitted, for fear of drawing out this part of the discourse to a greater length than would consist with the design and measures of the present undertaking: and I had rather be thought to have said too little, than too much, upon this head, that I might not cloy, but leave an edge upon the appetite of the inquisitive reader.

CHAPTER IV.

AN ACCOUNT OF SOME OTHER LAWS AND RULES, WHICH WERE A SORT OF OUT-GUARDS AND FENCES TO THE FORMER.

HAVING thus far discoursed both of such laws as related to the life and conversation of the primitive clergy, and of those that more immediately concerned the duties and offices of their function; I come now to speak of a third sort of laws, which were like the Jews' sepimenta legis, a sort of by-laws and rules, made for the defence and guard of the two former. Among these we may reckon such laws as were made to fix the clergy to their proper business and calling; such as that which forbade any clergyman to desert or relinquish his station, without just grounds or leave granted by his superiors. In the African church, as has been showed before,¹ from the time that any man was made a reader, or entered in any of the lower orders of the church, he was presumed to be dedicated to the service of God, so as thenceforth not to be at liberty to turn secular again at his own pleasure. And much more did this rule hold for bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Therefore Cyril of Alexandria, as he is cited by Harmenopolus,² says in one of his canons, that it was contrary to the laws of the church for any priest to give in a libel of resignation: for if he be worthy, he ought to continue in his ministry; if he be unworthy, he should not have the privilege of resigning, but be condemned and ejected. The council of Chalcedon orders³ all such to be anathematized, as forsook their orders to take upon them any military office or secular dignity, unless they repented and returned to the employment, which for God's sake they had first chosen. The council of Tours⁴ in like manner decrees, that whoever of the clergy desert their order and office, to follow a secular life and calling again, shall be punished with excommunication. The civil law was also very severe upon such deserters. By an order of Arcadius and Honorius,⁵ they are condemned to serve in curia all their lives, that they might never have the privilege of resuming the clerical life again. And by a law of Justinian's,⁶ both monks and clerks so deserting, were to forfeit whatever

Sect. 1.
No clergyman allowed to desert or relinquish his station without just grounds and leave.

⁵⁶ Book IV. chap. 7. sect. 7 and 8.

⁵⁷ Conc. Carth. 2. c. 8. Si quis forte presbyter ab episcopo suo correptus vel excommunicatus, tumore vel superbia inflatus, putaverit separatim Deo sacrificia offerenda, vel aliud erigendum altare—anathema sit.

⁵⁸ Conc. Antioch. c. 4 et 5. ⁵⁹ Canon. Apost. c. 32.

¹ Book III. chap. 1. sect. 5.

² Harmenopol. Epit. Can. ap. Leunclav. Jus Græc. Rom. t. 1. p. 11. Παρά τοὺς ἐκκλησιαστικούς θεσμούς, τὸ λιβέλλους παρατήσεων προπάγειν τινας τῶν ἱερουργῶν, &c.

³ Conc. Chalced. c. 7. Τοὺς ἀπαξ ἐν κλήρῳ τεταγμένους, μήτε ἐπὶ στρατείαν μήτε ἐπὶ ἀξίαν κοσμικὴν ἐρχεσθαι, &c.

⁴ Conc. Turon. c. 5. Si quis clericus, relicto officii sui ordine, laicam voluerit agere vitam, vel se militia tradiderit, excommunicationis poena feriat.

⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 16. tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 39. Si qui professum sacre religionis sponte dereliquerit, continuo sibi eum curia vindicet: ut liber illi ultra ad ecclesiam recursus esse non possit.

⁶ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 55. Quod si estate they were possessed of, to the church or monastery to which they belonged.

But this rule, as it was intended for the benefit of the church, to keep the clergy to their duty; so when the benefit of the church, or any other reasonable cause, required the contrary, might be dispensed with: and we find many such resignations or renunciations practised, and some allowed by general councils. For not to mention the case of disability by reason of old age, sickness, or other infirmity, in which it was usual for bishops to turn over their business to a coadjutor; of which I have given a full account in a former book;⁷ there were two other cases, which come nearer to the matter in hand. One was, when a bishop, through the obstinacy, hatred, or disgust of any people, found himself incapable of doing them any service, and that the burden was an intolerable oppression to him; in that case, if he desired to renounce, his resignation was accepted. Thus Gregory Nazianzen renounced the see of Constantinople, and betook himself to a private life, because the people grew factious, and murmured at him, as being a stranger. And this he did with the consent and approbation of the general council of Constantinople, as not only the historians, Theodoret⁸ and Socrates,⁹ but he himself testifies¹⁰ in many places of his writings. After the same manner, Theodoret says,¹¹ Meletius, the famous bishop of Antioch, when he was bishop of Sebastia in Armenia, was so offended with the rebellious temper and contumacy of a perverse and froward people, that he abandoned them, and retired likewise to a private life. So Theodorus Lector tells us,¹² how Martyrius, bishop of Antioch, being offended at the factiousness of his people and clergy, upon the intrusion of Peter Fullo, renounced his church with these words: "A contumacious clergy, a rebellious people, a profane church, I bid adieu to them all, reserving to myself the dignity of priesthood." Another case was, when in charity a bishop resigned, or showed himself willing to resign, to cure some inveterate schism. Thus Chrysostom¹³ told his people, that if they had any suspicion of him, as if he were a usurper, he was ready to quit his government when they pleased, if that was necessary to preserve the unity of the church. And so Theodoret¹⁴ tells us, that in the dispute between Flavian and Evagrius, the two bishops of Antioch, when Theodosius the emperor sent for Flavian, and ordered him to go and have his cause decided at Rome; he bravely answered, "Great sir, if any accuse my faith as erroneous, or my life as unqualifying me for a bishopric, I will freely let my accusers be my judges, and stand to their sentence, whatever it be: but if the dispute be only about the throne, and government of the church, I shall not stay for judgment, nor contend with any that has a mind to it, but freely recede, and abdicate the throne of my own accord. And you, sir, may commit the see of Antioch to whom you please." The emperor looked upon this as a noble and generous answer, and was so affected with it, that instead of obliging him to go to Rome, he sent him home again, and bade him go feed the church committed to his care: nor would he ever after hearken to the bishops of Rome, though they often solicited him to expel him. There is one instance more of this nature which I cannot omit, because it is such an example of self-denial, and despising of private interest for the public good and peace and unity of the church, as deserves to be transmitted to posterity, and to be spoken of with the highest commendations. It was the proposal which Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, and St. Austin, with the rest of the African bishops, made to the Donatists at the opening of the conference of Carthage; that to put an end to the schism, wherever there was a catholic and a Donatist bishop in the same city, they should both of them¹⁵ resign, and suffer a new one to be chosen. For why, say they, should we scruple to offer the sacrifice of such an humility to our Redeemer? Did he descend from heaven to assume our nature, and make us his members? And shall we make any doubt to descend from our chairs, to prevent his members being torn to pieces by a cruel schism? We bishops are ordained for the people of Christ. What therefore is most conducive to the peace of Christian people, we ought to do in reference to our episcopacy. If we be profitable servants, why should we envy the eternal gain of our Lord for our own temporal honours? Our episcopal dignity will be so much the more advantageous to us, if by laying it aside we gather together the flock of Christ, than if we disperse his flock by retaining it. And with what face can we hope for the honour which Christ has promised us in the world to come, if our honours in this world hinder the unity of his church? By this we see there were some cases, in which it was lawful for men to renounce even the episcopal office, and betake themselves to a private life; the grand rule being, in these and all other cases, to do illi monasteria aut ecclesias relinquunt, atque mundani fiant: omne ipsorum jus ad monasterium aut ecclesiam pertinet.

⁷ Book II. chap. 13. sect. 4.

⁸ Theod. lib. 5. c. 8.

⁹ Soc. lib. 5. c. 7. ¹⁰ Naz. Orat. 32. it. Carm. de Vita Sua.

¹¹ Theod. lib. 2. c. 31. ¹² Theodor. Lect. lib. I. p. 555.

¹³ Chrys. Hom. 11. in Ephes. p. 1110. "Ετοιμοὶ παραχωρῆσαι τῆς ἀρχῆς μόνον ἐκκλησία ἔστω μία.

¹⁴ Theod. lib. 5. c. 23.

¹⁵ Collat. Carthag. Die I. c. 16. Utrique de medio secedamus—Quid enim dubitemus redemptori nostro sacrificium istius humilitatis offerre? An vero ille de cœlis in membra humana descendit, ut membra ejus essemus? Et nos, ne ipsa ejus membra crudeli divisione lanientur, de cathedris descendere formidamus? &c.

what was most for the benefit and edification of the church, and sacrifice private interest to the advantage of the public.

In these cases, a bishop, after he had renounced, was not to intermeddle with the affairs of the church, to ordain, or perform any offices of the like nature, unless he was called to assist by some other bishop, or was commissioned by him as his delegate: yet he was allowed the title and honour and communion of a bishop, as the general council of Ephesus¹⁶ determined it should be, in the case of Eustathius, bishop of Perga, and metropolitan of Pamphylia, who had renounced his bishopric, being an aged man, and thinking himself unable to discharge the duties of it. In such cases likewise, when any one receded with the approbation of a council, he was sometimes allowed to receive a moderate pension out of the bishopric for his maintenance. As it was in the case of Domnus, bishop of Antioch, who having been ejected, though unjustly, by Dioscorus in the second synod of Ephesus, yet quietly resigned the bishopric to Maximus: upon which account, Maximus desired leave of the council of Chalcedon, that he might allow him an annual pension out of the revenues of the church, which the council of Chalcedon¹⁷ readily complied with. And this, as Richerius¹⁸ ingenuously owns, was the ancient design and meaning of canonical pensions, which were not used to be granted but by the authority or approbation of a synod, and only to such as, having spent the greatest part of their life in the service of the church, desired to be disburdened of their office by reason of their age. For the reserving a pension out of a bishopric, which a man only resigns to take another, was a practice wholly unknown to former ages.

Secondly, Another rule, designed to keep all clergymen strictly to their duty, was, That no one should remove from his own church or diocese, without the consent of the bishop to whose diocese he belonged. For as no one at first could be ordained ἀπολελυμένως, but must be fixed to some church at his first ordination; so neither, by the rules and discipline of the church then prevailing, might he exchange his station at pleasure, but must have his own bishop's licence, or letters dimissory,

Sect. 3.
And canonical pensions sometimes granted in such cases.

Sect. 4.
No clergyman to remove from one diocese to another without the consent and letters dimissory of his own bishop.

to qualify him to remove from one diocese to another. For this was the ancient right, which every bishop had in the clergy of his own church, that he could not be deprived of them without his own consent; but as well the party that deserted him, as the bishop that received him, were liable to be censured upon such a transgression. If any presbyter, deacon, or other clerk, say the Apostolical Canons,¹⁹ forsake his own diocese to go to another, and there continue without the consent of his own bishop: we decree, that such a one shall no longer minister as a clerk, (especially if after admonition he refuse to return,) but only be admitted to communicate as a layman. And if the bishop, to whom they repair, still entertain them in the quality of clergymen, he shall be excommunicated as a master of disorder. The same rule is frequently repeated in the ancient councils, as that of Antioch,²⁰ the first and second of Arles,²¹ the first and fourth of Carthage,²² the first of Toledo,²³ and the council of Tours,²⁴ and Turin,²⁵ and the great council of Nice,²⁶ to whose canons it may be sufficient to refer the reader. I only observe, that this was the ancient use of letters dimissory, or, as they were then called, ἀπολυτικαί, εἰρημικαί, συστατικαί, and concessoriae, which were letters of licence granted by a bishop, for a clergyman to remove from his diocese to another; though we now take letters dimissory in another sense: but the old canons call those dimissory letters, which were given upon the occasion that I have mentioned. The council of Carthage gives them only the name of the bishop's letters,²⁷ but the council of Trullo²⁸ styles them expressly, dimissory; when, reinforcing all the ancient canons, it says, No clergyman of what degree soever shall be entertained in another church, ἐκτός τῆς τοῦ οἰκείου ἐπισκόπου ἐγγράφου ἀπολυτικῆς, without the dimissory letters of his own bishop; which he might grant or refuse as he saw proper occasion for it. For there was no law to compel him to grant it, whatever arts any clerk might use to gain a dismissal any other way. St. Austin mentions a pretty strange case of this nature, that happened in his own diocese. One Timotheus, a subdeacon of his church, being desirous to leave his post under St. Austin, and go to Severus, a neighbouring bishop, protests upon oath to Severus that he would be no longer of St. Austin's church: upon this ¹⁶ Conc. Ephes. Act. 7. in Epist. ad Synod. Pamphylia. Habeat episcopi nomen et honorem ac communionem, sic quidem ut neque ipse ordinet, neque in ecclesiam propria auctoritate ordinaturus veniat, nisi forte coassumatur, &c.

¹⁷ Conc. Chalced. Act. 7. al. Act. 10. edit. Labbe. t. 4. p. 681.

¹⁸ Richer. Hist. Concil. par. 1. c. 8. n. 30. p. 218. Nihil antiquitus consuetum fieri nisi synodice comprobatur; hincque jus pensionum canonicarum potest confirmari; quæ iis tantum tribui consueverant qui magnam vitæ partem in ministerio consumerant, et propter ætatem se exonerabant episcopatu.

¹⁹ Canon. Apost. c. 15 et 16. Vid. Conc. Chalced. can. 20.

²⁰ Conc. Antioch. c. 3. ²¹ Arelat. 1. c. 21. Arelat. 2. c. 13.

²² Conc. Carth. 1. c. 5. Carth. 4. c. 27.

²³ Conc. Tolet. 1. c. 12.

²⁴ Conc. Turon. c. 11.

²⁵ Conc. Taurin. c. 7.

²⁶ Conc. Nic. c. 16.

²⁷ Conc. Carth. 1. c. 5. Non licere clericum alienum ab aliquo suscipi sine literis episcopi sui, neque apud se retinere.

²⁸ Conc. Trull. c. 17.

Severus, pretending a reverence for his oath, writes to St. Austin, and tells him he could not return him his clerk for fear of making him guilty of perjury. To which St. Austin replied, That this opened a way to licentiousness, and there was an end²⁹ of all ecclesiastical order and discipline, if a bishop would pretend to keep another man's clerk upon such a scruple, for fear of being accessory to his perjury. This evidently implies, that there was no law then to compel a bishop to grant letters dismissory to his clerk; for if there had been any such, Timotheus needed not to have used the stratagem of an oath, but might have compelled St. Austin to have granted them. But the church then did not think fit to put it in every man's power to remove from one diocese to another at his own pleasure, but left every bishop sole judge in this case, as best knowing the necessities and circumstances of his own church, and whether it were expedient to part with the clergy which were ordained for her service.

The laws were no less severe against all wandering clergymen, whom some of the ancients call βακάντιβοι,³⁰ or vacantivi, by way of reproach. They were a sort of idle persons, who having deserted the service of their own church, would fix in no other, but went roving from place to place, as their fancy and their humour led them. Now, by the laws of the church no bishop was to permit any such to officiate in his diocese, nor indeed so much as to communicate in his church; because, having neither letters dismissory nor letters commendatory from their own bishop, (which every one ought to have that travelled,) they were to be suspected either as deserters, or as persons guilty of some misdemeanor, who fled from ecclesiastical censure. Therefore the laws forbade the admitting of such either to ecclesiastical or lay-communion. A presbyter or deacon, says the council of Agde,³¹ that rambles about without the letters of his bishop, shall not be admitted to communion by any other. The council of Epone³² repeats the decree in the same words. And the council of Valentia³³ in Spain orders such wandering and roving clerks, as will not settle to the constant performance and attendance of divine offices in the church, whereto they were deputed by the bishop that ordained them, to be deprived both of the communion and the honour of their order, if they persisted in their obstinacy and rebellion. So strict were the laws of the ancient church in tying the inferior clergy to the service of that church to which they were first appointed, that they might not upon any account move thence, but at the discretion of the bishop that ordained them.

Nor were the bishops so arbitrary in this matter, but that they themselves were under a like regulation, and liable to laws of the same nature. For as no clerk could remove from his own church without the licence of his bishop, so neither might any bishop pretend to translate or move himself to another see without the consent and approbation of a provincial council. Some few there were who thought it absolutely unlawful for a bishop to forsake his first see and betake himself to any other, because they looked upon his consecration to be a sort of marriage to his church, from which he could not divorce himself, nor take another without incurring the crime of spiritual adultery. To this purpose they wrested that passage of St. Paul, "A bishop must be the husband of one wife," taking it in a mystical and figurative sense, as St. Jerom³⁴ informs us. But this was but the private opinion of one or two authors, which never prevailed in the catholic church; whose prohibition of the translation of bishops was not founded upon any such reasons, but was only intended as a cautionary provision to prevent the ambition of aspiring men, that they might not run from lesser bishoprics to greater, without the authority of a provincial synod, which was the proper judge in such cases. Some canons indeed seem to forbid it absolutely and universally, as a thing not to be allowed in any case. The council of Nice,³⁵ and Sardica,³⁶ and some others, prohibit it without any exception or limitation. But other canons restrain it to the case of a bishop's intruding himself into another see by some sinister arts, without any legal authority from a provincial synod. So those called the Apostolical Canons³⁷ distinguish upon the matter: It shall not be lawful for a bishop to leave his diocese, and invade another, though many of the people would compel him to it; unless there be a reasonable cause, as that he may the more advantage the church by his preaching; and then he shall not do

Sect. 6.
Laws against the translations of bishops from one see to another, low to be limited and understood.

²⁹ Aug. Ep. 240. ad Severum. Aditus aperitur ad dissolvendum ordinem ecclesiasticæ disciplinæ, si alterius ecclesiæ clericus cuicumque juraverit, quod ab ipso non sit recessurus, eum secum esse permittat: ideo se facere affirmans, ne author sit ejus perjuri, &c.

³⁰ Synes. Ep. 67.

³¹ Conc. Agathen. c. 52. Presbytero sive diacono sine antistitis sui epistolis ambulanti communionem nullus impendat.

³² Conc. Epauens. c. 6.

³³ Conc. Valentin. c. 5. Vagus atque instabilis clericus, si episcopi, a quo ordinatus est, præceptis non obedierit, ut in delegata sibi ecclesia officium dependat assiduum, quousque in vitio permanserit, et communione et honore privetur.

³⁴ Hieron. Ep. 83. ad Oceanum. t. 2. p. 321. Quidam coacte interpretantur uxores pro ecclesiis, viros pro episcopis debere accipi, &c.

³⁵ Conc. Nic. c. 15.

³⁶ Conc. Sardic. c. 1 et 2. Conc. Antioch. can. 21. Conc. Carthag. 3. c. 38.

³⁷ Canon. Apost. c. 11.

it of his own head, but by the judgment and treaty of many bishops, that is, a provincial synod. The fourth council of Carthage distinguishes³⁸ much after the same manner: A bishop shall not remove himself from an obscure to a more honourable place out of ambition, but if the advantage of the church require it, he may be translated by the order and decree of a provincial synod. Schelstrate³⁹ and some other learned persons think, that these canons were a correction of the former, the one allowing what the other had positively forbidden. But this is not at all probable: it is more reasonable to think, that though, in the Nicene and Sardican canons, these exceptions are not expressed, yet they are to be understood: because the council of Nice itself translated Eustathius, bishop of Berræa, to Antioch, as Mr. Pagi⁴⁰ rightly observes out of Sozomen,⁴¹ and other historians of the church; which had been to break and affront their own rule at the very first, had it meant, that it should not be lawful in any case to translate a bishop from one see to another. We must conclude, then, that the design of all these canons was the same, to prevent covetousness, ambition, and love of pre-eminence in aspiring men, who thrust themselves into other sees by irregular means, by a faction, or the mere favour of the people, without staying for the choice or consent of a synod; which was the common practice of the Arian party in the time of Constantine and Constantius, and occasioned so many laws to be made against it. But when a synod of bishops in their judgment and discretion thought it necessary to translate a bishop from a lesser to a greater see for the benefit and advantage of the church, there was no law to prohibit this, but there are a thousand instances of such promotions to be met with in ancient history, as Socrates⁴² has observed long ago, who has collected a great many instances to this purpose. Those that please may see more in Cotelierius⁴³ and Bishop Beveridge,⁴⁴ for in so plain a case I do not think it necessary to be more particular in my account of them, but proceed with other laws of the church which concerned the clergy.

Sect. 7.
Laws concerning the residence of the clergy.

The next laws of this nature were such as concerned the residence of the clergy; the design of which was the same as all the former, to bind them to constant attendance upon their duty. And these laws equally concerned bishops and all the inferior clergy. The council of Sardica has several canons relating to this matter. The seventh decrees, that no bishop should go εἰς παρόπιον, to the emperor's court, unless the emperor by letter called him thither. The next canon⁴⁵ provides, that whereas there might be several cases, which might require a bishop to make some application to the emperor in behalf of the poor, or widows, or such as fled for sanctuary to the church, and condemned criminals, and the like: in such cases the deacons or subdeacons of the church were to be employed to go in his name, that the bishop might fall under no censure at court, as neglecting the business of his church. Justinian⁴⁶ has a law of the same import with these canons, That no bishop should appear at court upon any business of his church without the command of the prince: but if any petition was to be preferred to the emperor, relating to any civil contest, the bishop should depute his apocrisarius, or resident at court, to act for him, or send his æconomus, or some other of his clergy, to solicit the cause in his name; that the church might neither receive damage by his absence, nor be put to unnecessary expenses. Another canon⁴⁷ of the council of Sardica limits the absence of a bishop from his church to three weeks, unless it were upon some very weighty and urgent occasion. And another canon⁴⁸ allows the same time for a bishop, who is possessed of an estate in another diocese, to go and collect his revenues, provided he celebrate Divine service every Lord's day in the country church where his estate lies. And by two other canons⁴⁹ of that council, presbyters and deacons are limited to the same term of absence, and tied to the forementioned rules in the same manner as bishops were. The council of Agde⁵⁰ made the like order for the French churches, decreeing, That a presbyter or deacon, who was absent from his church for three weeks, should be three years suspended from the communion. In the African churches, upon the account of this residence, every bishop's house was to be near the church,⁵¹ by a rule of the fourth council of Carthage. And in the fifth council there is another rule,⁵² That every bishop shall have his residence at his principal or cathedral church, which he shall not leave, to betake himself

³⁸ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 27. Ut episcopus de loco ignobili ad nobilem per ambitionem non transeat.—Sane si id utilitas ecclesiæ fiendum poposcerit, decreto pro eo clericorum et laicorum episcopis porrecto, per sententiam synodi transferatur.

³⁹ Schelstrat. de Concil. Antioch. can. 21. p. 614.

⁴⁰ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 324. n. 22.

⁴¹ Sozom. lib. 1. c. 2.

⁴² Socrat. lib. 7. c. 36.

⁴³ Cotelier. Not. in Can. Apost. c. 14.

⁴⁴ Bevereg. Not. in eundem Canon.

⁴⁵ Conc. Sardin. c. 8.

⁴⁶ Just. Novel. 6. c. 2.

⁴⁷ Conc. Sardin. c. 11.

⁴⁸ Ibid. c. 12.

⁴⁹ Ibid. c. 16 et 17.

⁵⁰ Conc. Agathen. c. 61. Diaconus vel presbyter, si per tres hebdomadas ab ecclesia sua defuerit triennio a communione suspendatur.

⁵¹ Conc. Carthag. 4. c. 14. Ut episcopus non longe ab ecclesia hospitalium habeat.

⁵² Conc. Carthag. 5. c. 5. Placuit ut nemini sit facultas, relicta principali cathedra, ad aliquam ecclesiam in diocesi constitutam se conferre: vel intro propria diutius quam oportet constitutum, curam vel frequentationem propriæ cathedræ negligere.

to any other church in his diocese; nor continue upon his private concerns, to the neglect of his cure, and hinderance of his frequenting the cathedral church. From this it appears, that the city church was to be the chief place of the bishop's residence and cure: and Cabassutius,⁵³ in his remarks upon this canon, reflects upon the French bishops, as transgressing the ancient rule, in spending the greatest part of the year upon their pleasure in the country. Yet there is one thing that seems a difficulty in this matter; for Justinian⁵⁴ says, no bishop shall be absent from his church above a whole year, unless he has the emperor's command for it. Which implies, that a bishop might be absent from his bishopric a year in ordinary cases, and more in extraordinary. But I conceive the meaning of this is, that he might be absent a year during his whole life; not year after year; for that would amount to a perpetual absence, which it was not the intent of the law to grant, but to tie them up to the direct contrary, except the prince, upon some extraordinary affair, thought fit to grant them a particular dispensation.

Another rule, grounded upon the same reasons with the former, was the inhibition of pluralities; which concerned both bishops and the inferior clergy. As to bishops, it appears plainly from St. Ambrose, that it was not thought lawful for a bishop to have two churches. For speaking of those words of the apostle, "A bishop must be the husband of one wife," he says, If we look⁵⁵ only to the superficies of the letter, it forbids a digamist to be ordained bishop; but if we penetrate a little deeper to the profounder sense, it prohibits a bishop to have two churches. That is, wherever there were two dioceses before, it was not lawful for one bishop to usurp them both, except where the wisdom of the church and state thought it most convenient to join them into one. And it is remarkable, that though there be many instances of bishops removing from lesser sees to greater, yet there is no example in all ancient history, that I remember, of any such bishops holding both together; no, not among the Arians themselves, who were the least concerned in observing rules of any other. As to the case of the inferior clergy, we must distinguish betwixt diocesan and parochial churches, and between the office and the benefit in parochial churches. The circumstances and necessities of the church might sometimes require a presbyter or deacon to officiate in more than one parochial church, when there was a scarcity of ministers; but the revenues of such churches did not thereupon belong to him, because they were paid into the common stock of the city or cathedral church, from whence he had his monthly or yearly portion in the division of the whole, as has been noted before. And this makes it further evident, that in those early ages there could be no such thing as plurality of benefices, but only a plurality of offices in the same diocese, within such a district, as that a man might personally attend and officiate in two parochial churches. But then, as to different dioceses, it being ordinarily impossible that a man should attend a cure in two dioceses, the canons are very express in prohibiting any one from having a name in two churches, or partaking of the revenues of both. The council of Chalcedon⁵⁶ has a peremptory canon to this purpose: It shall not be lawful for any clergyman to have his name in the church roll or catalogue of two cities at the same time, that is, in the church where he was first ordained, and any other to which he flies out of ambition as to a greater church; but all such shall be returned to their own church, where they were first ordained, and only minister there. But if any one is regularly removed from one church to another, he shall not partake of the revenues of the former church, or of any oratory, hospital, or alms-house, belonging to it. And such as shall presume, after this definition of this great and œcumenical council, to transgress in this matter, are condemned to be degraded by the holy synod. And that none might pretend, under any other notion, to evade this law, the same rule was made for monasteries, that one abbot should not preside over two monasteries at the same time. Which provision is made by the council of Agde⁵⁷ and Epone, and confirmed by the imperial laws of Justinian,⁵⁸ who inserted it into his Code. Now, the design of all these laws was to oblige the clergy to constant attendance upon their duty in the church where they were first ordained; from which if they once removed, whether with licence or without, to any other diocese, they were no longer to enjoy any dividend in the church or diocese to which they first belonged. And this rule continued for several ages after the council of Chalcedon, being renewed in the second council of Nice,⁵⁹ and other later councils.

⁵³ Cabassut. Notit. Concil. c. 44. Huic canonis contraveniunt episcopi, qui magna parte anni rure versantur et deliciantur.

⁵⁴ Just. Novel. 6. c. 2. Et illud etiam definimus, ut nemo Deo amabilius episcoporum foris a sua ecclesia plusquam per totum annum abesse audeat, nisi hoc per imperialem fiat jussionem.

⁵⁵ Ambros. de Dignit. Sacerd. c. 4. Si ad superficiem tantum literæ respiciamus, prohibet bigamum episcopum ordinari: si vero ad altiores sensum conscendimus, inhihet episcopum duas usurpare ecclesias.

⁵⁶ Conc. Chalced. c. 10. Μη ἐξείναι κληρικόν ἐν δύο πόλεωv κατ' αὐτὸν καταλέγεσθαι ἐκκλησίας, &c.

⁵⁷ Conc. Agathen. c. 57. Unum abbatem duobus monasteriis interdicimus præsideri. Vid. Conc. Epauuens. c. 9.

⁵⁸ Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 40. Non sit vero abbas duorum monasteriorum.

⁵⁹ Conc. Nic. 2. c. 15.

Sect. 9.
Laws prohibiting the clergy to take upon them secular business, and offices.

In pursuance of the same design, to keep the clergy strict and constant to their duty, laws were also made to prohibit them from following any secular employment, which might divert them too much from their proper business and calling. Among those called the Apostolical Canons, there are three to this purpose. One of which says,⁶⁰ No bishop, presbyter, or deacon, shall take upon him any worldly cares, under pain of degradation. Another says,⁶¹ No bishop or presbyter shall concern himself in any secular offices or administrations, that he may have more time to attend the needs and business of the church; and this under the same penalty of degradation. The last says,⁶² A bishop, presbyter, or deacon, that busies himself in any secular office, and is minded to hold both a place in the Roman government and an office in the church, shall be deposed. For the things of Cæsar belong to Cæsar, and the things of God to God. Balsamon and Zonaras take this canon to mean only the prohibition of holding military offices, because it uses the word στρατεία: but I have showed before, out of Gothofred and others, that the word στρατεία and militia are used by the Romans in a larger signification, to denote all kinds of secular offices, as well civil as military: and therefore they more rightly interpret this canon,⁶³ who understand it as a prohibition of holding any secular office, civil as well as military, with an ecclesiastical one, as things incompatible and inconsistent with one another. Eusebius⁶⁴ informs us, from the epistle of the council of Antioch that deposed Paulus Samosatensis, that among other crimes alleged against him, this was one, that he took upon him secular places, and preferred the title of ducenarius before that of bishop. The ducenarii, among the Romans, were a sort of civil officers, so called from their receiving a salary of two hundred sestertia from the emperor, as Valesius observes⁶⁵ out of Dio. And this makes it plain, that the intent of the canons was to prohibit the clergy from meddling with civil offices, as well as military. Only in some extraordinary cases, where the matter was a business of great necessity or charity, we meet with an instance or two of a bishop's joining an ecclesiastical and civil office together without any censure. As Theodoret⁶⁶ notes of the famous Jacobus Nisibensis, that he was both bishop and prince, or governor, of Nisibis, or Antioch in Mygdonia, a city in the confines of the Persian and Roman empires. Theodoret represents him as a man of great fame in his country for his miracles, by which he sometimes relieved the city when besieged by the Persians. And it is probable, in regard to this, the emperors Constantine and Constantius pitched upon him, as the properest person to take the government of the city upon him, being a place in great danger, and very much exposed to the incursions of the Persians. But such instances are but rarely met with in ancient history.

In some times and places the laws of the church were so strict about this matter, that they would not suffer a bishop or presbyter to be left trustee to any man's will, or a tutor or guardian in pursuance of it: because it was thought this would be too great an avocation from his other business. There is a famous case in Cyprian relating to this matter. He tells us, it had been determined by an African synod, that no one should appoint any of God's ministers a curator or guardian by his will, because they were to give themselves to supplications and prayer, and to attend only upon the sacrifice and service of the altar. And therefore, when one Geminus Victor had made Geminus Faustinus, a presbyter of the church of Furni, guardian or trustee by his last will and testament, contrary to the decree of the foresaid council; Cyprian⁶⁷ wrote to the church of Furni, that they should execute the sentence of the council against Victor, which was, That no annual commemoration should be made of him in the church, nor any prayer be offered in his name (according to the custom of the church in those times) in the sacrifice of the altar. This was a sort of excommunication after death, by denying to receive such a person's oblations, and refusing to name him at the altar among others that made their offerings, and neither honouring him with the common prayers or praises that were then put up to God for all the faithful that were dead in the Lord. This was the punishment of such as transgressed this rule in the days of Cyprian. And in the following ages the canon was renewed, but with a little difference. For though bishops were absolutely and universally forbidden⁶⁸ to take this office upon them, both by the ecclesi-

Sect. 10.
Laws prohibiting the clergy to be tutors and guardians,
how far extended.

⁶⁰ Can. Apost. c. 7. Κοσμικὰς φροντίδας μὴ ἀναλαμβάνετω, εἶδε μὴ, καθαιρέσθω.

⁶¹ Ibid. c. 81. Ὅτι μὴ χρὴ ἐπίσκοπον ἢ πρεσβύτερον καθιέναι ἑαυτὸν εἰς δημοσίας διοικήσεις, &c.

⁶² Ibid. c. 83. Στρατεία ἀχολάζων, καὶ βουλόμενος ἀμφότερα κατέχειν, Ῥωμαϊκὴν ἀρχὴν καὶ ἱερατικὴν διοίκησιν, καθαιρέσθω.

⁶³ Bevereg. Not. in Can. Apost. c. 83.

⁶⁴ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30. Κοσμικὰ ἀξιώματα ὑποδύμενος, καὶ δοκνητῆριος μᾶλλον ἢ ἐπίσκοπος θέλων καλεῖσθαι.

⁶⁵ Valesius in loc. Ducenarii dicebantur procuratores, qui ducenta sestertia annui salarii nomine accipiebant a principe. Ex Dione, lib. 53.

⁶⁶ Theod. lib. 2. c. 30.

⁶⁷ Cypr. Ep. 66. al. 1. ad Cler. Furnitan. p. 3. Ideo Victor cum contra formam nuper in concilio a sacerdotibus datam, Geminium Faustinum presbyterum ausus sit tutorem constituere, non est quod pro dormitione ejus apud vos fiat oblatio, aut deprecatio aliqua nomine ejus in ecclesia frequentetur.

⁶⁸ Conc. Carthag. 4. c. 18. Ut episcopus tuitionem testamentorum non suscipiat.

astical and civil law; yet presbyters and deacons, and all the inferior clergy, were allowed to be tutors and guardians to such persons as by right of kindred⁶⁹ might claim this as a duty from them. But still the prohibition stood in force against their being concerned in that office for any other, that were not of their relations, as appears from one of Justinian's Novels, which was made to settle this matter in the church.

By other laws they were prohibited from taking upon them the office of pleaders at the bar in any civil contest, though it were in their own case, or the concerns of the church: neither might they be bondsmen or sureties for any other man's appearance in such causes: because it was thought, that such sort of encumbrances might bring detriment to the church, in distracting her ministers from constant attendance upon Divine service, as appears both from the foresaid Novel⁷⁰ of Justinian, and some ancient canons,⁷¹ which forbid a clergyman to become a sponsor in any such cause under the penalty of deprivation.

Now, as all these offices and employments were forbidden the clergy upon the account of being consumers of their time, and hinderances of Divine service; so there were some others prohibited, not only upon this account, but also upon the notion of their being generally attended with covetousness and filthy lucre. Thus, in the first council of Carthage⁷² we find several prohibitions of clergymen's becoming stewards or accountants to laymen. The third council⁷³ forbids both that, and also their taking any houses or lands to farm, and generally all business that was disreputable and unbecoming their calling. The second council of Arles⁷⁴ likewise forbids their farming other men's estates, or following any trade or merchandise for filthy lucre's sake, under the penalty of deprivation. The general council of Chalcedon⁷⁵ has a canon to the same purpose, That no monk or clergyman shall rent any estate, or take upon him the management of any secular business, except the law called him to be guardian to orphans, (in the case that has been spoken of before, as being their next relation,) or else the bishop made him steward of the church revenues, or overseer of the widows, orphans, and such others as stood in need of the church's care and assistance. And here the reason given for making this canon is, that some of the clergy were found to neglect the service of God, and live in laymen's houses as their stewards, for covetousness and filthy lucre's sake. Which was an old complaint made by Cyprian⁷⁶ in that sharp invective of his against some of the bishops of his own age, who were so far gone in this vice of covetousness, as to neglect the service of God to follow worldly business; leaving their sees, and deserting their people, to ramble about in quest of gainful trades in other countries, to the provocation of the Divine vengeance, and flagrant scandal of the church. So that these being the reasons of making such laws, we are to judge of the nature of the laws themselves by the intent and design of them; which was to correct such manifest abuses, as covetousness and neglect of Divine service, which either as cause or effect too often attended the clergy's engagement of themselves in secular business.

But in some cases it was reasonable to presume, that their engagements of this nature were separate from these vices. For in some times and places, where the revenues of the church were very small, and not a competent maintenance for all the clergy, some of them, especially among the inferior orders, were obliged to divide themselves between the service of the church and some secular calling. Others, who found they had time enough to spare, negotiated out of charity, to bestow their gains in the relief of the poor, and other pious uses. And some, who, before their entrance into orders, had been brought up to an ascetic and philosophic life, wherein they wrought at some honest manual calling with their own hands, continued to work in the same manner, though not in the same measure, even after they were made presbyters and bishops in the church, for the exercise of their humility, or to answer some other end of a Christian life. Now, in all these cases, the vices complained of in the forementioned

⁶⁹ Just. Novel. 123. c. 5. Episcopus et monachos ex nulla lege tutores aut curatores cujuscunque personæ fieri concedimus. Presbyteros autem et diaconos et subdiaconos, si jure ac lege cognationis ad tutelam aut curam vocentur, ejusmodi munus suscipere concedimus. Vid. Concil. Chalced. c. 3.

⁷⁰ Just. Novel. 123. c. 6. Sed neque procuratorem litis, aut fidejussorem pro talibus causis episcopum, aut alium clericum, proprio nomine, aut ecclesiæ sinimus: ne per hanc occasionem sacra ministeria impediatur.

⁷¹ Canon. Apost. c. 20. Κληρικὸς ἐγγυῶς διδοὺς καθαρῶς ὄσω. Vid. Constitut. Apost. lib. 2. c. 6.

⁷² Conc. Carth. l. c. 6. Qui serviunt Deo, et annexi sunt clero, non accedant ad actus seu administrationem vel pro- curationem domorum. Ibid. c. 9. Laicis non liceat clericos nostros eligere apothecarios vel ratiocinatores.

⁷³ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 15. Clerici non sint conductores, neque procuratores, neque ullo turpi vel inhonesto negotio victum quærant.

⁷⁴ Conc. Arelat. l. al. 2. c. 14. Siquis clericus conductor alienæ rei voluerit esse aut turpis lucri gratia aliquod genus negotiationis exercuerit, depositus a clero, a communione alienus habeatur.

⁷⁵ Conc. Chalced. c. 3.

⁷⁶ Cypr. de Lapsis, p. 123. Episcopi plurimi Divina procreatione contempta, procuratores rerum secularium fieri, derelicta cathedra, glebe deserta, per alienas provincias oberrantes, negotiationis quæstuosæ nundinas aucupari, &c.

laws, as the reasons of the prohibition, had no share or concern: for such men's negociations were neither the effects of covetousness, nor attended properly with any neglect of Divine service; and consequently not within the prohibition and censure of the laws. For first, both the laws of church and state allowed the inferior clergy to work at an honest calling in cases of necessity, to provide themselves of a liberal maintenance, when the revenues of the church could not do it.

In the fourth council of Carthage⁷⁷ there are three canons immediately following one another to this purpose, that they should provide themselves of food and raiment at some honest trade or husbandry, without hindering the duties of their office in the church: and such of them as were able to labour, should be taught some trade and letters together. And the laws of the state were so far from hindering this, that they encouraged such of the clergy to follow an honest calling, by granting them a special immunity from the chrysargyrum, or lustral tax, which was exacted of all other tradesmen, as I have showed more at large in another place.⁷⁸ Secondly, It was lawful also to spend their leisure hours upon any manual trade or calling, when it was to answer some good end of charity thereby: as that they might not be overburdensome to the church; or might have some superfluities to bestow upon the indigent and needy; or even that they might set the laity a provoking example of industry and diligence in their callings. Which were those worthy ends, which the holy apostle St. Paul proposed to himself in labouring with his own hands at the trade of tent-making: after whose example many eminent bishops of the ancient church were not ashamed to employ their spare hours in some honest labour, to promote the same ends of charity, which the apostle so frequently inculcates. Thus Sozomen observes⁷⁹ of Zeno, bishop of Maiuma in Palestine, that he lived to be a hundred years old, all which time he constantly attended both morning and evening the service of the church, and yet found time to work at the trade of a linen weaver, by which he not only subsisted himself, but relieved others, though he lived in a rich and wealthy church. Epiphanius makes a more general observation against the Massalian heretics, (who were great encouragers of idleness,) that not only all those of a monastic life, but also many of the priests of God,⁸⁰ imitating their holy father in Christ St. Paul, wrought with their own hands at some honest trade, that was no dishonour to their dignity, and consistent with their constant attendance upon their ecclesiastical duties; by which means they had both what was necessary for their own subsistence, and to give to others that stood in need of their relief. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions⁸¹ brings in the apostles recommending industry in every man's calling from their own example, that they might have wherewith to sustain themselves, and supply the needs of others. Which though it be not an exact representation of the apostles' practice, (for we do not read of any other apostle's labouring with his own hands, except St. Paul, whilst he preached the gospel,) yet it serves to show what sense that author had of this matter; that he did not think it simply unlawful for a clergyman to labour at some secular employment, when the end was charity, and not filthy lucre. And it is observable, that the imperial laws for some time granted the same immunity from the lustral tax to the inferior clergy, that traded with a charitable design to relieve others, as to those that traded out of necessity for their own maintenance; of both which I have given an account in another place. Thirdly, We have some instances of very eminent bishops, who, out of humility and love of a philosophical and laborious life, spent their vacant hours in some honest business, to which they had been accustomed in their former days. Thus Ruffin,⁸² and Socrates,⁸³ and Sozomen⁸⁴ tell us of Spiridion, bishop of Trimitus in Cyprus, one of the most eminent bishops in the council of Nice, a man famous for the gift of prophecy and miracles, that having been a shepherd before, he continued to employ himself in that calling, out of his great humility, all his life. But then he made his actions and the whole tenor of his life demonstrate, that he did it not out of covetousness. For Sozomen particularly notes, that whatever his product was, he either distributed it among the poor, or lent it without usury to such as needed to borrow, whom he trusted to take out of his storehouse what they pleased, and return what they pleased, without ever examining or taking any account of them. Fourthly, I observe, that those laws which were most severe against the superior clergy's negotiating in any secular business, in cases of necessity allowed them a privilege, which was equivalent to it: that is, that they might employ others to factor for them, so long as they were not concerned in their own persons. For so the council of Eliberis⁸⁵ words it:

⁷⁷ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 51. Clericus quantumlibet verbo Dei eruditus, artificio victum querat. Ibid. c. 52. Clericus victum et vestimentum sibi, artificio vel agricultura, absque officii sui duntaxat detrimento, præparet. Ibid. c. 53. Omnes clerici, qui ad operandum validi sunt, et artificiose et literas discant.

⁷⁸ Book V. chap. 3. sect. 6. ⁷⁹ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 28.

⁸⁰ Epiphanius. Hær. 80. Massalian. n. 6.

⁸¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 63.

⁸² Ruffin. lib. 1. c. 5. Hic pastor ovium etiam in episcopatu positus permansit.

⁸³ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 12. Διὰ δὲ ἀτυφίαν πολλὴν, ἐχόμενος τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς ἐποίμαινε καὶ τὰ πρόβατα.

⁸⁴ Sozom. lib. 1. c. 11.

⁸⁵ Conc. Eliber. c. 19. Episcopi, presbyteri, et diaconi, de locis suis negociandi causa non discedant, nec circumueintes provincias, quæstuosas nundinas sectentur. Sane ad victum sibi conquirendum, aut filium, aut libertum, aut mercena-

Bishops, presbyters, and deacons shall not leave their station to follow a secular calling, nor rove into other provinces after fairs and markets. But yet, to provide themselves a livelihood, they may employ a son, or a freeman, or a hired servant, or a friend, or any other; and if they negociate, let them negociate within their own province. So that all these laws were justly tempered with great wisdom and prudence; that as, on the one hand, the service of God and the needs of his ministers and servants might be supplied together; so, on the other, no encouragement should be given to covetousness in the clergy, nor any one be countenanced in the neglect of his proper business, by a licence to lead a wandering, busy, distracted life, which did not become those that were dedicated to the sacred function. It is against these only, that all the severe invectives of St. Jerom,⁸⁶ and others of the ancients,⁸⁷ are levelled, which the reader must interpret with the same limitations, and distinction of cases, as we have done the public laws: the design of both being only to censure the vices of the rich, who, without any just reason or necessity, immersed themselves in the cares of a secular life, contrary to the rules and tenor of their profession.

Another sort of laws were made respecting their outward behaviour, to guard them equally against scandal in their character, and danger in their conversation. Such were the laws against corresponding and conversing too familiarly with Jews and Gentile philosophers. The council of Eliberis⁸⁸ forbids them to eat with the Jews under pain of suspension. The council of Agde⁸⁹ has a canon to the same purpose, forbidding them to give, as well as receive, an entertainment from the Jews. And those called the Apostolical Canons,⁹⁰ not only prohibit them to fast or feast with the Jews, but to receive τις εορτης ξίνα, any of those portions or presents, which they were used to send to one another upon their festivals. And the laws against conversing with Gentile philosophers were much of the same nature. For Sozomen⁹¹ says, Theodotus, bishop of Laodicea in Syria, excommunicated the two Apollinarii, father and son, because they went to hear Epiphanius the sophist speak his hymn in the praise of Bacchus; which was not so agreeable to their character, the one being a presbyter, the other a deacon in the Christian church. It was in regard to their character likewise, that other canons restrained them from eating or drinking in a tavern, except they were upon a journey, or some such necessary occasion required them to do it. For among those called the Apostolical Canons,⁹² and the decrees of the councils of Laodicea⁹³ and Carthage,⁹⁴ there are several rules to this purpose; the strictness of which is not much to be wondered at, since Julian required the same caution in his heathen priests, that they should neither appear at the public theatres, nor in any taverns, under pain of deposition from their office of priesthood, as may be seen in his letter to Arsacius, high priest of Galatia, which Sozomen⁹⁵ records, and other fragments of his writings.

To this sort of laws we may reduce those ancient rules, which concerned the garb and habit of the ancient clergy; in which such a decent mean was to be observed, as might keep them from obloquy and censure on both hands, either as too nice and critical, or too slovenly and careless in their dress: their habit being generally to be such, as might express the gravity of their minds without any superstitious singularities, and their modesty and humility without affectation. In this matter, therefore, their rules were formed according to the customs and opinions of the age, which are commonly the standard and measure of decency and indecency in things of this nature. Thus, for instance, long hair, and baldness by shaving the head or beard, being then generally reputed indecencies in contrary extremes, the clergy were obliged to observe a becoming mediocrity between them. This is the meaning of that controverted canon of the fourth council of Carthage, according to its true reading, that a clergyman shall neither indulge long hair, nor shave his beard: Clericus nec comam nutriat⁹⁶ nec barbam radat. The contrary custom being now in vogue in the church of Rome, Bellarmine⁹⁷ and many other writers of that side, who will have all their ceremonies to be apostolical, and to contain some great mystery in them, pretend, that the word radat should be left out of that ancient canon, to make it agreeable to the present practice. But the learned Savaro⁹⁸ proves the other to be the true reading, as well from the Vatican, as many other manuscripts. And even Spondanus himself⁹⁹ confesses as much,

Sect. 15.
Laws relating to their habit.

rium, aut amicum, aut quemlibet mittant: et si voluerint negotiari, intra provinciam negotientur.

⁸⁶ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian. Negotiatorem clericum quasi pestem fuge, &c.

⁸⁷ Sulpic. Sever. Hist. lib. 1. p. 30. Tanta hoc tempore animos eorum habendi cupido veluti tabes incensit: inhiant possessionibus, prædia excolunt, auro incubant, emunt, venduntque quæstui, per omnia student, &c.

⁸⁸ Conc. Eliber. c. 50. Clericus qui cum Judæis cibum sumpserit, placuit eum a communione abstinere, ut debeat emendari.

⁸⁹ Conc. Agathen. c. 40. Omnes clerici Judæorum convivium evitent. Nec eos ad convivia quisquam excipiat.

⁹⁰ Canon. Apost. c. 70. ⁹¹ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 25.

⁹² Canon. Apost. c. 53. ⁹³ Conc. Laodic. c. 24.

⁹⁴ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 27.

⁹⁵ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 16. Vid. Julian. Fragment. Epist. p. 517.

⁹⁶ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 44.

⁹⁷ Bellarm. de Monach. lib. 2. c. 40.

⁹⁸ Savaro, Not. in Sidonium, lib. 4. Ep. 21. p. 306.

⁹⁹ Spondan. Epit. Baron. an. 58. n. 58.

and thereupon takes occasion to correct Baronius for asserting, that in the time of Sidonius Apollinaris it was the custom of the French bishops to shave their beards: whereas the contrary appears from one of Sidonius his epistles,¹⁰⁰ that their custom then was to wear short hair and long beards, as he describes his friend Maximus Palatinus, who of a secular was become a clergyman: he says, his habit, his gait, his modesty, his countenance, his discourse were all religious; and agreeably to these, his hair was short, and his beard long. Custom, it seems, had then made it decent and becoming; and upon that ground the ancients are sometimes pretty severe against such of the clergy as transgressed in this point, as guilty of an indecency in going contrary to the rules and customs of the church, which were to be observed, though the thing was otherwise in itself of an indifferent nature.

The Romanists are generally as much to be blame in their accounts of the ancient tonsure of the clergy; which they describe in such a manner, as to make parallel to that shaving of the crown of the head by way of mystical rite, which is now the modern custom. Whereas this was so far from being required as a matter of decency among the ancients, that it was condemned and prohibited by them. Which may appear from that question, which Optatus puts to the Donatists, when he asks them, where they had a command¹⁰¹ to shave the heads of the priests? as they had done by the catholic clergy in order to bring them to do public penance in the church. In which case, as Albaspinæus rightly notes,¹⁰² it was customary to use shaving to baldness, and sprinkling the head with ashes, as signs of sorrow and repentance. But the priests of God were not to be thus treated. Which shows, that the ancients then knew nothing of this, as a ceremony belonging to the ordination or life of the clergy. Which is still more evident from what St. Jerom says upon those words of Ezekiel xlv. 20, "Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only poll their heads." This, says he,¹⁰³ evidently demonstrates, that we ought neither to have our heads shaved, as the priests and votaries of Isis and Serapis; nor yet to suffer our hair to grow long, after the luxurious manner of barbarians and soldiers; but that priests should appear with a venerable and grave countenance: neither are they to make themselves bald with a razor, nor poll their heads so close, that they may look as if they were shaven; but they are to let their hair grow so long, that it may cover their skin. It is impossible now for any rational man to imagine, that Christian priests had shaven crowns in the time of St. Jerom, when he so expressly says they had not, and that none but the priests of Isis and Serapis had so. But the custom was to poll their heads, and cut their hair to a moderate degree; not for any mystery that was in it, but for the sake of decency and gravity: that they might neither affect the manners of the luxurious part of the world, which prided itself in long hair; nor fall under contempt and obloquy by an indecent baldness; but express a sort of venerable modesty in their looks and aspects, which is the reason that St. Jerom assigns for the ancient tonsure.

From hence we may further conclude, that the ancient clergy were not called coronati from their shaven crowns, as some would have it, since it is evident there was no such thing among them: but it seems rather a name given them, as Gothofred¹⁰⁴ and Savaro¹⁰⁵ conjecture, from the form of the ancient tonsure; which was made in a circular figure, by cutting away the hair a little from the crown of the head, and leaving a round or circle hanging downwards. This in some councils¹⁰⁶ is called circuli corona, and ordered to be used in opposition to some heretics, who it seems prided themselves in long hair and the contrary custom. But I am not confident that this was the reason of the name, coronati; it might be given the clergy in general out of respect to their office and character, which was always of great honour and esteem: for corona signifies honour and dignity in a figurative sense, and it is not improbable but that the word was sometimes so used in this case, as has been noted before¹⁰⁷ in speaking of the form of saluting bishops, per coronam.

As to the kind or fashion of their apparel, it does not appear for several ages, that there was any other distinction observed therein between them

Sect. 16. The tonsure of the ancients very different from that of the Romish church.

Sect. 17. Of the corona clericalis, and why the clergy called coronati.

Sect. 18. Whether the clergy were distinguish'd in their apparel from laymen.

¹⁰⁰ Sidon. lib. 4. Ep. 24. Habitus viro, gradus, pudor, color, sermo religiosus: tum coma brevis, barba prolixa, &c.

¹⁰¹ Optat. cont. Parmen. lib. 2. p. 58. Docete, ubi vobis mandatum est radere capita sacerdotum, cum e contrario sint tot exempla proposita, fieri non debere.—Qui parare debebas aures ad audiendum, parasti novaculam ad delinquendum.

¹⁰² Albaspinæus in loc. p. 141.

¹⁰³ Hieron. lib. 13. in Ezek. cap. 44. p. 668. Quod autem sequitur, capita sua non radent, &c. perspicue demonstratur, nec rasis capitibus, sicut sacerdotes, cultoresque Isidis atque Serapis, nos esse debere; nec rursum comam demit- tere, quod proprie luxuriosum est, barbarorumque et militantium; sed ut honestus habitus sacerdotum facie demonstretur; nec calvitium novacula esse faciendum, nec ita ad pressum tendendum caput, ut rasorum similes esse videamur; sed in tantum capillos esse demittendos, ut operata sit cutis.

¹⁰⁴ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Theod. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 38.

¹⁰⁵ Savaro, Not. in Sidon. lib. 6. Ep. 3.

¹⁰⁶ Conc. Tolet. 4. c. 41. Omnes clerici, detonso superius capite toto, inferius solum circuli coronam relinquunt, &c.

¹⁰⁷ Book II. chap. 9. sect. 5.

and the laity, save that they were more confined to wear that which was modest and grave, and becoming their profession, without being tied to any certain garb or form of clothing. Several councils require the clergy to wear apparel suitable to their profession, but they do not express any kind, or describe it otherwise, than that it should not border upon luxury or any affected neatness, but rather keep a medium between finery and slovenliness. This was St. Jerom's direction to Nepotian,¹⁰⁸ that he should neither wear black nor white clothing; for gaiety and slovenliness were equally to be avoided, the one savouring of niceness and delicacy, and the other of vain-glory. Yet in different places different customs seem to have prevailed, as to the colour of their clothing. For, at Constantinople, in the time of Chrysostom and Arsacius, the clergy commonly went in black, as the Novatians did in white. Which appears from the dispute which Socrates speaks of¹⁰⁹ between Sisinnius, the Novatian bishop, and one of Arsacius's clergy: for he says, Sisinnius going one day to visit Arsacius, the clergyman asked him, why he wore a garment which did not become a bishop? And where it was written, that a priest ought to be clothed in white? To whom he replied, You first show me where it is written that a bishop ought to be clothed in black? From this it is easy to collect, that by this time it was become the custom at Constantinople for the clergy to wear black, and that perhaps to distinguish themselves from the Novatians, who affected, it seems, to appear in white. But we do not find these matters as yet so particularly determined or prescribed in any councils. For the fourth council of Carthage¹¹⁰ requires the clergy to wear such apparel as was suitable to their profession, but does not particularize any further about it, save that they should not affect any finery or gaiety in their shoes or clothing. And the council of Agde¹¹¹ gives the very same direction. Baronius,¹¹² indeed, is very earnest to persuade his reader, that bishops, in the time of Cyprian, wore the same habit that is now worn by cardinals in the church of Rome, and such bishops as are advanced from a monastery to the episcopal throne. As if Cyprian had been a monk or a cardinal of the church of Rome. But as the learned editor¹¹³ of Cyprian's Works observes, there is scarce any thing so absurd, that a man who is engaged in a party cause cannot persuade himself to believe, and hope to persuade others also. For is it likely that bishops and presbyters should make their appearance in public in a distinct habit, at a time when tyrants and persecutors made a most diligent search after them to put them to death? Do the clergy of the present church of Rome use to appear so in countries where they live in danger of being discovered and taken? But what shall we say to the writer of Cyprian's Passion, who mentions Cyprian's¹¹⁴ lacerna or birrus, and after that his tunica or dalmatica, and last of all his linea, in which he suffered? of which Baronius makes the linea to be the bishop's rochet; and the dalmatica or tunica, that which they now call the loose tunicle; and the lacerna or birrus, the red silken vestment that covers the shoulders. Why, to all this it may be said, that these are only old names for new things. For besides the absurdity of thinking that Cyprian should go to his martyrdom in his sacred and pontifical robes, (which were not to be worn out of the church,) it is evident these were but the names of those common garments which many Christians then used without distinction.

As to the birrus, it is evident that it was no peculiar habit of bishops, Sect. 19. A particular account of the birrus and pallium. nor yet of the clergy. That it was not peculiar to bishops, appears from what St. Austin says of it, that it was the common garment which all his clergy wore, as well as himself. And therefore if any one presented him with a richer birrus than ordinary, he would not wear it. For,¹¹⁵ though it might become another bishop, it would not become him, who was a poor man, and born of poor parents. He must have such a one as a presbyter could have, or a deacon, or a subdeacon. If any one gave him a better, he was used to sell it; that since the garment itself could not be used in common, the price of it at least might be common. This shows plainly that the birrus was not the bishop's peculiar habit, but the common garment of all St. Austin's clergy. And that this was no more than the common tunica, or coat worn generally by Christians in Africa and other places, may appear from a canon of the council of Gangra, made against Eustathius the heretic, and his followers, ¹⁰⁸ Hieron. Ep. 2. ad Nepot. Vestes pullas æque devita, ut candidas. Ornatus et sordes pari modo fugiendæ sunt; quia alterum delicias, alterum gloriam redolet, &c.

¹⁰⁹ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 22.

¹¹⁰ Conc. Carth. 4. c. 45. Clericus professionem suam et in habitu et in inessu probet: et ideo nec vestibus nec calceamentis decorem quærat.

¹¹¹ Conc. Agathen. c. 20. Vestimenta vel calceamenta etiam eis, nisi quæ religionem deceant, uti aut habere non liceat.

¹¹² Baron. an. 261. n. 44.

¹¹³ Vide Fell, Not. in Vit. Cypr. p. 13.

¹¹⁴ Passio Cypr. p. 13. Cyprianus in agrum sexti productus est, et ibi se lacerna birro expoliavit.—Et cum se dalmatica (al. tunica) expoliasset, et diaconibus tradidisset, in linea stetit, et cepit spiculatorem sustinere.

¹¹⁵ Aug. Sermon. 50. de Diversis. t. 10. p. 523. Offeratur mihi birrum pretiosum, forte decet episcopum, quamvis non deceat Augustinum, id est, hominem pauperem, de pauperibus natum.—Talem debet habere, qualem potest habere presbyter, qualem potest habere diaconus et subdiaconus.—Si quis meliorem dederit, vendo, quod et facere soleo, ut quando non potest vestis esse communis, pretium vestis sit commune.

who condemned the common habit,¹¹⁶ and brought in the use of a strange habit in its room. Now this common habit was the birrus, or βῆρος, as they call it in the canon made against them, which runs in these words: If any man uses the pallium,¹¹⁷ or cloak, upon the account of an ascetic life, and, as if there were some holiness in that, condemns those that with reverence use the birrus, and other garments that are commonly worn, let him be anathema. The birrus, then, was the common and ordinary coat, which the Christians of Paphlagonia and those parts generally wore: and though the ascetics used the περιβόλαιον, the philosophic pallium, or cloak, yet the clergy of that country used the common birrus, or coat. For Sozomen,¹¹⁸ in relating this same history, instead of βῆρος, uses the word χιτων, which is a more known name for the Latin tunica, or coat: and he also adds, that Eustathius himself, after the synod had condemned him, changed his philosophic habit, and used the same garb that the secular presbyters wore. Which plainly evinces, that as yet the clergy in those parts did not distinguish themselves by their habit from other Christians, though the ascetics generally did. In the French churches, several years after this, we find the clergy still using the same secular habit with other Christians: and when some endeavoured to alter it, and introduce the ascetic or philosophic habit among them; Celestine, bishop of Rome, wrote a reprimanding letter to them, asking, Why that habit, the cloak, was used in the French churches,¹¹⁹ when it had been the custom of so many bishops for so many years to use the common habit of the people? From whom the clergy were to be distinguished by their doctrine, and not by their garb; by their conversation, not their habit; by the purity of their souls, rather than their dress. But yet I must observe, that in some places the ascetics, when they were taken into the ministry of the church, were allowed to retain their ancient philosophic habit without any censure. Thus St. Jerom¹²⁰ observes of his friend Nepotian, that he kept to his philosophic habit, the pallium, after he was ordained presbyter, and wore it to the day of his death. He says the same of Heraclas,¹²¹ presbyter of Alexandria, that he continued to use his philosophic habit when he was presbyter. Which is noted also by Eusebius out of Origen, who says, that when Heraclas entered himself in the school of philosophy under Ammonius, he then laid aside the common garb, and took the philosophic habit,¹²² with which he sat in the presbytery of Alexandria. Upon which Valesius¹²³ very rightly observes, that there was then no peculiar habit of the clergy, forasmuch as Heraclas always retained his philosophic pallium; which was the known habit of the ascetics, but as yet was very rarely used among the clergy, who wore generally the common habit, except when some such philosophers and ascetics came among them. For here we see it was noted as something rare and singular in Heraclas: but in after ages, when the clergy were chiefly chosen out of the monks and ascetics, the philosophic habit came in by degrees with them, and was encouraged, till at last it became the most usual habit of the clergy of all sorts: but this was not till the fifth or sixth century, as may be collected from what has been said before on this subject.

But some, perhaps, may think the clergy had always a distinct habit, because some ancient authors take notice of the collobium, as a garment worn by bishops and presbyters in the primitive ages. For Epiphanius,¹²⁴ speaking of Arius, while he was presbyter of Alexandria, says, he always wore the collobium or hemiphorium. And Pius, bishop of Rome, in his epistle to Justus, bishop of Vienna, (which by many is reckoned genuine,) speaks of Justus¹²⁵ as wearing a collobium also. But this was no more than the tunica, of which there were two sorts, the dalmatica and collobium, which differed only in this respect, that the collobium was the short coat without long sleeves, so called from κολοβός, curtus; but the dalmatica was the tunica manicata et talaris, the long coat with sleeves. Both which were used by the Romans, though the collobium was the more common, ancient, and honourable garment. As appears from Tully, who derides Catiline's¹²⁶ soldiers, because they had their tunicæ manicatæ et talaris; whereas the ancient Romans were used

Sect. 20.
Of the collobium,
dalmatica, caracolla,
hemiphorium,
and linen.

¹¹⁶ Conc. Gangr. in Præfat. Ξένα ἀμφιάσματα ἐπὶ καταπτώσει τῆς κοινότητος τῶν ἀμφιασμάτων συνάγοντες.

¹¹⁷ Conc. Gangr. c. 12. Εἰ τις ἀνδρῶν διὰ νομιζομένην ἄσκησιν περιβολαίω χρήται, καὶ ὡς ἂν ἐκ τούτου τὴν δικαιοσύνην ἔχων καταψηφίσαιτο τῶν μετ' εὐλαβείας τοὺς βήρους φορούντων, καὶ τῆ ἄλλῃ κοινῇ καὶ ἐν συνθειᾷ οὐσῆ ἐσθῆτι κεχρημένων, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω.

¹¹⁸ Sozom. lib. 3. c. 14.

¹¹⁹ Celestin. Ep. 2. ad. Episc. Gall. c. 1. Unde hic habitus in ecclesiis Gallicanis, ut tot annorum, tantorumque pontificum in alterum habitum consuetudo vertatur? Discernendi a plebe vel cæteris sumus doctrina, non veste; conversatione, non habitu; mentis puritate, non cultu.

¹²⁰ Hieron. Epitaph. Nepotian.

¹²¹ Hieron. de Scriptor. c. 51. Heraclam presbyterum, qui sub habitu philosophi perseverabat, &c.

¹²² Orig. ap. Euseb. Lib. 6. c. 19. Πρότερον κοινῇ ἐσθῆτι χρώμενος, ἀποδυσάμενος καὶ φιλόσοφον ἀναλαβὼν σχῆμα μεχρὶ τοῦ δένρου τηρεῖ.

¹²³ Vales. Not. in loc. Ex his apparet, nullum etiam tum peculiarem fuisse vestitum clericorum, quandoquidem Heraclas philosophicum pallium semper retinuit.

¹²⁴ Epiph. Har. 69. Arian. n. 3. Ἡμφόριον γὰρ οὗ τοιοῦτος αἶψ, καὶ κολοβίωνα ἐνδιδυσκόμενος.

¹²⁵ Pius, Ep. 4. ad Just. Vien. Tu vero apud senatoriam Viennam—collobio episcoporum vestitus, &c.

¹²⁶ Cicero, Orat. 2. in Catilin. n. 22.

to wear the collobia, or short coats without long sleeves: as Servius¹²⁷ and St. Jerom¹²⁸ after him observe from this place of Tully. So that a bishop or a presbyter's wearing a collobium means no more (when the hard name is explained) but their wearing a common Roman garment. Which is evident from one of the laws of Theodosius the Great, made about the habits which senators were allowed to use within the walls of Constantinople, where they are forbidden to wear the soldier's coat, the chlamys, but allowed to use the collobium and penula,¹²⁹ because these were civil habits, and vestments of peace. The dalmatica, or as it was otherwise called, χειρόδοτος, or tunica manicata, because it had sleeves down to the hands, was seldom used among the Romans: for Lampridius¹³⁰ notes it as a singular thing in the Life of Commodus the emperor, that he wore a dalmatica in public, which he also¹³¹ censures in Heliogabalus, as Tully had done before in Catiline. And that is a good argument to prove, that the clergy of this age did not wear the dalmatica in public, since it was not then the common garment of the Romans. And the conjecture of a learned man¹³² is well grounded, who thinks that in the Life of St. Cyprian, where the ancient copies have, tunicam tulit, some officious modern transcribers changed the word tunica into dalmatica, as being more agreeable to the language and custom of their own time, when the dalmatica was reckoned among the sacred vestments of the church, though we never find it mentioned as such in any ancient author. The caracalla, which some now call the cassock, was originally a Gallic habit, which Antoninus Bassianus, who was born at Lyons in France, first brought into use among the Roman people, whence he had the name of Caracalla, as Aurelius Victor¹³³ informs us. It was a long garment, reaching down to the heels, which Victor says the Roman people put on, when they went to salute the emperor: but whether it was also a clerical habit in those days, may be questioned, since no ancient author speaks of it as such: but if it was, it was not any peculiar habit of the clergy; since Spartian,¹³⁴ who lived in the time of Constantine, says, they were then used by the common people of Rome, who called them caracallæ Antoniniana, from their author. The ἡμιφόριον, which Epiphanius joins with the collobium, was either but another name for the same garment, or one like it: for it signifies a short cloak or coat, as Petavius¹³⁵ and other critics explain it: ἡμισὺν ἱματίας, or dimidium pallium, which answers to the description of the collobium given before. As for the linea, mentioned in the Life of Cyprian, which Baronius calls the bishop's rochet, it seems to have been no more than some common garment made of linen, though we know not what other name to give it. Baronius says pleasantly, it was not his shirt, and therefore concludes it must be his rochet: which is an argument to make a reader smile, but carries no great conviction in it. And yet it is as good as any that he produces to prove, that bishops in Cyprian's time appeared in public differently habited from other men. That the clergy had their particular habits for ministering in Divine service, at least in the beginning of the fourth century, is not denied, but will be proved and evidenced in its proper place: but that any such distinction was generally observed extra sacra in their other habits in that age, is what does not appear, but the contrary from what has been discoursed. It was necessary for me to give the reader this caution, because some unwarily confound these things together, and allege the proofs or disproofs of the one for the other, which yet are of very different consideration.

CHAPTER V.

SOME REFLECTIONS UPON THE FOREGOING DISCOURSE, CONCLUDING WITH AN ADDRESS TO THE CLERGY OF THE PRESENT CHURCH.

HAVING thus far gone over, and as it were brought into one view, the chief of those ancient laws and rules, which concerned the elections, qualifications, duties, and general offices of the primitive clergy; reserving the consideration of particular offices to their proper places, I shall close this part of the discourse with a few necessary re-¹²⁷ Servius in Virgil. 9. Æneid. vers. 616. Et tunicæ manicas, et habent redimicula mitræ.

¹²⁸ Hieron. Quæst. Hebraic. in Genes. xxxvii. 32. t. 3. p. 222. Pro varia tunica Symmachus interpretatus est tunicam manicatam; sive quod ad talos usque descenderet, sive quod haberet manicas; antiqui enim magis collobiis utebantur.

¹²⁹ Cod. Theodos. lib. 14. Tit. 10. de Habitu quo uti oportet intra Urbem, Leg. 1. Nullus senatorum habitum sibi vindicet militarem, sed chlamydis terrore deposito, quieti colloborum ac penularum induat vestimenta, &c.

¹³⁰ Lamprid. Vit. Commodi, p. 139. Dalmaticatus in publico processit.

¹³¹ Id. Vit. Heliogab. p. 317. Dalmaticatus in publico post cœnam sæpe visus est.

¹³² Bp. Fell. Not. in Vit. Cypr. p. 13.

¹³³ Victor. Epit. Vit. Caracallæ. Cum e Gallia vestem plurimam devexisset, talaresque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque plebem ad se salutandum indutam talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis, Caracalla cognominatus est.

¹³⁴ Spartian. Vit. Caracal. p. 251. Ipse Caracalli nomen accepit a vestimento, quod populo dederat, dimisso usque ad talos, quod ante non fuerat; unde hodieque Antoniniana dicuntur caracallæ hujusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ.

¹³⁵ Petav. Not. in Epiphan. Hær. 69. n. 3. Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. t. 1. p. 1334.

Sect. I.
Reflection 1. All laws and rules of the ancient church not necessary to be observed by the present church and clergy.

flections upon it, in reference to the practice of the clergy of the present church. And here first of all it will be proper to observe, that all the laws and rules of the primitive church are not obligatory to the present clergy, save only so far as they either contain matters necessary in themselves, or are adopted into the body of rules and canons, which are authorized and received by the present church. For some laws were made upon particular reasons, peculiar to the state and circumstances of the church in those times: and it would neither be reasonable nor possible to reduce men to the observance of all such laws, when the reasons of them are ceased, and the state of affairs and circumstances of the church are so much altered. Other laws were made by particular churches for themselves only, and these never could oblige other churches, till they were received by their own consent, or bound upon them by the authority of a general council, where they themselves were represented, and their consent virtually taken: much less can they oblige absolute and independent churches at the distance of so many ages; since every such church has power to make laws and rules about things of an alterable nature for herself, and is not tied to the laws of any other. Nor, consequently, are any of the members of such a church bound to observe those rules, unless they be revived and put in force by the church whereof they are members. As this is agreeable to the sense and practice of the catholic church; so it was necessary here to be observed, that no one might mistake the design of this discourse, as if it tended to make every rule, that has been mentioned therein, become necessary and obligatory; or designed to reflect upon the present church, because in all things she does not conform to the primitive practice: which it is not possible to do, without making all cases and circumstances exactly the same in all ages.

But, 2. Notwithstanding this, I may, I presume, without offence take leave to observe in the next place, that some ancient rules would be of excellent use, if they were revived by just authority in the present church. What if we had a law agreeable to that of Justinian's in the civil law, that every patron or elector, who presents a clerk, should depose upon oath, that he chose him neither for any gift, or promise, or friendship, or any other cause, but because he knew him to be a man of the true catholic faith, and good life, and good learning? Might not this be a good addition to the present laws against simoniacal contracts? What if the order of the ancient chorepiscopi were reduced and settled in large dioceses? And coadjutors in case of infirmity and old age? Might not these be of great use, as for many other ends, so particularly for the exercise of discipline, and the easier and constant discharge of that most excellent office of confirmation? The judicious reader will be able to carry this reflection through abundance of other instances, which I need not here suggest: and I forbear the rather, because I am only acting the part of an historian for the ancient church; leaving others, whose province it is, to make laws for the present church, if any things are here suggested, which their wisdom and prudence may think fit to make the matter of laws for the greater benefit and advantage of it.

Sect. 2.
Reflect. 2. Some ancient rules would be of excellent use, if revived by just authority.

3. It may be observed further, that there were some laws in the ancient church, which, though they be not established laws of the present church, may yet innocently be complied with; and perhaps it would be for the honour and advantage of the clergy voluntarily to comply with them, since there is no law to prohibit that. I will instance in one case of this nature. It was a law in the ancient church, as I have showed,¹ that the clergy should end all their civil controversies, which they had one with another, among themselves, and not go to law in a secular court, unless they had a controversy with a layman. Now, though there be no such law in the present church, yet there is nothing to hinder clergymen from choosing bishops to be their arbitrators, and voluntarily referring all their causes to them, or any other judges whom they shall agree upon among themselves; which must be owned to be the most Christian way of ending controversies: whence, as I have showed, it was many times practised by the laity in the primitive church, who took bishops for their arbitrators by voluntary compromise, obliging themselves to stand to their arbitration. And what was so commendable in the laity, must needs be more reputable in the clergy, and more becoming their gravity and character; not to mention other advantages, that might arise from this way of ending disputes, rather than any other. From this one instance it will be easy to judge, how far it may be both lawful and honourable, for the clergy to imitate the practice of the ancients in other cases of the like nature.

4. The last observation I have to make upon the foregoing discourse, is in reference to such laws of the ancient church, as must be owned to be of necessary and eternal obligation. Such are most of those that have been mentioned in the second and third chapters of this book, relating to the life and duties of the clergy: in which the clergy of all churches will for ever be concerned, the matter of those laws being in itself of absolute and indispens-

Sect. 3.
Reflect. 3. Some ancient laws may be complied with, though not laws of the present church.

Sect. 4.
Reflect. 4. Of the influence of great examples, and laws of perpetual obligation.

¹ Book V. chap. 1. sect. 4.

able obligation. The practice of the ancients, therefore, in compliance with such laws, will be a continual admonition, and their examples a noble provocation to the clergy of all ages. There is nothing that commonly moves or affects us more than great and good examples: they at once both pleasantly instruct, and powerfully excite us to the practice of our duty; they show us that rules are practicable, as having already been observed by men of like passions with ourselves; they are apt to inflame our courage by a holy contagion, and raise us to noble acts by provoking our emulation; they, as it were, shame us into laudable works, by upbraiding and reproaching our defects in falling short of the patterns set before us; they work upon our modesty, and turn it into zeal; they raise our several useful passions, and set us to work by exciting those inbred sparks of emulation, and principles of activity, that are lodged within us. And for this reason, whilst others have done good service by writing of the pastoral office and care in plain rules and directions, I have added the examples of the ancients to their rules; the better to excite us to tread those paths which are chalked out to us, by the encouragement of such instructive and provoking examples. Who can read that brave defence and answer² which St. Basil made to the Arian prefect, without being warmed with something of his zeal for truth upon any the like occasion? How resolute and courageous will it make a man, even against the calumnies of spite and malice, to contend for the faith, when he reads³ what base slanders and reproaches were cast upon the greatest luminaries of the church, and the best of men, Athanasius and Basil, for standing up in the cause of religion against the Arian heresy! Again, how peaceable, how candid, how ingenuous and prudent will it make a man in composing unnecessary disputes that arise among catholics in the church, always to have before his eyes that great example of candour and peaceableness, which Nazianzen describes in the person of Athanasius,⁴ who by his prudence reconciled two contending parties, that for a few syllables, and a dispute about mere words, had like to have torn the church in pieces? To instance but once more, who that reads that great example of charity and self-denial in the African fathers at the collation of Carthage,⁵ and considers with what a brave and public spirit they despised their own private interest for the good, and peace, and unity of the church, will not be inspired with something of the same noble temper, and ardent love of Christ; which will make him willing to do or suffer any thing for the benefit of his church, and sacrifice his own private interest to the advantage of the public; whilst he persuades himself, with those holy fathers, that he was made for the church of Christ, and not the church for him? As it is of the utmost consequence to the welfare of the church, to have these and the like virtues and graces planted in the hearts of her clergy; so, among other means that may be used for the promoting this end, there is none perhaps more likely to take effect, than the recommending such virtues by the powerful provocation of such noble examples. And he that offers such images of virtue to public view, may at least be allowed to make the apology, which Sulpicius Severus⁶ makes for his writing the Life of St. Martin: Etsi ipsi non viximus, ut aliis exemplo esse possimus: dedimus tamen operam, ne illi laterent, qui essent imitandi.

But whilst I am so earnest in recommending the examples of the ancients, I must not forget to inculcate some of their excellent rules. Such as their laws about training up young men for the ministry under the magister disciplinæ, whose business was to form their morals, and inure them to such studies, exercises, and practices, as would best qualify them for higher offices and services in the church. This method of education being now changed into that of universities and schools of learning, it highly concerns them on whom this care is devolved, to see that the same ends however be answered, that is, that all young men who aspire to the sacred profession, be rightly formed both in their studies and morals, to qualify them for their great work and the several duties of their calling. And they are the more concerned to be careful in this matter, because bishops now cannot have that personal knowledge of the morals of such persons, as they had formerly, when they were trained up under their eye, and liable to their inspection: but now, as to this part of their qualification, they must depend first upon the care, and then upon the testimony, of those who are intrusted with their education. Besides, a late eminent writer,⁷ who inquires into the causes of the present corruption of Christians, where he has occasion to speak of the pastoral office, and the ordinary methods now used for training up persons to it, makes a double complaint of the way of education in several of the universities of Europe. As to manners, he complains that young people live there licentiously, and are left to their own conduct, and make public profession of dissoluteness: nay, that they not only live there irregularly, but have privileges, which give them a right to commit with impunity all manner

Sect. 5.
Some particular rules recommended to observation. 1st, Relating to the ancient method of training up persons for the ministry.

² See Book VI. chap. 3. sect. 10.

³ Ibid.

⁴ See chap. 3. sect. 9.

⁵ See chap. 4. sect. 2.

⁶ Sever. de Vita S. Martin. in Prologo.

⁷ Ostervald's Causes of the Corruption of Christians, part 2. c. 3. p. 333.

of insolencies, brutalities, and scandals, and which exempt them from the magistrate's jurisdiction. Now, such universities as are concerned in this accusation, (which by the blessing of God those of our land are not,) have great reason to consider how far they are fallen from the primitive standard, and what a difference there is between the ancient way of educating under the inspection of a bishop, and the conduct of a master of discipline in every church, and the way of such academies, where, if that learned person say true, "the care of masters and professors does not extend to the regulating of the manners of their disciples." The other complaint he makes, is in reference to the studies which are pursued at universities, in which he observes two faults. One in reference to the method of teaching. "Divinity is treated there, and the Holy Scripture explained, altogether in a scholastical and speculative manner. Common places are read, which are full of school terms, and of questions not very material. This makes young men resolve all religion into controversies, and gives them intricate and false notions of divinity." The other fault, he thinks, is more essential: "Little or no care is taken, to teach those who dedicate themselves to the service of the church, several things, the knowledge of which would be very necessary to them. The study of history and of church antiquity is neglected: morality is not taught in divinity schools, but in a superficial and scholastic manner; and in many academies it is not taught at all. They seldom speak there of discipline, they give few or no instructions concerning the manner of exercising the pastoral care, or of governing the church. So that the greater part of those who are admitted into this office, enter into it without knowing wherein it consists; all the notion they have of it is, that it is a profession which obliges them to preach and to explain texts." I cannot think all universities are equally concerned in this charge, nor shall I inquire how far any are, but only say, that the faults here complained of were rarely to be met with in the methods of education in the primitive church; where, as I have showed, the chief studies of men devoted to the service of the church, both before and after their ordinations, were such as directly tended to instruct them in the necessary duties and offices of their function. The great care then was to oblige men carefully to study the Scriptures in a practical way, and to acquaint themselves with the history and laws and discipline of the church, by the knowledge and exercise of which they became expert in all the arts of curing souls and making pious and holy men, which is the business of spiritual physicians, and the whole of the pastoral office: in which therefore their rules and examples are proper to be proposed to all churches for their imitation.

Another sort of rules worthy our most serious thoughts and consideration, were those which concerned the examination of the candidates for the ministry. For by these such methods were prescribed, and such caution used, that it was scarce possible for an unfit or immoral man to be admitted to an ecclesiastical office, unless a bishop and the whole church combined as it were to choose unworthy men, which was a case that very rarely happened. It was a peculiar advantage in the primitive church, that by her laws ordinarily none were to be ordained but in the church where they were personally known; so that their manners and way of living might be most strictly canvassed and examined; and a vicious man could not be ordained, if either the bishop or the church had the courage to reject him. Now, though this rule cannot be practised in the present state of the church, yet the main intent of it is of absolute necessity to be answered and provided for some other way; else the church must needs suffer greatly, and infinitely fall short of the purity of the primitive church, by conferring the most sacred of all characters upon immoral and unworthy men. The only way which our present circumstances will admit of, to answer the caution that was used in former days, is to certify the bishop concerning the candidates' known probity and integrity of life, by such testimonials as he may safely depend upon. Here therefore every one sees, without my observing it to him, that to advance the present church to the purity and excellency of the primitive church, there is need of the utmost caution in this matter; that testimonials in so weighty an affair be not promiscuously granted unto all; nor to any but upon reasonable evidence and assurance of the things testified therein: otherwise we partake in other men's sins, and are far from consulting truly the glory of God and the good of his church, whilst we deviate so much from the exactness and caution that is showed us in the primitive pattern.

The other part of the examination of candidates, which related to their abilities and talents, was made with no less diligence and exactness. The chief inquiry was, whether they were well versed in the sense and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures; whether they rightly understood the fundamentals of religion, the necessary doctrines of the gospel, and the rules of morality as delivered in the law of God; whether they had been conversant in the history of the church, and understood her laws and discipline; and were men of prudence to govern, as well as of ability to teach, the people committed to their charge. These were things of great importance, because most of them were of daily use in the exercise of the ministry and pastoral care; and therefore proper to be insisted on in examinations of this nature. These were the qualifications, which,

Sect. 6.
2dly, Their rules for examining the qualifications of candidates for the ministry.

joined with the burning and shining light of a pious life, raised the primitive church and clergy to that height of glory, which we all profess to admire in them: and the very naming that is a sufficient provocation to such as are concerned in this matter, to express their zeal for the welfare and glory of the present church, by keeping strictly to the measures, which were so successfully observed in the ancient church; and without which the ends of the ministry cannot be fully attained in any church, whilst persons are ordained that want proper qualifications.

I shall not now stand to inculcate any other rules about particular duties, studying, preaching, or the like, but only beg leave to recommend the primitive pattern in two things more. The one concerns private pastors, the other is humbly offered to the governors of the church. That which concerns private pastors, is the duty of private address, and the exercise of private discipline toward the people committed to their charge. Some eminent persons,⁸ who have lately considered the duties of the pastoral office, reckon this one of the principal and most necessary functions of it; which consists in inspecting the lives of private persons, in visiting families, in exhortations, warnings, reproofs, instructions, reconciliations, and in all those other cares, which a pastor ought to take of those over whom he is constituted. "For," as they rightly observe, "neither general exhortations nor public discipline can answer all the occasions of the church. There are certain disorders, which pastors neither can nor ought to repress openly, and which yet ought to be remedied by them. In such cases, private admonitions are to be used. The concern of men's salvation requires this, and it becomes the pastoral carefulness to seek the straying sheep, and not to let the wicked perish for want of warning." But now, because this is a nice and difficult work, and requires not only great diligence and application, but also great art and prudence, with a proportionable share of meekness, moderation, and temper, to perform it aright; it is often either wholly neglected, or very ill performed; whilst some think it enough to admonish sinners from the pulpit, and others admonish them indiscreetly, which tends more to provoke than reclaim them. To remedy both these evils, it will be useful to reflect upon that excellent discourse of Gregory Nazianzen, which has been suggested in the third chapter of this book,⁹ where he considers that great variety of tempers that is in men, and the nicety of all matters and occasions, that a skilful pastor ought to consider, in order to apply suitable remedies to every distemper. And there the reader will also find some other excellent cautions and directions given by Chrysostom and others upon this head, with examples proper to excite him to the performance of this necessary duty.

The other thing I would humbly offer to the consideration of our superiors, who are the guardians of public discipline, and inspectors of the behaviour of private pastors, is the exercise of discipline in the ancient church. By which I do not now mean that general discipline, which was exercised toward all offenders in the church; but the particular discipline that was used among the clergy; by virtue of which, every clerk convict of immorality, or other scandalous offence, was liable to be deposed, and punished with other ecclesiastical censures; of which, both crimes and punishments, I have given a particular account in the three foregoing chapters of this book. It is a thing generally acknowledged by all, that the glory of the ancient church was her discipline; and it is as general a complaint of the misfortune of the present church, that corruptions abound for want of reviving and restoring the ancient discipline. Now, if there be any truth in either of these observations, it ought to be a quickening argument to all that sit at the helm of government in the church, to bestir themselves with their utmost zeal, that discipline, where it is wanting, may at least be restored among the clergy; that no scandals or offences may be tolerated among them, whose lives and practices ought to be a light and a guide to others. As there is nothing to hinder the free exercise of it here, so it is but fitting it should be exemplified in them; as for many other reasons, so particularly for this: that the laity may not think they are to be tied to any discipline, which the clergy have not first exercised upon themselves with greater severity of ecclesiastical censures. And if either rules or examples can encourage this, those of the primitive church are most provoking: her rules of discipline were most excellent and exact in themselves, and for the most part as exactly managed by persons intrusted with the execution of them.

After these reflections made upon the laws and practice of the primitive clergy, it will be needless to make any long address to any orders of the clergy of the present age. I will therefore only observe one thing more, that Julian's design to bring the laws of the primitive clergy into use among the heathen priests, in order to reform them, as it was then a plain testimony of their excellency, so it is now a proper argument to provoke the zeal of the present clergy, to be more forward

Sect. 7.
3rdly, Their rules about private address, and the exercise of private discipline.

Sect. 8.
4thly, Their rules for exercising public discipline upon delinquent clergymen, who were convict of scandalous offences.

Sect. 9.
Julian's design to reform the heathen priests by the rules of the primitive clergy, an argument to provoke our zeal in the present age.

⁸ Ostervald's Causes of the Corrupt. of Christians, p. 318. See also Bishop Burnet's Pastoral Care, c. 8. p. 96.

⁹ See Book VI. chap. 3. sect. 8.

and ambitious in their imitation. I have already, in part, recited Julian's testimony and design, out of his letter to Arsacius, high priest of Galatia: I shall here subjoin a more ample testimony from a fragment of one of his epistles¹⁰ printed among his works, where, speaking of the Gentile priests, he says, It was reasonable they should be honoured, as the ministers and servants of the gods, by whose mediation many blessings were derived from heaven upon the world: and so long as they retained this character, they were to be honoured and respected by all, but if wicked and vicious, they should be deposed from their office,¹¹ as unworthy of their function. Their lives were to be so regulated, as that they might be a copy and pattern of what they were to preach to men. To this purpose they should be careful in all their addresses to the gods, to express all imaginable reverence and piety,¹² as being in their presence and under their inspection. They should neither speak a filthy word, nor hear one; but abstain as well from all impure discourse, as vile and wicked actions, and not let a scurrilous or abusive jest come from their mouths. They should read no books tending this way, such as Archilochus and Hipponax, and the writers of loose, wanton comedies; but apply themselves to the study of such philosophers as Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, Chrysippus, and Zeno, whose writings were most likely to create piety in men's minds. For all sorts of books were not fit to be read by the priests: even among philosophers, those of Pyrrho and Epicurus were wholly to be rejected by them; and instead of these they¹³ should learn such divine hymns, as were to be sung in honour of the gods, to whom they should make their supplications publicly and privately thrice a day, if it might be; however, twice at least, morning and evening. In the course of their public ministrations in the temples,¹⁴ which at Rome commonly held for thirty days, they were to reside all the time in the temples, and give themselves to philosophic thoughts, and neither go to their own houses, nor into the forum, nor see any magistrate but in the temple. When their term of waiting was expired, and they were returned home, they might not converse or feast promiscuously with all, but only with their friends and the best of men; they were but rarely then to appear in the forum, and not to visit the magistrates and rulers, except it were in order to be helpful to some that needed their assistance. While they ministered in the temple, they were to be arrayed with a magnificent garment; but out of it, they must wear common apparel, and that not very costly, or in the least savouring of pride and vain-glory. They were in no case¹⁵ to go to see the obscene and wanton shows of the public theatres, nor to bring them into their own houses, nor to converse familiarly with any charioteer, or player, or dancer belonging to the theatre. After this he signifies, out of what sort of men the priests should be chosen. They should be the best that could be found in every city, persons that had true love for God and man, and then it mattered not whether they were rich or poor; there being no difference to be made between noble and ignoble in this case: no one was to be rejected upon other accounts, who was endued with those two qualities, piety to God and humanity to men. Whereof the former might be evidenced by their care to make all their domestics as devout as themselves; and the latter, by their readiness to distribute liberally to the poor, out of that little they had, and extending their charity to as many as was possible. And there was the more reason to be careful in this matter, because it was manifestly the neglect of this humanity in the priests, which had given occasion to the impious Galileans (by whom he means the Christians) to strengthen their party by the practice of that humanity, which the others neglected. For as kidnappers steal away children, whom they first allure with a cake; so these begin first to work upon honest-hearted Gentiles with their love-feasts, and entertainments, and ministering of tables, as they call them, till at last they pervert them to atheism and impiety against the gods.

Now from this discourse of Julian, I think, it is very evident, that he had observed what laws and practices had chiefly contributed to the advancement of the character and credit of the Christian clergy, and of the Christian religion by their means: and therefore he laboured to introduce the like rules and discipline among the idol-priests, and intended to have made many other alterations in the heathen customs, in compliance with the envied rites and usages of the Christian religion, as is observed both by Gregory Nazianzen¹⁶ and Sozomen,¹⁷ who give us a particular account of his intended emendations. The very mentioning which, if I mistake not, is a loud call to us, to be at least as zealous as Julian was, in copying out such excellencies of the primitive clergy, as are proper for our imitation. It is the argument which the apostle makes use of in a like case: "I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, by a foolish nation will I anger you," Rom. x. 19. I must needs say, it will be but a melancholy consideration for any man, to find hereafter, that the zeal of an apostate heathen shall rise up in judgment against him and condemn him.

¹⁰ Julian. Fragment. Epist. p. 542.¹¹ Ibid. p. 543.¹⁴ Ibid. p. 553.¹⁵ Ibid. p. 555.¹² Ibid. p. 547.¹³ Ibid. p. 551.¹⁶ Naz. Invect. 1. in Julian.¹⁷ Sozom. lib. 5. c. 16.

Sect. 10.
The conclusion by way of address to the clergy of the present church.

We all profess (as it is our duty to do) a great zeal for the honour and welfare of the present church. Now, if indeed we have that zeal which we profess, we shall be careful to demonstrate it in all our actions; observing those necessary rules and measures which raised the primitive church to its glory. We are obliged, in this respect, first to be strict and exemplary in our lives; to set others a pattern of sobriety, humility, meekness, charity, self-denial, and contempt of the world, and all such common graces as are required of Christians in general to adorn their profession: and then to add to these the peculiar graces and ornaments of our function, diligence, prudence, fidelity, and piety in the whole course of our ministry; imitating those excellencies of the ancients which have been described; confining ourselves to the proper business of our calling, and not intermeddling or distracting ourselves with other cares; employing our thoughts and time in useful studies, and directing them to their proper end, the edification of the church; performing all divine offices with assiduity and constancy, and in that rational, decent, and becoming way, as suits the nature of the action; making our addresses to God with a serious reverence, and an affecting fervency of devotion; and in our discourses to men, speaking always as the oracles of God, with Scripture eloquence, which is the most persuasive: in our doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech that cannot be condemned: in our reproofs, and the exercise of public and private discipline, using great wisdom and prudence, both to discern the tempers of men, and to time the application to its proper season, mixing charity and compassion with a just severity, and endeavouring to restore fallen brethren in the spirit of meekness; showing gentleness and patience to them that are in error, and giving them good arguments with good usage in order to regain them; avoiding all bitter and contumelious language, and never bringing against any man a railing accusation; treating those of our own order, whether superiors, inferiors, or equals, with all the decency and respect that is due to them, since nothing is more scandalous among clergymen, than the abuses and contempt of one another; endeavouring here, as well as in all other cases, to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; showing ourselves candid and ingenuous in moderating disputes among good catholics, as well as resolute and prudent in opposing the malicious designs of the professed enemies of truth; briefly, employing our thoughts day and night upon these things, turning our designs this way, and always acting with a pure intention for the benefit and edification of the church; even neglecting our own honours, and despising our own interest, when it is needful, for the advantage of the public. Such actions will proclaim our zeal indeed, and draw every eye to take notice of it. Such qualities, joined with probity and integrity of life, will equal our character to that of the primitive saints; and either give happy success to our labours, or at least crown our endeavours with the comfort and satisfaction of having discharged a good conscience in the sight of God. The best designs indeed may be frustrated, and the most pious and zealous endeavours be disappointed. It was so with our Lord and Master himself, and no one of his household then is to think it strange if it happen to be his own case. For though he spake as never man spake, though he had done so many miracles among the Jews, yet they believed not on him. This seems to be written for our comfort, that we should not be wholly dejected, though our endeavours fail of success, since our Lord himself was first pleased to take his share in the disappointment. It will still be our comfort, that we can be able to say with the prophet¹⁸ in this case, Though we have laboured in vain, and spent our strength for nought, yet surely our judgment is with the Lord, and our work with our God: and then, though Israel be not gathered, yet shall we be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and our God shall be our strength.

¹⁸ Isa. xlix. 4, 5.

BOOK VII.

OF THE ASCETICS IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE FIRST ASCETICS AND MONKS, AND OF THE FIRST ORIGINAL OF THE MONASTIC LIFE.

Sect. 1.
Ascetics always in the church: monks not so. THEY who are conversant in the writings of the ancients, will very often meet with the name, ἀσκηται, ascetics, applied to some Christians by way of distinction from others. The generality of writers in the Romish church, wherever they meet with this word, lay hold of it as an argument to prove the antiquity of monks in the church; whereas, indeed, there was a very wide difference between them: for though, in the writers of the fourth and fifth ages, when the monastic life was fully established, ascetics and monks often signify the same persons; yet for the greatest part of the three first centuries, it was otherwise: for there were always ascetics in the church, but not always monks retiring to the deserts and mountains, or living in monasteries and cells, as in after ages.

Sect. 2.
This difference acknowledged by some ingenuous writers in the Romish church. This difference is freely confessed by some of the more frank and ingenuous writers of the Romish church; as Valesius¹ and Mr. Pagi,² who correct the mistakes of Baronius, Christopherson, and others in this matter. Eusebius, speaking of Philo Judæus his description of the Egyptian therapeuta, says, he therein exactly described the life of the Christian ascetics³ that lived in those times. Where, by ascetics, Christopherson and Baronius understand monks and religious, as they speak in the modern style: but Valesius rightly observes, that there were no monks in the time of Philo, but both the name and institution of them was of much later date. Ascetic was a more general name than that of monk: for though every monk was an ascetic, yet every ascetic was not a monk; but anciently every Christian that made profession of a more strict and austere life, was dignified with the name of ascetic; which is a name borrowed by the Christians from the ancient philosophers, as Valesius shows out of Arian, Artemidorus, and Philo; and signifies, as the word imports, any one that exercises himself by the severe rules of abstinence and virtue; of which kind there were always ascetics, without being monks, from the first foundation of the church by the apostles.

Such were all those that inured themselves to greater degrees of abstinence and fasting than other men. Sect. 3.
What the primitive ascetics were. As those mentioned by Origen,⁴ who abstained from flesh and living creatures, as well as the Pythagoreans, but upon very different principles and designs: the Pythagoreans abstained upon the fond imagination of the transmigration of souls, lest a father should kill and eat his own son in the body of a living creature; but the ascetics, says he, among us do it only to keep under the body, and bring it into subjection; to mortify their members upon earth, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, and all inordinate passions and affections. Such abstinence the Apostolical Canons call ἀσκησις,⁵ the exercise of an ascetic life, saying, If any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or any other of the clergy, abstain from marriage, flesh, or wine, οὐ διὰ ἀσκησιν, ἀλλὰ διὰ βδελυρίαν, not for exercise' sake, but as abominating the good creatures of God, &c., let him either reform himself, or be deposed and cast out of the church. So that all who exercised themselves with abstinence from flesh, only for mortification, and not out of an opinion of its uncleanness, (as some heretics did,) were reckoned ascetics, whether they were of the laity or clergy. Some of these not only abstained from flesh, but often continued their fasts for two or three days

¹ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 2. c. 17.

² Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 62. n. 4.

³ Euseb. lib. 2. c. 17. Τὸν βίον τῶν παρ' ἡμῶν ἀσκητῶν ὡς ἐνι μάλιστα ἀκριβέστατα ἰστορῶν, &c.

⁴ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 5. p. 264. "Ὅρα τὴν διαφορὰν τῆ ἀιτίου τῆς ἐμφύου ἀποχῆς, τῶν ἀπὸ τοῦ Πυθαγόρου, καὶ τῶν ἐν ἡμῶν ἀσκητῶν.

⁵ Canon. Apost. c. 51.

together without taking any food at all; of which there are frequent instances in Irenæus,⁶ and Dionysius of Alexandria,⁷ and Epiphanius,⁸ and others: and such again were called ascetics⁹ from the severe exercise of fasting, to which they accustomed themselves. Secondly, In like manner, they who were more than ordinary intent upon the exercise of prayer, and spent their time in devotion, were justly thought to deserve the name of ascetics. Whence Cyril of Jerusalem,¹⁰ speaking of Anna the prophetess, (who departed not from the temple, but served God with fasting and prayer, night and day,) styles her ἀσκήτρια εὐλαβε-άτη, the religious ascetic, which the common translations, not so correctly, render, monialis, as if she had been confined to a monastery or a cloister, of which we read nothing in those times in Jerusalem. Thirdly, The exercise of charity and contempt of the world in any extraordinary degree, as when men gave up their whole estate to the service of God or use of the poor, was another thing that gave men the denomination and title of ascetics. In this respect St. Jerom calls Pierius¹¹ a wonderful ascetic, because, among other things, he embraced a voluntary poverty, and lived an austere and philosophic life. And perhaps, for the same reason, he gives Serapion, bishop of Antioch, the same title,¹² as having freely given up his whole estate to the service of the church upon his ordination; which was a practice very common in those days, as appears from the examples of Cyprian, Paulinus, Gregory Nazianzen, and many others. Fourthly, The widows and virgins of the church, and all such as confined themselves to a single life, and made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake, were reckoned into the number of ascetics, though there was then neither cloister nor vow to keep them under this obligation. Thus Epiphanius¹³ observes of Marcion, that before he fell into his heresy he lived an ascetic life, professing celibacy under his father, who was bishop of Sinope in Pontus, by whom he was excommunicated for corrupting one of the virgins of the church. Origen, in like manner, alludes to this name, when he says, the number of those who exercised themselves in perpetual¹⁴ virginity among the Christians, was great in comparison of those few who did it among the Gentiles. And hence, in after ages, the word ascetria, in the civil law,¹⁵ is commonly put to signify the widows and virgins of the church.

Lastly, All such as exercised themselves with uncommon hardships or austerities for the greater promotion of piety and religion, as in frequent watchings, humicubations, and the like, had the name of ascetics also. In allusion to which Athanasius, or whoever is the author of the Synopsis Scripturæ among his works, styles Lucian the martyr, μέγαν ἀσκητήν,¹⁶ the great ascetic, because of the hardships he endured in prison; being forced to lodge on sharp potsherd for twelve days together, with his feet and hands so bound in the stocks that he could not move; and being denied all sustenance, except he would eat things sacrificed to idols; rather than pollute himself with which he chose to die with famine, as the acts of his martyrdom relate the story. Now, from this account that has been given of the primitive ascetics, it plainly appears, that originally they were not monks, but men of all orders, that freely chose such a way of living as engaged them upon some austerities, without deserting their station or business in the world, whether it were ecclesiastical or secular, that they were otherwise engaged in: and therefore; wherever we read of ascetics in the writers of the three first ages, we must not with Baronius dream of monks and regulars, but take them for persons of another character, agreeable to this description. Valesius¹⁷ makes this observation upon several passages in Eusebius his book of the martyrs of Palestine, who suffered in the beginning of the fourth century in the Diocletian persecution. There he terms one of them Peter the ascetic,¹⁸ and another called Seleucus, a follower of the religious ascetics,¹⁹ whose chief exercise was to take care of the fatherless and widows, and minister to the sick and the poor. These were no monks, as Valesius rightly observes: for St. Jerom says, there were no monks in Palestine before Hilarion, who brought the monastic life into use in that country, not till about fifty years after the death of those martyrs. Cotelerius²⁰ makes the like remark upon the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, who speaks²¹ of ascetics among other orders of Christians, but never of monks: whence he concludes, not without some probability, that that author wrote before the monastic life was settled in the church; else it is hardly to be imagined that he should not some where in his collections have taken notice of monks as well as others.

⁶ Iren. ap. Euseb. lib. 5. c. 21.

⁷ Dionys. Ep. Canon. ap. Bevereg. Pandect. t. 2.

⁸ Epiphani. Expos. Fid. n. 22.

⁹ Antioch. Homil. 7. in Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 1037.

¹⁰ Cyril. Catech. 10. n. 9.

¹¹ Hieron. de Script. Eccles. c. 76. Constat hunc miræ ἀσκήσεως appetitorem et voluntariæ paupertatis.

¹² Ibid. c. 41. Leguntur ejus breves epistolæ, auctoris sui ἀσκήσει et vitæ congruentes.

¹³ Epiphani. Hær. 42. n. 1. Τὸν δὲ πρῶτον αὐτοῦ βίου παρθενίαν ὄθεν ἤσκει, μονάζων γὰρ ὑπῆρχε, &c.

¹⁴ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 7. p. 365. Ἀσκοῦσι τὴν παντελῆ παρθενίαν, &c.

¹⁵ Justin. Novel. 123. c. 43.

¹⁶ Athan. Synop. t. 2. p. 157.

¹⁷ Vales. Not. in Euseb. de Martyr. Palæst. c. 11.

¹⁸ Euseb. de Mart. Pal. c. 10.

¹⁹ Ibid. c. 11.

²⁰ Coteler. Not. in Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 13.

²¹ Constit. Apost. ibid.

Ascetics, then, there were always in the church: but the monastic life, neither name nor thing, was not known till toward the fourth century. Mr. Pagi²² fixes its original to the time of Constantine, and he cites Holstenius²³ and Papebrochius²⁴ for the same opinion. The rise of it was thus: In the Decian persecution, which was about the middle of the third century, many persons in Egypt, to avoid the fury of the storm, fled to the neighbouring deserts and mountains, where they not only found a safe retreat, but also more time and liberty to exercise themselves in acts of piety and Divine contemplations; which sort of life, though at first forced upon them by necessity, became so agreeable to some of them, that when the persecution was over they would not return to their ancient habitations again, but chose rather to continue in those cottages or cells, which they had made themselves in the wilderness. The first and most noted of these were Paul and Antonius, two famous Egyptians, whom therefore St. Jerom calls²⁵ the fathers of the Christian hermits. For though some deduced them from John the Baptist and Elias, yet they who understood the matter best, reckoned Paul the Thebæan the first author, and Antony the great encourager of that way of living among the Christians: to which opinion, as the truest, St. Jerom himself²⁶ subscribes. But as yet there were no bodies or communities of men embracing this life, nor any monasteries built, or any regular societies formed into any method of government; but only a few single persons scattered here and there in the deserts of Egypt, till Pachomius, in the peaceable reign of Constantine, when the persecutions were ended, procured some monasteries to be built in Thebais in Egypt; from whence the custom of living as regulars in societies was followed by degrees in other parts of the world in the succeeding ages. This is evident, from what Papebrochius and Pagi²⁷ have observed out of the ancient writer of the Acts of Pachomius, where the author brings in Antony the hermit thus comparing the different states of monachism together. When I first became a monk, says he, there was as yet no monastery²⁸ in any part of the world, where one man was obliged to take care of another; but every one of the ancient monks, when the persecution was ended, exercised a monastic life by himself in private. But afterward your father Pachomius, (he speaks to one of Pachomius's disciples,) by the help of God, effected this. That is, he brought the monks to live in communities, and under rules, which they had not done before. So that here we see at once the rise and progress of the monastic life. Till the year 250, there were no monks, but only ascetics in the church: from that time to the reign of Constantine, monachism was confined to the Anchorets living in private cells in the wilderness: but when Pachomius had erected monasteries in Egypt, other countries presently followed the example, and so the monastic life came to its full maturity in the church. Hilarion, who was scholar to Antonius, was the first monk that ever lived in Palestine or Syria: for St. Jerom²⁹ says plainly, there was neither monastery nor monk before he came there, but he was the founder and beginner of that sort of life in those provinces. Not long after Eustathius, bishop of Sebastia, brought it into the regions of Armenia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, as Sozomen³⁰ informs us: but as yet there were no monasteries in Thrace, or Illyricum, or amongst the Europeans, as the same author testifies. Baronius³¹ owns there were no monasteries in Italy or Rome, till Athanasius came thither, anno 340, and taught the Anchorets to live in societies, after the example of Pachomius and the Egyptian monks: which is confirmed by St. Jerom,³² who says, Marcella was the first noble woman that embraced the monastic life at Rome, and that she was instructed by Athanasius, and Peter his successor, who fled to Rome for shelter against the Arian persecution. It was some time after this that St. Martin, bishop of Tours, fixed his cell in France, and eighty other monks³³ followed his example: from whence, some learned men³⁴ think, Pelagius brought the monastic life first into Britain in the beginning of the fifth century; beyond which period I think it needless to carry the present inquiry. They who would know the rise and distinction of the several later orders, may consult Hospinian, Creccelius, and others, who pursue this history through all ages. Vid. Hospinian. de Origin.

²² Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 318. n. 12. Initium monachatus ætati Constantini imputandum.

²³ Holsten. Præf. ad Regulas Veter. Monachor.

²⁴ Papebroch. Com. in Acta Pachomii, Maii 14.

²⁵ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 16. Hujus vitæ auctor Paulus, illustrator etiam Antonius.

²⁶ Id. Vit. Pauli, t. 1. p. 237. Affirmant Paulum quandam Thebæum principem istius rei fuisse: quod non tam nomine quam opinione nos quoque comprobamus.

²⁷ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 318, n. 12.

²⁸ Acta Pachomii, c. 77. ap. Papebroch. die 14 Maii. Quo ego primum tempore monachum cæpi agere, nullum usquam extabat cœnobium, in quo de aliorum salute cura aut metus cuiquam erat: sed quisque antiquorum monachorum, persecutione jam finita, privatim in vita sese monastica exercebat. Postea vero pater vester (Pachomius) tantum bonum, Deo adjuvante, effecit.

²⁹ Hieron. Vit. Hilarion. c. 11. Needum enim tunc monasteria erant in Palestina, nec quisquam monachos ante sanctum Hilarionem in Syria noverat. Ille fundator et eruditor hujus conversationis et studii in hac provincia fuit.

³⁰ Sozom. lib. 3. c. 14.

³¹ Baron. an. 340. n. 7.

³² Hieron. Ep. 16. Epitaph. Marcellæ.

³³ Sever. Vit. Martin. c. 7.

³⁴ Sutlif. de Monach. Institut. c. 6.

Monachor. Creccelii Collectanea de Origine et Fundat. Ordinum Monastic. &c.

But it may now be properly inquired, since monks are of so much later date than ascetics, how the ancient ascetics differed from them? To which it may be replied, Chiefly in these three things: 1. That the monks were men that retired from the business and conversation of the world, for they either lived in private cells singly by themselves, or if in monasteries and societies, yet those were remote from cities, in some far distant mountain or a desert wilderness; but the first ascetics, as their name implies, were always men of an active life, living in cities, as other men, and in nothing differing from them save only in this, that they were more intent and zealous in attempting greater heights and heroic acts of Christian virtue. 2. The monks, by their first institution, as we shall see hereafter, were to be no more than laymen; for being confined to the wilderness, the clerical and monastic life were, upon that account, incompatible states, and for almost one whole age they were scarce ever joined together: but the ancient ascetics were indifferently persons of any order of men, clergy as well as laity, because the clerical and ascetic life were then consistent with each other; the business of each being to converse with men, and exercise themselves in acts of piety and charity among them. 3. The monks, at least such as lived in monasteries and societies, were always brought under certain private rules and laws of discipline: but the ancient ascetics had no laws but those of the gospel, and the church where they lived, to be governed by; their exercises were freely chosen, and as freely pursued, in what manner, and to what degree, they pleased, without any binding laws or rules of compulsion. And these things are a further proof that the first ascetics were no monks, however some writers unwarily confound them together.

The reader may take notice of one thing more concerning the primitive ascetics, that they were sometimes called by other names. Eusebius³⁵ calls them σπουδαῖοι, and Epiphanius³⁶ uses the same appellation; meaning persons more eminent for their sanctity, and diligence in the exercises of fasting, and prayer, and almsdeeds, and the like. Clemens Alexandrinus³⁷ styles them ἐλεκτῶν ἐκλεκτότεροι, the elect of the elect; for all Christians, as has been observed in another place,³⁸ were called the elect, and therefore the ascetics are termed the elect of the elect, because

^{Sect. 6.}
What other names they were called by.

they were the more eminent or choice part of Christian professors.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE SEVERAL SORTS OF MONKS, AND THEIR WAYS OF LIVING IN THE CHURCH.

HAVING hitherto showed the difference between the first ascetics and monks, I come now to speak a little more particularly of the monks alone, so far as may be necessary to inform the reader of the true state of the monastic life at its first appearance and settlement in the church. And here we are to observe, that the ancient monks were not like the modern, distinguished into orders, and denominated from the authors and founders of them; but they had their names either from the places where they inhabited, as the monks of Mount Scethis, Tabennesus, Nitria, Canopus in Egypt, &c., or else they were distinguished by their different ways of living, some in cells, others on pillars, others in societies, and others by a roving and rambling kind of life, which were always reckoned a dishonour and reproach to the church.

The first sort were commonly known by the name of Anchorets, from their retiring from society, and living in private cells in the wilderness. Such were Paul, and Antony, and Hilarion, the first founders of the monastic life in Egypt and Palestine; from whom other monks took their model. Some of these lived in caves, ἐν σπηλαιῖς, as Chrysostom says¹ the monks of Mount Casius, near Antioch, did; and others in little tents or cells, οἰκίσκοι, Evagrius² calls them, and Chrysostom, σκήναι, tabernacles. When many of these were placed together in the same wilderness at some distance from one another, they were all called by one common name, laura, which, as Evagrius³ informs us, differed from a cœnobium or community in this, that a laura was many cells divided from each other, where every monk provided for himself; but a cœnobium was but one habitation, where the monks lived in society, and had all things in common. Epiphanius⁴ says, Laura or Labra was the name of a street or district where a church stood at Alexandria; and it is probable, that from thence the name was taken, to signify a multitude of cells in the wilderness, united as it were in a certain district, yet so divided

^{Sect. 1.}
Several sorts of monks distinguished by their different ways of living.

^{Sect. 2.}
The first called Anchorets, ἀναχωρηταί.

³⁵ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 11.

³⁶ Epiphani. Expos. Fid. n. 22.

³⁷ Clem. Alex. Homil. Quis dives salv. n. 36. ap. Combefis Auctar. Novissim. p. 151.

³⁸ Book I. chap. i. sect. 1.

¹ Chrysos. Hom. 17. ad Pop. Antioch. p. 215.

² Evagr. lib. i. c. 21.

³ Evagr. ibid.

⁴ Epiph. Hær. 69. n. 1.

as to make up many separate habitations; whereas a cœnobium was more like a single house for many monks to dwell in.

And hence arose a second sort of monks, who from their different way of living were commonly called Cœnobitæ; and their habitations, cœnobia, κοινόβια, because they lived in common. In the Theodosian Code⁵ they are also called Synoditæ; which does not signify the attendants of monks, as some civilians⁶ by mistake explain the word, deriving it from σύν and δοτήης, viator; but it denotes the monks themselves, who were so called from their living ἐν συνόδοις, in communities, or convents. And in this they differed from Anchorets, as has been noted before. Gennadius⁷ applies these two names indifferently to this second sort of monks, when he says, Evagrius wrote a book concerning Cœnobites and Synodites, containing rules and directions for leading a life in common. St. Jerom⁸ says, the Egyptians called this sort of monks, Sauches, in their proper tongue, which signifies the same as Cœnobites in the Greek and Latin church; and that the Anchorets were of a different order from them, and had their name from living in solitude, or singly by themselves in the wilderness.

There was another sort, he says, whom the Egyptians called Remboth, who were a sort of monks that would live as they listed themselves, only two or three⁹ together, under no rule or government. These did not resort to the wilderness as the others, but lived chiefly in cities and castles, where every thing they did might be seen and valued by men, which was the only end they aimed at. For they turned religion into an art, and made a real gain of pretended godliness. Whatever they sold of the work of their own hands, was at a higher price than any others. And this made them very turbulent and contentious: for living upon their own labour, they would be subject to no superiors. They fasted to an extraordinary degree; but then they made that which should have been a private exercise, matter of strife and public victory and triumph. Every thing about them was affected, loose sleeves, wide stockings, coarse clothes, often sighing, making frequent visits to the virgins, and always bitterly inveighing against the clergy. But if ever there came a feast-day, they would indulge themselves even to riot and excess. These therefore St. Jerom justly brands as the pests and banes of the church. He that would see more of their character, may consult Cassian¹⁰ among the ancient writers, who exposes them under the name of Sarabaitæ; and Spalatensis¹¹ among the moderns, who draws the parallel between them and the Minorites, Dominicans, Carmelites, Servites, and Minims of the Romish church.

Another sort of monks in the ancient church (of which there were but a very few) were the Stylitæ, or Pillarists, so called from their taking up a singular way of living perpetually upon a pillar. Simeon, surnamed Stylites, who lived about the time of the council of Chalcedon, was the first, Evagrius¹² says, that introduced this sort of life among the monastic orders. And Theodorus Lector¹³ observes, that the novelty of it at first was so offensive to the Egyptian monks, that they sent anathematizing letters against him; but upon better information, coming to understand the worth and conversation of the man, they afterward communicated with him. The severity of this way of living was not very inviting, and therefore it made but few proselytes. Theodorus Lector¹⁴ mentions one Daniel, a disciple of Simeon's, and Evagrius¹⁵ speaks of another Simeon, in the time of Mauricius, who lived sixty-eight years upon a pillar, and is commonly called Simeon Stylites junior, to distinguish him from the former. Johannes Moschus¹⁶ gives an account of two or three more of this way in the same age. Surius also, among his catalogue of saints, has the life of one Alipius, bishop of Adrianople, who renounced his see to live upon a pillar; where, if the story say true,¹⁷ he continued seventy years; having two quires of virgins and one of monks attending him, with whom he sang psalms and hymns alternatively night and day. Beside these we scarce meet with any other of this way in ancient history. An argument that

Sect. 5.
Of the Stylitæ, or Pillarists.

Sect. 4.
The third, Sarabaitæ.

⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 30. de Appellat. Leg. 57. Addictos supplicio, nulli clericorum vel monachorum, eorum etiam quos Synoditas vocant, per vim atque usurpationem vindicare liceat, &c. It. Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 4. de Episcopali Audientia, Leg. 6.

⁶ Lexicon Juridic. voce Synoditæ, Genèv. 1615.

⁷ Gennad. de Scriptor. in Evagrio. Composuit de Cœnobitis ac Synoditis doctrinam aptam vitæ communis.

⁸ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15. Tria sunt in Ægypto genera monachorum: primum Cœnobitæ, quod illi Sauches gentili lingua vocant; nos, in commune viventes, possumus appellare. Secundum Anachorite, quod soli habitant per deserta, et ab eo quod procul ab hominibus recesserint, nuncupantur. Tertium genus est quod Remboth dicunt, deterrimum atque neglectum.

⁹ Ibid. Hi bini vel tria nec multo plures simul habitant, suo arbitrato ac ditione viventes.—Habitant autem quamplurimi in urbibus et castellis: et quasi ars sit sancta, non vita, quicquid vendiderint majoris est pretii. Inter hos sæpe sunt jurgia, quia suo viventes cibo, non patiuntur se alicui esse subjectos. Revera solent certare jejuniis, et rem secreti victoriæ faciunt. Apud hos affectata sunt omnia, laxæ manicæ, caligæ follicantes, vestis crassior, crebra suspiria, visitatio virginum, detractio clericorum. Et si quando dies festus venerit, saturantur ad vomitum, &c.

¹⁰ Cassian. Collat. 18. c. 7.

¹¹ Spalat. de Rep. Eccl. lib. 2. c. 12. n. 77.

¹² Evagr. lib. 1. c. 13. ¹³ Theodor. Lect. lib. 2. p. 565.

¹⁴ Ibid. lib. 1. p. 551.

¹⁵ Evagr. lib. 6. c. 23.

¹⁶ Mosch. Prat. Spir. c. 36, 57, 129.

¹⁷ Surius, t. 6. Vid. Hospin. de Monach. lib. 2. c. 5. p. 22.

it was not of any great esteem, when it was first invented in the primitive church.

Beside these sorts of monks, who Sect. 6.
Of secular monks. renounced the world, and lived in perpetual celibacy, Spalatensis¹⁸ thinks there was another order, which did neither of those things, but lived in a married state, and enjoyed their own property and possessions, only they exercised themselves in acts of austerity and religion, as the primitive ascetics were used to do, of whom we have given an account in the former chapter. Thus much is certain from the express words of Athanasius and St. Austin, that in their time some went by the name of monks, who were married men, and possessed of estates. For Athanasius, writing to Dracontius, a monk, to persuade him to accept of a bishopric, (to which he was averse, because he thought it would not consist with his ascetic way of living,) uses this argument to him: You may still, says he, after you are made a bishop,¹⁹ hunger and thirst with Paul, and abstain from wine with Timothy, and fast frequently as St. Paul was wont to do. Let not therefore your counsellors throw such objections in your way. For we know many bishops that fast, and monks that eat and drink; we know bishops that drink no wine, and monks that do; we know bishops that work miracles, and monks that work none. Many bishops are not married; and on the other hand, many monks are fathers of children: you may also find bishops that are fathers of children, and monks that are not so; clergy that eat and drink, and monks that fast. For these things are at liberty, and no prohibition laid upon them: every one exercises himself as he pleases; for it is not men's station, but their actions, for which they shall be crowned. From these words of Athanasius it seems plain, that as yet the rules of the monastic life obliged no man to renounce either his possessions or a married state, but he might use both, if he pleased, without any ecclesiastical censure. And though the case was a little altered with some monks before St. Austin's time, yet others reserved to themselves their ancient privilege: for St. Austin, writing against the heretics who called themselves Apostolics, says, They²⁰ arrogantly assumed to themselves that name, because they rejected all from their communion, who had either wives or estates, of which sort the catholic church had many both monks and clergy. So that at least some monks were still at liberty to enjoy both a conjugal state and possessions of their own, without any impeachment of apostacy or breach of vow in the catholic church. For which reason I have given this sort of monks the distinguishing name of seculars.

Though, to avoid ambiguity in terms, it must be observed, that all monks at first might properly be called seculars, as that name is opposed to ecclesiastics. For monks in their first original were generally laymen, nor could they well be otherwise by their proper constitution, and the general laws of the catholic church. For the first monks were generally hermits, that is, persons confined by their own rules to some desert or wilderness, where solitude was thought to help forward the exercises of contemplation and repentance, and they had none to take care of but their own souls: but the clerical life required men to live in towns and cities, where crowds of people afforded them proper occasions to exercise the offices of the clerical function; and it was against the rules of the catholic church, as I have showed²¹ in another place, for any clerk to be ordained without a proper cure or title in some church, where he might do the duties of his function. For this reason it was a thing impracticable in itself, as well as against the rules of the two different states of the clerical and monastic life, that the generality of monks should be clergymen; which, to the confusion of ancient rules and discipline, has been the unwarrantable practice of later ages, especially since the time of Clement V., anno 1311, who obliged²² all monks to take holy orders, that they might say private mass for the honour of God, as he esteemed it; which was in truth a manifest trampling on the laws of the ancient church, and an affront to her practice. For anciently monks were put into the same class with laymen, as they generally were, and considered only as such. St. Jerom gives us at once both the rule and the practice, when he says, the office of a monk is not²³ to teach, but to mourn: and that the case of the monks and clergy is very different from each other: the clergy are those that feed the sheep, but the monks (among whom he reckons himself) are those that are fed. It is true, St. Jerom was not only a monk, but a presbyter likewise; but being ordained against his will, and resolving to continue a monk, he refused to officiate as a presbyter: which shows, that he had no great opinion of joining the monk and the clerk together, much less of making all monks in general become clerks, according to the modern practice. The ¹⁸ Spalat. de Rep. lib. 2. c. 11. n. 22.

¹⁹ Athan. Ep. ad Dracont. t. 1. p. 958.

²⁰ Aug. de Hæres. c. 40. Apostolici se isto nomine arrogantissime vocaverunt, eo quod in suam communionem non recipenter utentes conjugibus, et res proprias possidentes; quales habet catholica ecclesia et monachos et clericos plurimos.

²¹ Book IV. chap. 6. n. 2.

²² Vid. Clementin. lib. 3. Tit. 10. c. 1.

²³ Hieron. Ep. 55. ad Ripar. Monachus non docentis, sed plangentis habet officium. Id. Ep. 1. ad Heliodor. Alia monachorum est causa, alia clericorum: clerici pascunt oves, ego pascor.

council of Chalcedon once or twice very expressly distinguishes the monks from the clergy, and reckons them with the laymen. In one canon it says,²¹ Whoever are instrumental in getting others ordained or promoted to any office in the church for money or filthy lucre; such transactors, if they be clergymen, shall be deposed; if laymen or monks, excommunicated. And another canon²² forbids monks to meddle with ecclesiastical affairs. Both which canons plainly imply, that the monks then were not of the clergy, but merely laymen. Pope Leo²³ at the same time speaks of them as such, telling Maximus, bishop of Antioch, that he should not permit monks or laymen, however learned, to usurp the power of teaching or preaching, but only the priests of the Lord. And therefore when any monk was to be ordained presbyter or bishop, he was obliged first to go through all other orders of the church, as it was then customary for laymen to do, before the superior orders were conferred upon them. This we learn from a decree of Pope Gelasius,²⁴ which orders, that if a monk of good life and learning was minded to be ordained a priest, he should first be made a reader, or a notary, or a defensor, and after three months an acolythist, after six months a subdeacon, after nine months a deacon, and at the year's end a presbyter. So that the difference between a monk and any other layman was only this, that a monk by virtue of his education in a school of learning and good discipline (such as monasteries then were) was supposed to be a better proficient than other laymen, and therefore allowed the benefit of a quicker passage through the inferior orders than other candidates of the priesthood. All which shows, that anciently the generality of monks were only laymen, or at most but in a middle state betwixt common laymen and the clergy; as the learned men of the Romish church, Habertus,²⁵ Lindanus,²⁶ and others, scruple not to confess, though they are willing to defend the modern practice. Nay, even Gratian himself²⁷ who is most concerned for the moderns, owns it to be plain from ecclesiastical history, that to the time of Pope Siricius and Zosimus the ancient monks were only simple monks, and not of the clergy.

But though monks did not anciently aspire to be ordained; nor was it consistent with the rules of the church that all of them should be so; yet in several cases the clerical and monastic life was in some measure capable of being conjoined. As, first, when a monastery happened to be at so great a distance from its proper episcopal or parochial church, that the monks could not ordinarily resort thither for Divine service; which was the case of the monasteries in Egypt and other parts of the East, where the monks lived in great deserts sequestered from the rest of mankind; then some one or more of the monks were ordained for the performance of Divine offices among them. Thus Cassian often speaks of the churches of the monasteries of Scethis or Scythia in the deserts of Egypt, one of which had two presbyters, Paphnutius²⁸ and Daniel; and three others, single presbyters, residing, and performing Divine offices in them: these were the abbots or fathers of the monasteries, and presbyters of the churches together; whom Cassian mentions with this remarkable circumstance,²⁹ that all of them, except Paphnutius, being overrun with the heresy of the Anthropomorphites; when Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, sent one of his paschal letters among them, (to give notice of Easter according to custom,) and therein made some sharp reflections on that absurd heresy, they would not so much as suffer his epistle to be read in their churches. Sozomen likewise tells us,³⁰ that Prines the monk, whom the Arians made use of as their instrument to conceal Arsenius, while they accused Athanasius of his murder, was a presbyter of one of the monasteries in the deserts of Thebais. Where it seems the monasteries were vastly great: for Cassian³¹ assures us, that one of them had no less than five thousand monks in it: and it cannot be thought strange, that such monasteries in remote deserts should have their proper churches, and presbyters to officiate in them. But it was not only in the deserts that monasteries were allowed presbyters in them, but in some places the city monasteries (as soon as they began to get footing there) had the same privilege likewise. For Eutyches the heretic was not only archimandrite, but presbyter also of his monastery

See p. 8.
In what cases the clerical and monastic life might be conjoined together.

²¹ Conc. Chalced. c. 2.

²² Ibid. c. 4.

²³ Leo, Ep. 60. al. 62. Illud quoque convenit præcavere, ut præter eos qui sunt Domini sacerdotes, nullus sibi jus docendi et prædicandi audeat vendicare, sive sit ille monachus, sive laicus, qui alicujus scientiæ nomine gloriatur.

²⁴ Gelas. Ep. 9. ad Episc. Lucan. c. 3. Si quis de religioso proposito, et disciplinis monasterialibus eruditus, ad clericale munus accedat—continuò lector vel notarius, aut certe defensor effectus, post tres menses existat acolythus: sexto mense subdiaconi nomen accipiat; nono mense diaconus, completoque anno sit presbyter.

²⁵ Habert. Archieratic. p. 601.

²⁶ Lindan. Panopl. lib. 4. c. 75.

²⁷ Gratian. Caus. 16. qu. 1. post cap. 39. Monachos vero usque ad tempus Eusebii, Zosimi et Siricii monachos simpliciter, et non clericos fuisse, ecclesiastica testatur historia.

²⁸ Cassian. Collat. 3. c. 1. Collat. 4. c. 1.

²⁹ Collat. 10. c. 2. Ita est hæc epistola refutata ab his, qui erant in eremo Scythi commorantes, ut præter abbatem Paphnutium nostræ congregationis presbyterum, nullus eam cæterorum presbyterorum, qui in eadem eremo aliis tribus ecclesiis præsidebant, nec legi quidem ac recitari in suis conventibus prorsus admitterent.

³⁰ Sozom. lib. 2. c. 23.

³¹ Cassian. de Institut. Renunciat. lib. 4. c. 1.

at Constantinople, as Liberatus³⁵ and other ancient writers style him. And that this was no unusual thing, appears from hence, that both the civil and the canon law allows the practice. Justinian in one of his Novels³⁶ has a proviso both for such monasteries as had churches of their own, and such as had not: for those which had none of their own, it is ordered, that the monks should repair to the parish church with their abbot, and after Divine service immediately return to their monastery again; but such monasteries as had churches in them, might have four or five of their own body ordained, presbyters, or deacons, or of the inferior orders, as there was occasion. And before this the council of Chalcedon³⁷ speaks of churches in monasteries, and clergy belonging to them; allowing a deputation to any such church to be a sufficient title to qualify a man for holy orders. So that in these circumstances there is no question to be made but that the clerical and monastic life were often joined together.

2. Another case in which the same thing was practised, was when monks were taken out of monasteries by the bishops, and ordained for the service of the church. Which thing was frequently done, and not only allowed, but encouraged, both by the imperial and ecclesiastical laws: when once monasteries were become schools of learning and pious education, they were thought the properest nurseries for the church. Therefore Arcadius made it an instruction to the bishops, that if at any time they needed to augment their clergy,³⁸ they should do it out of the monks. Gothofred, in his learned observations on this law, has abundantly showed the church's practice from the testimonies of Athanasius,³⁹ St. Jerom,⁴⁰ St. Austin,⁴¹ Epiphanius,⁴² Palladius,⁴³ St. Basil,⁴⁴ Marcellinus Chronicon, and the code of the African church.⁴⁵ To which may be added the letters of Siricius,⁴⁶ Innocent, and Gelasius, alleged by Gratian, and the councils of Agde⁴⁷ and Lerida, which allow a bishop to take any monk out of a monastery with the consent and approbation of the abbot, and ordain him for the service of the church. And in this case they usually continued their ancient austerities and ascetic way of living, and so joined the clerical and monastic life together. Upon which account both these and the former sort were by the Greeks styled ἱερομοναχοί, clergy-monks, to distinguish them from such as were only laymen.

3. It happened sometimes, that a bishop and all his clergy chose an ascetic way of living, by a voluntary renunciation of all property, and enjoying all things in common, in imitation of the first church under the apostles. St. Ambrose⁴⁸ seems to say, that Eusebius Vercellensis was the first that brought in this way of living into the Western church. For before his time the monastic life was not known in cities; but he taught his clergy to live in the city after the rules and institution of monks in the wilderness. Which must be understood chiefly, I conceive, of their austerities, and renouncing their property, and having all things in common, as the other had. St. Austin set up the same way of living among the clergy of Hippo, as we learn from his own words, who says,⁴⁹ he made the bishop's house a monastery of clergymen, where it was against the rule for any man to enjoy any property of his own, but they had all things in common. Which is also noted by Possidius in his Life, That his clergy⁵⁰ lived with him in the same house, and eat at the same table, and were fed and clothed at a common expense. And so far as this was an imitation of the Cœnobites' way of living and having all things common, it might be called a monastic as well as clerical life, as Possidius and St. Austin call it. But as yet there was no monastery in the world, where all the monks were ordained only to say private mass, without being fixed to any certain cure, where they might perform the several offices of the clerical function. The monastery of St. Austin consisted only of such as had public offices and business in the church, and were not men confined to a cloister.

Therefore the hermits of St. Austin, and many other modern orders which assume his name, do but falsely pretend to derive their original from him; who, it is certain, never was a hermit himself, nor wrote any rules for them, though a great many sermons are fathered on him as preached to the hermits in the wilderness. They who count the rise of canons regular from him, as Duarenus⁵¹ and others, have something more of probability on their side: because, as I have showed, the clergy of Hippo were under some of the exercises of a monastic life, which

Sect. 9.
The original of canons regular.

³⁵ Liberat. Breviar. c. 11.

³⁶ Justin. Novel. 133. c. 2. ³⁷ Conc. Chalced. c. 6 et 8.

³⁸ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 32. Si quos forte episcopi deesse sibi clericos arbitrantur, ex monachorum numero rectius ordinabunt.

³⁹ Athanas. Ep. ad Dracont. ⁴⁰ Hieron. Ep. 3 et 4.

⁴¹ Aug. Ep. 67, 76, 81. ⁴² Epiphan. Expos. Fidei.

⁴³ Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 21.

⁴⁴ Basil. Ep. 403. ad Amphiloc. ⁴⁵ Cod. Afric. c. 80. al. 83.

⁴⁶ Gratian. Caus. 16. qu. 1. c. 20, 22, 28.

⁴⁷ Conc. Agathen. c. 27. Conc. Ilerd. c. 3.

⁴⁸ Ambros. Ep. 82. ad Eccles. Vercel. p. 254. Hæc enim primus in Occidentis partibus diversa inter se Eusebius sanctæ memoriæ conjunxit, ut et in civitate positus instituta monachorum teneret, et ecclesiam regeret jejunii sobrietate.

⁴⁹ Aug. Serm. 49. de Diversis, t. 10. p. 519. Volui habere in ista domo episcopi meum monasterium clericorum. Ecce quomodo vivimus. Nulli licet in societate habere aliquid proprium.

⁵⁰ Possid. Vit. Aug. c. 25. Cum ipso semper clerici, una etiam domo ac mensa, sumptibusque communibus alebantur et vestiebantur.

⁵¹ Duaren. de Minist. et Benefic. lib. 1. c. 21.

made them a sort of canons regular: and yet Onuphrius,⁵² and Hospinian,⁵³ who have inquired very nicely into these matters, make Gelasius the first founder of them under that name in the Lateran church, where they continued to the time of Boniface VIII., who expelled them thence. How soon the name or order came into other churches, Hospinian will inform the curious reader.

Section 10. Of the monks called Acemetae, or Watchers.

About the beginning of the fifth century, or, as Baronius⁵⁴ thinks, toward the middle of it, at Constantinople, under Gennadius the patriarch, one Alexander set up an order of monks, whom the writers of that and the following ages commonly style 'Ακομῆται, that is, Watchers: the reason of which name is taken from their manner of performing Divine offices day and night without intermission. For they divided themselves into three classes, and so one succeeded another at a stated hour, and by that means continued a perpetual course of Divine service without any interval, as well by night as by day, whence they had the name of Watchers given them. The piety of this order procured them great esteem and veneration, and many monasteries were builded for their use at Constantinople. Among others, one Studius, a nobleman of Rome, and a man of consular dignity, renounced the world, and became one of their order; erecting a famous monastery for them himself, which from the founder was⁵⁵ called Studium, and the monks of it Studite. And this, perhaps, is the first time we meet any monks that took their denomination from any founder. But these monks in a little time sunk in their credit, because they were many times found to be favourers of the heresy of Nestorius, for which they are frequently reflected on⁵⁶ by ecclesiastical writers.

Section 11. Of those called Βοσκοί, or Grazers.

In the regions of Syria and Mesopotamia, Sozomen⁵⁷ takes notice of another sort of monks, who, from their peculiar way of living, were commonly called Βοσκοί, the Grazers. For they lived after the same manner as flocks and herds upon the mountains, never dwelling in any house, nor eating any bread or flesh, nor drinking wine, but continuing instantly in the worship of God, in prayers and hymns, according to the custom of the church, till eating time was come; and then every man went with his knife in his hand to provide himself food of the herbs of the field, which was their only diet and constant way of living.

I take no notice here of those called by some the monks of St. Basil and St. Jerom; for it is certain those fathers never set up any distinct orders of their own, though both of them were promoters of the monastic life in general. The Rule, which goes under the name of St. Jerom, is known to be a forgery of some later writer: and the ascetics commonly ascribed to St. Basil, are by some learned men⁵⁸ rather thought to be the offspring of Eustathius of Sebastia. But admitting them to be his, as most learned men do, they do not argue him the author of any new order, but only a director of those which were already founded. Therefore passing by these, I shall only take notice of two orders more, the Benedictins in Italy, and the Apostolics in Britain. The Benedictins had their rise from Benedict, a famous Italian monk in the time of Justinian, about the year 530. His first settlement was at Sublaqueum, in the diocese of Tibur in Italy, where he erected twelve monasteries of twelve monks apiece in the neighbouring wilderness; one of which, in after ages, grew so great, that it was not only exempt from episcopal power, against all ancient rules, but, as a modern writer⁵⁹ observes, had no less than fourteen villages under its own proper jurisdiction. From this place he removed to Mount Cassin, where he erected another monastery, from whence he propagated his order into other countries with so great success, that for six hundred years after the greatest part of the European monks were followers of his rule; and so, whatever other names they went by, Carthusians, Cistercians, Grandimontenses, Præmonstratenses, Cluniacks, &c., they were but different branches of the Benedictins, till about the year 1220 the Dominicans and Franciscans took new rules from their leaders. Hospinian⁶⁰ reckons up twenty-three orders that sprang from this one, and observes out of Volateran, that in his time it was computed that there had been of the order two hundred cardinals, sixteen hundred archbishops, four thousand bishops, fifteen thousand seven hundred abbots, by which it is easy to judge of the prodigious increase of this order. I shall not concern myself to give any further account of them, but only observe one thing out of the rule of Benedict himself, that he never intended his monks should be called after his own name, or reckoned a new order; much less that so many new orders should be derived from it. For he professes only to write in general for the use of the Cœnobites and ⁵² Onuphr. Annot. in Platin. Vit. Gelas. p. 62. Gelasius canonicos, ut vocant, regularis ordinis Sti. Augustini Laterani primus collocavit, qui ibidem usque ad Bonifacium VIII., a quo expulsi sunt, permanserunt. Ex Archivis Basilicæ Lateranensis.

⁵³ Hospin. de Orig. Monach. lib. 3. c. 6. p. 72.

⁵⁴ B. ron. an. 459. ex Actis Marcelli ap. Surium, Dec. 29.

⁵⁵ Niceph. Hist. lib. 15. c. 23. ⁵⁶ Vid. Nicephor. ibid.

⁵⁷ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 33. Vid. Evagr. lib. 1. c. 21. Moschus, Prat. Spir. c. 19.

⁵⁸ Hospin. de Orig. Monach. p. 69. Sutclif. de Monachis, c. 7. Vid. Sozomen. lib. 3. c. 14.

⁵⁹ Baudrand. Lexic. Geograph. voce Sublaqueum.

⁶⁰ Hospin. de Monach. lib. 4. c. 5. p. 116 et 132.

Anchorets of the primitive church, which in his time were the only two standing orders that the churches of Italy allowed. He says, indeed, there were four sorts of monks in all, Cœnobites, Anchorets, Sarabaitæ, and Gyrovasi: but the two last were only scandals and reproaches to the church. Of the Sarabaitæ he gives much the same account that St. Jerom and Cassian do before him.⁶¹ And the Gyrovasi he thus describes: That they were a sort of rambling monks, that spent their whole life⁶² in running about from one province to another, and getting themselves well entertained for three or four days together at every cell they came at, being arrant slaves to their bellies, and wholly addicted to their pleasures, and in all things worse than the very Sarabaitæ themselves. So that he professes to pass over their miserable conversation in silence, and to write only for the instruction and use of the ancient Cœnobites of the church. By which it is plain, that in the time of St. Benedict, the monks had not distinguished themselves into very many different orders allowed in the Western church.

About the year 596, the Benedictins came with Austin the monk into Britain, and so all the monasteries which the Saxons built were for monks of that order. But the ancient Britons had long before this entertained the monastic life. Some say Pelagius⁶³ first brought it out of the East into Britain: others make him also abbot of the college of Bangor, and speak of two thousand monks under him: but this is justly censured by learned men⁶⁴ as a mere fable of modern authors. However, it is certain, from Bede, that there was a monastery at Bangor (whoever was the first founder of it is not very material to inquire) before Austin and his monks came into England; and here was such a number of monks,⁶⁵ that the monastery being divided into seven parts, each part had a rector, and no less than three hundred persons in it: all which were wont to live by the labour of their own hands. Hospinian and Bale give this the name of the Apostolic order; but whether upon good grounds I cannot say. In one thing it is certain they make a great mistake, in that they confound this monastery of Banochor, or Bangor, with that of Benchor in Ireland; which was another famous monastery founded by Congellus about the year 520. Out of this monastery sprang many thousand monks, and many other monasteries in Ireland and other nations also. St. Bernard⁶⁶ says, Luanus, one of the monks of this congregation, himself alone founded a hundred monasteries. And Bishop Usher has observed⁶⁷ of Brendanus, one of Congellus his first disciples, that he presided over three thousand monks, who by their own labours and handy-work did earn their own living. Columba was another of his disciples, who, having first founded the monastery of Deermach in Ireland, went and converted the Northern Picts to the Christian faith, anno 565, and builded a monastery in the isle of Hy, from whence many other monasteries, both in Britain and Ireland, as Bede⁶⁸ observes, were propagated by his disciples. Columbanus and Gallus were also monks under Congellus, the latter of which is famous for founding the monastery of St. Gall, in Helvetia, which is since become an eminent city; and the other for founding that of Lexovium, or Lisieux, in Normandy, where the monks (like the Acœmetæ, or Watchers, of Constantinople, mentioned before) were used to divide themselves into several quires, to succeed one another, and continue Divine service day and night without intermission, as St. Bernard⁶⁹ informs us. I have been the more particular in giving a distinct account of these two famous monasteries, Benchor and Bangor, not only because they were the most ancient in Ireland and Britain, but because they are so unhappily by Hospinian and Bale confounded into one.

I will shut up this chapter with a few remarks upon the different names which the ancients gave to some, or all kinds of monks in general. Beside the names of monks and ascetics, we find them frequently styled by other titles, respecting some particular act of their profession. In regard to their retirement and quiet way of living, some are styled by Justinian,⁷⁰ in one of his Novels, Ἡσυχασταί, Hesychnstæ, Quietists. Suicerus⁷¹ and Habertus⁷² take it to be only another name for Anchorets. But according to Justinian's account, it seems rather to mean persons who lived among the Cœnobites, but for greater exercise were allowed to retire from the community, and live (though within the bounds of ⁶¹ Vid. sect. 4.

⁶² Benedict. Regul. Monachor. c. 1. Quartum genus est monachorum, quod nominatur Gyrovagum, qui tota vita sua per diversas provincias ternis aut quaternis diebus per diversorum cellas volutantur; semper vagi et nunquam stabiles; propriis voluptatibus et gulæ illecebris servientes, et per omnia deteriores Sarabaitis: de quorum omnium miserima conversatione melius est silere quam loqui. His ergo omissis, ad Cœnobitarum fortissimum genus disponendum, adjuvante Domino, veniamus.

⁶³ Hospin. de Monach. lib. 4. c. 3. p. 115.

⁶⁴ Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. 1. p. 291.

⁶⁵ Bede, Hist. Anglor. lib. 2. c. 2. In monasterio Bancor tantus fertur fuisse numerus monachorum, ut cum in septem portiones esset cum præpositis sibi rectoribus monasterium divisum, nulla harum portio minus quam trecentos homines haberet, qui omnes de labore manuum suarum vivere solebant.

⁶⁶ Bernard. Vit. Malachix, c. 5. p. 1934.

⁶⁷ Usher, Relig. of the Anc. Irish, c. 6. p. 46.

⁶⁸ Bede, lib. 3. c. 4.

⁶⁹ Bernard, ibid. Vit. Malachix, c. 5.

⁷⁰ Justin. Novel. 5. c. 3.

⁷¹ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce ἡσυχαστής.

⁷² Habert. Archierat. p. 588.

Sect. 13.
Of the Apostolics
in Britain and Ireland.

Sect. 14.
Of some uncommon names of monks in the ancient church.

a cœnobium) in particular cells by themselves, and those cells were called ἡσυχαστήρια upon that account. Otherwhiles monks are styled continentes, because of their great abstinence and continent life; as in the third council of Carthage, which forbids the clergy and persons⁷³ professing continence, to go to the virgins or widows without the leave of the bishops or presbyters. So also in a law of Valentinian in the Theodosian Code,⁷⁴ and other places. Sometimes, again, they are noted by the names ἀποραζόμενοι, and renunciantes, renouncers, from renouncing the world and a secular life; as in Palladius,⁷⁵ and Cassian,⁷⁶ who particularly entitles one of his books, De Institutis Renunciantium. Sometimes they are termed philosophers, as by Isidore of Pelusium,⁷⁷ Palladius,⁷⁸ Theodoret⁷⁹ and others, because their way of living seemed to resemble the philosophic life more than others. The author under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite seems to give them the name of therapeutæ,⁸⁰ though that was once a common name of Christians in Egypt, if the accounts of Eusebius and St. Jerom may be trusted.⁸¹ Palladius sometimes uses the term φλοσεία for the monastic life,⁸² because they made a profession of renouncing all for the love of God: and upon this account Theodoret⁸³ gives one of his books the title of Philotheus, or Religious History, because it contains the lives of the most famous ascetics of his time. The reader⁸⁴ will sometimes also meet with the name of Silentiarii, given to some monks in ancient history: but this was not a name of any particular order, but given to some few for their professing a more than Pythagorean silence; such as Johannes Silentarius, who was first bishop of Colonia in Armenia, but renounced his bishopric to become a monk in Palestine, where he got the name of Silentarius, from his extraordinary silence, as Cyril⁸⁴ of Scythopolis, the writer of his Life, informs us. Though it must be noted, that the name Silentiarii is more commonly given to another sort of men, who were civil officers in the emperor's palace, and served both as apparitors to execute public business, and as guards to keep the peace about him, whence they had the name of Silentiarii, under which title they are spoken of in the Theodosian Code,⁸⁵ which joins them and the Decuriones together, where in Gothofred's learned notes the curious reader may find a further account of them.

Another name which the historians give to some Egyptian monks, who were deeply concerned in the disputes between Theophilus and Chrysostom, is the title of Μακροί, or Longi; but this was peculiar to four brethren, Dioscorus, Ammonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius, who were noted by this name for no other reason, as Sozomen⁸⁶ observes, but only because they were tall of stature. In Sidonius Apollinaris they are sometimes called cellulami, from their living in cells,⁸⁷ and insulani, islanders, because the famous monastery in the isle of Lerins was the place where most of the French bishops and learned men in those ages had their education. So this was a peculiar name for the monks of Lerins. The monasteries, beside the common names of μοναστήρια and μοναί, were also sometimes termed σενονεῖα, as Suicerus shows out of Balzamon, and Methodius, and Suidas, though that anciently in Eusebius and Philo signified a church. They were also called ἡγουμενεῖα and μάνδραι, whence hegumenus and archimandrita are names for an abbot, who is the chief father of a monastery, or governor of it. And they are sometimes styled φροντιστήρια, places of education and schools of learning, because, as I show in the next chapter, they were anciently made use of to that end, and had their φροντισται, or curators, particularly designed for that purpose.

CHAPTER III.

AN ACCOUNT OF SUCH ANCIENT LAWS AND RULES, AS RELATE TO THE MONASTIC LIFE, CHIEFLY THAT OF THE CŒNOBITES.

HAVING thus far taken a view of the several sorts of monks and their several titles, I proceed to give a short account of the principal laws and rules, made partly by the joint concurrence of the civil and ecclesiastical power, and partly by the authority of private superiors, for the government of the Cœnobites, or such monks as lived in communities, which were chiefly regarded in the church. And here we must first look to the laws relating to their admission: for all men were not allowed to turn monks at pleasure,

Sect. 1.
The curiales not allowed to turn monks.

⁷³ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 25. Ut clerici vel continentes, ad viduas vel virgines, nisi jussu vel permissu episcoporum et presbyterorum, non accedant. Vid. Cod. Can. Afric. c. 38. al. 41.

⁷⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episcop. Leg. 20. Qui continentium se volunt nomine nuncupari, &c.

⁷⁵ Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 15.

⁷⁶ Cassian. lib. 4. de Institut. Renunc.

⁷⁷ Isidor. lib. 1. Ep. 1. ⁷⁸ Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 8.

⁷⁹ Theodor. lib. 4. c. 28.

⁸⁰ Dionys. de Hierarch. Eccl. c. 6. p. 386.

⁸¹ See Book I. chap. 1. sect. 1.

⁸² Pallad. Lausiac. c. 12. ⁸³ Theodor. φίλοθεός, t. 4.

⁸⁴ Apud Papebroch. Acta Sanctorum, Maii 13. t. 3. p. 234.

⁸⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 6. Tit. 23. de Decurionibus et Silentariis.

⁸⁶ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 30. Οἱ μακροὶ δὲ ἐκ τοῦ σώματος ὀνομάζοντο.

⁸⁷ Sidon. lib. 9. Ep. 3. ad Faustum. Precum peritus insulanarum, quas de senatu Lyrinensium cellulanoꝝ in urbem transtulisti. So Eucherius ad Salon. lib. 1. Insulani Tyrones. And Faustus de Natali S. Maximi Stadium Insulanum. Vid. Savaro, Not. in loc. Sidonii.

because such an indiscriminate permission would have been to the detriment both of church and state. Upon this account the civil law forbids any of the curiales to become monks, unless they parted with their estates to some others, that might bear the offices of their country in their stead. To this purpose is that law of Valentinian and Valens in the Theodosian Code,¹ which taking notice of some curiales, who pretended to associate themselves with the monks in Egypt, only to avoid bearing the offices of their country, orders them to be fetched back from the monasteries by force, and to be compelled to do their duty in their civil station, or else to part with their estates to others that should officiate for them. This was agreeable to all those ancient laws, which forbade any of the curiales to be ordained among the clergy, except upon the same condition of quitting their estates to others to bear the offices of their country in their stead: and yet Baronius² is so offended at this law, that he reckons it was but the prælidium to a severe persecution, which Valens, shortly after the death of Valentinian, brought upon the monks in the East, when, as St. Jerom³ and Orosius inform us, he by another law obliged them to turn soldiers, and ordered such as refused to be bastinadoed to death. Gothofred,⁴ by mistake, reckons this law the very same with the former; but Mr. Pagi⁵ corrects both him and Baronius together, and shows them to be distinct laws, and plainly to refer to different times and things; the one being made while Valentinian was alive, the other by Valens alone after his death; the one a very severe law, raising a great persecution against the monks, the other laying no greater burden on them than was always laid upon the clergy by other laws, which prohibit the curiales to be ordained, unless they found proper substitutes to bear the offices of their country in their room. And the reason of these laws, as they referred both to the monks and clergy, was one and the same, that men, who by their estates were tied to the service of their country, might not exempt their estates from that service under pretence of entering into a religious life.

For the same reason, the most ancient laws both of church and state forbid any servant to be admitted into any monastery without his master's leave, because that was to deprive his master of his legal right of service, which by the original state and condition of his servants was his due. To this purpose Valentinian III. has a law at the end of the Theodosian Code, which equally forbids servants to become either clerks or monks⁶ against their master's will, to evade the proper bonds and duties of their station. Baronius⁷ has a sour reflection upon this law also; for he says, nothing ever prospered with Valentinian after the making of it: and yet he could not but know, that the same thing had been before determined by the council of Chalcedon,⁸ and that at the instance of the emperor Marcion, who himself drew up the law, and desired the fathers in synod to make a canon of it, as appears from the acts⁹ of that council. The words of the canon are, That no one shall be received into any monastery, to continue there as a monk, without the consent of his own master. So little reason was there to charge Valentinian with an innovation in this matter, when an emperor and a general council had determined the same before him. But Justinian cancelled all these former laws by a new edict of his own, which first set servants at liberty¹⁰ from their masters, under pretence of betaking themselves to a monastic life. So that what innovation was made in this matter is justly to be ascribed to him as its proper author.

Another caution which the ancients prescribed to be observed in this matter was, that married persons should never betake themselves to a monastic life without mutual consent of both parties. Thus Ammus and his wife acted by consent, as Socrates and Palladius¹¹ relate the story. And so Martinianus and Maxima, mentioned by Victor;¹² Paulinus, bishop of Nola, and Therasia his wife, by mutual consent. But Paulinus inveighs severely against the contrary practice, blaming Celantia and others, who indiscreetly dissolved their marriage

Sect. 2.
Nor servants without their master's consent.

Sect. 3.
Nor husbands and wives without mutual consent of each other.

¹ Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 63. Quidam ignaviae sectatores, desertis civitatum muneribus, captant solitudines ac secreta, et specie religionis cum cœtibus monazontum congregantur. Hos igitur atque hujusmodi intra Ægyptum deprehensos, per comitem Orientis erui e latebris consulta præceptione mandavimus, atque ad munia patriarum subeunda revocari, aut pro tenore nostræ sanctionis familiarium rerum carere inlecebris: quas per eos censuum vindicandas, qui publicarum essent subituri munera functionum.

² Baron. an. 375. p. 369.

³ Hieron. Chronic. an. 376. Valens lege data, ut monachi militarent, nolentes fustibus jussit interfici. Oros. Hist. lib. 7. c. 33. Tribuni et milites missi, qui sanctos et veros Dei milites alio nomine persecutionis abstraherent, interfecerunt ibi agmina multa sanctorum.

⁴ Gothofred. Not. in Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decurion. Leg. 63.

⁵ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 375. n. 12 et 13.

⁶ Valent. 3. Novel. 12. Nullus originarius, inquilinus, servus, vel colonus, ad clericale munus accedat, neque monachis et monasteriis aggregetur, ut vinculum debitæ conditionis evadat.

⁷ Baron. an. 452. p. 179.

⁸ Conc. Chalced. c. 4. Μηδένα προσδέχεσθαι ἐν τοῖς μοναστηρίοις ἐπὶ τὸ μονάζειν παρὰ γνώμην τοῦ ἰδίου δεσπότητος.

⁹ Conc. Chalced. Act. G. p. 609.

¹⁰ Justin. Novel. 5. c. 2.

¹¹ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 23. Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 8.

¹² Vict. Uticens. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 1.

vow, and thereby exposed their husbands to the sin of adultery, making themselves partakers in their guilt,¹³ by acting against the rule of the apostle, which says, "The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband; and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife." St. Austin¹⁴ argues upon the same ground, that such engagements are not to be made but by mutual consent; and if either party inconsiderately enter into any such vow, they are rather to repent of their rashness, than perform their promise. This was his constant sense, as appears from other places of his writings:¹⁵ and herein St. Jerom,¹⁶ St. Basil,¹⁷ and all the ancients agree, except Theonas in Cassian,¹⁸ who, having forsaken his wife to turn monk, is said to have done it with the approbation of the fathers in Scethis, though Cassian himself dares not undertake to excuse it, as knowing it to have been against the general sense and practice of the catholic church. Justinian, indeed, gave some encouragement to this unwarrantable practice by a law, wherein he authorizes the deserting party, man or woman, to claim their own fortune again,¹⁹ and not be liable to the least punishment for their desertion. But the church never approved of this law; and it is remarked even by Bellarmine²⁰ himself, that Gregory the Great wrote against it.

It was anciently also thought unreasonable to admit children into the monastic life without or against the consent of their parents. The council of Gangra²¹ seems to reflect on this practice, as encouraged by Eustathius the heretic, in a canon which decrees, That if any children, under pretence of religion, forsook their parents, and did not give them the honour due to them, they should be anathematized. St. Basil's directions are conformable to the rule of that council, that children should not be received into monasteries,²² unless they were offered by their parents, if their parents were alive. But Justinian a little enervated the force of this ancient rule by a new law,²³ forbidding parents to hinder their children from becoming monks or clerks, and evacuating their wills, if they presumed to disinherit them upon that account. And this seems to have been the first step toward the contrary practice; which some learned writers²⁴ of the Romish church have been so far from approving, that they have with the utmost zeal and vehemence declaimed against it, as repugnant to the laws of reason and Scripture, and the general practice of the primitive church.

Nor was it only the parents' right that was to be considered in this case, but also the right that every person is presumed to have in himself: for if a parent offered a child before he was capable of giving his own consent, the act was of no force, unless the child confirmed it voluntarily, when he came to years of discretion: which the second council of Toledo reckons to be about the age of eighteen, decreeing, That all such as were entered in their infancy by their parents²⁵ into the clerical or monastic state, should be instructed in the bishop's house till they came to that age, and then they should be interrogated, whether they intended to lead a single life or marry, that accordingly they might now resolve either to continue in their present state, or betake themselves to a secular life again; which, by the decree of this council, they had still liberty to do. And virgins had the same liberty till forty, by an edict of the emperors Leo and Majorian,²⁶ at the end of the Theodosian Code. But the fourth council of Toledo²⁷ was more severe in this respect to infant monks: for there it was decreed, anno 633, that whether their parents' devotion or their own profession made them monks, both should be equally binding, and there should be no permission to return to a secular life again. This, as Spalatensis²⁸ rightly observes, was the first canon that ever was made to retain children in monasteries, who were only offered by their parents, without requiring their own consent at years of discretion.

^{Sect. 4.}
Not children without the consent of their parents.

^{Sect. 5.}
Children, though offered by their parents, not to be retained against their own consent.

¹³ Paulin. Ep. 14. ad Celant. inter Epist. Hieronymi. Multa jam per hujusmodi ignorantiam et audivimus et vidimus scissa conjugia; quodque recordari piget, occasione castitatis adulterium perpetratum, &c.

¹⁴ Aug. Ep. 45. Armentario et Paulinæ. Vovenda talia non sunt a conjugatis, nisi ex consensu et voluntate communi. Et si præperore factum fuerit, magis est corrigenda temeritas quam persolvenda promissio.

¹⁵ Aug. Ep. 199. ad Ecdiciam.

¹⁶ Hieron. Ep. 46. ad Rusticum. De non divellendo matrimonio sine utriusque consensu.

¹⁷ Basil. Regul. Major. qu. 12. ¹⁸ Cassian. Collat. 21. c. 9.

¹⁹ Cod. Just. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episcop. et Cler. Leg. 53.

²⁰ Bellarm. de Monachis, c. 38.

²¹ Conc. Gangren. c. 16. Εἴ τινα τέκνα γονεῖων, μάλιστα πιστῶν, ἀναχωροῖσι προφάσει θεοσεβείας, καὶ μὴ τὴν καθήκουσαν τιμὴν τοῖς γονεῦσιν ἀπονέμωμι—ἀνάθεμα ἔστω.

²² Basil. Regul. Major. qu. 15.

²³ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 55. Ut non liceat parentibus impedire, quo minus liberi eorum volentes monachi aut clerici fiant, aut eam ob solam causam exheredare, &c.

²⁴ Aërodius de Patrio Jure ad Filium, &c.

²⁵ Conc. Tolet. 2. c. 1. De his, quos voluntas parentum a primis infantie annis in clericatus officio vel monachali posuit, pariter statutum observandum, ut mox cum detonsi vel ministerio electorum contraditi fuerint, in domo ecclesie sub episcopali presentia a præposito sibi debeant erudiri. At ubi octavum decimum ætatis suæ compleverint annum, coram totius cleri plebisque conspectu, voluntas eorum de expetendo conjugio ab episcopo perscrutetur, &c.

²⁶ Leo, Novel. 8.

²⁷ Conc. Tolet. 4. c. 48. Monachum aut paterna devotio aut propria professio facit. Quicquid horum fuerit alligatum, tenebit. Proinde his ad mundum revertendi intercludimus aditum, et omnes ad seculum interdicimus regressus.

²⁸ Spalat. de Repub. lib. 2. c. 12. n. 29.

Sect. 6.
Of the tonsure
and habit of monks.

The manner of admission was generally by some change of their habit and dress, not to signify any religious mystery, but only to express their gravity and contempt of the world. And in this the sober part of them were always careful to observe a decent mean betwixt vanity and lightness on the one hand, and hypocritical affectations on the other. Long hair was always thought an indecency in men, and savouring of secular vanity; and therefore they polled every monk at his admission, to distinguish him from the seculars; but they never shaved any, for fear they should look too like the priests of Isis. This, then, was the ancient tonsure, in opposition to both those extremes. Long hair they reckoned an effeminate dress, and against the rule of the apostle: therefore Epiphanius²⁹ blames the Mesopotamian monks for wearing long hair against the rule of the catholic church; and St. Austin³⁰ censures such under the name of eriniti fratres, the long-haired brethren. St. Jerom, according to his custom, expresses himself with satire and indignation against them; for, writing to Eustochium,³¹ he bids her beware of such monks as affected to walk in chains, and wear long hair, and goats' beards, and black cloaks, and go barefoot in the midst of winter. For these were but arguments and tokens of a devil. From which invective it may be easily collected, that such sort of affectations in habit and dress were not approved then by wise men in the church. But, on the other hand, the ancient tonsure was not a shaven crown; for St. Jerom,³² St. Ambrose,³³ and others, equally inveigh against this as a ceremony of the priests of Isis: it was only an obligation on the monks and clergy to wear decent and short hair, as it is evident from all the canons that appoint it.³⁴ As to their habit and clothing, their rules were the same, that it should be decent and grave, as became their profession; not light and airy, nor slovenly and affected. The monks of Tabennesus in Thebais, which lived under the institution of Pachomius, seem to have been the only monks in those days which were confined to any particular habits: Cassian³⁵ has a whole book among his Institutes to describe them; where he speaks of their cingula, cuculli, collobia, redimicula, palliola or mafortes, melotes, their sheep-skins, and caligæ, their sandals; all which, they that are curious in this matter may find there particularly described. But he owns, these habits were not in use³⁶ among the Western monks; and some of them, particularly the cowl and the sheep-skins, would have exposed them only to derision to have worn them. St. Jerom often speaks of the habit of monks, but he never once intimates that it was any particular garb differing from others, save only in this, that it was a cheaper, coarser, meaner raiment³⁷ than others wore, expressing their humility and contempt of the world, without any singularity or affectation. For as to the affecting of black cloaks, and appearing in chains, we have heard him already express himself severely against them. And he is no less satirical³⁸ against those who wore cowls and sackcloth for their outward garment: because these were vain singularities, which religious persons ought to avoid, and rather observe a becoming mean in their habit³⁹ between gaiety and slovenliness, without any notable distinction to draw the eyes of the world upon them. Palladius takes notice of some who loved to walk in chains, but he says,⁴⁰ Apollo, the famous Egyptian monk, was used to inveigh severely against them. And Cassian justly blames some others, as having more zeal than knowledge, because they, literally interpreting that saying of our Saviour, "He that taketh not up his cross and followeth me, is not worthy of me," made themselves wooden crosses, and carried them continually about their necks; which, as he rightly observes,⁴¹ was not to edify, but raise the laughter of all spectators. Such affectations were generally condemned by the ancients, and it was only the ignorant or superstitious

²⁹ Epiphanius. Hæc. 80. n. 6.

³⁰ Aug. de Oper. Monach. c. 31. Vereor in hoc vitio plura dicere propter quosdam crinitos fratres, quorum præter hoc multa et pene omnia veneramus.

³¹ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustochium, c. 12. Viroso fuge, quos videris catenatos; quorum femine contra apostolum Paulum crines, hircorum barba, nigrum pallium, et nudi in patientia frigoris pedes. Hæc omnia argumenta sunt diaboli.

³² Id. Com. in Ezek. c. 44.

³³ Ambros. Ep. 36. ad Sabin.

³⁴ Vid. Conc. Carthag. 4. c. 41. Conc. Agath. c. 20. Conc. Tolet. 3. c. 12. Tolet. 4. can. 40.

³⁵ Cassian. lib. 1. de Habitu Monachor.

³⁶ Cassian. ibid. c. 11. Nam neque caliginis neque collobiis seu una tunica esse contentos hyemis permittit asperitas; et parvissimi cuculli velamen vel melotis gestio derisum potius quam ædificationem ullam videntibus comparabit.

³⁷ Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Sordidæ vestes candidæ mentis indicia sunt. Vilis tunica contemptum sæculi præbet. Id. Ep. 13. ad Paulin. Tunicam mutas cum animo, nec pleno marsupio gloriosas sordes appetis, &c. Id. Ep. 15. ad Marcellam de Laud. Asellæ. Tunica fuscior induta se repente Domino consecravit.

³⁸ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustochium, c. 12. Sunt quæ ciliicis vestiuntur et cucullis fabrefactis: ut ad infantiam redeant, imitantur noctuas et bubones.

³⁹ Ibid. Vestis sit nec satis munda, nec sordida, et nulla diversitate notabilis: ne ad te obviam prætereuntium turba consistat, aut digito demonstreris.

⁴⁰ Pallad. Hist. Lausiæ. c. 52. in Bibl. Patr. G. Lat. t. 2. p. 985.

⁴¹ Cassian. Collat. 8. c. 3. Quod quidam districtissimi monachorum, habentes quidem zelum Dei, sed non secundum scientiam, simpliciter intelligentes, fecerunt sibi cruces ligneas, easque jugiter humeris circumferentes, non ædificationem, sed risum cunctis videntibus intulerunt that approved them. So that upon the whole matter it appears, that the Western monks used only a common habit, the philosophic pallium, which many other Christians in those times did; whence, as I have noted⁴² in another place, the heathens called Christians, Greeks and impostors; and sometimes the looser sort of Christians gave monks the same name for the same reason, as St. Jerom⁴³ seems to intimate, when he says, If a man did not wear silk, he was reckoned a monk; if he did not appear in gay clothing, he was presently termed a Greek and impostor. And Salvian⁴⁴ reflects on the African people, and especially those of Carthage, for the same treatment of them: for he says, They could scarce ever see a man with short hair, and a pale face, and habited in a pallium, that is, a monk, without bestowing some reviling and reproachful language on him. These words of Salvian I take to be an exact description of their ancient habit and tonsure.

As to any solemn vow or profession required at their admission, we find no such thing: for it was not yet the practice of those ages; but whatever was done in that kind, was only a private transaction between God and themselves. St. Basil⁴⁵ says plainly, that there was no express promise of celibacy taken of any, but they seemed only to promise it tacitly by becoming monks. He advises, indeed, that a profession should be required of them for the future: but that implies, that as yet no such promise had been exacted before. There were some monks that lived in a married state, as appears from what has been alleged from Athanasius and St. Austin in the foregoing chapter:⁴⁶ and it is certain a promise of celibacy could not be exacted of them. And for others that lived in communities, their way of admission was not upon any explicit promise, but a triennial probation, during which time they were inured to the exercises of the monastic life in the greatest severity; and if, after that term was expired, they liked to continue the same exercises, they were then admitted without any further ceremony or solemnity into the community, to cohabit as proper members of it. This was the method prescribed by the rule of Pachomius, the father of the monks of Tabennesus, from which all others took their model, as the reader may find in Palladius⁴⁷ and Sozomen,⁴⁸ where the rule is at large recited.

There was as yet no solemn vow of poverty required neither: though it ^{Sect. 8. What meant by their renunciation of the world.} was customary for men voluntarily to renounce the world, by disposing of their own estates to charitable uses, before they entered into a community, where they were to enjoy all things in common. Thus Hilarion divided all his substance between his brethren and the poor, reserving nothing to himself, as St. Jerom⁴⁹ and Sozomen report of him. And Paulinus, a rich senator's son, with his wife Therasia, by mutual consent disposed of both their estates (which were very great) to the poor, and then betook themselves to a monastic life at Nola, where Paulinus, after he was made bishop of the place, continued the same voluntary poverty still; insomuch that St. Austin⁵⁰ says of him, that when the Goths were ravaging and plundering the town, he made this prayer to God, Domine, ne excrucier propter aurum et argentum: ubi enim sint omnia mea, tu scis: Lord, let not the barbarians torture me for my silver or gold, for thou knowest where all my treasure is. Such instances of voluntary poverty are every where obvious in ancient history. But then one thing they were very careful to avoid in those early times, that is, that when they had once renounced their own estates, they did not afterward seek to enrich themselves or their monasteries by begging or accepting the estates of others. It was a remarkable answer to this purpose, which Isaac Syrus, bishop of Ninive,⁵¹ is said to have given to his monks, when they desired him to receive some lands that were offered him for the use of his monastery: he replied, Monachus qui in terra possessiones querit, monachus non est, A monk that seeks for possessions in the earth, is not a monk. The Western monks were not always precise to this rule, as appears from the complaints of St. Jerom⁵² and Cassian,⁵³ and some imperial laws,⁵⁴ made to restrain their avarice: but the monks of Egypt were generally just to their own pretensions: their monasteries had no lands or revenues belonging to them, nor would they have any, nor suffer any monk to enjoy more than was necessary for his daily subsistence. For they thought it a contradiction to their profession, that men who made a show of renouncing the world, should grow rich in monasteries, who perhaps were poor before they came thither. And therefore if ever they received any donation, it was not for their own use, but the ⁴² Book I. chap. 2. n. 4.

⁴³ Hieron. Ep. 23. ad Marcellam. Nos quia serica veste non utimur, monachi judicamur.—Si tunica non canduerit, statim illud de trivio, impostor et Græcus est.

⁴⁴ Salvian. de Gubern. lib. 8. p. 295. Inter Africæ civitates, et maxime intra Carthaginis muros, palliatum et pallidium, et recisis comarum fluentium júbis usque ad cutem tonsum videre, tam infelix ille populus quam infidelis sine convicio atque execratione vix poterat.

⁴⁵ Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 19. Κατὰ τὸ σιωπώμενον ὁκοῦσι παραδέχθαι τὴν ἀγαμίαν, &c.

⁴⁶ See chap. 2. sect. 6.

⁴⁷ Pallad. Hist. Lansiæ. c. 38.

⁴⁸ Sozom. lib. 3. c. 14.

⁴⁹ Hieron. Vit. Hilar. c. 3. Sozom. lib. 3. c. 14.

⁵⁰ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 1. c. 10.

⁵¹ Vid. Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. 2. p. 185.

⁵² Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Ep. 2. ad Nepotian.

⁵³ Cassian. Instit. lib. 4. c. 15.

⁵⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 20.

use of the poor. Nay, they would not suffer any monk to enjoy any thing to call it his own; but in a community they would have all things in common. And therefore St. Jerom⁵⁵ tells a remarkable story of one of the monks of Nitria in Egypt, how he was punished for hoarding up but a hundred shillings as his own property, which he had saved out of his daily labour. At his death, when the thing came to be discovered, a council of all the monks was called, to advise what should be done with the money; and they were about five thousand who met at this consultation: some said it should be distributed among the poor; others, that it should be given to the church; and others, that it should be remitted to his parents. But Macarius, and Pambo, and Isidore, and the rest of those called fathers among them, decreed that it should be buried with him in his grave, saying, Thy money perish with thee. So little regard had those ancient monks for any thing more than what was necessary for their daily sustenance.

Some indeed did not thus renounce all property, but kept their estates in their own hands, and yet enjoyed no more of them than if they had actually passed them over to others: for they distributed their whole yearly revenue constantly to the poor, and such charitable uses as men's daily needs required. Of this sort Palladius⁵⁶ and Sozomen⁵⁷ mention one Apollonius, who kept his estate in his own possession, but expended the annual income in providing physic and other necessaries for the sick monks, as there was occasion. Palladius also speaks of two brothers,⁵⁸ Pacesius and Esaias, sons of a rich merchant, who betaking themselves to a monastic life, disposed of their estates in these different ways: the one gave away his whole estate at once to churches and prisons, and such monasteries as needed relief, and then betaking himself to a small trade for his own subsistence, he spent the rest of his life in labour and prayer; but the other kept his estate in his own possession, and therewith first building a monastery, and taking to himself a few associates, he entertained all strangers travelling that way, took

Sect. 9.
Of the difference between the renouncing and the communicative life.

care of sick, entertained the aged, relieved the poor, and on every Saturday and Lord's day spread three or four tables for the refreshment of such as needed. Palladius calls this rightly, κοινωνικόν βίον, the communicative life, and the other, ἀποαζαμένον βίον, the life of a renouncer: and adds, that the question being put by some brethren to Pambo, the famous Egyptian, concerning these two brothers, Whether of them took the better course? he replied, They were both equally perfect and acceptable in the sight of God; the one imitating the hospitality of Abraham, and the other the zeal of Elias.

Hence it appears that the ancient monks had no regard to estates and possessions; for one way or other they discharged themselves of the burden of them. And then, since monasteries had no standing revenues, all monks whatever were obliged to exercise themselves in bodily labour, partly to maintain themselves without being burdensome to others, and partly to keep their souls well guarded, and, as it were, out of the way of Satan's strongest temptations. For Cassian notes it⁵⁹ as a very wise saying of the old Egyptian fathers, That a labouring monk was but tempted with one devil, but an idle one was exposed to the devastation of a legion. And therefore St. Jerom, writing to his friend Rusticus the monk, bids him be sure to exercise himself in some⁶⁰ honest labour, that the devil might always find him employed. This, he tells him, was the custom of the Egyptian monasteries, to admit none without working with their own hands, as well to supply their bodily wants, as to preserve their souls from danger. They had then no idle mendicants among them, as Duarenus himself⁶¹ rightly observes. They looked upon a monk that did not work, as no better than a covetous defrauder. For so Socrates⁶² tells us the Egyptian fathers were used to express themselves concerning such as eat other men's bread for nought. We have already heard out of Bede⁶³ how the monks of Bangor, two thousand in number, maintained themselves with their own labour. And Bishop Usher has collected⁶⁴ a great many other instances of the same nature in relation to the first monasteries of Ireland and Britain. It would be

Sect. 10.
All monks anciently maintained
by their own labour.

⁵⁵ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 14. Quod ante non plures annos Nitriæ gestum sit, referamus. Quidam ex fratribus parior magis quam avarior, nesciens triginta argenteis Dominum venditum, centum solidos, quos lina texendo acquisierat, moriens dereliquit. Initum est inter monachos consilium (nam in eodem loco circiter quinque millia divisus cellulis habitabant) quid hinc facto opus esset. Alii pauperibus distribuendos esse dicebant: alii dandos ecclesiæ; nonnulli parentibus remittendos. Macarius vero et Pambo et Isidorus, et cæteri quos patres vocant, sancto in eis loquente Spiritu, decreverunt infodiendos esse cum eodem, dicentes, pecunia tua tecum sit in perditionem.

⁵⁶ Pallad. Hist. Lausiæ. c. 14.

⁵⁷ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 29.

⁵⁸ Pallad. ibid. c. 15.

⁵⁹ Cassian. Instit. lib. 10. c. 23. Hæc est apud Ægyptum antiquis patribus sancta sententia, operantem monachum uno dæmone pulsari; otiosum vero innumeris spiritibus devastari.

⁶⁰ Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Fac et aliquid operis, ut te semper diabolus inveniat occupatum.—Ægyptiorum monasteria hunc morem tenent, ut nullum absque operis labore suscipiant, non tam propter victus necessaria, quam propter animæ salutem.

⁶¹ Duaren. de Minister. et Benefic. lib. 1. c. 20. Nec ita otio erant dediti, more pseudomonachorum nostri temporis.

⁶² Socrat. lib. 4. c. 23. Μοναχός, εἰ μὴ ἐργάζοιτο, ἐπίσης τῷ πλεονέκτη κρίνεται.

⁶³ Bed. lib. 2. c. 2.

⁶⁴ Usher, Relig. of the Ancient Irish, c. 6.

endless to produce passages of ancient writers that relate to this matter: therefore I shall content myself to refer the reader to the places themselves cited⁶⁵ in the margin, and only observe one thing further, That anciently monks by the labour of their hands did not only provide themselves of sufficient maintenance, but had superfluities also to relieve the necessities of others. Sozomen⁶⁶ says, Serapion presided over a monastery of ten thousand monks near Arsinoe in Egypt, who all thus laboured with their own hands, going to reap in the fields in the time of harvest, so that they had enough and to spare for the use of the poor. Which is confirmed by St. Austin,⁶⁷ who, speaking of the labour of the monks of his own time, assures us, they many times sent away whole ships laden with necessaries, to supply the needs of such countries as were exceeding barren and poor. He means the deserts of Libya, of which Cassian speaks, telling us, that the fathers in Egypt would never suffer their monks to receive any thing by way of maintenance⁶⁸ from others, but they had sufficient out of their labour not only to entertain strangers and travellers that came to visit them, but also to send abundance of provisions into the famished parts of Libya, and to supply the wants of men in prison in other places; reckoning that hereby they offered a reasonable and true sacrifice to God of the fruit of their own hands by such an oblation. It seems they did not then think that working was inconsistent with the other duties of a monk, but one necessary part of his office and station. And St. Austin wrote a whole book⁶⁹ to prove this to be their duty, wherein he takes occasion to answer all the plausible objections that have ever been made to the contrary.

Now, the better to promote this and all their other duties, the monasteries were commonly divided into several parts, and proper officers appointed over them. Every ten monks were subject to one, who was called the decanus, or dean, from his presiding over ten; and every hundred had another officer, called centenarius, from presiding over a hundred. Above these were the patres, or fathers of the monasteries, as St. Jerom and St. Austin commonly term them; which in other writers are called abbates, abbots, from the Greek ἀββᾶς, a father; and hegumeni, presidents; and archimandrites, from μανδρα, a sheepfold; they being, as it were, the keepers or rulers of these sacred folds in the church. The business of the deans was to exact every man's daily task, and bring it to the æconomus, or steward of the house, who himself gave a monthly account to the father of them all, as St. Jerom⁷⁰ and St. Austin⁷¹ inform us.

Sect. 11.
Proper officers appointed in monasteries for this purpose, viz. decani, centenarii, patres, &c.

The fathers were commonly of the order of presbyters, both for the performance of Divine offices, and the exercise of discipline among them. And their power was very considerable: for though it was not absolute and unlimited, yet it was seldom or never disputed by their inferiors; it being, as St. Jerom observes,⁷² a prime part of their confederation to obey their superiors, and do whatever they commanded them. And in case of wilful transgression, they had power to inflict both spiritual and corporal punishments on them. Their spiritual punishments were the censures of the church, suspension from the eucharist, and excommunication. For these powers were lodged in their hands, as appears from several passages in Cassian, who often speaks⁷³ of the abbots casting the monks out of the church, and forbidding the rest to pray with them, till they had done a very submissive penance prostrate upon the ground, and had been reconciled and absolved by the abbot publicly before all the brethren. He particularly notes of Paphnutius, abbot of Scethis,⁷⁴ that he struck out a monk's name out of the diptychs of the church, and could scarce be prevailed with to let him be mentioned in the obla-

Sect. 12.
The power of the fathers or abbots very great in point of discipline over the rest.

⁶⁵ Epiphan. Hær. 80. n. 6. Chrysost. de Compunct. Cordis, lib. 1. c. 6. Hieron. Ep. 77. ad Marcum Celedensem. Cassian. Instit. lib. 10. c. 22. Id. Collat. 15. c. 4. Justin. Novel. 133. c. 6. Id. Cod. lib. 11. Tit. 25. de Mendicantibus Validis. Pallad. Histor. Lausiæ. cap. 7, 10, 20, 28, 30, 39, 76, 89, 96, 112. Moschus, Prat. Spir. cap. 22, 114, 160, 161, 183, 194.

⁶⁶ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 28.

⁶⁷ Aug. de Morib. Eccles. c. 31. Usque adeo ut oneratas etiam naves in ea loca mittant, quæ inopes incolunt, &c.

⁶⁸ Cassian. Instit. lib. 10. c. 22. Non solum a nullo quicquam ad usum victus sui accipere patiuntur, sed etiam de laboribus suis non tantum supervenientes et peregrinos reficiunt, verum etiam per loca Libyæ, quæ sterilitate ac fame laborant, nec non etiam per civitates his qui squalore carcerum contabescunt, inhumanem conferentes dirigunt alimoniam victusque substantiam, de fructu manuum suarum rationabile ac verum sacrificium Domino tali oblatione se offerre credentes.

⁶⁹ Aug. de Opere Monachor. c. 17, &c.

⁷⁰ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15. Opus diei statum est, quod decano redditum, fertur ad æconomum, qui et ipse per singulos menses patri omnium cum magno tremore reddit rationem.

⁷¹ Aug. de Morib. Eccles. Cathol. c. 31.

⁷² Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15. Prima apud eos confœderatio est, obedire majoribus, et quicquid jusserint facere.

⁷³ Cassian. Instit. lib. 2. c. 16. Si quis pro admissis quolibet delicto fuerit ab oratione suspensus, nullus cum eo prorsus orandi habet licentiam, antequam submissa in terram pœnitentia, reconciliatio ejus et admissi venia coram fratribus cunctis publice fuerit ab abbate concessa. Id. lib. 4. c. 16. Tandiu prostratus in terram veniam postulabit, donec orationum consummetur solennitas, impetraturus eam, cum jussus fuerit abbatibus judicio de solo surgere. Vid. ibid. c. 20. It. Collat. 18. c. 15.

⁷⁴ Cassian. Collat. 2. c. 5. Vix a presbytero abbate Paphnutio potuit obtineri, ut non inter bythyanatos reputatus, etiam memoria et oblatione pausatium judicaretur indignus.

tion for those that are at rest in the Lord, because he had murdered himself at the instigation of Satan, who appeared to him in the form of an angel of light, persuading him to throw himself into a deep well, with confidence that no harm could befall him for the great merit of his labours and virtues. Socrates⁷⁵ speaks of the like power in Arsenius, who used it, he says, with this discretion, that he never excommunicated the junior monks, but only the seniors, because the juniors were likely to become more refractory by it, and contemn his discipline, but the seniors were quickly amended by it. The reader may find some other instances in Palladius⁷⁶ to the same purpose. As to their corporal punishments, Cassian⁷⁷ tells us they were these two, whipping and expulsion; and he particularly enumerates the crimes for which they were inflicted. Palladius also mentions the flagellum monachorum: for he says,⁷⁸ in the church of Mount Nitria, there were three whips hanged upon three palm trees, one for the offending monks, another for the correcting of thieves, and a third for the punishment of strangers, whom they entertained in an hospital adjoining. But as yet we read nothing of voluntary whipping of themselves by way of exercise: that is a later invention of the modern monks, whom Spondanus⁷⁹ and Prateolus⁸⁰ themselves cannot forbear ranking among heretics, and a late French writer⁸¹ has more fully exposed them in a discourse on purpose, entitled Historia Flagellantium, to which I refer the curious reader.

The abbots or fathers were also of great repute in the church. For many times they were called to councils, and allowed to sit and vote there in the quality of presbyters. As Benedict in the council of Rome under Boniface II., anno 531. Which I relate upon the authority of Dr. Cave,⁸² who has it from Antonius Scipio in his Elogium Abbatum Cassinensium. The like privilege we find allowed in the council of Constantine under Flavian, anno 448, where twenty-three archimandrites subscribe with thirty bishops to the condemnation of Eutyches, as appears from the fragments of that council related in the council of Chalcedon.⁸³ But it is justly noted by learned men⁸⁴ as a new thing, to find abbesses, as well as abbots, subscribing in the council of Beaufield in Kent, anno 694, and that before both presbyters and temporal lords, as the author of the *Saxon Chronicle*⁸⁵ reports it. For this is the first time we meet with any such thing in the records of the ancient church.

But though such power and privileges were granted to abbots, yet neither they nor their monasteries were as yet exempt from the jurisdiction of bishops. For by the ancient laws, both ecclesiastical and civil, no monastery was to be erected in any place without the leave of the bishop of the diocese. This was one of those things which the emperor Marcian proposed to the council of Chalcedon, and at his request it was there enacted into a canon, that no one should build⁸⁶ either monastery or oratory without the consent of the bishop of the city or country where it was to be erected. And by Justinian's law,⁸⁷ the bishop was to make a sort of consecration of the ground before they went to building. It is further provided in the forementioned canon, that all monks shall be subject to the bishop of the diocese, and give attendance to their own proper duties of fasting and prayer, not intermeddling themselves either in ecclesiastical or secular affairs, except upon great and urgent necessity, and that by the permission of the bishop of the city or diocese to which they belonged. But I have already had occasion to speak of this matter more fully in another place:⁸⁸ I shall therefore here only observe two or three mistakes committed by some modern authors in their descants upon the words of Bede, which are commonly alleged to prove the contrary. In one place Bede,⁸⁹ speaking of the isle of Huy, and the monastery founded there by Columba, says, The island was always governed by a presbyter abbot, under whose power the whole province, and the bishops also, were subjected after an unusual manner, pursuant to the example of the first founder, who was not a bishop, but only a presbyter and a monk. Carolus a Sancto Paulo⁹⁰ unluckily mistakes this island for Hibernia, and so makes all the bishops of Ireland subject to one abbot: others mistake the province for all Scotland, and so make the same false deduction in reference to that: whereas in truth Bede is speaking only of one small part of Scotland, the country of the Northern Picts, who were converted by Columba, in the time of King Bricius, who gave him the isle of Huy to build a monastery ⁷⁵ Socrat. lib. 4. c. 23. ⁷⁶ Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca. c. 40.

⁷⁷ Cassian. Collat. 2. c. 16. Vel plagis emendantur, vel expulsi purgantur.

⁷⁸ Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 6.

⁷⁹ Spondan. an. 1349. n. 2.

⁸⁰ Prateol. Elench. Hæret. lib. 6. c. 8.

⁸¹ Historia Flagellantium, Paris. 1700. 8vo.

⁸² Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. 1. p. 402.

⁸³ Conc. Chalced. Act. 1. t. 4. p. 230.

⁸⁴ Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. 2. p. 240.

⁸⁵ Chron. Saxon. an. 694.

⁸⁶ Conc. Chalced. can. 4. "Ἐδοξεν μηδένα μὲν μηδαμῶν οἰκοδομεῖν, μηδὲ συνιστᾶν μοναστήριον ἢ εὐκτήριον οἶκον παρὰ γνώμην τοῦ τῆς πόλεως ἐπισκόπου.

⁸⁷ Justin. Novel. 5. c. 1. Novel. 131. c. 7.

⁸⁸ Book II. chap. 4. sect. 2.

⁸⁹ Bed. Hist. lib. 3. c. 4. Habere autem solet ipsa insula rectorem semper abbatem presbyterum, cujus juri et omnis provincia et ipsi etiam episcopi ordine inusitato debeant esse subjecti, juxta exemplum primi doctoris illius, qui non episcopus, sed presbyter extitit et monachus.

⁹⁰ Carol. a S. Paulo, Geogr. Sacr. lib. 6. p. 170.

Sect. 14.
Yet always subordinate to the power of bishops.

in, whence that province of the Northern Picts became subject to the abbot of that monastery: but that this subjection was in spirituals Bede says not, but it seems to have been an acknowledgment of some civil jurisdiction over the bishops, which may very well consist with their superiority in spirituals, as the learned bishop of Worcester⁹¹ shows at large in his discourse of the Culdees among his antiquities of the British church. Another passage in Bede, which has been grossly mistaken, is where he speaks of the council of Herudford, anno 673. In one of the canons of this council, according to some corrupt printed copies of Bede, there is this decree, That the bishops⁹² who are monks, shall not wander from one monastery to another without leave of their abbot, but continue in that obedience which they promised at the time of their conversion. But this is nothing but a mere mistake of the first editors of Bede, who not minding the abbreviations of the manuscript, read episcopi monachi, instead of ipsi monachi, as some later editions rightly have it. So that there is nothing said in this place either for the exemption of monasteries, or in derogation of the episcopal power, as some seem wilfully to have mistaken. Yet I deny not but that before this time there might be some monasteries exempt. For Habertus is of opinion,⁹³ that the third council of Arles, anno 455, granted an exemption to Faustus, abbot of the monastery of Lerins, which he thinks was the first that was ever granted. But from that time the bishops of Rome took occasion to exempt monasteries in the West, as other patriarchs did in the East, whence such monasteries by the later Greeks are called patriarchal monasteries, as being exempt from episcopal visitations, and only subject to patriarchal jurisdiction.

But I return to the ancient monks; and having given an account of their bodily exercises, I proceed to speak of those that were spiritual. For the improvement of the spiritual life was the thing originally aimed at by men's retiring from the world. Here they thought they should have more leisure and better opportunities for the great business of repentance. Upon which account the life of a monk is, by St. Jerom⁹⁴ and others, so often styled the life of a mourner. And in allusion to this, the isle of Canobus near Alexandria, formerly a place of great lewdness, was upon the translation and settlement of the monks of Tabennesus there, called Insula Metanœa, the Isle of Repentance; as may be collected from St. Jerom, who speaks of its changing its name upon the building of a monastery there:⁹⁵ and so both Valesius and others understand it.⁹⁶

To their extraordinary repentance they usually joined extraordinary Sect. 16. Secondly, Extraordinary fasting. fasting. For the Egyptian monks kept every day a fast till nine o'clock, that is, till three in the afternoon, except on Saturdays and the Lord's day, and the fifty days of Pentecost, or other days when any brother came to visit them. For then they had their relaxations, as we learn from Cassian and St. Jerom. The fifty days of Pentecost they kept always festival in compliance with the public rules and practice of the catholic church, whose custom was, as Tertullian says,⁹⁷ to keep all the time between Easter and Whitsuntide festival in memory of our Saviour's resurrection. Therefore St. Jerom,⁹⁸ speaking of their daily fasts, says, They fasted every day alike throughout the year, except in Lent, when their fasts were a little more strict, that is, not only till nine o'clock, but till evening; and in Pentecost, when they turned their suppers into dinners, in compliance with the custom of the church. Cassian⁹⁹ often speaks of their daily fasts till nine, but then he excepts likewise the time of Pentecost¹⁰⁰ for the same reason assigned by St. Jerom; and Saturdays and Sundays also,¹⁰¹ because both these days were always festival in the Eastern church, being days of solemn assembly, on which they received the eucharist at morning service. Some indeed exercised themselves with greater austerities, fasting two, three, four, or five days together: but these were not generally approved. St. Jerom¹⁰² and Cassian¹⁰³ both express themselves against such immoderate fasts; and Cassian¹⁰⁴ particularly notes it as a wise saying of Macarius, the famous Egyptian, That a monk should so fast and keep under his body, as if he were to live a hundred years; but so kill and mortify the affections of his soul, as if he

Sect. 15.
The spiritual exercises of monks: First, Perpetual repentance.

⁹¹ Bp. Lloyd's Historical Account of Church Government, chap. 7. p. 180.

⁹² Bed. Hist. lib. 4. c. 5. Ut episcopi monachi non migrent de loco in locum, hoc est, de monasterio in monasterium, nisi per dimissionem proprii abbatis, sed in ea permaneant obedientia, quam tempore suæ conversionis promiserunt.

⁹³ Habert. Archierat. p. 595.

⁹⁴ Hieron. Ep. 53. ad Ripar. Monachus non docentis, sed plangentis habet officium.

⁹⁵ Hieron. Prolog. in Regul. Pachomii. In monasterio Metanœæ, quod de Canobo in penitentiam felici nominis conversione mutatum est, &c. Bibl. Patr. t. 15.

⁹⁶ Vales. Not. in Sozomen. lib. 3. c. 14.

⁹⁷ Tertul. de Coron. Mil. c. 3.

⁹⁸ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15. Jejunium totius anni æquale est, excepta quadragesima, in qua sola conceditur strictius vivere. A Pentecoste cœnæ mutantur in prandia, quo et traditioni ecclesiasticæ satisfiat, et ventrem cibo non onerate duplicato.

⁹⁹ Cassian. Collat. 2. c. 25 et 26. Collat. 19. c. 16. Collat. 21. c. 23.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid. 21. c. 11 et 20.

¹⁰¹ Ibid. 3. c. 1.

¹⁰² Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rusticum. Ep. 7. ad Lætam.

¹⁰³ Cassian. Instit. lib. 5. c. 9.

¹⁰⁴ Ibid. lib. 5. c. 41. Ita, inquit, debere monachum jejunii operam dare, ut centum annis in corpore duraturum, &c.

were to die the next moment. By which it appears, that they did not think excessive abstinence of any use, but rather a disservice to religion. And therefore St. Austin observes, that the ancient rules¹⁰⁵ imposed no absolute necessity in this matter upon them, but left it to every man's power and every man's will to fast at discretion; no one condemning others, that could not imitate his own austerities, but always remembering that the Scripture had above all things recommended charity to men. The Rule of Pachomius was said to be given him by an angel, and there one of the angel's directions to him was, that he should permit every man to eat and drink and labour according to his strength,¹⁰⁶ and neither forbid them to fast nor to eat. Accordingly Palladius tells us,¹⁰⁷ there were among his monks in Tabennesus some that eat at seven o'clock, others at nine, others at ten, others not till even; some after two days, others after three, four, or five days: but all was matter of choice, not compulsion.

Their fastings were accompanied with extraordinary and frequent returns of devotion. The monks of Palestine had six or seven canonical hours of prayer, so those in Mesopotamia and other parts of the East. These were morning prayer at the first hour of the day, then the third, sixth, and ninth hours, and after that the eleventh hour, which Cassian¹⁰⁸ calls the lucernaris hora, or evening prayer. Besides which they had their constant vigils, or nocturnal meetings, of which Cassian gives a particular account in one whole book¹⁰⁹ of his Institutions. But he says the monks of Egypt were not tied to all these canonical hours, but only met twice a day for public devotion, that is, in their night assemblies, which was their morning prayer; and at nine o'clock, which was their evening prayer: but then the whole day was spent in devotion notwithstanding; for in their private cells,¹¹⁰ whilst they were at work, they were always repeating the psalms and other parts of the Holy Scripture, and intermixing prayers and supplications continually with their labour. Which Cassian prefers before the observation of so many canonical hours, as being a more free and voluntary oblation. Some observed a course of constant devotion without intermission, as has been noted before¹¹¹ concerning the monks of Constantinople, and those of Lisieux¹¹² founded by Columbanus, who were used to divide themselves into several classes or quires to succeed and relieve one another in their continued stations. And Cassian tells us that the first monks¹¹³ of Egypt were used to observe such a perpetual watch, to guard themselves against the assaults and incursions of midnight devils: for they durst not all betake themselves to sleep at once, but while some slept, others kept watch by turns, and exercised themselves in singing psalms, reading, and prayer. Whence we may infer, that though all monks then did not observe precisely the canonical hours, yet they were no less constant to their devotions than those that did; and their intermixing prayers with their labour, or worshipping by turns, was equivalent to so many canonical hours, or rather did exceed it. St. Jerom seems also to say¹¹⁴ that the Egyptian monks had a sermon made by the abbot every day after evening prayer: for thus he describes their devotions: At nine o'clock they meet together, then the psalms are sung, and the Scriptures are read; and prayers being ended, they all sit down, and the father begins to discourse to them, whom they hear with the profoundest silence and veneration. His words make a deep impression on them, their eyes overflow with tears, and the speaker's commendation is the weeping of his hearers. Yet no one's grief expresses itself in any indecent strain; but when he comes to discourse of the kingdom of Christ, and future happiness, and the glory of the world to come, then one may observe, how each of them, with a moderate sigh, and eyes lift up to heaven, says within himself, Oh that I had wings like a dove, for then would I flee away and be at rest! This was their continual exercise of public devotion every day. Their private vacancies and intervals of labour were also spent in reading and prayer; for they daily learned some portion of Scripture, and more especially ¹⁰⁵ Aug. de Morib. Eccles. Cathol. c. 33. Inter hæc nemo urgetur in aspera, quæ ferre non potest; nulli quod recusat imponitur; nec ideo condemnatur a cæteris, quod in eis se imitandis fatetur invalidum, &c.

¹⁰⁶ Pachom. Reg. apud Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 38.

¹⁰⁷ Pallad. ibid. c. 39.

¹⁰⁸ Cassian. Instit. lib. 3. c. 3. In his horis etiam evangelicus ille paterfamilias operarios conduxit in vineam suam. Ita enim et ille primo mane conduxisse describitur, quod tempus designat matutinam nostram solennitatem: deinde tertia, inde sexta, post hæc nona, ad extremum undecima, in qua lucernaris hora signatur.

¹⁰⁹ Ibid. lib. 2.

¹¹⁰ Ibid. lib. 3. c. 2. Apud illos hæc officia, quæ Domino solvere per distinctiones horarum et temporis intervalla cum admonitione compulsoris adigimur, per totum diei spacium jugiter cum operis adjectione spontanea cele-brantur.—Quamobrem exceptis vespertinis horis ac nocturnis congregationibus, nulla apud eos per diem publica solennitas absque die sabbati vel Dominica celebratur, in quibus hora tertia sacræ communionis obtentu conveniunt.

¹¹¹ Chap. 2. sect. 10.

¹¹² Chap. 2. sect. 13.

¹¹³ Cassian. Collat. 7. c. 23. Ita dæmonum atrocitas grassabatur, et frequentes ac visibiles sentiebantur aggressus, ut non auderent omnes pariter noctibus obdormire, sed vicissim aliis degustantibus somnum, alii vigiliæ celebrantes, psalmis et orationibus seu lectionibus inhærebant.

¹¹⁴ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15. Manent separati, se junctis cellulis, usque ad horam nonam. Post horam nonam in commune concurrunt, psalmi resonant, Scripture recitantur ex more. Et completis orationibus, cunctisque residentibus, medius quem patrem vocant, incipit disputare, &c.

made it their meditation on the Lord's day, as St. Jerom observes of them in the forementioned place:¹¹⁵ insomuch that many of them became so expert and well versed in the Holy Scripture, that they could repeat it by heart: which is particularly noted of Hilarion by Sozomen and St. Jerom,¹¹⁶ and of Ammonius, Marcus junior, Eros, Serapion, Solomon, and some others by Palladius.¹¹⁷ And by this means they were qualified to entertain their souls with spiritual exercises, singing of David's Psalms, and repeating other parts of Scripture, even at their bodily labours. Which practice is often mentioned with great commendation by Palladius,¹¹⁸ Cassian,¹¹⁹ and St. Jerom, who takes occasion upon this account to extol the quiet retirement of Christ's little village of Bethlehem above the noisy pomp and ambitious greatness of Rome, where so much time was spent in seeing and being seen, in receiving visits and paying them, in praises and detractions, things disagreeable to the life of a monk: whereas, at Bethlehem¹²⁰ there was nothing to be heard but psalms: one could not go into the field, but he should hear the ploughman singing his hallelujahs, the sweating mower solacing himself with hymns, and the vine-dresser tuning David's Psalms. Thus the ancient monks joined their bodily and spiritual exercise together, and made their common labour become acts of devotion to God. Their times of eating and refreshment were managed after the same manner. In some places they had the Scriptures read at table; which, Cassian says, was first brought up¹²¹ in the monasteries of Cappadocia, to prevent idle discourse and contentions: but in Egypt they had no need of that remedy, for they were taught to eat their meat in silence. But when supper was ended, St. Jerom¹²² says, they sung a hymn, and so returned to their cells. St. Chrysostom¹²³ also takes notice of this, and recommends it to secular men, as proper for their imitation; reciting the hymn which they used, which is in these words: "Blessed God, that hast fed me from my youth, that givest food unto all flesh, fill our hearts with joy and gladness, that we, having always what is sufficient for us, may abound unto every good work, through Jesus Christ our Lord; to whom with thee and the Holy Ghost be glory, honour, and power, for ever. Amen. Glory be to thee, O Lord; glory be to thee, O Holy; glory be to thee, O King, who hast given us food for refreshment: fill our hearts with thy Holy Spirit, that we may be found acceptable in thy sight, and not be ashamed, when thou renderest to every man according to his works." Thus their ordinary refreshments, that is, their suppers, (for dinners, he says, they had none,) were sanctified with the word of God and prayer. And to express their humility, and avoid all contention about precedency and greatness, they served one another mutually at table, all of them taking their weekly turns: whence in Cassian¹²⁴ and St. Jerom¹²⁵ they are called hebdomadarii, week's-men, from their weekly service. On the Lord's day they were more intent upon their devotions, and spent it wholly upon reading and prayer. For no other employment, St. Jerom¹²⁶ says, was ever allowed among them on that day. Then every one received the communion, unless he was under some censure and suspension from it. And not only on Sundays, but on Saturdays also, it was customary for the Egyptian monks and others of the East to communicate. For the first and last day of the week were so appointed by Pachomius, the father of the Egyptian monks, to be communion days among them, as appears from his Rule¹²⁷ in Sozomen and Palladius. And Cassian frequently¹²⁸ speaks of it as their constant practice. Some were more strict, and let no day pass without receiving the eucharist: Palladius¹²⁹ says the Egyptian monks under Apollo observed this rule; for Apollo was used to instil this notion into his disciples, That a monk, if he had opportunity, ought to communicate every day; and accordingly he with his fraternity communicated every day at nine, or three o'clock in the afternoon, which was the time of their solemn assembly, before they went to their ordinary refreshment. Palladius¹³⁰ mentions one instance more of their devotion, which was only occasional, viz. their psalmody at the reception of any brethren: for that, it seems, was the first entertainment they gave them, to conduct them with singing of psalms to their habitation. Which has no relation to the processions of modern ages, but seems to be done in imitation of our Saviour's entrance and reception into Jerusalem.

These were the spiritual exercises of the ancient monks, whose life was

Sect. 18.
Of laws excluding monks from offices

¹¹⁵ Ibid. Dominicis diebus orationi tantum et lectionibus vacant: quod quidem et omni tempore completis opusculis faciunt. Quotidie aliquid de Scripturis dicitur.

¹¹⁶ Sozom. lib. 3. c. 14. Hieron. Vit. Hilarion. c. 7.

¹¹⁷ Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 12, 21, 29, 83, 96.

¹¹⁸ Pallad. ibid. c. 39.

¹¹⁹ Cassian. Instit. lib. II. c. 15.

¹²⁰ Hieron. Ep. 18. ad Marcel. In Christi villa tuta rusticitas est. Extra psalmos silentium est. Quocunque te verteris, arator stivam retinens alleluia decantat, sudans messor psalmis se advocat, &c.

¹²¹ Cassian. Instit. lib. 4. c. 17.

¹²² Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15. Nullus in cibo strepitus, nemo comedens loquitur.—Dehinc consurgunt pariter, et hymno dicto ad præsepia redeunt.

¹²³ Chrysost. Hom. 56. in Matth.

¹²⁴ Cassian. Instit. lib. 4. c. 19.

¹²⁵ Hieron. Prolog. ad Reg. Pachom. It. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15.

¹²⁶ Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15. Dominicis diebus orationi tantum et lectionibus vacant.

¹²⁷ Sozom. lib. 3. c. 14. Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 38.

¹²⁸ Cassian. Collat. 18. c. 15. Collat. 23. c. 21.

¹²⁹ Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 52. p. 985. ¹³⁰ Ibid. p. 984.

both ecclesiastical and civil.

a life of repentance, fasting, and devotion, which, joined with continual bodily labour, kept them always virtuously and honestly employed: and their laws did not allow them either to wander about as mendicants, or to interest themselves in civil or ecclesiastical offices, or any public affairs relating to church or state. There are three canons in the council of Chalcedon to this purpose. One indifferently¹³¹ forbids both clergymen and monks to take to farm any estate or office, or involve themselves in secular affairs, except they be unavoidably required by the law to take upon them the guardianship of minors. Another¹³² obliges monks particularly to live in their retirement, and to give themselves only to fasting and prayer, and not to leave their monasteries to engage themselves either in ecclesiastical or secular affairs, except the bishop of the city upon some urgent occasion permit them so to do. And a third canon¹³³ forbids both monks and clergy to take upon them any office, civil or military; anathematizing such as are guilty, and do not return to their first choice. So that monks were wholly excluded then from secular offices: and though some were called to ecclesiastical employments, yet then they were obliged to quit their monastery, and betake themselves wholly to a clerical life, only retaining so much of the former as would consist with the indispensable duties of the sacred function. Of these cases I have particularly spoken¹³⁴ in the foregoing chapter. But of monks continuing in their cloisters, and taking upon them at the same time the offices of the church, which did not concern their own monastery, we have scarce any instance in ancient history. Pope Pelagius, as he is cited by Gratian,¹³⁵ would not permit a monk to be a defensor, though that was but a low office in the church; because it was contrary to the state of a monastic life, which was to be spent in retirement, prayer, and bodily labour: whereas the office of a defensor was wholly taken up in hearing of causes, and other acts of a public and litigious nature, which were things inconsistent with one another. Till a monk therefore had first bid adieu to his monastery, he was not to be promoted to any such office in the church.

Much less were they then permitted to encroach upon the duties, or rights and privileges, of the secular clergy. For we find no complaints of this nature in ancient history, as too frequently in after ages. For the generality of monks being only laymen, and refusing any other subsistence or revenues but what arose out of their own labour, (as I have fully proved before,) they could have no temptation then to intermeddle either with the business and duties, or the maintenance and revenues of the clergy. And for such of them as were ordained presbyters or deacons, they were either only to serve their own monastery, or else such were taken out of monasteries by the bishops, and thenceforth reckoned among the secular clergy of the church. Valesius indeed is willing to have it thought otherwise: for he says,¹³⁶ in the latter end of the fourth century, it was very usual for monks to perform the offices of the clergy; and he alleges for proof the example of Eusebius Vercellensis and the church of St. Austin, which I have considered before,¹³⁷ and showed that they prove no more, but that some bishops and their clergy took up a way of living in common, in imitation of the monastic life, which is nothing to monks in cloisters intruding themselves into parochial cures. The only instance that looks any thing this way, is what Sozomen¹³⁸ relates of the church built by Ruffinus, the great statesman under Arcadius, at a place called Quercus, in the suburbs of Chalcedon, where, after he had built his church, he says, he placed some monks near it, whence the clergy of the church were supplied. But this may mean no more, but that when there wanted clergy in that church, they were to be chosen out of that neighbouring monastery, which indeed was then no unusual thing in the church: but that monks living in a monastery should perform Divine offices in other churches beside that of their own monastery, is not agreeable to ancient rules and practice. And therefore we meet with no instances of that kind, nor of tithes being received by monks, unless it was for the use of the poor; of which there is one instance in Cassian,¹³⁹ and besides that I do not remember any other. Their way of living upon their own labour made them not solicitous to receive any thing from other men, and therefore some of them would not receive maintenance from their own parents, as Cassian¹⁴⁰ relates of Antony, lest they should seem to live upon any thing that was not the work of their own hands.

Beside all this, there was another reason then why monks could not ordinarily attend parochial cures, had they been otherwise qualified for them. For by the laws of their first institution, in all parts of the East, their habitation was not to be

Sect. 19.
No monks anciently encroached on the duties or rights of the secular clergy.

to encroach upon the duties, or rights and privileges, of the secular clergy.

Sect. 20.
Not allowed at first to dwell in cities, but confined to the wilderness.

¹³¹ Conc. Chalced. can. 3.

¹³² Ibid. can. 4.

¹³³ Ibid. c. 7.

¹³⁴ Chap. 2. sect. 8.

¹³⁵ Gratian. Caus. 16. Quest. 1. c. 20. Omnimoda est illius habitus et istius officii diversitas. Illic enim quies, oratio, labor manuum: at hic causarum cognitio, conventiones, actus, publica litigia, &c.

¹³⁶ Vales. Not. in Sozom. lib. 8. c. 17.

¹³⁷ See chap. 2. sect. 8.

¹³⁸ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 17. Πλησίον δὲ μοναχῶν συνώκισεν, οἱ τῆς ἐκκλησίας κλήρον ἐπλήρου.

¹³⁹ Cassian. Collat. 21. c. 2.

¹⁴⁰ Ibid. 24. c. 12.

in cities, or places of public concourse, but in deserts and private retirements, where they might be sequestered from the noise of the world, and live in quiet and solitude, as their name seemed to imply. Whence St. Jerom, writing to Rusticus the monk, inveighs against those who were desirous¹⁴¹ to live in cities, which was contrary to that singularity they made profession of. And giving instructions to Paulinus, he says, If you desire to be really, what you are in name, that is, a solitary, or one that lives alone, what have you to do in cities,¹⁴² which are not habitations for solitaires, but the multitude? And it is observed both by him and Sozomen¹⁴³ of Antonius, that he was used to say, The wilderness was as natural to a monk, as water to a fish; and therefore a monk in a city was quite out of his element, like a fish upon dry land. By which it appears, that the monastic life in the first design was to exclude men from having any thing to do in cities and places of public concourse. And there are laws in both the Codes to the same purpose. Theodosius enacted, that all that made profession of the monastic life,¹⁴⁴ should be obliged by the civil magistrate to betake themselves to the wilderness and deserts, as their proper habitation. Baronius, by mistake, reckons¹⁴⁵ this law a punishment, and next to a persecution of the monks: but Gothofred¹⁴⁶ and Mr. Pagi¹⁴⁷ with better judgment correct his error, and observe with more truth, that it was so far from being a punishment, that it was only obliging them to live according to the rules of their first institution. Leo and Anthemius,¹⁴⁸ and after them Justinian, made laws to the same purpose, forbidding the Eastern monks to appear in cities; but if they had any business of concern to be transacted there, they should do it by their apocrisiarii or responsales, that is, their proctors or syndics, which every monastery was allowed for that purpose.

Not but that in some extraordinary cases they took liberty to dispense with this rule, when a just occasion required their appearance. As in times of common danger to the faith, or great persecutions, or when it seemed necessary for them to interpose with the magistrate, and intercede for criminals in special cases. Thus St. Jerom¹⁴⁹ observes of Antonius, that he came to Alexandria at the request of Athanasius, to give testimony and countenance to the catholic faith, and to confute the Arian heresy. Theodoret makes the like observation¹⁵⁰ upon the behaviour of Aphraates and Julian, two Syrian monks, who left their cells in the desert to live in Antioch, when their presence was thought necessary to support the catholic doctrine and its professors in the time of the Arian persecution under Valens. And of Aphraates he tells this remarkable story: that Valens once observing him to pass the streets in haste, though he was an old man, asked him, Whither he was going with so much speed? To whom he replied, I am going, sir, to pray for your empire. But, said Valens, it would more have become you to do that at home in your retirement, according to the laws of your solitary life. Yes, sir, said Aphraates, you say very true, I ought so to do, and I always did so, as long as my Saviour's sheep were in peace: but now that they are disquieted and brought into great danger, very necessity compels me to take another course for their safety, that they may not be torn in pieces by wild beasts. Were I a virgin, confined to a single room, it would not become me to sit still, when I saw my father's house on fire, but to run abroad, fetch water, and extinguish the flame. Now, this is our case. You, sir, have set fire to the house of our common Father, and we have left our cells with no small concern, and are come abroad to put it out. Thus bravely did Aphraates answer Valens, and apologize for his appearing in the city in the time of common danger, when Valens himself was the occasion of it. Nor was it only in defence of religion they thus made a public appearance, but sometimes they thought it necessary to come and intercede with the emperors and judges for condemned criminals. As Sozomen¹⁵¹ observes of Antonius, that he was frequently compelled by the complaints and lamentations of the distressed, to come and interpose his good offices with the princes and magistrates for them, and as soon as he had done, he returned to the wilderness again. The reader may find a more remarkable instance of this kind in one of St. Chrysostom's homilies¹⁵² to the people of Antioch, where he relates how the city was delivered from imminent ruin (being under the displeasure of Theodosius for having demolished the imperial statues, and committing other crimes of a high nature) by the intercession of the neighbouring monks, who left their tabernacles and caves in the mountains, and came into the city, (when other philosophers for fear were fled out of it,) and interceding with the judges, prevailed with them to spare the criminals;

Sect. 21.
What exceptions that rule admitted
of.

¹⁴¹ Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Quid desideramus urbium frequentiam, qui de singularitate censemur?

¹⁴² Ep. 13. ad Paulin. Si cupis esse quod diceris, id est solus: quid facis in urbis, quæ utique non sunt solorum habitacula, sed multorum?

¹⁴³ Sozom. lib. 1. c. 13.

¹⁴⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 3. de Monachis. Leg. 1. Quinque sub professione monachi reperiuntur, deserta loca et vastas solitudines sequi atque habitare jubeantur.

¹⁴⁵ Baron. an. 390. n. 48.

¹⁴⁶ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 3. Leg. 1.

¹⁴⁷ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 390. n. 10.

¹⁴⁸ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Episc. Leg. 29. It. Novel. 123. c. 42.

¹⁴⁹ Hieron. Ep. 33. ad Castruc.

¹⁵⁰ Theodor. lib. 4. c. 26 et 27.

¹⁵¹ Sozom. lib. 1. c. 13.

¹⁵² Chrys. Hom. 17. ad Pop. Antioch. p. 215.

telling them, that the images of the emperor might easily be restored to their pristine beauty, and be set up again; but if they slew the images of God, it would be impossible to raise them up again, since it was beyond the art of man to join body and soul together: and if they would not hearken to their intercession, they should execute them too; for if it must be so, they were resolved to die with them. After this manner they were used to intercede with the judges for criminals in some such special cases as this before us. And they commonly did it with such prevalency, that they seldom failed in their petition, the magistracy expressing a particular reverence to them upon such occasions. But afterward this thing grew into abuse, and they would not be content to petition, but would sometimes come in great bodies or troops, per drungos, and by force deliver criminals, after sentence of condemnation was passed upon them. To repress which tumultuous way of proceeding, Arcadius the emperor was forced to publish a law¹⁵³ strictly forbidding both the monks and clergy to attempt any such thing, and commanding all bishops to prosecute the authors of such disorders, if any monks happened to be so engaged in their districts, under pain of his royal displeasure.

There remains but one inquiry more to be made concerning this order of men, which is, whether such as made profession of the monastic life, were afterward at liberty to alter their state as they thought convenient, and turn seculars again? To which it may be answered, that they were under no public vow to the contrary: many men embraced the life, who never intended to continue all their days in it. Julian himself was once in the monastic habit, to please his cousin Constantius, who began to suspect his inclination toward the philosophy of the Gentiles. Socrates says of him, that he assumed¹⁵⁴ the tonsure, and feigned the life of a monk in public, whilst he privately resorted to the lectures of Libanius the sophist. And Orosius observes the same¹⁵⁵ of Constans the son of Constantine, who usurped the empire in Britain in the time of Honorius, that he was first a monk before his father made him Cæsar, and sent him into Spain to promote his interest there. These men had no need of the pope's dispensation to set them at liberty from their vow; for it does not appear they were ever under any such obligation. Monasteries were anciently schools of learning, and places of pious and religious education of youth: which, though Bellarmine¹⁵⁶ thinks fit to deny it, is evidently proved from St. Chrysostom's third book¹⁵⁷ against the defamers of the monastic life, which is chiefly spent in advising parents to send their children to be educated in monasteries, as the safest places of good education; not with a design to oblige them always to continue in the monastic life, but only to train them up and settle them securely in the ways of virtue. And to the same purpose it is observed by Palladius, that the monks of Mount Nitria¹⁵⁸ had a xenodochium or hospital, where, for a week, they entertained any one that came to them, without working; if he continued longer, they set him either to work at some bodily labour, or to study: and so employed he might continue a year, or two or three, among them, till he saw his own time to depart from them. This Palladius¹⁵⁹ calls ἄσκησις γραφικὴ, the exercise of letters, in opposition to that of bodily labour. So that men might enter a monastery for the sake of study, and leave it again when they pleased, if they laid upon themselves no further obligation. And they who tied up themselves stricter, and entered the monastic life with a design to continue in it, were never under any vow, unless a private resolution might be esteemed such, which might be altered at pleasure, especially if any unforeseen case or accident seemed to require a change in their way of living. As Cassian¹⁶⁰ tells of one in Egypt, who despairing to obtain the gift of continency, was preparing to enter into a married state, and return to a secular life again. The Rule of Pachomius, by which the Egyptian monks were governed, has nothing of any vow at their entrance, nor any punishment for such as deserted their station afterward: and there was one piece of discipline among the Egyptians, which I have mentioned before, that seems plainly to intimate that they were under no solemn vow; for one of their punishments was expulsion out of the monastery, which is inconsistent with a vow of continuing in a monastery for ever. So that at first the monastic life seems to have been a matter of free choice, not only at men's first entrance, but in their progress and continuance also; and men might quit it without any other punishment, unless it were a note of inconstancy fixed upon them.

However, this is certain, that monks who betook themselves to a married state, were not anciently obliged by

Sect. 22.
Whether monks might betake themselves to a secular life again.

¹⁵³ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 40. de Pœnis. Leg. 16. Addictos supplicio, nulli clericorum vel monachorum, eorum etiam quos cœnobitas vocant, per vim atque usurpationem vindicare liceat ac tenere, &c.

¹⁵⁴ Socrat. lib. 3. c. 1. Ἐν χρώτῳ κειράμενος, τὸν τῶν μοναχῶν ὑπεκρίνετο βίον.

¹⁵⁵ Oros. Hist. lib. 7. c. 40. Constantinus Constantem filium suum, proh dolor, ex monacho Cæsarem factum—in Hispanias misit.

¹⁵⁶ Bellarm. de Monachis, lib. 2. c. 6.

¹⁵⁷ Chrysost. advers. Vituperatores Vitæ Monast. lib. 3. t. 4. p. 499.

¹⁵⁸ Pallad. Hist. Lausiæ. c. 6.

¹⁵⁹ Pallad. ibid. c. 14.

¹⁶⁰ Cassian. Collat. 2. c. 13. Ut quia monachus esse non posset, nec refrænare stimulos carnis, et impugnationis remedia consequi prævaleret, uxorem duceret, ac relicto monasterio revertetur ad sæculum.

Sect. 23.
Marriage of monks anciently not annulled.

any law to dissolve their marriage, and put away their wives, under pretence of any preceding obligation, according to the new rules of the council of Trent,¹⁶¹ which pronounces such marriages null and void. In St. Austin's time some virgins and widows were under the obligation of a vow; yet if they married after that, he says, they were not to be separated¹⁶² from their husbands as adulteresses: for their marriage was true marriage, and not adultery, as some falsely argued. He says, They offended highly in breaking their vow, but yet their marriage was valid; and in that case to separate them from their husbands, was only to make their husbands adulterers in marrying others while their wives were living. By parity of reason, then, the marriage of monks must be esteemed valid also, even supposing them under an equal obligation. And upon this account we find no instances of dissolving marriage in such cases left upon record in ancient history.

Yet in process of time, because monks were presumed to be under some private obligation by assuming this way of living, some punishments were thought of, as proper to be inflicted on such as relinquished their station and returned to a secular life again. By the first council of Orleans, a monk that had entered himself in a monastery,¹⁶³ if he afterwards married a wife, was for ever after incapable of holy orders, but no other censure is passed upon him. St. Austin was for inflicting the same punishment on such as left their monastery without their own bishop's leave, as appears from his letter to Aurelius,¹⁶⁴ bishop of Carthage, upon that subject. The civil law likewise excludes deserters from the privilege of ordination: for by a law of Honorius,¹⁶⁵ they were to be delivered up to the curia, or civil court of the city, there to serve all their lives; by which means they were rendered incapable of any office in the church, because curial and clerical offices were inconsistent with one another, as has been showed at large¹⁶⁶ in another place. Justinian added another punishment, that if they were possessed of any substance, it should all be forfeited to the monastery¹⁶⁷ which they deserted, while they themselves should be obliged to serve personally among the officials of the judge of the province where they lived. For by this time monasteries began to have estates and possessions in some places, though the most exact rules of the Egyptian monks were against it. The censures of the church were likewise inflicted on deserting monks in the fifth century. Spalatensis¹⁶⁸ thinks the first council that ever decreed excommunication against them, was the fourth council of Toledo¹⁶⁹ under Honorius, anno 633. But did not advert to a former canon of the council of Chalcedon, made near two hundred years before, which decreed, that neither virgins consecrated to God, nor monks,¹⁷⁰ should marry; and such as did so, should be excommunicated: only the bishop of the place might moderate the censure. That is, if I rightly understand that canon, which is by some mistaken, he might shorten the term of their penance at his discretion; which was the only way of granting indulgences in the primitive church. And from hence again it appears, that when it was thought a crime for a monk to marry, yet they did not think it a nullity when done, or presume to void it upon that score, but only oblige him to do penance for such a term as the bishop should think fit to impose upon him. And I suppose the canons of St. Basil,¹⁷¹ and the council of Trullo,¹⁷² which speak of a penance of seven years or more, are to be understood with this limitation.

I have now put together all that I could think material to be said upon this subject of the monastic life: and some perhaps will think I have said too much, and others too little upon it: but I content myself to have said so much as seemed necessary to my own design, which was to give an account of ancient customs, and explain several laws and rules of the church. They whose curiosity leads them further, may easily have recourse to Cassian's Institutions and Collations, and Palladius's Historia Lausiaca, and Theodoret's Philotheus or Religious History, books written particularly upon this subject by professed admirers of the monastic life. My method now leads me to say something briefly of the virgins and widows, that were also reckoned among the ascetics of the church.

¹⁶¹ Conc. Trident. Sess. 24. can. 9.

¹⁶² Aug. de Bono Viduitat. c. 10. Qui dicunt talium nuptias, non esse nuptias, sed potius adulteria, non mihi videntur satis acute ac diligenter considerare quid dicant. Fallit eos quippe similitudo veritatis, &c.

¹⁶³ Conc. Aurel. l. c. 21. Monachus in monasterio conversus, si pellici postea vel uxori fuerit sociatus, tantæ prævaricationis reus, nunquam ecclesiastici gradus officium sortiatur.

¹⁶⁴ Aug. Ep. 76. ad Aurel. Ordini clericorum fit indignissima injuria, si desertores monasteriorum ad militiam clericatus eligantur, &c.

¹⁶⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. Leg. 39. Si qui professum sacræ religionis sponte dereliquerit, continuo sibi eum curia vindicet, &c.

¹⁶⁶ Book IV. chap. 4. sect. 4.

¹⁶⁷ Justin. Novel. 5. c. 6. Si relinquens monasterium, ad quandam veniat militiam, aut ad aliam vitæ figuram: substantia ejus in monasterio remanet, ipse inter officiales clarissimi provincie judicis maneat, &c. It. Cod. lib. 1. Tit. 3. Leg. 56.

¹⁶⁸ Spalat. de Repub. lib. 2. cap. 12. n. 48.

¹⁶⁹ Conc. Tolet. 4. c. 55.

¹⁷⁰ Conc. Chalced. can. 16.

¹⁷¹ Basil. can. 60.

¹⁷² Conc. Trull. c. 44.

CHAPTER IV.

THE CASE AND STATE OF VIRGINS AND WIDOWS
IN THE ANCIENT CHURCH.

As I have showed before that there were ascetics in the church long before there were any monks; so it must here be noted, that there were virgins who made public and open profession of virginity, before the monastic life or name was known in the world. This appears from the writings of Cyprian and Tertullian, who speak of virgins dedicating themselves to Christ before there were any monasteries to receive them. These for distinction's sake are sometimes called ecclesiastical virgins by the writers of the following ages, Sozomen¹ and others, to distinguish them from such as embraced the monastic life, after monasteries began to multiply in the world. The ecclesiastical virgins were commonly enrolled in the canon or matricula of the church, that is, in the catalogue of ecclesiastics, as we learn from Socrates,² who speaks of them under that title: and hence they were sometimes called canonicae, canonical virgins, from their being registered in the canon or books of the church. They differed from the monastic virgins chiefly in this, that they lived privately in their fathers' houses, and had their maintenance from their fathers, or in cases of necessity from the church; but the other lived in communities and upon their own labour, as we learn from the third council of Carthage³ and the writings of St. Austin.⁴ Spalatensis long ago observed this difference,⁵ and it is since acknowledged by Albaspinæus,⁶ Valesius,⁷ Cotelierius,⁸ and other learned men of the Romish church. So that it is now out of dispute, that as the ascetics for the first three hundred years were not monks, so neither were the sacred virgins of the church monastical virgins, or nuns confined to a cloister, as in after ages.

If it be inquired how these were distinguished from other virgins, that

Sect. 2.
Whether they were under any pro-

¹ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 23. Παρθένοι ἐκκλησιαστικαί.

² Socrat. lib. 1. c. 17. Τὰς παρθένας τὰς ἀναγεγραμμένας ἐν τῷ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν κανόνι, &c.

³ Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 33. Ut virgines sacrae, si parentibus, a quibus custodiebantur, privatae fuerint, episcopi providentia vel presbyteri, si episcopus absens est, in monasterio virginum gravioribus fœminis commendentur, &c.

⁴ Aug. de Morib. Eccles. c. 31. Lanificio corpus exercent, atque sustentant, vestesque ipsas fratribus tradunt, ab iis invicem quod victui opus est resumentes.

⁵ Spalat. de Repub. lib. 2. c. 11. n. 25.

⁶ Albaspin. Not. in Conc. Eliber. can. 13.

⁷ Vales. Not. in Sozom. lib. 8. c. 23.

⁸ Cotelier. Not. in Constitut. Apost. lib. 8. c. 13.

Fell, Not. in Cyp. Ep. 4. Animi proposito et publica were merely secular; I conceive it profession of perpetual virginity. was by some sort of profession of their intention to continue in that state all their lives; but whether that was a solemn vow, or a simple profession, is not agreed among learned writers. The learned editor⁹ of St. Cyprian reckons they were under no obligation of any formal vow in the age of Cyprian, but yet were some way bound by the resolution and purpose of their own mind, and the public profession of virginity: and in this he seems to speak not only the common sense of protestant writers, but the sense of that ancient author,¹⁰ who says, They dedicated themselves to Christ, yet so as that if either they would not or could not persevere, it was better for them to marry than to burn, or to be cast into fire for their offences, as his words may literally be translated. From whence it may be collected, that then the profession of virginity was not so strict, as to make marrying after be thought a crime worthy of ecclesiastical censure.

But in the following ages the censures of the church were inflicted on them. The council of Ancyra¹¹ determined universally against all such as, having professed virginity, afterward went against their profession, that they should be subjected to the same term of penance as digamists were used to be; that is, a year or two, as we learn from one of the canons of St. Basil.¹² The council of Chalcedon¹³ orders them to be excommunicated if they married, but leaves the term of their penance to the bishop's discretion. The council of Valence in France is still more severe, forbidding¹⁴ them to be immediately admitted to penance; and when they were admitted, unless they made full and reasonable satisfaction to God, their restoration to communion was still to be deferred. Now, from these canons, to mention no more, it evidently appears, that in the following ages next after the time of Cyprian, that is, in the fourth and fifth centuries, the censures of the church were severer against the marriage of professed virgins than they were before: and they seem to have risen in proportion to the esteem and value which men began to set upon celibacy and the monastic life.

Sect. 3.
When first made liable to the censures of the church for marrying against their profession.

virginitatis professione, non voto astrictæ.

⁹ Cyp. Ep. 62. al. 4. ad Pompon. Si ex fide se Christo dicaverunt, pudice et caste sine ulla fabula perseverant; ita fortes et stabiles præmium virginitatis expectent. Si autem perseverare nolunt, vel non possunt; melius est nubant, quam in ignem delictis suis cadant.

¹¹ Conc. Ancyr. can. 19. Ὅσοι παρθεναίαν ἐπαγγελλόμενοι, ἀξεπούσι τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν, τὸν τῶν διγύμων ὄρον ἐκπιροῦτωσαν.

¹² Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 4. ¹³ Conc. Chalced. can. 16.

¹⁴ Conc. Valentin. cap. 2. De puellis, quæ se Deo voverunt, si ad terrenas nuptias sponte transierint, id custodiendum esse decrevimus, ut pœnitentia his non statim detur: et cum data fuerit, nisi plene satisfecerint Deo, in quantum ratio poposcerit, eandem communio differatur.

Yet two things are very observable amidst all the severity and rigour of those ages : first, that there never was any church decree for rescinding, or pronouncing null, such marriages. The emperor Jovian, indeed, as Sozomen relates,¹⁵ made it a capital crime by law for any one to commit a rape upon a devoted virgin, or so much as to solicit her to forsake her present state of life, and forego her resolution and purpose : which law is still extant in both the Codes.¹⁶ But then, as Valesius himself rightly observes, this law was only made against ravishers, and such as solicited those virgins to marry against their own will : but if a virgin did voluntarily quit her purpose and station, and then marry after that, there was nothing in this law¹⁷ to prohibit her, much less to punish her for so doing. And for the laws of the church, though they appointed a spiritual punishment, yet they did not cancel or disannul the act, but confirmed and ratified such marriages, though done against the rules then prevailing in the church. Of which the testimony of St. Austin,¹⁸ alleged before in the last chapter, sect. 23, is abundant proof: not to mention the silence of all ancient laws in the case, which speak of no other punishment beside excommunication, and penance as the consequent of that, in order to be received into the communion of the church again. Epiphanius¹⁹ is very express and particular in the case, that if any professing virginity fell from their state by fornication, they had better marry publicly according to the laws, and then submit themselves to a course of penance, in order to obtain the communion of the church again, rather than live perpetually exposed to the secret darts of the devil. Which, I think, he would not have said, had it then been the custom of the church to disannul the marriages of professed virgins, under pretence of any preceding vow or obligation.

The other thing proper to be considered in this case, is, that by the imperial laws great liberty and indulgence was granted to all virgins that were consecrated before the age of forty. For though some canons²⁰ allowed them to be consecrated at twenty-five, and others²¹ at sixteen or

^{Sect. 5.}
Liberty granted by some laws to marry, if they were consecrated before the age of forty.

¹⁵ Sozom. lib. 6. c. 3.

¹⁶ Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 3. Leg. 5. Si quis non dicam rapere, sed attentare tantum jungendi causa matrimonii sacratissimas virgines ausus fuerit, capitali pœna feriat. Vid. Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 25. de Raptu Sanctimonialium, Leg. 2.

¹⁷ Vales. Not. in Sozom. lib. 6. c. 3. Lex Joviani adversus raptore virginum lata est; sed si sanctimonialis relicto proposito postea nubere voluisset, non prohibebatur hac lege.

¹⁸ Aug. de Bono Viduit. c. 8, 9, 10.

¹⁹ Epiphan. Her. 61. Apostolic.

²⁰ Conc. Carthag. 3. can. 4. ²¹ Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 18.

seventeen, which were reckoned to be years of discretion; yet time quickly showed, that neither of those terms were so conveniently fixed as they might be: and therefore other canons required virgins to be forty years old²² before they were veiled, as may be seen particularly in the French and Spanish councils of Agde and Saragossa. And the imperial laws not only required that age in consecrated virgins, but further decreed, That if any virgin was veiled before that age, either by the violence or hatred of her parents, (which was a case that often happened,) she should have liberty to marry: as appears from the Novel of Leo and Majorian²³ at the end of the Theodosian Code, which says, That no virgin in such circumstances should be judged sacrilegious, who by her honest marriage declared, that either she never intended to take upon her any such vow, or at least was not able to fulfil it: forasmuch as the doctrine and institutes of the Christian religion have declared, that it is better for a virgin to marry, than to burn, and forfeit her virtue by leading an unchaste life, after she has made profession of virginity. Now, if these two things be rightly considered, first, that the consecration of a virgin was not to be reputed valid, till she was forty years of age: and, secondly, that if she married after her consecration at that age, yet her marriage was then reputed valid, and never disannulled; there will appear a very wide difference between the practice of the ancient church, and that of the church of Rome in this matter: for which reason I have spoken distinctly of this profession of virgins, both to explain the nature of their vow, and show the measures of its obligation.

As to their consecration itself, it had some things very peculiar in it. For it was usually performed publicly in the church, and that with some solemnity, by the bishop himself, or at least some presbyter particularly deputed by the bishop for that purpose. For by the ancient canons, this act among others was reserved to the office of the supreme minister of the church, and therefore a presbyter without his commission or leave was not to intermeddle in it. The sixth canon in the African Code²⁴ seems universally to prohibit presbyters these three things,

^{Sect. 6.}
Of their habit, and form, and manner of consecration.

²² Conc. Agathen. can. 19. Sanctimoniales, quantumlibet vita earum et mores probati sint, ante annum ætatis suæ quadragesimum non velentur. Conc. Cæsaraugust. can. 8. Non velandas esse virgines, quæ se Deo voverunt, nisi quadraginta annorum probata ætate, &c.

²³ Leo et Majorian, Novel. 8. Neque enim sacrilega judicanda est, quæ se hoc ante noluisse, aut certe non posse complere adpetiti conjugii honestate prodiderit; cum Christianæ religionis instituta atque doctrina melius esse censuerit virginem nubere, quam impatientiæ ardore naturali professæ pudicitia non servare virtutem.

²⁴ Cod. Afric. c. 6. Κορών καθίρωσις ἀπό πρεσβυτέρων μή γίνηται, &c.

the making of chrisin, the public reconciliation of penitents, and the consecration of virgins. But this last point is to be interpreted by what is said in the third council of Carthage, that a presbyter is not to consecrate a virgin without²⁵ the bishop's leave. Which implies, that he might do it by his direction. And so Ferrandus in his Abbreviation²⁶ understands it. So that this was one of those things which bishops thought fit to reserve to themselves in those times, and did not allow their presbyters, without special direction, to perform it. Whence I conclude, it was a thing esteemed of some weight, and the bishop's character was concerned in it, to use an exact caution in the consecrating of virgins, as St. Ambrose²⁷ words it, that nothing might be done rashly to the dishonour of the church. Now, when a virgin had signified her purpose to the bishop, and her desire of the usual consecration, she was wont to come and make a public profession of her resolution in the church; and then the bishop, or presbyter appointed at the altar, put upon her the accustomed habit of sacred virgins, by which they were known and distinguished from all others. The matter is thus represented by St. Ambrose, who, speaking of his sister Marcellina, who was consecrated at Rome by Liberius, says, that on Christmas day,²⁸ in St. Peter's church, she signified the profession of virginity by the change of her habit, Liberius making an exhortation or discourse of her, suitable to the occasion, containing the duty of virgins, which the reader may find there recorded. This change of habit is frequently²⁹ mentioned in the ancient councils, and the civil law also takes notice of it, forbidding³⁰ all mimics and lewd women the public use of such habit, as was worn by virgins consecrated to God. Which implies plainly, that such virgins were known by some particular habit peculiar to themselves. One part of this was a veil, called the sacrum velamen, whence the phrase, Velare virginem,³¹ To veil a virgin, is the same as consecrating her to God, in some ancient writers. Though I must note, that Tertullian's book de Velandis Virginibus, is not so to be understood:

for he writes not to devoted virgins, but to all virgins in general, persuading them to use the grave habit of matrons, that is, to go veiled, according to the apostle's direction. Whence we must say, that the veil of consecrated virgins had some note of distinction from the common veil of others, and thereupon the name of sacred affixed to it, because it was a token or indication of their resolution. Optatus particularly observes this of another part of their habit, which he calls their purple and golden mitre. He says, they did not use it for any sacrament or mystery, but only as a badge of distinction, and to signify to whose service they belonged, that no one might pretend to ravish, or so much as court them. And therefore he blames³² the Donatists for their blind and mad zeal in making the virgins of Christ do penance, and cast away their veils, and change their mitres, which were only innocent tokens of their profession. Eusebius takes notice of the same habit under the name of coronet: for speaking of one Ennathas, a virgin of Scythopolis in Palestine, who suffered martyrdom in the Diocletian persecution, he says of her,³³ that she was adorned with the coronet of virginity; alluding to what Optatus calls their golden riband or little mitre; unless he speaks metaphorically, and means the crown of virginity added to the crown of martyrdom in another world, of both which great things are often said in the ancient writers. Albaspinus³⁴ thinks Optatus speaks of another custom, which, he says, is still in use in the consecration of virgins, which is untying the hair, as was customary in secular marriages, in token of the woman's subjection to her husband. But Optatus's words³⁵ seem only to be a bare allusion to that secular custom: for the marriage of virgins to Christ was only figurative, or, as he words it, spiritual and heavenly; and, consequently, the custom referred to must be understood to be of the same nature, that is, not real and proper, but figurative only; which seems to be most agreeable to the mind of the author. Baronius³⁶ and Habertus³⁷ express themselves patrons of another custom, which began to creep in ²⁵ Conc. Carthag. 3. c. 36. Ut presbyter inconsulto episcopo virgines non consecret, chrisma vero nunquam conficiat.

²⁶ Ferrand. Breviat. Canonum, c. 91.

²⁷ Ambros. de Virgin. lib. 3. p. 121. Neque ego abnuo, sacerdotalis esse cautionis debere, ut non temere puella veletur.

²⁸ Ambros. de Virgin. lib. 3. p. 112. Cum in salvatoris natali, ad apostolum Petrum, virgininitas professionem vestis quoque mutatione signares, &c. Vid. Ambros. ad Virginem Lapsam, c. 5.

²⁹ Conc. Carthag. 4. can. 12 et 101. Conc. Arausic. 1. c. 27.

³⁰ Lex Arcadii in Cod. Justin. lib. 1. Tit. 4. de Episc. Audient. Leg. 4. Mimæ et quæ ludibrio corporis sui quæstum faciunt, publice habitu earum virginum, quæ Deo dicatæ sunt, non utantur. Vid. Cod. Th. lib. 15. Tit. 17. Leg. 12.

³¹ Innoc. Ep. 2. ad Victric. c. 13. Hæc vero quæ necdum sacro velamine tectæ, &c. Gelas. Ep. 9. ad Episc. Lucaiæ, c. 12.

³² Optat. cont. Parmen. lib. 6. p. 96. Jam illud quam stultum, quam vanum, ut virgines Christi agerent pœnitentiam, ut jamdudum professæ signa voluntatis capitibus, postea vobis jubentibus, immutarent; ut mitellas aureas projicerent, alias acciperent, &c.

³³ Euseb. de Martyr. Palæst. c. 9. Παρθενίας στέμματα καὶ αὐτῇ κεκοσμημένη.

³⁴ Albaspin. Not. in Optat. lib. 6. p. 159.

³⁵ Optat. lib. 6. p. 97. Spiritale nubendi hoc genus est: in nuptias sponsi jam venerant voluntate et professione sua, et ut sæcularibus nuptiis se renunciassent monstrarent, spiritali sponso solverant crimem, jam cœlestes celebraverant nuptias. Quid est quod eas iterum crines solvere coegistis?

³⁶ Baron. an. 57. n. 93. ³⁷ Habert. Archieratic. p. 598.

among some, but was never allowed or approved by the catholic church. Eustathius the heretic was for having all virgins shorn or shaven at their consecration: but the council of Gangra immediately rose up against him, and anathematized the practice, passing a decree in these words, If any woman,³⁸ under pretence of an ascetic life, cut off her hair, which God hath given her for a memorial of subjection, let her be anathema, as one that disannuls the decree of subjection. Habertus and Baroni- us pretend that this decree was made only against married women and seculars, and not such as betook themselves to a monastic life; but the words of the canon are positively against such as did it upon pre- tence that they were entered upon an ascetic, or, as some call it, a religious life; and Valesius³⁹ ingenu- ously confesses this to be the true sense of the can- on, proving hence, that anciently the sacred virgins were not shaven: as neither were they in France to the time of Carolus Calvus, as he shows from other canons, citing Hugo Menardus⁴⁰ for the same opi- nion. But the council of Gangra was not of suffi- cient force to repress this custom in all places: for in St. Jerom's time it prevailed in some monasteries of Syria and Egypt, though upon another principle, of cleanliness, not religion, as appears⁴¹ from his epis- tle against Sabinian the deacon: yet it did not pre- vail every where in Egypt in the days of Athanasius; for Sozomen,⁴² giving an account of the barbarous usage which the holy virgins met with from the heathen at Heliopolis, says, they added this indig- nity above all, that they shaved them also. Which plainly implies, that it was not then any approved custom of the church. Nor did it ever prevail by any law; for Theodosius the Great added a civil sanction⁴³ to confirm the ecclesiastical decree made against it, commanding all women, that under pretence of their profession cut off their hair, to be cast out of the church, and not to be allowed to partake of the holy mysteries, or make their supplications at the altar; and further laid the penalty both of deposition and excommunication upon any bishop that should admit such women to communion. From all which it manifestly ap- pears, that the pretended tonsure of virgins and widows was anciently no allowed custom of the church, but rather an abuse, which both the civil and ecclesiastical laws endeavoured to correct and exterminate, however it came to prevail in the con- trary practice of later ages. The Ordo Romanus has also a long form of prayer, and the ceremony of a ring and a bracelet at their consecration; but the ancient liturgies having nothing of this, their silence seems to be an argument against the an- tiquity of them. And lest any one should think the virgins were ordained to some special office in the church, as the deaconesses were, it is particu- larly remarked by the author of the Constitutions,⁴⁴ that their consecration was not an ordination; and therefore imposition of hands, for aught that I can find, was not any ancient ceremony belonging to it. I must note further, that as the society of virgins was of great esteem in the church, so they had some particular honours paid to them.

Virgins and widows were common- ly excused capitation money together with the clergy,⁴⁵ by the imperial laws of Valentinian and others. Their persons were sacred; and severe laws were made against any that should presume to offer the least violence to them; banishment, and proscription, and death, were the ordinary punishments⁴⁶ of such offenders. Con- stantine paid them a particular respect, by charging his own coffers and exchequer with their main- tenance. And his mother, Helena,⁴⁷ was used to entertain them herself, and wait upon them at her own table. The church gave them also a share in her own revenues, and assigned them by way of re- spect a particular place or apartment in the house of God, whither, as St. Ambrose says,⁴⁸ the most noble and religious matrons were to resort with some earnestness to receive their salutations and embraces. But of this I shall have occasion to dis- course further in the next book, when I come to treat of churches, and the distinct places of every order in them.

I have but one thing more to ob- serve, which relates to an ancient name of these virgins, νονις and νον- να, whence I presume comes our English name,

Sect. 7. Of some privileges bestowed on them.

Sect. 8. Of the name νονις and νοννα, and its signification.

³⁸ Conc. Gangr. can. 17. Εἰ τις γυναικῶν διὰ τὴν νομιζομένην ἀσκησιν ἀποκείροιο τὰς κόμας, ὡς ἔδωκεν ὁ Θεὸς εἰς ὑπόμνησιν τῆς ὑποταγῆς, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω.

³⁹ Vales. Not. in Sozomen. lib. 5. c. 10. Porro sciendum est, sacras virgines olim intonsas fuisse, ut constat ex concilio Gangrensi. Idque etiam in Gallia usitatum fuit temporibus Caroli Calvi, ut docet canon. 7. Concilii in Verno Palatio.

⁴⁰ Menard. Not. in Sacramental. Gregor.

⁴¹ Hieron. Ep. 48. cont. Sabinian. Moris est in Ægyptiis et Syris monasteriis, ut tam virgo quam vidua, quæ se Deo devoverint, et sæculo renunciantes omnes delicias sæculi conculcarint, mundanum crinem monasteriorum matribus offerant desecandum, &c.

⁴² Sozom. lib. 5. c. 10. Τὸ τελευταῖον ἀνέκειρον αὐτὰς.

⁴³ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 27. Feminae quæ crimem suum, contra Divinas humanasque leges, instinctu persuasæ professionis, absciderint, ab ecclesiæ foribus arceantur: non illis fas sit sacra adire mysteria, neque ullis supplicationibus mereantur veneranda omnibus altaria frequentare. Adeo quidem, ut episcopus, tonso capite fe- minam si introire permiserit, dejectus loco etiam ipse cum hujusmodi contuberniis arceatur.

⁴⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 24. Παρθένους οὐ χειροτονεῖται, &c.

⁴⁵ Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 10. de Censu, Leg. 4.

⁴⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 25. de Raptu Sanctimon. Leg. 2 et 3.

⁴⁷ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 17.

⁴⁸ Ambros. ad Virgin. Lapsam, c. 6.

nun. Moniales, and ascetriae, and sanctimoniales, are common names for them in ancient writers. St. Jerom once uses the name nonnae, and Palladius of Meursius's edition,⁴⁹ νονίς, but in Fronto Ducæus's edition it is γαυῆς, an old woman. Hospinian⁵⁰ says it is an Egyptian name, and signifies a virgin; but St. Jerom⁵¹ seems to extend the signification a little further, to denote indifferently widows professing chastity after a first marriage, as well as virgins; for he particularly applies it to women living in widowhood after their first husband's decease. The names agapetae and sorores I pass over, as being rather names of reproach, and deriving their original from a scandalous abuse and unwarrantable practice of some vain and indiscreet men in the church, of which I have given a full account⁵² in another place.

Concerning the widows of the church we have not many things further to be observed distinctly, they being generally under the same laws and rules as the ecclesiastical virgins were, as to what concerned their habit, consecration, profession, maintenance, and the like; the sum of which is thus expressed in one of the canons⁵³ of the first council of Orange, That a widow having made profession of continuing in her widowhood before the bishop in the church, and having her widow's garment put on by the presbyter, ought never after to violate her promise. That which was particular in their case, was, 1. That they must be such widows as had a long time ago lost their husbands, and lived many years a chaste, unblamable life, ruling their own houses well, as the author⁵⁴ of the Constitutions expresses himself almost in the words of the apostle: but such widows as had but lately buried their husbands were not to be trusted, for fear their passions should one time or other prove too strong for their promise. 2. It may hence be reasonably concluded, that the younger widows were generally refused by the church, and not allowed to make any solemn profession before they were forty or fifty years old, though this term be no where precisely fixed. For since, as I have showed before, virgins in some ages were not allowed to make their profession before forty, it is probable the same term was generally observed in the case of widows, or perhaps sixty required, according to the rule of the apostle. The widows that were chosen to be deaconesses in the church, were to be fifty or sixty years of age, as I have showed before⁵⁵ in speaking of their order; who, though they were not the widows we are now speaking of, yet being generally chosen out of them, and thence termed widows also, it may be presumed there was no great difference in point of age betwixt them. 3. Widows were to be such only as had been the wives of one man, that is, only once married, as the ancients generally understand it; though Theodoret gives a different sense of the words, only excluding such as had scandalously married a second time after having divorced themselves from a former husband; which seems to be the true sense and meaning of the apostle, as learned men now understand it.⁵⁶ 4. There was some difference between widows and virgins in the ceremony of their consecration, at least in the church of Rome in the time of Gelasius. For in one of his canonical epistles,⁵⁷ where he speaks of veiling of virgins on certain holidays, and not at other times, except in case of sickness, he pre-emptorily forbids the veiling of widows at any time, as contrary to custom and law, for no canon had prescribed it. Which seems to argue, that this particular ceremony was not used in their consecration. Though it came into use by the time that the Ordo Romanus was written; for there the form⁵⁸ of consecrating widows prescribes that they shall be veiled by the presbyter, or else take a veil consecrated by the bishop from the altar, and veil themselves. But it is no wonder to find such a change as this in the Roman church: a diligent inquirer may find many other that are more considerable, which I shall no further pursue, but here put an end to the discourse concerning the ascetics of the ancient church.

⁴⁹ Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 46. al. 86.

⁵⁰ Hospin. de Monach. lib. 1. c. 1. p. 3.

⁵¹ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoich. c. 6. Maritorum expertes dominatu, viduitatis præferunt libertatem. Castæ vocantur et nonnae, et post cœnam dubiam apostolos somniant.

⁵² Book VI. chap. 2. sect. 13.

⁵³ Conc. Arausican. can. 27. Viduitatis servandæ professionem coram episcopo in secretario habitant, imposita a presbytero veste viduali, non esse violandam.

⁵⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 25.

⁵⁵ Book II. chap. 22. sect. 4.

⁵⁶ See Book II. chap. 22. sect. 5.

⁵⁷ Gelas. Ep. 9. ad Episc. Lucan. Devotis virginibus, nisi aut in Epiphaniarum die, aut in Albis Paschalibus, aut in Apostolorum Natalitiis sacrum minime velamen imponatur, &c. Viduas autem velare pontificum nullus attentet, quod nec auctoritas Divina delegat, nec canonum forma præstituit. Ibid. c. 15.

⁵⁸ Ordo Roman. de Consecr. Viduae, p. 167. Vidua, si seipsam vult Deo dare, debet et a presbytero velari, vel etiam consecratum ab episcopo velamen de altari accipere, et ipsa sibi, non episcopus, illud debet imponere.

BOOK VIII.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE ANCIENT CHURCHES, AND THEIR SEVERAL PARTS, UTENSILS, CONSECRATIONS, IMMUNITIES, ETC.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE SEVERAL NAMES AND FIRST ORIGINAL OF CHURCHES AMONG CHRISTIANS.

Sect. 1.
Of the name ecclesia, and ἐκκλησιαστήριον. HAVING hitherto given an account of the persons, as well clergy as laity, that made up the great body of the Christian church, I now proceed to speak of churches in another sense; first, as taken for the material buildings, or places of assembly set apart for Divine worship, and secondly, as taken for certain divisions or districts of dioceses, provinces, parishes, &c. into which the church catholic was divided. In speaking of the first it will be proper to begin with their names, and make a little inquiry into the first original of churches among Christians. One of the most common names of churches, as taken for the structures or buildings, is that of ecclesia; which yet among the ancient Greek writers often signifies the assembly or convocation of people, met together either upon sacred or civil affairs, and so it is sometimes used in Scripture, Acts xix. 40; Matt. xviii. 17. And so Isidore of Pelusium uses it likewise, distinguishing thus between ἐκκλησιαστήριον and ἐκκλησία; the ἐκκλησιαστήριον¹ is the temple, or building made of wood and stone, but the ἐκκλησία is the congregation of souls or people that meet therein. And in this sense, as St. Cyril observes,² there is a sort of pheronymy in the name ἐκκλησία, which is so called ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐκκαλεῖν, because it is a convocation of men solemnly called together. But though this be a very ancient and common signification, yet it not less usually occurs in the other sense, denoting the place or building itself³ where the congregation met together; and in this acceptation it is commonly opposed both to the synagogues of the Jews and the temples of the Gentiles; as appears from that noted passage in the epistle of Aurelian⁴ the heathen emperor, where he chides the senate for demurring about the opening of the Sibylline books, as if they had been upon a debate in a Christian church, and not in the temple of all the gods; and from another passage in St. Ambrose,⁵ where pleading with Theodosius in behalf of a Christian bishop, who had caused a Jewish synagogue to be set on fire, he asks him, whether it was fitting that Christians should be so severely animadverted on for burning a synagogue, when Jews and heathens had been spared, who had made havoc of the churches?

Another common name among the Latins is, Dominicum, or domus Dei, God's house, which answers to the Greek κυριακόν, whence with a little variation we have the Saxon name kyrik, or kyrch, and the Scotch and English kirk and church, which are all words of the same import, denoting a place set apart for the use and service of God. The name Dominicum is at least as old as Cyprian, but he applies it not only to the church, but to the Lord's supper,⁶ and perhaps the Lord's day. For as the learned editor⁷ and others⁸ have observed, the word Dominicum signifies three things in ancient writers: 1. The Lord's day. 2. The Lord's supper. 3. The Lord's house. And Cyprian's words may be construed to either sense;

Sect. 2.
Of the names Do-
minicum and κυριακόν, (whence comes kirk and church,) and domus
columba

¹ Isidor. Pelus. lib. 2. Ep. 246. "Ἄλλο ἐστὶν ἐκκλησία, καὶ ἄλλο ἐκκλησιαστήριον, &c.

² Cyril. Catech. 18. n. 11. p. 270. 'Ἐκκλησία δὲ καλεῖται φερωνύμως, διὰ τὸ πάντας ἐκκαλεῖσθαι, καὶ ὁμῶς συνάγειν.

³ Vide Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce 'Ἐκκλησία.

⁴ Apud Vopiscum, Vit. Aurelian. Miror vos, patres sancti, tamdiu de aperendis Sibyllinis dubitasse libris; perinde quasi in Christianorum ecclesia, non in templo deorum omnium, tractaretis.

⁵ Ambros. Ep. 29. ad Theodos. Synagoga incensa est, perfidiae locus.—Ecclesia non vindicata est, vindicabitur synagoga?

⁶ Cypr. de Opere et Eleemos. p. 203. Locuples et dives es, et Dominicum celebrare te credis, quæ carbonam omnino non respicis? quæ in Dominicum sine sacrificio venis; quæ partem de sacrificio, quod pauper obtulit, sumis?

⁷ Bp. Fell in loc.

⁸ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 3. n. 2.

for he thus addresses himself to a rich matron: Do you think you rightly celebrate the Dominicum, the Lord's day, or the Lord's supper, who have no regard to the corban? who come into the Lord's house without any sacrifice, and eat part of the sacrifice which the poor have offered? The same name occurs frequently in other Latin writers, as in Ruffin, who brings in the bishop who converted the philosopher in the council of Nice, thus addressing himself to his new convert, Arise and follow me to the Dominicum,⁹ and there receive the seal of your faith, viz. baptism in the church. And St. Jerom¹⁰ tells us, that the famous church of Antioch, which was begun by Constantine, and finished and dedicated by Constantius, had the name of Dominicum aureum, the golden dome, for its richness and beauty. The Greek name κυριακόν is frequently to be met with in the councils of Ancyra,¹¹ and Neocæsarea,¹² and Laodicea,¹³ and Eusebius, who says,¹⁴ the persecuting emperor Maximinus restored the Christians their churches under that appellation in his edicts. And Constantine, having built several churches, gave them all the name of κυριακά, as being dedicated not to the honour of any man,¹⁵ but him who is Lord of the universe. This is a plain account of the name: but whether we may hence conclude with a learned man,¹⁶ that the Greeks, and not the Latins, were the first planters of Christianity in Britain, because of the near affinity between the names κυριακόν and kirk, is what I think not so plain; but I leave it to every reader's judgment to determine.

Tertullian once uses the name of domus columbæ, the house of the dove, for a church. For writing against the Valentinian heretics, who affected secrecy in their doctrines, he compares them to the Eleusinian mysteries, whose temple was so guarded with doors and curtains, that a man must be five years a candidate, before he could be admitted to the adytum of the deity, or secrets of the sanctuary. Whereas, says he, the house of our dove¹⁷ is plain and simple, delights in high and open places, affects the light, loves the figure of the Holy Ghost, (that is, fire and light, as I think Junius rightly interprets it,) and the orient, or morning sun, which is the figure of Christ. The house of the dove seems here to be the same as the house of Christ, who is pointed out by the dove, as Tertullian words it in the same place, Christum columba demonstrare solita est; or else, as Mr. Mede¹⁸ explains it, we may take it for the house of the dove-like religion, or the dove-like disciples of Christ. For every way it will be the name of a church, as Tertullian plainly intended it.

There are two other names of near affinity with the former, which some ^{Sect. 3.} readers may be apt to mistake for ^{Of the distinction between domus Dei, domus Divina, and domus ecclesiæ.} names of churches, when they are not always so; and therefore I cannot let them pass in this place without taking notice of them. The one is domus Divina, and the other domus ecclesiæ. The first of which is of frequent use in the civil law, where it signifies not a church, but the emperor's palace, or his house and family, according to the style of those times, when every thing belonging to them had the name of divine. As constitutiones divinæ, divale præceptum, lex divalis, literæ sacræ, oraculum cælestè, and such other terms, do not signify (as one would hastily imagine) the sacred inspired writings, or the laws and oracles of God, but the edicts and constitutions of the emperors, who themselves were called divi, and thence all things related to them styled divine. Agreeably to this style, when the emperor Theodosius junior decrees,¹⁹ that no one, no, not of his own divine house, should receive corn in specie out of the public storehouses, before it was made into bread by the public bakers: it is plain, by his own divine house he does not mean the house of God, the church, but his own family of palatins, as Gothofred rightly explains it. The other name, domus ecclesiæ, οἶκος ἐκκλησίας, the house of the church, is used by Eusebius in relating the history of the heretic Paulus Samosatensis, who, notwithstanding that he was deposed by the council of Antioch, would not remove out of the house of the church,²⁰ and therefore the fathers appealed to the emperor Aurelian against him, who determined, that that party to whom the bishops of Italy and Rome should write, should have the house delivered up to them; and so Paul was turned out of the church with great disgrace by the secular power. The question here is, what Eusebius means by the house of the church. Mr. Mede²¹ takes it for the church itself, and gives a very probable reason for it, because Eusebius expounds himself, when he says, Paul was turned out of the church: and he uses the same expression in another place, where it can signify nothing but the church, or house of sacred assembly. For speaking of the persecutor Maximinus,²² he says, he neither allowed the Chris-⁹ Ruffin. Hist. lib. 1. c. 3. Si hæc ita esse credis, surge et sequere me ad Dominicum, et hujus fidei signaculum suscipe.

¹⁰ Hieron. Chron. Olymp. 276. an. 3. In Antiochia Dominicum quod appellatur aureum, ædificari cœptum.

¹¹ Conc. Ancy. can. 15.

¹² Conc. Neocæsar. c. 5.

¹³ Conc. Laodic. c. 28.

¹⁴ Euseb. lib. 9. c. 10.

¹⁵ Id. de Laud. Const. c. 17.

¹⁶ Beverege, Not. in Can. 15. Conc. Ancy.

¹⁷ Tertul. contra Valentin. c. 3. Nostræ columbæ domus simplex, etiam in editis et apertis et ad lucem. Amat figuram Spiritus Sancti, orientem Christi figuram, &c.

¹⁸ Mede, Disc. of Chur. p. 329.

¹⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 14. Tit. 16. de Frumento Urbis Constantinop. Leg. 2. Nulli, ne divinæ quidem domui nostræ, frumentum de horreis publicis pro annona penitus præbeat, sed integer canon mancipibus consignetur, annonam in pane cocto domibus exhibendo.

²⁰ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30.

²¹ Mede's Disc. of Churches, p. 333.

²² Euseb. lib. 9. c. 9. Οὐ μὲν συνόδους ἐπικελεύου ποιtians to hold assemblies, nor build houses of assembly; which evidently refers to the building of churches. But yet in other places domus ecclesie seems to signify no more than the bishop's house, as in the second council of Toledo,²³ where it is decreed, that such children as were dedicated by their parents in their infancy to a clerical or monastic life, should be educated and instructed in the house of the church, under the bishop's eye, by the provost or governor that was set over them. This in other canons is called domus sacerdotalis, the bishop's house, to distinguish it from the church.

But to proceed: as the temple of God at Jerusalem is frequently in Scripture styled the house of prayer; so Christian churches, in regard that prayer was one of the principal offices performed in them, were usually termed προσευκτήρια, and οἶκοι εὐκτήριω, oratories, or houses of prayer; of which there are innumerable instances in Eusebius,²⁴ Socrates,²⁵ Sozomen,²⁶ and other ancient writers. But in some canons the name, oratories, seems to be restrained to private chapels, or places of worship set up for convenience in private families, still depending upon parochial churches, and differing from them in this, that they were only places of prayer, but not for celebrating the communion; or if that was at any time allowed there to private families, yet at least upon the great and solemn festivals, they were to resort for communion to the parish churches. Gratian²⁷ cites a canon of the council of Orleans, which allows such oratories, but forbids any one to celebrate the eucharist there. The same privilege is granted in one of Justinian's Novels,²⁸ with the same exception. And so I think we are to understand that canon of the council of Trullo,²⁹ which allows the clergy to use the public offices or liturgy in such oratories, provided they did it with the consent and approbation of the bishop of the place. For no mention is made there of administering the sacraments in those places, though the Latin translations put in the word baptizing, which is not in the original, and is expressly forbidden in another canon³⁰ of the same council, requiring all persons to be baptized in the catholic, that is, public churches. But the council of Agde³¹ in France allows the eucharist to be administered in private oratories, except upon Easter-day, or Christmas, or Epiphany, or Ascension, or Pentecost, or such other of the greater festivals; and upon these too, if they had the bishop's licence and permission for it. So that in those ages an oratory and a catholic church seem to have differed, as now a private chapel and a parochial church, though the first ages made no distinction between them.

Another common name of churches is that of basiliæ, which we may English, palaces of the Great King. This name frequently occurs in St. Ambrose,³² St. Austin,³³ St. Jerom,³⁴ Sidonius Apollinaris,³⁵ and other writers of the fourth and fifth ages, before which time we scarce meet with it in any Christian author. For originally the basiliæ among the Romans were the public halls or courts of judicature, where the princes or magistrates sat to hear and determine causes; and other buildings of public use, such as state-houses, and exchanges for merchants, &c., went by the same name among them. But upon the conversion of Constantine many of these were given to the church, and turned to another use, for Christian assemblies to meet in; as may be collected from that passage in Ausonius,³⁶ where speaking to the emperor Gratian, he tells him, the basiliæ, which heretofore were wont to be filled with men of business, were now thronged with votaries praying for his safety. By which he must needs mean that the Roman halls or courts were turned into Christian churches. And hence, I conceive, the name basiliæ came to be a general name for churches in after ages. Though I know Durantus and Bona³⁷ have other reasons beside this for the appellation, as that it was because churches εἶσθαι, οὐδ' οἶκους ἐκκλησιῶν οἰκοδομεῖν, &c. See lib. 8. c. 13.

²³ Conc. Tolet. 2. can. 1. De his quos voluntas parentum a primis infantie annis in clericatus officio vel monachali posuit, pariter statuimus observandum, ut in domo ecclesie sub episcopali presentia a præposito sibi debeant erudiri.

²⁴ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 3. It. de Laud. Constant. cap. 17. De Vit. Const. lib. 3. c. 48.

²⁵ Soerat. lib. 1. c. 18, 19.

²⁶ Sozom. lib. 2. c. 5.

²⁷ Gratian. de Consecrat. Dist. 1. c. 33. Unicuique fidelium in domo sua oratorium licet habere, et ibi orare: missas autem ibi celebrare non licet.

²⁸ Justin. Novel. 58.

²⁹ Conc. Trull. c. 31. Τοὺς ἐν τοῖς εὐκτηρίοις οἴκοις ἔνδον οἰκίας τυγχάνουσι λειτουργοῦντας κληρικούς, ὑπὸ γνῶμην τοῦτο πράττειν τοῦ κατὰ τὸν τόπον ἐπισκόπου.

³⁰ Conc. Trull. c. 58. al. 59. Μηδαμῶς ἐν εὐκτηρίω οἴκῳ ἔνδον οἰκίας τυγχάνοντι βάπτισμα ἐπιτελεῖσθαι, &c.

³¹ Conc. Agathen. can. 21. Si quis etiam extra parochias, in quibus legitimus est ordinariusque conventus, oratorium in agro habuerit, reliquis festivitibus ut ibi missas teneat propter fatigationem familie justa ordinatione permittimus: Pascha vero, Natali Domini, Epiphania Domini, Ascensione Domini, Pentecoste, et Natali S. Johannis Baptiste, et si qui maximi dies in festivitibus habentur, non nisi in civitatibus aut in parochiis teneant, &c.

³² Ambros. Ep. 33. ad Marcellinam de tradendis Basilicis.

³³ Aug. de Diversis, Serm. 12 et 122.

³⁴ Hieron. Ep. 7. ad Lætam, Ep. 53. ad Riparium.

³⁵ Sidon. lib. 5. Ep. 17. Eusebius, in his Panegyric, c. 9, uses the Greek name, ἀνάκτορον.

³⁶ Auson. Gratiar. Actio ad Gratian. pro Consulatu, p. 190. Basilea olim negotii plena, nunc votis, votisque pro tua salute susceptis.

³⁷ Durant. de Ritib. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 1. n. 9. Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 19. n. 4.

were places where sacrifice was offered to God, the King of all the earth; or because they were only the more stately and magnificent churches which had the title; which is not true in fact, for ever since it came first into use, it appears to have been the common name of all churches.

The like observation is to be made upon the name temples, which for the three first ages is scarce ever³⁸ used by any Christian writer for a church, but only for the heathen temples, which were receptacles of idols, and cloisters of their gods. But when idolatry was destroyed, and statues every where demolished, and temples purged and consecrated into Christian churches, then the writers of the following ages make no scruple to give them the name of temples. As when St. Ambrose³⁹ says, he could not deliver up the temple of God, he certainly means the church, and not an idol temple. So does also Lactantius⁴⁰ when he says, he taught oratory in Bithynia, when the temple of God was destroyed; meaning the church of Nicomedia, which was the first that was demolished in the Diocletian persecution. Eusebius, speaking of the churches that were rebuilt after that persecution was over, gives them⁴¹ the name of temples, and particularly the church built by Paulinus he calls the temple of Tyre.⁴² Not to mention other passages of Chrysostom,⁴³ Theodoret,⁴⁴ Prudentius,⁴⁵ St. Hilary,⁴⁶ St. Austin,⁴⁷ and a thousand more to the same purpose, which show that they had no aversion to the name temple, when they could safely use it without ambiguity, and not be mistaken to mean the temples of the heathen. But from the name phanum they more religiously abstained, and never used it unless it were by way of contempt, to signify their resentments against some conventicle of heretics, whom they usually put into the same class with heathens. As we may observe in St. Ambrose,⁴⁸ who having occasion to speak of a conventicle of the Valentinians, will not vouchsafe it the name of a temple, or a church, but a phanum, a name always appropriated to the idol temples of the heathens, with whom he parallels the Valentinians, as no better than a pack of idolatrous Gentiles met together, for they worshipped idols and images as the heathen did.

There is one general name more for churches, which I must not omit, because the ambiguity of the expression has led some learned men into strange mistakes about it. Constantine, in one of his laws in the Theodosian Code,⁴⁹ calls the church sanctissimum catholicæ concilium, which Alciat, the great lawyer, by mistake interprets an ecclesiastical synod; whereas, indeed, as Gothofred rightly observes, it signifies there the church, as in many other places of the ancient writers. For these words, concilium, synodus, conventiculum, conciliabulum, and the like, are words of various acceptation. For though they commonly signify ecclesiastical synods and councils, yet sometimes they denote other assemblies, and particularly the ordinary assemblies of the church for Divine service, and thence the name was transferred from the assembly to denote the place of the assembly, or the church, as has been observed before upon the word ecclesia. Thus, when St. Jerom commends Nepotian for adorning the conciliabula martyrum with flowers and branches, he cannot mean councils of martyrs, but churches called by the names of martyrs.⁵⁰ And so again when he says, The persecutors' rage and barbarity was so exceeding fierce against us, that they proceeded to destroy our conciliabula, it is evident he means the Christian churches.⁵¹ As Gaudentius must be understood in one of his sermons upon the dedication of a church,⁵² which is called Concilium Martyrum. The church assembly itself is often called by the same name, concilium. As in the Passion of Cyprian, written by Pontius his deacon,⁵³ The Christians are commanded by the emperor to leave off their conciliabula, or meetings and assemblies in the cemeteries for the worship of God. So the word is used by St. Jerom,⁵⁴ speaking of the monks meeting in the church for Divine service; and by Tertullian,⁵⁵ for any church assembly, when he says, the book of Hermes Pastor was reckoned to be ³⁸ Ignatius, Ep. ad Magnes. n. 7, once uses the name with some restriction, calling the church ναὸν Θεοῦ, the temple of God.

³⁹ Ambros. Ep. 33. ad Marcellin. Respondi quod erat ordinis, templum Dei tradi a sacerdote non posse.

⁴⁰ Lactant. lib. 5. c. 2. Cum ego in Bithynia literas oratorias accitus docerem, contigissetque ut eodem tempore Dei templum everteretur, &c.

⁴¹ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 2. Νεὼς αὐτῆς ἐκ βάρβαρον εἰς ὕψος ἀπειρον ἐγειρομένου.

⁴² Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. Ἐν Τύρῳ νεὼς, &c.

⁴³ Chrysost. Hom. 4. de Verbis Esaiæ, t. 3. p. 865.

⁴⁴ Theodor. Hist. lib. 1. c. 31.

⁴⁵ Prudent. Passio Laurentii et Hippolyti.

⁴⁶ Hilar. Com. in Psalm. cxxvi.

⁴⁷ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 8. c. 27.

⁴⁸ Ambros. Ep. 29. ad Theodos. Vindicabitur etiam Valentinianorum phanum incensum? Quid enim est nisi pha-num, in quo est conventus Gentilium?

⁴⁹ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 2. de Episc. Leg. 4.

⁵⁰ Hieron. Ep. 3. Epitaph. Nepotian. Quod basilicas ecclesiarum et martyrum conciliabula diversis floribus et arborum comis, vitiumque pampinis adumbravit, &c.

⁵¹ Hieron. Com. in Zechar. cap. viii. In tantam rabiem persecutorum feritas excitata est, ut etiam conciliabula nostra destruerent.

⁵² Gaudent. Serm. 17. in Dedicatione Basilicæ Martyrum.

⁵³ Pontii Pass. Cypr. Jussum est, ut nulla conciliabula faciant, neque cœmeteria ingrediantur.

⁵⁴ Hieron. Ep. 22. ad Eustoch. c. 15. Post hoc concilium solvitur, et unaquæque decuria cum suo parente pergit ad mensam.

⁵⁵ Tertul. de Pudicit. c. 10. Cederem tibi, si Scripturâ Pastoris—non ab omni concilio ecclesiarum etiam vestrarum inter apocrypha et falsa judicaretur.

apocryphal by the universal consent of every assembly of the Christian catholic churches. Now, what the Latins call concilia, the Greeks call σύνδοσι, and therefore it is observable, that the style of the imperial edicts, which in the Passion of Cyprian forbids Christians conciliabula facere, is in Eusebius⁵⁶ συνόδου ποιῆσαι, which is a prohibition not of ecclesiastical synods, but of all church assemblies. For synodus and ecclesia, as Chrysostom observes,⁵⁷ are words of the very same import and signification, and therefore the one may denote a church or church assembly as well as the other. And because the Latin name conventiculum in its original notation signifies no more than an assembly, it is frequently used by ancient writers for a church. As by Lactantius,⁵⁸ who, speaking of the persecutors in the time of Diocletian, says, They were eagerly set upon shedding Christian blood, for one of them in Phrygia burned a whole people, together with their conventiculum, or church, where they were met together. And Arnobius⁵⁹ expresses himself in the same manner, making a like complaint: Why did our Bibles deserve to be thrown into the flames? Why did our churches, our conventicula, deserve to be so barbarously pulled down? By which it appears, that the name conventicula was not as yet appropriated to heretical meetings, but when the ancients had occasion to speak of them, they commonly joined the epithet of heretical to them, to distinguish them from the catholic churches, as may be seen in several laws of Theodosius,⁶⁰ and Arcadius, and Honorius, in the Theodosian Code.

All these were general names of churches: but there were some which had particular appellations given them upon reasons which could not extend to all. And it will not be amiss in our passage to take notice of them also. Such as were built over the grave of any martyr, or called by his name to preserve the memory of him, had usually the distinguishing title of martyrium, or confessio, or memoria, given them for that particular reason. Thus Eusebius⁶¹ observes of Constantine, that he adorned his new city of Constantinople with many oratories and ample martyries, by which he at once did honour to the memory of the martyrs, and, as it were, consecrated his city to the God of the martyrs. And from this time, in all Christian writers of the following ages, a martyr is always put to signify such a church. Socrates speaks⁶² of the martyr of Thomas the apostle at Edessa, and of Peter and Paul⁶³ at Rome, and of the martyr of Euphemia⁶⁴ at Chalcedon, where the body of that martyr lay buried, which was the church where the famous council of Chalcedon was held, whence, in the acts of that council, it is so often styled μαρτύριον Εὐφημίας, the martyr of Euphemia. And upon the same reason, because our Saviour Christ was the chief sufferer, and great martyr of his own religion, therefore the church which Constantine built at Mount Golgotha in memory of his passion and resurrection, is usually by Eusebius⁶⁵ and others styled martyrium Salvatoris, the martyr of our Saviour, of which the reader that pleases may find a more ample account given by the learned Valesius, in a particular dissertation⁶⁶ about it at the end of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History. The Latins, instead of martyrium, commonly use the name memoria martyrum for such kind of churches. As in that noted passage of St. Austin,⁶⁷ where he says, We do not build temples to our martyrs as gods, but only memorials of them, as dead men, whose spirits still live with God; nor do we erect altars to them in those memorials, or offer sacrifice thereon to our martyrs, but to the only God, both theirs and ours. So that when St. Austin in another place⁶⁸ commends Eradius his presbyter for building a memorial of a holy martyr at his own expense, we are to understand, not a monument or a sepulchre, but a church. And so the name is used by Optatus⁶⁹ and several others. But if the person, in memory of whom the church was built, was either a prophet or an apostle, then the church respectively took the name of ἀποστολείον or προφητεῖον. As we may see in Sozomen,⁷⁰ who speaks of the apostoleum of Peter in Rome, and again, of the apostoleum of Peter and Paul

See, §. Why some churches called martyria, memoria, apostoleia, and propheteia.

⁵⁶ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 11. Vid. lib. 9. c. 2 et 9.

⁵⁷ Chrysost. Hom. in Psal. cxlix. t. 3. p. 632. Ἐκκλησία σπήματος καὶ συνόδου ἐστὶν ὄνομα.

⁵⁸ Lactant. lib. 5. c. 11. Aliqui ad occidendum præcipites extiterunt, sicut unus in Phrygia, qui universum populum cum ipso pariter conventiculo concremavit.

⁵⁹ Arnob. cont. Gent. lib. 4. p. 152. Nostra quidem scripta cur ignibus meruerit dari? Cur immaniter conventicula dirui? in quibus summus oratur Deus, &c. Item Ambrosiaster in Ephes. iv. p. 948. Ubi omnia loca circumplexa est ecclesia, conventicula constituta sunt, et rectores et cætera officia in ecclesiis ordinata sunt.

⁶⁰ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 5. de Hæreticis, Leg. 10. A conventiculis suis hæreticæ superstitionis turba propulsetur. It. lib. 16. Tit. 4. Leg. 4.

⁶¹ Euseb. de Vit. Constant. lib. 3. c. 48. Εὐκτηρίοις πλείοσιν, μαρτυρίοις τε μεγίστοις.

⁶² Socrat. lib. 4. c. 18.

⁶³ Id. lib. 4. c. 23.

⁶⁴ Id. lib. 6. c. 6.

⁶⁵ Euseb. lib. 4. de Vit. Constant. c. 40.

⁶⁶ Valesii Epistola de Anastasi et Martyrio Hierosolymitano.

⁶⁷ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. c. 10. Nos martyribus nostris non templa sicut diis, sed memorias sicut hominibus mortuis, quorum apud Deum vivunt spiritus, fabricamus: nec ibi erigimus altaria, in quibus sacrificemus martyribus, sed uni Deo et martyrum et nostro.

⁶⁸ Aug. Hom. 50. de Diversis, t. 10. p. 522. De opera ejus et expensa pecunia memoriam sancti martyris habemus.

⁶⁹ Optat. cont. Parmen. lib. 2. p. 1. Præsentēs sunt ibi duorum memoriæ apostolorum, &c.

⁷⁰ Sozom. lib. 9. c. 10. Ἦγάγε εἰς τὸ Πέτρον ἀποστολεῖον, &c.

at Quercus in the suburbs of Chalcedon, which Ruffin, the great statesman under Arcadius, built to the honour of the apostles, and called it⁷¹ an apostoleum from them. So in the council of Constantinople, under Mennas, there is mention⁷² made of the propheteum of St. Esaias the prophet, as also in Theodorus Lector,⁷³ who says, the relics of Samuel the prophet were laid up ἐν τῷ προφητείῳ αὐτοῦ, in his propheteum; which can mean nothing else but churches called by their names, as Valesius rightly expounds it.

Much the like account is to be given of two other names, cœmeterium, and mensa, which we find sometimes used to signify churches. The Christians in times of persecution were used to meet in private vaults or burying-places, and especially at the graves or monuments of their martyrs; as is evident both from the canons of the council of Eliberis,⁷⁴ which was held in the heat of the Diocletian persecution, and often speaks of their assembling in such places; as also from the edicts of the persecuting emperors, forbidding Christians to hold assemblies in their cemeteries, as has been noted⁷⁵ before. Now, when the persecutions were over, churches were actually erected over the graves of the martyrs, and in the places where the cemeteries were, and so a cemetery, or a grave of a martyr, came to be used for the name of a church. Thus, in the writings of St. Austin there is frequent mention of a church called mensa Cypriani, where St. Austin preached several⁷⁶ of his sermons. This was the place where Cyprian suffered martyrdom, which being the altar on which Cyprian was offered a sacrifice to God, a church was afterward built there, and an altar or communion table erected therein for the Christian sacrifice to be offered to God; and both these being a memorial of Cyprian's passion, they were jointly called by his name,⁷⁷ mensa Cypriani, Cyprian's altar, or Cyprian's church. For though it primarily signifies the altar, yet it is plain it was extended to be the name of the church also, where St. Austin preached so many sermons on Cyprian's day to the people of Carthage. The name cemetery continued also to be used in after ages for a church; as appears from one of the canons of the council⁷⁸ of Laodicea, which forbids catholics to frequent the cemeteries or martyries of heretics, upon pretence of prayer or Divine service. St. Chrysostom often uses the word τάφοι μαρτύρων, sepulchres of martyrs, for churches. As where he says⁷⁹ one might see whole cities running to the monuments of the martyrs. And again,⁸⁰ We depart not from their sepulchres: here kings lay aside their crowns, and continue praying for deliverance from dangers, and for victory over their enemies. Nay, he triumphs in this both over Jews and Gentiles, that the apostles in their deaths were more honourable than the greatest kings upon earth: for even at Rome,⁸¹ the royal city, emperors, and consuls, and generals, left all, and ran to the sepulchres of the fisherman and tentmaker: and at Constantinople it was thought honour enough by those that wore the diadem, to lie buried, not with the apostles, but before their porches, and kings themselves were the fishermen's door-keepers. In all which places, it is evident, he means churches by the sepulchres of the apostles. And so Athanasius,⁸² and Socrates, and others, take the word cemetery for a church. And perhaps St. Jerom intends the same by the sepulchres of the martyrs, when he says⁸³ it was his custom, when he was a boy at school in Rome, on Sundays to go about and visit the sepulchres of the apostles and martyrs; but I will not be positive of this, because he joins the crypte or subterraneous vaults with them, which in his time were not churches; though they were in Tertullian's time, who calls them aræ sepulcrarum,⁸⁴ telling us, that Hilarian the persecutor forbade them to hold assemblies there; but this was remarkably punished by the providence of God; for they who denied the Christians the liberty of their aræ, had their own aræ, meaning their storehouses or barnfloors, (which is another signification of the word aræ.) taken ⁷¹ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 17. Ἀποστολεῖον ἐξ αὐτῶν ὀνόμασε.

⁷² Conc. Constant. sub Menna. Act. 3. t. 5. p. 67.

⁷³ Theodor. Lector. lib. 2. p. 568.

⁷⁴ Conc. Eliber. c. 31. Cereos in cœmeteriis per diem placuit non incendi, &c. It. can. 35. Placuit prohiberi, ne feminae in cœmeterio pervigilent, eo quod sæpe sub obtentu orationis scelera latenter committant.

⁷⁵ See sect. 7. Vid. Onuphrium de Cœmeteriis, cap. 11.

⁷⁶ See Sermon. 94 et 237. de Diversis, Sermon. 26. ex Editis a Sirmondo. Ser. 38 et 80. in Psal., all preached ad mensam Cypriani.

⁷⁷ Aug. Ser. 113. de Diversis. Sicut nostis, quicumque Carthaginem nostis, in eodem loco mensa Deo constructa est, tamen mensa dicitur Cypriani, non quia ibi est unquam Cyprianus epulatus, sed quia ibi est immolatus, et quia ipsa immolatione sua paravit hanc mensam, non in qua pascatur sive pascatur, sed in qua sacrificium Deo, cui et ipse oblatus est, offeratur.

⁷⁸ Conc. Laodic. can. 9. Περί τοῦ μή συγχωρεῖν εἰς τὰ κοιμητήρια, ἢ εἰς τὰ λεγόμενα μαρτύρια πάντων τῶν αἰρετικῶν τοῦς τῆς ἐκκλησίας, εὐχῆς ἢ θεραπείας ἔνεκα, ἀπίεσαι.

⁷⁹ Chrys. Com. in. Psal. cxv. t. 3. p. 404. Σκόπει καὶ ἐπὶ τῶν μαρτύρων τοῦς τάφους τὰς πόλεις συντρεχούσας.

⁸⁰ Id. Hom. 1. in Psal. xlvi. ibid. p. 812. Οὐκ ἀναχωροῦμεν τῶν τάφων αὐτῶν, &c.

⁸¹ Chrys. Demonstr. quod Christus sit Deus, t. 5. p. 839.

⁸² Athan. Apol. 2. ap. Socrat. lib. 2. c. 28.

⁸³ Hieron. Com. in Ezek. c. 40. Dum essem Romæ puer, et liberalibus studiis erudirer, solebam cum cæteris ejusdem ætatis et propositi, diebus Dominicis sepulchra apostolorum et martyrum circuire, crebròque cryptas ingredi, &c.

⁸⁴ Tertul. ad Scapul. c. 3. Sicut sub Hilariano præside, cum de aræis sepulcrarum nostrarum adclamassent, aræ non sint: aræ ipsorum non fuerunt: messes enim suas non egerunt.

from them; for they had no harvest that year, by the just judgment of God upon them. The reader will meet with the name area for a place of prayer in the Acts of Purgation of Cæcilian,⁸⁵ bishop of Carthage, and other records of that⁸⁶ age of persecutions, when they were forced to fly from their churches above-ground to their vaults underneath, and make a sort of temporary churches of them.

Casa is another name in the same Sect. 10. Acts of Purgation of Cæcilian and why casæ, trophæa, and tituli. Felix, which I take to be the name of a church also.⁸⁷ For though it might be something doubtful from that place alone, yet finding it so used in other authors, I conclude it was one of the ancient names of their churches. For Bede tells us⁸⁸ the town of St. Martin's, in Bernicia, a province of Britain, came to be vulgarly called Candida Casa, Whitern, or Whitchurch, from the church of stone which Bishop Ninyas built in it. And I leave it as a query, whether Casæ Nigræ in Africa, where Donatus was bishop, be not beholden to some such circumstance for its denomination also? But why churches should be called casæ, is not very easy to conjecture. Till a better reason can be found, let us suppose it to be from the plainness and simplicity of them, of which we shall have something more to say in the next chapter. Mr. Mede has observed another name for churches (which is not very common) in Caius Romanus, an ancient writer in Eusebius, who uses the term trophæa apostolorum, as Mr. Mede conjectures, to denote two churches of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome.⁸⁹ But I confess there is some reason to question, whether in that place it means churches, and not rather the monuments or sepulchres of those apostles. For Eusebius is only speaking of their bodies being buried at Rome; to confirm which opinion he quotes that ancient writer in these words: We can yet⁹⁰ show the trophies of the apostles; for whether you go to the Vatican, or the Via Ostiensis, you may there see the trophies of those who founded this church; meaning the church of Rome, which was founded by St. Peter and St. Paul, whose sepulchres were then to be seen, the former in the Vatican Hill, and the other in the way from Ostia to Rome. However, in after ages, when churches were built over their sepulchres, then their trophies became a name for those churches, as we may learn from those words of St. Jerom⁹¹ to Marcella, who lived at Rome: You have there a holy church, you have there the trophies of the apostles and martyrs. For now it is certain their sepulchres were advanced into churches, and both together called trophies, as being manifest tokens and evidences of the victory which they had gained over their enemies, by resisting unto blood, and triumphing after death. There is yet another name, of which it is not easy to give so exact an account: that is, why some churches had the name of tituli given them peculiarly in Rome. In the Pontifical in the Life of Marcellus,⁹² it is said of him, that he appointed twenty-five tituli in Rome, for the convenience of baptizing new converts. And in the same place one Lucina, a widow, is said to have dedicated her house⁹³ to be made a titulus or church, where they worshipped Christ day and night with prayers and hymns, till Maxentius the tyrant, hearing of it, turned the church into a stable, and forced Marcellus to be the keeper of it. These are supposed to be the same as parish churches, erected for the convenience of administering Divine offices, as the multitude of converts increased in Rome. But why they were called tituli, is not exactly agreed among learned men. Baronius⁹⁴ will have them to be so called, because they had the sign of the cross upon them, by which sign or title they were known to belong to Christ, as things which belonged to the emperor's exchequer were known to be his by an appendant veil, which had either his image or his name, by way of title, inscribed upon it. But it does not appear that the sign of the cross was so early fixed upon churches; or if it were, that it was the peculiar distinction of a parish church; for no doubt the cathedral or bishop's church had that sign as soon as any others. Mr. Mede⁹⁵ offers two other reasons, and leaves the reader to determine whether they were so called, because by their dedication the name of Christ our Lord was, as it were, inscribed upon them, as the ⁸⁵ Gesta Purgat. Cæcilian. ad Calcem Optati, p. 272. Cives in area martyrum fuerunt inclusi. Item, p. 277. Tollat aliquis de vestris in aream ubi orationes facitis.

⁸⁶ Vide Acta Concilii Cirtensis, ap. Baron. an. 303. n. 24. Passio Cypriani. Ejus corpus positum est in areis Macrobbii Candidi.

⁸⁷ Gesta Purgat. p. 272. Nunquid populus Dei ibi fuit? Saturninus dixit, in casa majore fuit inclusus. It. p. 274. Præsens cum populo inclusus in casa majore.

⁸⁸ Bed. Hist. lib. 3. c. 4. Qui locus ad provinciam Berniciorum pertinens, vulgo vocatur, ad candidam casam, eo quod ibi ecclesiam de lapide, insolito Britonibus more, fecerit.

⁸⁹ Mede's Discourse of Churches, p. 328.

⁹⁰ Euseb. lib. 2. c. 25. Ἐγὼ δὲ τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ἀποστόλων ἔχω δεῖξαι, &c.

⁹¹ Hieron. Ep. 18. ad Marcellam. Est quidem tibi sancta ecclesia, sunt trophæa apostolorum et martyrum. So Gildas, de Excid. Britan., and Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 8, call them Signa victricia martyrum. Eusebius de Laud. Constant. c. 17. Τρόπαια νικητήρια.

⁹² Pontifical. Vit. Marcelli. Hic fecit cœmeterium Via Salaria, et viginti quinque titulos in urbe Roma constituit, quasi diœceses, propter baptismum et pœnitentiam multorum, qui convertebantur ex paganis, et propter sepulturas martyrum.

⁹³ Pontifical. ibid. Lucina domum suam nomine tituli beati Marcelli dedicavit, ubi die noctuque hymnis et orationibus Domino Jesu Christo confitebatur, &c. Vjd. Pii Epist. 4. ad Justum Vrien. Presbyter pastor titulum condidit, &c.

⁹⁴ Baron. an. 112. n. 5. ⁹⁵ Mede's Disc. of Church. p. 323.

manner then was to set the names or titles of the owners upon their houses and possessions; and so it would concur in notion with those other names of κυριακὸν and basilica, the Lord's, and the king's; or whether because they gave a title of cure, or denomination to the presbyters to whom they were committed. This last I take to be the true reason of the name, till one more probable can be thought of. As to the fancy of Onuphrius, that the number of these *tituli*⁹⁶ was exactly the same with that of cardinal presbyters now, and never exceeding the number of twenty-eight, it is an imagination without ground: for Optatus speaks of above forty churches in Rome before the time of the last persecution, as I shall have occasion to show more fully in the next book.

There are several other less usual names of churches in ancient writers, which I need not stand upon. Such as limina martyrum, the houses of the martyrs, used by St. Jerom;⁹⁷ σῆκος and τέμενος, words of the same import with temple, which we sometimes meet with in Theodoret,⁹⁸ Synesius,⁹⁹ and Evagrius.¹⁰⁰ In Eusebius, *domus synaxeos*¹⁰¹ sometimes occurs in the rescripts of heathen emperors for Christian churches, which signifies no more but houses of assembly. Chrysostom styles them the seat of doctrine,¹⁰² from the exercise of preaching therein. And many such names are to be met with, which need no explication. But there are two names more used by Eusebius, which some learned men have greatly mistaken. In one place, speaking of the Therapeute in Egypt, whom he reckons the first Christians converted by St. Mark, and described covertly by Philo-Judæus, he gives their churches the name of σεμνεῖα and μοναστήρια, which some mistake for monasteries in the modern sense; whereas Eusebius¹⁰³ says expressly, it was the name which Philo gave, not to their habitations, but their churches. For, says he, Philo having described their habitations, afterward speaks thus of their churches in that region: In every one of their dwellings there is a sacred house or chapel, which they call their semneum, or monastery, where they perform the religious mysteries proper to their holy life. For hither they bring nothing ever of meat, or drink, or other bodily necessities, but only their laws and inspired oracles of their prophets, their hymns, and whatever else tends to augment and consummate a life of piety and knowledge. This is not the description of a monastery in the modern sense, but of a church; and so we see the name was first used, as it is at this day among the Germans, who hence call some of their churches munsters, as we do minsters, which were heretofore collegiate churches and schools of learning, like St. Austin's monastery-church, of which I have given an account in the former book. This is further confirmed, because Eusebius joins the name σεμνεῖον to monastery to explain it, which, by the best critics, ancient and modern, Hesychius, Budæus, Suicerus, and others, is reckoned to signify a temple or place of Divine service. Eusebius has yet another name for a church, which I mention only because it is liable to the same mistake. He gives it the name of tabernacle: which is only a private appellation, belonging peculiarly to movable or travelling churches. For Eusebius, speaking of Constantine's intended expedition against the Persians, says, that among his other preparations for that war he erected himself¹⁰⁴ a tent or tabernacle in the form of a church, in which he might continually make his supplications to God the giver of victory, with the bishops and clergy that were to attend him in his expedition. Socrates,¹⁰⁵ speaking of the same thing, compares it to the tabernacle that Moses set up in the wilderness, and says, Constantine did it, that he might have a decent and convenient oratory, ἐκπήριον ἡντρεπισμένον, in the most desert and barbarous places through which he was to travel. And from this example, as Sozomen¹⁰⁶ observes, it became a custom throughout the Roman army for every legion to have their tabernacle, and priests and deacons appointed to attend the service of it.

Whilst I am upon this head, it will not be amiss to give the reader an account of two other words, which have some relation to this subject, and by their ambiguity are often mistaken and confounded, that is, ecclesia matrix and diæcesana, which seem to be words of the same importance, but are often very different from one another. Ecclesia matrix, a mother-church, is sometimes taken for an original church planted immediately by the apostles, whence others were derived and propagated afterward. So Tertullian¹⁰⁷ calls those churches, to which the apostles preached either in a voce, or by their epistles, by which all doctrines are to be judged. And in this sense the church of Jerusalem is called the mother of all churches in the world, by the second general ⁹⁶ Onuphr. Interpret. Vocum Ecclesiastic. p. 91.

⁹⁷ Hieron. Ep. 15. ad Marcellam.

⁹⁸ Theodor. Ser. de Martyr. ⁹⁹ Synes. Ep. 58.

¹⁰⁰ Evagr. lib. 1. c. 14. lib. 6. c. 8.

¹⁰¹ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 8. Vid. Gesta Purgationis Cæciliani.

¹⁰² Chrysost. Hom. 2. in Joh.

¹⁰³ Euseb. lib. 2. c. 17. Εἰθ' ἐξῆς, τὰς οἰκῆσεις αὐτῶν ὅποιαί τινες ἦσαν διαγράψας, περὶ τῶν κατὰ χώραν ἐκκλησιῶν ταῦτα φησὶν' ἐν ἐκάστῃ δὲ οἰκίᾳ ἔστιν οἶκημα ἱερὸν, ὃ καλεῖται σεμνεῖον καὶ μοναστήριον' ἐν ᾧ μονούμενοι τὰ τοῦ σεμνοῦ βίου μυστήρια τελοῦνται, &c.

¹⁰⁴ Euseb. de Vit. Constant. lib. 4. c. 56. Τὴν σκηνὴν τῷ τῆς ἐκκλησίας σχήματι πρὸς τὴν ἐκείνου τοῦ πολέμου παράταξιν σὺν πολλῇ φιλοτιμίᾳ κατεργάζετο.

¹⁰⁵ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 18.

¹⁰⁶ Sozom. lib. 1. c. 8.

¹⁰⁷ Tertul. de Præscript. c. 21. Constat proinde omnem doctrinam, quæ cum illis ecclesiis apostolicis matricibus et originalibus fidei conspiret, veritati deputandam.

council of Constantinople;¹⁰⁸ and Arles the mother-church of France, because supposed to be planted¹⁰⁹ by the apostle's missionary, Trophimus, first bishop of the place. At other times a mother-church denotes a metropolis, or the principal church of a single province, as in some of the African Canons,¹¹⁰ where matrix is used sometimes for the primate's see, to which other bishops were to have recourse for judgment and decision of controversies. But most commonly it signifies a cathedral or bishop's church, which was usually termed the great church, and the catholic church, and the principal see, in opposition to the lesser tituli or parish churches committed to single presbyters. Thus, in the African Code, the matter is plain, in one canon every bishop is prohibited to alienate or sell the goods of the mother-church;¹¹¹ and presbyters, the goods belonging to their titles. The Greek translation of this canon is here imperfect and corrupt, as Suicerus¹¹² has rightly observed, and by it Cujacius and others have been led into a mistake to expound matrix by matricula, the catalogue or books of the church, whereas it means the cathedral or bishop's church. As also in another canon,¹¹³ which says, If any bishop is negligent to deal with heretics in the mother-church, he shall be admonished of his fault by the neighbouring bishops, that he may have no excuse. The mother-church is here the bishop's church, or that which required both his care and residence, as the principal church of the diocese. This, by Fulgentius Ferrandus,¹¹⁴ is plainly opposed to other inferior churches in the diocese, upon which only presbyters resided, both when he says, that the judgment of the mother-church shall be sufficient in the election of a bishop; and again, that the bishop of the mother-church shall not usurp any thing that is given to the churches in the diocese. These churches in the diocese are the same as we now call parish churches, though they themselves are sometimes termed dioceses in the Pontifical,¹¹⁵ and the African Canons;¹¹⁶ and in some other canons,¹¹⁷ ecclesie diocesane, diocesan churches; as in the council of Tarraco, which obliges all bishops to visit their dioceses once a year, to see that no diocesan church, that is, no church within the diocese, was out of repair. So that a mother-church and a diocesan church in that ancient style differed, as now a cathedral and a parish church with us. The mother-church being otherwise called the principal see,¹¹⁸ principalis cathedra, where the bishop was obliged continually to reside: and sometimes the catholic church, as Valesius has observed¹¹⁹ out of Epiphanius¹²⁰ and Nicephorus,¹²¹ in opposition to the lesser churches that were subject to it. Though, as I noted before, the council of Trullo calls every baptismal church a catholic church,¹²² in opposition to private oratories, where baptism was not allowed to be administered. It was necessary for me to be thus particular about the names of churches in the entrance upon this book, because some of them are curious, and others ambiguous, that the reader might find them explained at once, and not be at a loss about terms upon every occasion in the following discourse.

Our next inquiry is into the original of churches, that is, when Christians began to set them apart for Divine service? A very singular paradox has been advanced by some learned men in these last ages, that for the three first ages the Christians had no such distinct places of worship; grounding upon some mistaken passages of Origen, Minucius Felix, Arnobius, and Lactantius, who say, the Christians had no temples; which they take for a denial of their having any churches. Which opinion, though advanced with some show of learning by Vedelius,¹²³ Suicerus,¹²⁴ and others, is altogether without ground, contradicted by the authors which they allege, and by themselves who assert and maintain it. Mr. Mede has an elaborate discourse in confutation of this opinion, wherein he has learnedly collected the authorities of the an-

Sect. 13.
Proofs of churches in the first century collected by Mr.
Mede.

¹⁰⁸ Epist. Synodic. ad Damasum, ap. Theodoret. lib. 5. c. 9. Τῆς δὲ γε μητρὸς ἀπασῶν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν τῆς ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις, &c.

¹⁰⁹ Libellus Precum Episcoporum Gallorum ad Leonem ap. Baron. an. 450. p. 125. Cujus honoris obtentu ecclesiam Arelatensem omnes decessores, prædecessoresque nostri vel ut matrem debito semper honore coluerunt, &c.

¹¹⁰ Cod. Afric. can. 119. al. 120. Μὴ προκριματισθῆ ἐν τῇ ματρικί, non præjudicetur in matrice, &c.

¹¹¹ Cod. Afric. can. 33. Non habente necessitate, nec episcopo liceat matricis ecclesie, nec presbytero rem tituli sui usurpare.

¹¹² Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Μάτριξ.

¹¹³ Cod. Afr. can. 123. Si in matricibus cathedris episcopus negligens fuerit adversus hæreticos, conveniatur a vicinis episcopis, &c.

¹¹⁴ Ferrand. Breviat. Canon. c. 11. Ut ad eligendum episcopum sufficiat matricis arbitrium ex concilio Septimuniensi et concilio Macrianensi. Item, c. 38. Ut episcopus matricis non usurpet quicquid fuerit donatum ecclesiis, quæ in diocesi constitutæ sunt. Ex Concilio Hipponiensi.

¹¹⁵ Pontifical. Vit. Marcelli. Hic viginti quinque titulos in urbe Roma constituit, quasi dioceses, propter baptismum, &c.

¹¹⁶ Cod. Afric. can. 53 et 56.

¹¹⁷ Conc. Tarracon. can. 8. Reperimus nonnullas diocesanæ ecclesie esse destitutas. Ob quam rem hac constitutione decrevimus, ut annuis vicibus ab episcopo dioceses visitentur.

¹¹⁸ Conc. Carthag. 5. c. 5. Placuit, ut nemini sit facultas relicta principali cathedra, ad aliquam ecclesiam in diocesi constitutam se conferre.

¹¹⁹ Vales. Not. in Theodor. Lector. lib. 1. 553.

¹²⁰ Epiphanius. Hæres. 69. n. 1.

¹²¹ Nicephorus. lib. 15. c. 22.

¹²² Conc. Trull. c. 58. al. 59.

¹²³ Vedel. Exercit. in Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes. c. 4.

¹²⁴ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Ναός, p. 388.

cients, which for the three first ages prove the being of Christian churches. I shall briefly, for the sake of those who have not that author at hand, relate the substance of his proofs, and add some others to his collections. In the first place, he shows that the ancients, St. Austin,¹²⁵ St. Basil,¹²⁶ and the author under the name of St. Jerom, St. Chrysostom, Sedulius, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, in their comments on that passage of St. Paul, 1 Cor. xi. 22, "Have ye not houses to eat and drink in? or despise ye the church of God?" took the word church there not for the assembly, but for the place set apart for sacred duties. And that the apostles always met together in a certain place for prayer and supplication upon Mount Sion, which was the hyperoon or cœnaculum, the upper room so often mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles; where the apostles were assembled when the Holy Ghost came upon them, Acts ii.; where our Saviour celebrated his last supper; where he appeared to his disciples two Sundays, one after another, after his resurrection, John xx. The place where the seven deacons were elected and ordained, Acts vi.; and where the first council of Jerusalem was held, Acts xv. Which place was afterward enclosed with a goodly church, called the church of Mount Sion, and the upper church of the apostles in the time of Cyril,¹²⁷ bishop of Jerusalem, and St. Jerom.¹²⁸ That this was the οἶκος, or house of assembly, mentioned Acts ii. 46, where the apostles continued breaking of bread, that is, celebrating the eucharist after their return from the temple. For he thinks, with many other critics, that the word ἐν οἴκῳ is not to be translated, from house to house, but, in the house, or place where the assembly was used to meet together. His next argument is drawn from what Eusebius¹²⁹ observes of the θεραπευταὶ in Egypt, whether Essenes or Christians, that they had their σεμνεία, or places appropriated for Divine worship, from the days of St. Mark. And that such places are to be understood in all those passages of St. Paul which salute¹³⁰ the churches in such or such a house, that is, the congregations that met in the houses of such pious Christians as had bestowed some part of their dwellings to be an oratory for the church to assemble in. Such a cœnaculum is described by Lucian, or whoever was the author of the dialogue called Philopatris, about the time of Trajan, where he brings in one Critias telling how the Christians carried him into an hyperoon, the place of their assembly, with a design to make him a proselyte to their religion. He argues further from the tradition of the church derived from the ancient author of the Recognitions under the name of Clemens Romanus, which says¹³¹ that Theophilus, to whom St. Luke is supposed to inscribe his Gospel, at Antioch, did convert his house into a church. And the like is reported of the house of Pudens, a Roman senator and martyr, in the Acta Pudentis, that it was turned into a church after his martyrdom. He concludes this first century with the testimony of Clemens Romanus, in his genuine Epistle to the Corinthians, which says,¹³² that God had ordained as well appropriate places where, as appropriate times and persons when and whereby, he would be solemnly served, that all things might be done religiously and in order.

In the next age he shows that Ignatius, in his epistle to the Magnesians,¹³³ exhorts them to meet together in one place, which he calls τὸν ναὸν Θεοῦ, the temple of God; and in his epistle to the Philadelphians¹³⁴ he says, there was one altar to every church, and one bishop with his presbytery and deacons. The present Greek copies, indeed, read it a little different from Mr. Mede, leaving out the word church, but the mentioning one altar is sufficient to intimate they had then a stated place for their ecclesiastical assembly. In the same age, Pius, bishop of Rome, wrote two short epistles to Justus, bishop of Vienna, in France, in the first of which, one Euprepia,¹³⁵ a pious matron, is said to have consigned the title of her house over to the church to celebrate Divine offices in: and in the other, one Pastor, a presbyter, is commended for erecting a titulus, that is, a church, before his death.¹³⁶ Clemens Alexandrinus, toward the end of this century, uses the name ecclesia for the place of the assembly, as well as the congregation. For, speaking of the church, he says, I call not now the place,¹³⁷ but the congregation of the elect, the church. And so in his famous homily, Quis dives salvetur, he brings in the Asian bishop, to whom St. John committed the young man to be trained up in the Christian discipline, complaining that the youth was become a villain and a robber, and now, instead of the church,¹³⁸ had betaken himself to the mountains, with a company like himself. By this it is plain, that in his time the word ecclesia was taken for a place of sacred assembly, as well as for the assembly itself.

Sect. 14.
Proofs in the second century

¹²⁵ Aug. Quæst. 57. in Levitic.

¹²⁶ Basil. Regul. Major. qu. 30. Regul. Minor. qu. 310.

¹²⁷ Cyril. Catech. 16. ¹²⁸ Hieron. Ep. 27. Epitaph. Paulæ.

¹²⁹ Euseb. lib. 2. c. 17.

¹³⁰ See Rom. xvi. 3, 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; Colos. iv. 15; Philem. 1, 2.

¹³¹ Recognit. lib. 10. n. 71. ¹³² Clem. Ep. 1. ad Cor. n. 40.

¹³³ Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes. n. 7.

¹³⁴ Epist. ad Philadelph. n. 4.

¹³⁵ Pii Ep. 1. ad Justum. Soror nostra Euprepia titulum domus suæ pauperibus assignavit; ubi nunc cum pauperibus nostris commorantes, missas agimus.

¹³⁶ Id. Ep. 2. Presbyter Pastor titulum condidit, et digne in Domino obiit.

¹³⁷ Clem. Alex. Strom. 7. Οὐ νῦν τὸν τόπον, ἀλλὰ τὸ ἄθροισμα τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν, ἐκκλησίαν καλῶ.

¹³⁸ Ap. Euseb. 1. 3. c. 23. et in Bibl. Patrum. Combefis. Νῦν ἀντὶ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ὄρος κατέλιφε, &c.

Sect. 15.
Proofs in the third century.

In the third century the testimonies are both more numerous and plain. Tertullian clearly intimates they had churches, when complaining against Christians who followed the trade of idol-making for the Gentiles, only excusing themselves that they did not worship them, he says, The zeal of faith¹³⁰ cannot but declaim all the day long upon this point, bewailing that any Christian should come from among his idols into the church, that he should come into the house of God from the shop of his enemy, and lift up those hands to God the Father, which were the mothers or makers of idols. In another place¹⁴⁰ he calls the church domus columbae, the house of the dove, meaning either Christ, or his dove-like religion, as I have explained it before.¹⁴¹ And again he expressly distinguishes between the baptistery and the church, which in those days were places separate one from another, saying, When we are come¹⁴² to the water to be baptized, we not only there, but also somewhat before in the church, under the hand of the minister, make a public declaration that we renounce the devil and his pomp and his angels. Tertullian is followed by Hippolytus,¹⁴³ who, describing the signs of the coming of antichrist, says, The temples of God shall be as common houses, the churches shall every where be destroyed. But I lay no stress upon this passage, because the work is spurious, and of later date than it pretends to be, as Bishop Usher has proved, and Combefis confesses as much, who published the genuine piece of Hippolytus de Christo et Antichristo, where no such passage is to be found.¹⁴⁴ But we have an authentic testimony, in the same age, from a heathen author. For Lampridius, in the Life of Alexander Severus,¹⁴⁵ reports of him, that there happening a dispute between the Christians and the victuallers, about a certain public place, each party challenging it as their own; the emperor's rescript determined it thus in favour of the Christians, That it was better that God should be worshipped there after any manner, than that it should be given up to the victuallers. About the middle of this age lived the famous Gregory of Neocæsarea, surnamed Thaumaturgus, who himself built several churches in Neocæsarea, and the adjacent parts of Pontus, as Gregory Nyssen¹⁴⁶ reports in his Life; and also wrote a canonical epistle, wherein are described the several classes or stations¹⁴⁷ of penitents in the respective parts of the church: but because some learned men question whether that part of his epistle be not rather a comment and addition by some other hand, I lay no greater weight upon it than it will bear, but only observe, that the same classes of penitents may be collected from other canons in that epistle, which are allowed to be genuine. About the same time St. Cyprian speaks of the place of their assembly under the name of Dominicum,¹⁴⁸ the Lord's house, as has been noted before; and in another place opposes the church and the capitol, the altar of the Lord and the altars of images and idol-gods, to one another: for speaking against some that had lapsed, and without due penance were for intruding themselves into the church again; If this were once permitted, says he, what then remains¹⁴⁹ but that the church should give way to the capitol, and the priests withdraw, and take away the altar of the Lord with them, and let the images and idol-gods with their altars succeed, and take possession of the sanctuary, where the venerable bench of our clergy sit? About this time also Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, speaks of churches as appropriate to the service of God, resolving this question, whether a woman in the time of her separation might enter¹⁵⁰ into the house of God? It appears further from the rescript of Gallienus the emperor, recorded by Eusebius,¹⁵¹ where he restores the Christians their churches under the name of τόποι θρησκευίμοι, worshipping places: and from what has been noted before out of the letter of Aurelian,¹⁵² which chides the senate for demurring about opening the Sibylline books, as if they had been consulting, not in the capitol, but in a Christian church: as also that other rescript of his in Eusebius,¹⁵³ which, at the request of the council of Antioch, ordered Paulus Samosatensis to be turned out of the house of the church. But the testimony of Eusebius goes far beyond all others: for speaking of the peaceable times which the Christians enjoyed from the persecution of Valerian to that of Diocletian, he ob-

¹³⁰ Tertul. de Idol. c. 7. Tota die ad hanc partem zelus fidei perorabit, ingemens Christianum ab idolis in ecclesiam venire, de adversaria officina in domum Dei venire, attollere ad Deum Patrem manus matres idolorum.

¹⁴⁰ Tertul. adv. Valent. c. 3. ¹⁴¹ See before, sect. 2.

¹⁴² Tertul. de Coron. Mil. c. 3. Aquam adituri, ibidem, sed et aliquanto prius in ecclesia, sub antistitis manu, contestamur nos renunciare diabolo, et pompæ et angelis ejus, &c.

¹⁴³ Hippolyt. de Consummat. Mundi. Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 346. Οἱ ναοὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ ὡς οἴκοι ἔσονται, καὶ καταστροφῆαι τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν πανταχοῦ γενήσονται.

¹⁴⁴ Vid. Combefis. Auctuar. Novissim. p. 57.

¹⁴⁵ Lamprid. Vit. Alex. c. 49. Cum Christiani quendam

locum, qui publicus fuerat, occupassent, contra popinarii dicerent, sibi eum deberi; rescripsit imperator, Melius esse ut quomodocunque illic Deus colatur, quam popinarii dedatur.

¹⁴⁶ Greg. Nyss. Vit. Greg. Thaumatur. t. 3. p. 567.

¹⁴⁷ Gregor. Thaumaturg. Epist. Canon. c. 11.

¹⁴⁸ Cypr. de Oper. et Eleemos. See sect. 2.

¹⁴⁹ Cypr. Ep. 55. al. 59. ad Cornel. Quid superest, quam ut ecclesia capitolio cedat, et recedentibus sacerdotibus ac Domini altare remorentibus, in cleri nostri sacrum venerandumque consessum simulacra atque idola cum aris suis transcant?

¹⁵⁰ Dionys. Ep. Canon. c. 2. ¹⁵¹ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 13.

¹⁵² See before, sect. 1. Ex Vopisco Vit. Aurelian.

¹⁵³ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30. cited sect. 3.

serves, that the number of Christians so grew and multiplied in that fifty years, that their ancient churches were not large enough to receive them, and therefore they erected from the foundations¹⁵⁴ more ample and spacious ones in every city.

The only objection against all this, made with any colour, is drawn from some of the ancient apologists, Origen,¹⁵⁵ Minucius Felix,¹⁵⁶ Arnobius,¹⁵⁷ and Lactantius,¹⁵⁸ who seem to say that the Christians in their time had no temples nor altars, nor ought to have any. But, as Mr. Mede shows at large, this is only spoken against such temples as the heathens pleaded for, in the notion of encloistering the Deity by an idol. For otherwise the very authors from whom the objection is drawn must strangely contradict themselves. For Arnobius¹⁵⁹ owns they had their conventicula, houses of assembly, which he complains were barbarously destroyed in the last persecution. And Lactantius¹⁶⁰ says the same, giving them also the name of the temples of God, which Diocletian ordered to be demolished, when he taught oratory in Bithynia. And Origen himself speaks¹⁶¹ of adorning the Christian churches and altars, in one of his homilies upon Joshua, translated literally by Ruffin.

Thus far Mr. Mede goes in his collections and answer to this objection; to which I shall add a few things which he has not observed. Lactantius, in another place of his Institutions,¹⁶² speaks of one of the Christian conventicula in a town in Phrygia, which the heathen burnt with the whole assembly in it. And in his book de Mortibus Persecutorum, published since Mr. Mede's death, he gives a more particular account of the destruction of churches throughout the world. For he not only mentions the demolishing the stately church of Nicomedia,¹⁶³ but intimates that the same fate attended the churches over all the world. For even in France, where the mild Constantius ruled, the persecution went so far as to pull down the churches,¹⁶⁴ though the men, the true temples of God, were spared, and sheltered under his gentle government. Lactantius lived in France at this time, being tutor to Crispus, the son of Constantine, and grandson of Constantius, and therefore he could not be mistaken in his relation. So that we must interpret Eusebius by him, when he says,¹⁶⁵ Constantius destroyed no churches: that is, he gave no positive orders, as the other emperors did, to destroy them, but he connived at such as pulled them down, in policy to satisfy the other emperors, and make the walls compound for the life and safety of the persons. However it was, both Eusebius and Lactantius agree in this, that there were churches in France before the last persecution. We have the like account of the churches of Britain given by Gildas, who says¹⁶⁶ in general of the last persecution, that it occasioned churches all over the world to be destroyed, and particularly in Britain; for the Christians built them new again from the ground when the persecution was over,¹⁶⁷ and founded others beside them, to be as so many public monuments and trophies of their martyrs. Optatus¹⁶⁸ takes notice of forty churches in Rome before the last persecution, which being taken from the Christians, were afterward restored to them by the order of Maxentius, as St. Austin¹⁶⁹ more than once informs us. In Africa we read of some churches that were demolished in this persecution, as at Zama and Furni, mentioned in the Gesta Purgationis¹⁷⁰ of Cecilian and Felix. Others were taken away, and in the mean time, till they were restored again, both councils and church assemblies were held in private houses, as Optatus¹⁷¹ observes of the council of Cirta, and St. Austin after him, who says, It was not to be wondered at, that a few bishops should hold a council¹⁷² in a private house in the heat of persecution, when the martyrs made no scruple in the like case to be baptized in prison, and Christians met in prison to celebrate the sacrament with the martyrs. But not to multiply instances of this nature, the very tenor of the imperial edicts, which raised the last per-¹⁵⁴ Euseb. lib. 8. c. 1. ¹⁵⁵ Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 8. p. 389.

¹⁵⁶ Minuc. Octav. p. 29.

¹⁵⁷ Arnob. adv. Gent. lib. 6. ¹⁵⁸ Lactant. lib. 2. c. 2.

¹⁵⁹ Arnob. lib. 4. p. 152. cited before, sect. 7.

¹⁶⁰ Lactant. lib. 5. c. 2. cited sect. 6.

¹⁶¹ Origen. Homil. 10. in Josua. ¹⁶² Lact. 1. 5. c. 11.

¹⁶³ Lact. de Mort. Persecut. c. 12. Illud editissimum paucis horis solo adæquarunt.

¹⁶⁴ Ibid. c. 15. Constantius, ne dissentire videretur a majoribus præceptis, conventicula, id est, parietes, qui restitui poterant, dirui passus est, verum autem Dei templum, quod est in hominibus, incolume servavit.

¹⁶⁵ Euseb. lib. 8. c. 13. μήτε τοὺς οἴκους τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν κατελλών.

¹⁶⁶ Gildas de Excid. Britan. in initio. Ad persecutionem Diocletiani tyranni novennem, in qua subversæ per totum mundum sunt ecclesie, &c.

¹⁶⁷ Ibid. Renovant ecclesias ad solum usque destructas, basilicas sanctorum martyrum fundant, construunt, perficiunt, ac veluti victicia signa passim propalant. Vide Bedæ Hist. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 6 et 8, who speaks almost in the words of Gildas.

¹⁶⁸ Optat. lib. 2. p. 49. Quadraginta basilicas.

¹⁶⁹ Aug. Brevic. Collat. die 3. c. 18. It. lib. post Collationem, c. 13.

¹⁷⁰ Gesta Purgat. p. 276. Et Zamæ et Furnis dirui basilicas et uri Scripturas vidi.

¹⁷¹ Optat. lib. 1. p. 39. Apud Cirtam civitatem, quia basilicæ nedum fuerant restitutæ, in domum Urbani Charisi condescerunt, &c.

¹⁷² Aug. Brevic. Collat. die 3. c. 17. Non esse incredibile, quod in privatam domum pauci illi episcopi persecutionis tempore convenerunt, ut fervente persecutione etiam in carcere doceantur baptizati martyres, et illic a Christianis celebrata sacramenta, ubi Christiani propter eadem sacramenta tenebantur inclusi.

secution, is undeniable evidence, that the Christians in all parts of the world had then their public churches, to which they resorted so long as they had opportunity to frequent them. For Eusebius¹⁷³ says, The edicts were sent over all the world, commanding the churches to be levelled with the ground, and the Bibles to be burnt. Which is also noted by Theodoret,¹⁷⁴ St. Jerom,¹⁷⁵ and the Acts of Purgation of Cecilian and Felix¹⁷⁶ at the end of Optatus. So that a man might as well question whether the Christians had Bibles, as whether they had churches before the last persecution. The defenders of the contrary opinion here always give up the cause, and contradict themselves: for when they have urged the authority of Arnobius and Lactantius, against Christians having any temples, they are forced to confess from the foresaid evidences, that they had churches whilst Arnobius and Lactantius lived, that is, within the third century; which is to grant and deny the same thing, and load both themselves and those ancient authors with a manifest contradiction. To the testimonies cited by Mr. Mede in the middle of the third century, the reader may add that remarkable story told by Eusebius, concerning the martyr Marinus, anno 259, in the time of Gallienus. Marinus being a candidate for a Roman office at Cæsarea, was informed against as a Christian by an antagonist, who pleaded, that he ought not to have the office upon that score: the judge upon examination finding it to be so, gives him three hours' time to consider, whether he would quit his religion, or his life. During this space, Theotecnus, bishop of Cæsarea, meets with him, and taking him by the hand, carries him to the church,¹⁷⁷ and sets him by the holy table, then offers him a Bible and a sword, and bids him take his choice. He readily, without any demur, lays his hand upon the Bible; whereupon the bishop thus bespake him: Adhere, says he, adhere to God, and in his strength enjoy what thou hast chosen, and go in peace. With this he immediately returns from the church to the judge, makes his confession, receives his sentence, and dies a martyr. Who that reads this story can question, whether the worshipping-places which Gallienus is said a little before¹⁷⁸ to have restored to the Christians, were properly churches, with holy tables, or altars, in them? To the testimonies cited from Tertullian may be added one more, where he plainly distinguishes the parts of their churches, as the discipline of their penitents then required. For, speaking of the unnatural sins of uncleanness, he says, All such monsters were excluded,¹⁷⁹ not only from the nave or body of the church, but from every part of it: they were obliged to stand without-door in the open air, and not allowed to come under the roof of it. This discipline was in the church of Antioch, in the time of Babylas, anno 247, when, according to the account given by St. Chrysostom¹⁸⁰ and Eusebius,¹⁸¹ Babylas excluded the emperor Philip from the church, with all his guards about him, on Easter eve, and would not suffer him to pray with the faithful, till he had set himself in the place of the penitents, μετανοίας χώρα, Eusebius calls it, and there made confession of his crimes. I stand not now critically to inquire into the truth of this history, which some learned men¹⁸² question, and others defend: ¹⁸³ it is sufficient to our present purpose, that both Eusebius and St. Chrysostom give us such an account of the ancient churches, as necessarily supposes them distinct from common habitations in the middle of the third century. Nay, St. Austin,¹⁸⁴ and the author of the Comments under the name of St. Ambrose,¹⁸⁵ say expressly, that as soon as the religion of Christ was planted in the world, churches were built, to pray for kings, and all that are in authority, &c., according to the apostle's direction, 1 Tim. ii. 1; upon which St. Austin finds the use and building of churches. I lay no stress upon the Martyrologies, nor such writers as Abdias Babylonius and Anacletus, which speak of churches built in Persia by Simon and Jude, and at Alexandria by St. Mark, and at Rome by St. Peter, because these are late and spurious writings: but yet, if we may judge of the first conversions by those that happened in the time of Constantine, we may conclude, that as soon as any people were converted, they provided themselves churches for Divine service. As when Frumentius had converted the Indians, Socrates¹⁸⁶ says, he immediately built churches among them; which is confirmed by Ruffin, who not only takes notice of that, but says further, that before he had converted them, meeting with some Roman merchants that were Christians, he encouraged them to build themselves oratories in all places, whither they might resort for prayer, after ¹⁷³ Euseb. lib. 8. c. 2. ¹⁷⁴ Theodor. lib. 5. c. 39.

¹⁷⁵ Hieron. Com. in Zecha. cap. 8.

¹⁷⁶ Gesta Purgat. p. 277. Ubi Scripturæ inveniuntur, ipsa domus diruitur.

¹⁷⁷ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 15. Ἐπὶ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν προάγει, εἶσω τε πρὸς αὐτῷ πῆσας τῷ ἀγιάσματι, &c.

¹⁷⁸ Ibid. c. 13.

¹⁷⁹ Reliquas autem libidinum furias impias, et in corpora et in sexus, ultra jura naturæ, non modo limine, verum omni ecclesiæ tecto submovemus, quia non sunt delicta, sed monstra. Tertul. de Pudicit. c. 4.

¹⁸⁰ Chrysost. cont. Gentil. t. l. p. 741. Τὸν βασιλέα τῶν τῆς ἐκκλησίας προθύρον ἐξήλασε, &c. Vid. p. 741.

¹⁸¹ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 31. ¹⁸² Cave, Prim. Christ. p. 46.

¹⁸³ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 247. n. 6. Huetius Origenian. lib. 1. c. 3. n. 12.

¹⁸⁴ Aug. cont. Faust. lib. 12. c. 36. Ex hoc quippe illis credentibus constructa sunt domicilia pacis, basilicæ Christianarum congregationum.

¹⁸⁵ Ambros. in Ephes. iv. Ubi omnia loca circumplexa est ecclesia, conventicula constituta sunt, &c.

¹⁸⁶ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 19. Εὐκτήρια πολλά ἰδρῆι, &c.

the custom of the Romans.¹⁸⁷ Theodoret,¹⁸⁸ and Socrates, and Ruffin observe the same in the conversion of the nation of the Iberians by a captive woman, who taught them to build churches after the Roman form; which they did, and then sent ambassadors to Constantine (in whose time both these conversions happened) to desire him to send them priests, to carry on the work they had thus begun, and to minister in their churches. Now, we may reasonably conclude, that some such thing was observed in all conversions from the very first, allowing for the difference betwixt times of persecution and times of peace. For though they had not such public and stately edifices at some times, as they had at others; yet they always had places peculiarly set apart for Divine worship, before the peaceable reign of Constantine, as the evidences produced above do undeniably prove.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN CHURCHES IN THE FIRST AGES AND THOSE THAT FOLLOWED: AND OF HEATHEN TEMPLES AND JEWISH SYNAGOGUES CONVERTED INTO CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

See, I.
The first churches very simple and plain. THE only remaining objection against what has been advanced in the last chapter, is taken from a passage or two of the ancients, which seem to imply, that there was a great difference between the apostolical age and those that followed, in reference to this business of churches. Isidore of Pelusium, treating of this matter, says, In the apostles' days there were¹ no churches, that is, buildings or temples, when spiritual gifts abounded, and a holy conversation was the bright ornament of the church: but in our days the buildings are adorned more than is necessary, whilst the church is fallen into disgrace. And therefore, were I at liberty to choose, I should rather have wished to have lived in those days, when there were no such beautified temples, but yet the church was crowned with Divine and heavenly graces; than in these days, when temples are adorned with all kinds of marble, but the church is deprived of all those spiritual gifts. These words, if they be taken in the strictest sense, may seem to import, that in the age of the apostles there were no churches builded; for beyond the apostolical age he carries not the comparison: but I rather take him to mean, that the apostles had not such churches as they had in his time, that is, so stately and magnificent, so rich and beautiful, as many in after ages. Which is certainly true: for in the first conversion of any nation the churches were always answerable to the state and condition the converts were in, which was commonly a state of persecution, when not many rich, not many noble were called. Nay, even in those places, where kings gave encouragement to the propagation of the faith, churches were another thing from what they are now, as we may learn from the history of our own nation. There was a time, Bede tells us, when there was not a stone church in all the land, but the custom was to build them all of wood: and therefore, when Bishop Ninyas built a church of stone, it was such² a rarity and unusual thing among the Britons, that they called the place Candida Casa, Whitern, or Whitchurch, upon it. The same author tells us,³ that Finan, the second bishop of Lindisfarne or Holy Island, since called the bishopric of Durham, built a church in the island fit for a cathedral see, which yet was not of stone, but only timber sawed, and covered with reed; and so it continued, till Eadbert, the seventh bishop, took away the reed, and covered it all over, both roof and sides, with sheets of lead. No one after this will wonder at the account which Sulpicius Severus⁴ gives of the churches of Cyrene in the deserts of Libya, when he tells us, he went with a presbyter into one of them, which was made of small rods interwoven one with another, and not much more stately and ambitious than his own house, in which a man could hardly stand upright. But the men who frequented these churches, were men of the golden age and purest morals: they neither bought nor sold any thing; they knew not what fraud or theft was; they neither had, nor desired to have, silver or gold, which other mortals set such a value upon. For, says he, when I offered the presbyter ten pieces of gold, he refused them, telling me with some greatness of mind, that the church was not built with gold, but rather unbuilt by it, Ecclesiam auro non strui, sed potius destrui, altiore consilio protestatus. These instances may serve to explain Isidore's meaning, when he says, The ¹⁸⁷ Ruffin. lib. 1. c. 9. Monere cepit, ut conventicula per loca singula facerent, ad quæ Romano ritu orationis causa confluerent.

¹⁸⁸ Theod. lib. 1. c. 24. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 20. Ruffin. lib. 1. c. 10.

¹ Isidor. Pelus. lib. 2. Ep. 246. Ἐπὶ μὲν τῶν ἀποστόλων ἐκκλησιαστήρια οὐκ ἦν, &c.

² Bede, Hist. lib. 3. c. 4. Vulgo vocatur, ad candidam casam, eo quod ibi ecclesiam de lapide, insolito Britonibus more, fecerit.

³ Bede, lib. 3. c. 25. Finan in insula Lindisfarnensi fecit ecclesiam episcopali sedi congruam. Quam tamen more Scotorum, non de lapide, sed de robore secto, totam composuit atque arundine textit.—Sed episcopus loci illius Eadbert, ablata arundine, eam totam, hoc est, et tectum et ipsos quoque parietes ejus plumbi laminis co-operire curavit.

⁴ Sulpit. Sever. Dial. 1. c. 2. Erat vilibus contexta virgultis, non multo ambitiosior quam nostri hospitis tabernaculum, in quo nisi incurvus quis non poterat consistere, &c.

apostolical age had no churches, or not such rich and noble structures, as the peace, and affluence, and emulation of after ages commonly produced.

Indeed there were many visible reasons, why the state of the structures must needs alter in proportion to the advancement of the state of religion itself. For times of peace and persecution looked with a very different aspect, and had a very different influence upon the affairs of the church. Persecution was always attended with poverty, paucity of believers, and unsettled hopes: so that either they needed not stately and sumptuous buildings, or they were not able to erect them; or at least they had no invitation and encouragement to do it, whilst they were under daily apprehensions of seeing them plundered or demolished almost as soon as they had erected them. But in times of peace great multitudes of converts forsook the temples, and came over to the church, and those many times persons of fortune and quality; and in some of the heathen reigns the church enjoyed a more serene and uninterrupted gale of tranquillity, as in that happy interval of near fifty years, between the death of St. Cyprian and the last persecution: and then there was a necessity to build more ample and stately churches, and they had ability to do it, and were not without hopes of continuing to enjoy their works of piety in a settled and lasting peace. So that then, in that promising interval, as Eusebius⁵ observes, when Diocletian's court and family were almost all become Christians, and great multitudes of believers in all cities came over daily to the faith; their ancient fabrics could not contain them, but they built them more ample and spacious churches in every city from the foundation. And when many of these had been destroyed in the long decennial persecution, they were again rebuilt from the ground more lofty and beautiful than they were before, as the same Eusebius words it,⁶ as soon as Constantine had revived the Christians' hopes, by publishing his edicts in favour of their religion.

But now there were two other reasons concurred, after the emperors were become Christians, which contributed much toward the state and magnificence of Christian churches. Which were, first, the great liberality and munificence of the emperors themselves, who were at great expense in erecting many noble fabrics in several cities to the honour of Christ; and, secondly, their orders for converting heathen temples into churches. Constantine spared no charge to erect, beautify, and adorn churches in all parts of the East, as at Jerusalem, Antioch, Nicomedia, Mambre, Heliopolis in Phœnicia, and many other places, of which the reader that pleases may find a particular account in Eusebius and Socrates:⁷ but especially at Constantinople, where among others he built the beautiful church called ecclesia Constantiniana, to the memory of the twelve apostles; which, as Eusebius describes it,⁸ was vastly high, and yet had all its walls covered with marble, its roof overlaid with gold, and the outside, instead of tiles, covered with gilded brass. He also laid the foundation of the famous temple called Sancta Sophia, and Magna, which was finished and dedicated thirty-four years after by his son Constantius, anno 360, who joined the temple of Peace to it, (which was another church built by Constantine,) including them both in one, as Socrates⁹ and the author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum inform us.¹⁰ Constantine's example was followed by the succeeding emperors, but more especially by Justinian, who, among many other works of this nature, rebuilt the church of S. Sophia, which had been burnt down in the time of Anastasius. And now it became the glory of the world for its greatness, curious architecture, richness, and beauty; insomuch that Justinian himself, having finished it, was heard to say, Νενίκηκά σε, Σολομών, I have outdone thee, Solomon. They who are desirous to read the particular description of this church, may find it briefly delineated in Evagrius,¹¹ Procopius,¹² and Agathius,¹³ but more fully and exactly by Paulus Silentiarius, and his learned commentator Du Fresne, whose accurate knowledge in these matters exceeds all that ever came before him. I have extracted out of him such observations as I thought necessary to my own design, but they that please to peruse the whole may find it at the end of Johannes Cinnamus, among the Byzantine historians, published at Paris, 1670.

The other reason, which I said contributed toward the magnificence of Christian churches, was the orders of several emperors for converting heathen temples into churches. At first indeed, whilst the reformation from heathenism was in its infancy, no idol-temples were made use of as churches, but they were either permitted to the heathen for some time, or else shut up, or demolished. Till the 25th year of Constantine, i. e. anno 333, the temples were in a great measure tolerated; but in that year he published his laws, commanding temples, altars, and images to be destroyed, which laws are sometimes referred to in the Theodosian Code.¹⁴ And pursuant to these laws, a great many temples were defaced

Sect. 3. Particularly the munificence of Christian emperors contributed toward this.

Sect. 4. As also their orders for converting heathen temples into churches.

⁵ Euseb. lib. 8. c. 1. ⁶ Ibid. lib. 10. c. 2.
⁷ Euseb. de Vita Constant. lib. 3. c. 50 et 51. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 16, 17, 18.
⁸ Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. 4. c. 58.

⁹ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 16.
¹⁰ Chronic. Alex. an. 360. p. 685. ¹¹ Evagr. lib. 4. c. 31.
¹² Procop. de Edific. Justin. lib. 1. c. 1. ¹³ Agath. lib. 5.
¹⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 17. de Sepulchris violatis, Leg. 2.

in all parts of the world, and their revenues confiscated, as appears not only from the Christian writers, St. Jerom,¹⁵ and Eusebius,¹⁶ and others, but also from the complaints of the heathen writers, Eunapius,¹⁷ Libanius,¹⁸ and Julian.¹⁹ In some of the following reigns also the same method was taken, to shut up or to deface the temples, as is evident from the account which Ruffin²⁰ gives of the general destruction of them in Egypt by the order of Valentinian. But in the next reign, in the time of Theodosius, another method was taken with some of them. For as Gothofred observes²¹ out of the Chronicon Alexandrinum, anno 379, Theodosius turned the famous temple of Heliopolis, called Balanium, into a Christian church, ἐποίησε αὐτοῖς ἐκκλησίαν χριστιανῶν. And about the same time, Socrates tells us, that when Valens had banished the two Macarii, the heads of the Egyptian monks, into a pagan island, they converted all the inhabitants, and turned²² their temple into the form of a church. The like was done by the famous temple of the dea caelestis at Carthage, by Aurelius the bishop, in the time of Honorius, anno 399, which the author of the book de Prædictionibus, under the name of Prosper,²³ tells with this remarkable circumstance, that it had been dedicated before by one Aurelius, a heathen high priest, with this inscription, Aurelius pontifex dedicavit, which our author says was left in the frontispiece, to be read by all the people, because by God's providence it was fulfilled again in Aurelius the bishop, for whom it served as well as the former Aurelius, when he had once dedicated it to the use and service of the Christian religion, and set his chair in the place of the goddess. Not long after this, Honorius, anno 403, published two laws in the Western empire, forbidding the destruction of any more temples in cities, because they might serve for ornament or public use,²⁴ being once purged of all unlawful furniture, idols, and altars, which he ordered to be destroyed wherever they were found. These laws, as Gothofred rightly observes, seem to have been published at the instance of the African fathers, who, as appears from one of the canons²⁵ of the African Code, petitioned the emperor, that such temples as were in the country only and private places, not serving for any ornament, might be destroyed. Arcadius published such another law for the Eastern empire, which relates only to the destruction of temples in country places,²⁶ and not in cities, where now there was no such danger of superstition, since they might be converted to a better use. And upon this ground the author under the name of Prosper²⁷ commends Honorius for his piety and devotion, because he gave all the temples with their adjacent places to the church, only requiring the idols to be destroyed. It is true, indeed, after this we find a law of Theodosius junior,²⁸ commanding all temples to be destroyed. But, as Gothofred seems rightly to interpret it, the word destroying in that law is to be understood only of despoiling them of their superstition, because it follows in the same law, that they were to be expiated by placing the sign of the cross upon them, which was a token of their being turned into churches. And his observation may be confirmed further from what Evagrius²⁹ reports of Theodosius, that he turned the Tycheum, or temple of Fortune, at Antioch, into a church, called by the name of Ignatius. The like was done by a great temple at Tanis in Egypt, as Valesius³⁰ has observed out of the Itinerary of Antoninus the martyr. Cluver, also, in his description of Italy, takes notice of a place in the Jerusalem Itinerary, called Sacraria, betwixt Fulginum and Spoletum, near the head of the river Clitumnus, which he thinks³¹ was originally no other than the temple of Jupiter Clitumnus; though another learned antiquary³² makes it something doubtful as to the present church now standing there. However, we ¹⁵ Hieron. Chronic. an. 332.

¹⁶ Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. 3. c. 54.

¹⁷ Eunap. Vit. Ædesii.

¹⁸ Liban. Orat. pro Templis, p. 9. Et Orat. Apologetic. 26. p. 591.

¹⁹ Julian. Orat. 7. p. 424.

²⁰ Ruffin. lib. 2. c. 28.

²¹ Gothofred. Com. in Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 10. de Pagan. Leg. 25.

²² Socrat. lib. 4. c. 24. Τὸ δὲ σχῆμα τοῦ ναοῦ εἰς ἐκκλησίας τύπον μεταποιήσαντες, &c.

²³ Prosper. de Promission. lib. 3. c. 38. Antistes Aurelius, cælestis jam patriæ civis, cathedram illie loco cælestis et habuit, et sedit. Ipse tunc aderam cum sociis et amicis, atque (ut se adolescentium ætas impatiens circumquaque vertebat) dum curiosi singula quæ pro magnitudine inspicimus, mirum quoddam et incredibile nostro se ingessit aspectui, titulus æneis grandioribusque literis in frontispicio templi conscriptus, Aurelius pontifex dedicavit. Hunc legentes populi mirabantur. Præsgo tunc spiritu acta, quæ præscius Dei ordo certo isto fine concluderat.

²⁴ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 10. de Pagan. Leg. 18. Ædes illicitis rebus vacuas, ne quis conetur evertere. Decernimus enim, ut ædificiorum quidem sit integer status. It. Leg. 19. Ædificia ipsa templorum, quæ in civitatibus vel oppidis, vel extra oppida sunt, ad usum publicum vindicentur: aræ locis omnibus destruantur.

²⁵ Cod. Afric. can. 58.

²⁶ Cod. Th. lib. 16. Tit. 10. de Pagan. Leg. 16. Si qua in agris templa sunt, sine turba et tumultu diruantur. His enim dejectis, omnis superstitionis materia consumetur.

²⁷ Prosper. de Promiss. lib. 3. c. 38. Honorius Christiana religione ac devotione præditus. Templa omnia cum suis adjacentibus spatiis, ecclesiis contulit: simulque eorum simulacra confringenda in potestatem dedit.

²⁸ Cod. Th. ibid. Leg. 25. Cuncta eorum fana, templa, delubra, si qua nunc etiam restant integra, præcepto magistratum destrui, conlocatione venerandæ Christianæ religionis signi expiari præcipimus.

²⁹ Evagr. lib. 1. c. 16. Σηκὸς εὐαγῆς καὶ τέμενος ἄγιον τῷ Ἰγνατίῳ τὸ πάλαι τυχεῖον γέγονε.

³⁰ Vales. Not. in Sozomen. lib. 5. c. 21. Immensum fuit ibi templum, quod modo est ecclesia.

³¹ Cluver. Ital. Vetus, p. 702.

³² Holsten. Annot. in Cluver. p. 124.

have seen instances enough of this practice; and Bede³³ tells us, That Gregory the Great gave Austin the monk instructions of the same nature, about the temples here among the Saxons in Britain, that if they were well built, they should not be destroyed, but only be converted from the worship of devils to the service of the true God; and so he observes it was done at Rome, where, not long after, Boniface IV. turned the heathen temple, called the Pantheon, into the church of All Saints,³⁴ in the time of the emperor Phocas. Sometimes the temples were pulled down, and the materials were given to the church, out of which new edifices were erected for the service of religion, as Sozomen³⁵ and Ruffin³⁶ particularly observe of the temples of Bacchus and Serapis at Alexandria. I have already showed³⁷ out of Ausonius, that the Roman halls, or basilicæ, were likewise turned into churches. The like is reported of some Jewish synagogues by the author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum, who takes notice particularly³⁸ of a synagogue of the Samaritans in a place called Gargarida, which Zeno the emperor converted into a large Christian church.

And though it is not agreed by learned men, whether the temples said to be built by Hadrian were intended for the worship of himself, or the worship of Christ; for Casaubon³⁹ and Pagi⁴⁰ think he designed them for himself, whilst Huetius⁴¹ defends Lampridius his relation, who says he designed them for the honour of Christ; yet it is certain, that after they had been used to other purposes, they were at last some of them turned into Christian churches. For Epiphanius says,⁴² there was a great temple at Tiberias, called the Hadrianum, which the Jews made use of for a bath, but Josephus Comes, the converted Jew, in the time of Constantine, turned it into a church. And the like was done by another of them by Athanasius at Alexandria, having before been the hall or palace of Licinius, as the same Epiphanius⁴³ informs us. So that now, partly by the munificence of the emperors, building churches at their own charge, and partly by their orders for converting heathen temples into churches, and partly by the great liberality and zeal of private Christians in times of peace, churches became another thing from what they were in former ages, that is, more noble and stately edifices, more rich and beautiful, under which advantage we are next to take a view of them in the following part of this book.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE DIFFERENT FORMS AND PARTS OF THE ANCIENT CHURCHES: AND FIRST, OF THE EXTERIOR NARTHEX, OR ANTE-TEMPLE.

IT may easily be collected from what has been discoursed in the former chapter, that anciently churches were not all built precisely in one form or figure. For since both heathen temples and public halls were turned into churches, it can hardly be imagined, that all these should happen to be built exactly in the same form. Nor indeed was there any universal rule among Christians about this matter. The author of the Constitutions seems to intimate, that they were generally oblong, in the figure of a ship.¹ This figure was otherwise called dromical, δρομικόν, because, as Leo Allatius² and Suicerus³ after him conjecture, churches built in this form had void spaces for deambulation. And this is said to be the figure of the famous church of Sancta Sophia at Constantinople, by Paulus Silentarius and other writers. But this figure was not so general but that we meet with churches in other forms. For the church which Constantine built over our Saviour's sepulchre at Mount Golgotha, was round, as we learn from Eusebius,⁴ and Walafridus Strabo.⁵ That which he built at Antioch, Eusebius⁶ says, was an octagon: and such was the church of Nazianzum, built by Gregory the father of Gregory Nazianzen, as we find in the son's funeral oration⁷ upon his father, who describes it as having eight sides equal to one another. Other churches were built in the form of a cross, as that of Simeon Stylites, mentioned by Evagrius.⁸ And the church of the apostles built by Constantine at Constantinople, was in this form likewise, as we learn from Gregory Nazianzen in his Somnium Anastasiæ, who thus describes it: Carm. 9. tom. 2. p. 79.

Σὺν τοῖς καὶ μεγάλαινον ἔδος Χριστοῦ μαθητῶν,
 Πλευραῖς ταυροτύποις τετραχὰ τεμνόμενον.

³³ Bede, lib. 1. c. 30.
³⁴ Ibid. lib. 2. c. 4.
³⁵ Sozomen. lib. 7. c. 15.
³⁶ Ruffin. lib. 2. c. 23.
³⁷ See chap. 1. n. 5.
³⁸ Chron. Alex. an. 10. Zenon. p. 757. 'Ἐποίησε τὴν συναγωγὴν αὐτῶν, τὴν ἕσαν εἰς τὸ καλούμενον γαργαρίδην, ἐκτῆριον οἶκον μέγαν, &c.
³⁹ Casaubon. Not. in Lamprid. Vit. Alex. Severi, p. 170.
⁴⁰ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 134. n. 4.
⁴¹ Huet, Demonstrat. Evangel. Propos. 3. p. 65.
⁴² Epiphani. Hær. 30. Ebionit. n. 12.

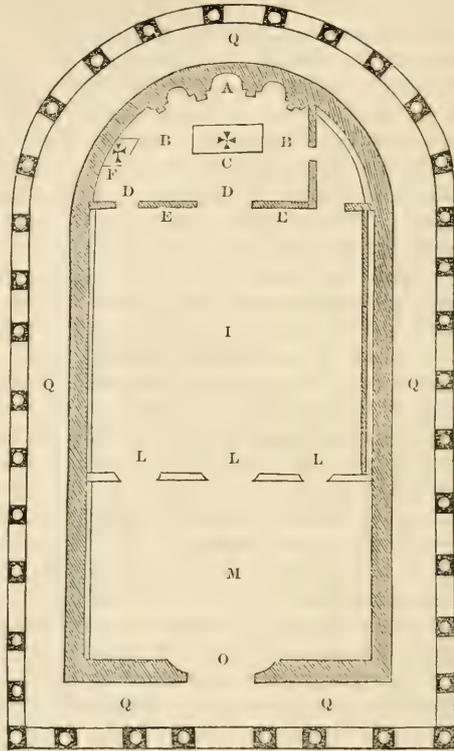

⁴³ Epiphani. Hær. 69. Arian. n. 2.
¹ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. 'Ὁ οἶκος ἔτω ἐπιμήκης, ὅπως ἔοικε νηϊ.
² Allatius, de Templis Græcorum.
³ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Ναός.
⁴ Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. 3. c. 38.
⁵ Strabo de Rebus Eccl. c. 4.
⁶ Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib. 3. c. 50. 'Ἐν ὀκταῖδρον σχήματι.
⁷ Naz. Orat. 19. de Laud. Patr. p. 313.
⁸ Evagr. lib. 1. c. 14.

ICHOGRAPHIA TEMPLORUM ORIENTALIUM.

Ichnographia Templorum Beveregii.

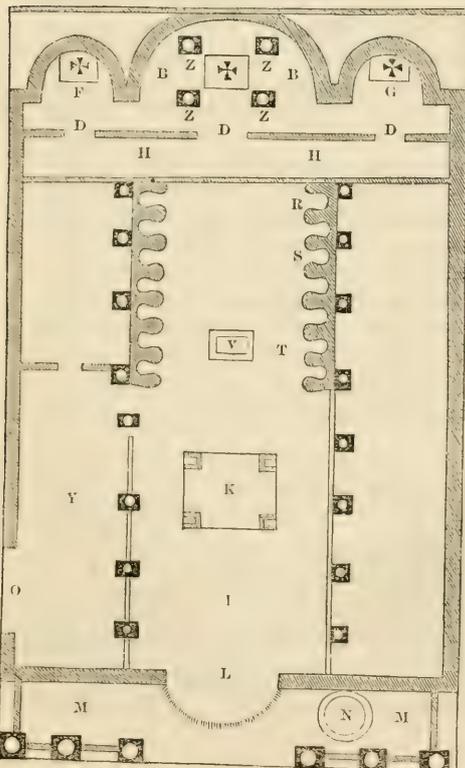

Ichnographia Leonis Allatii.

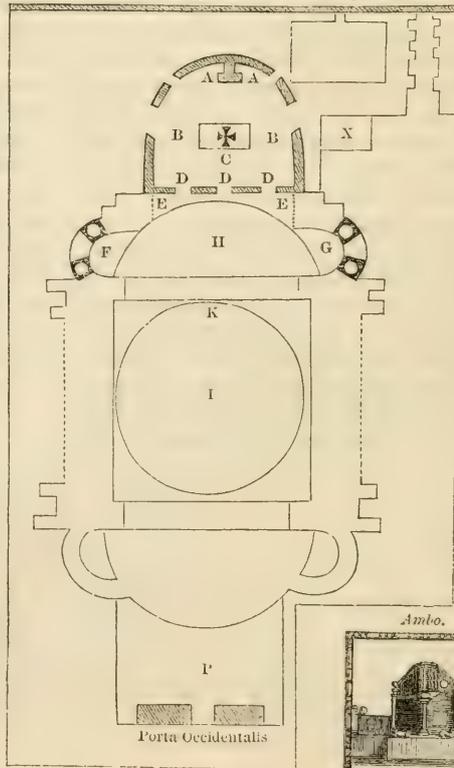

- A Synthronus.
- B S. Bema.
- C Altare.
- D Portæ sanctæ.
- E Cancelli bema-tis.
- F Prothesis.
- G Diaconicum.
- H Solea.
- I Naos.
- K Ambo.
- L Portæ speciosæ.
- M Narthex.
- N Baptisterium.
- O Magnæ portæ.
- P Porticus.
- Q Circuitus.
- R Locus episcopi extra S. bema.
- S Locus diaconorum.
- T Locus lectorum.
- V Pulpitum.
- X Sedes imperialis.
- Y Locus mulierum.
- Z Ciborium.

Ichnographia Jacobi Goar.

Ichnographia partis interioris S. Sophiæ.

Ambo.

Porta Occidentalis

Among these stood the stately church of the Apostles of Christ, dividing itself into four wings in the form of a cross. These were sometimes made so by the addition of a wing of building on each side, (which wings the Greeks call apsides;) as Cedrenus⁹ and Zonaras observe in the Life of Justin junior, who added two of these apsides to the church of Blachernæ, and so made it resemble the form of a cross. Valesius has also observed¹⁰ out of the Itinerary of Antoninus the martyr, that the church which Constantine built at Mambre, was in a quadrangular or square figure, with an open court in the middle, so as one part of it was made use of by the Jews, and the other by the Christians. Some churches were also called octachora, but, as Valesius rightly observes, those were the same with the octagones, as appears from this ancient inscription in Gruter:¹¹

Octachorum sanctos templum surrexit in usus,
Octagonus fons est munere dignus eo.

Suicerus and Allatius take notice also of another form of churches, which they call τρολλωτά, κυλινδρωτά, θολωτά, and κυκλοειδῆ, that is, round, in the figure of an arch, or sphere, or a cylinder, or a shield, or a circle, as the Pantheon at Rome was said to be. But this, properly speaking, was not so much the form of a church, as the figure of one part of some churches, as particularly that of Sancta Sophia, the body of which was built in the form of a trulla, that is, a great round arch or sphere, but yet the whole was oblong, resembling the form of other churches, as the reader may judge by comparing the several figures in the following table, whereof one is that of Sancta Sophia, taken from Du Fresne's Constantinopolis Christiana, another from Dr. Beverege in his Pandects, a third from Leo Allatius, and a fourth from Goar; all which being contracted and put together by Schelstrate in his Concilium Antiochenum, are here represented from his copy, with the proper names referring to each part of them. To these I have added another figure representing the stately church of Tyre, built by Paulinus, and described by Eusebius¹² in his panegyric oration upon the church and the founder of it, which the curious reader may see at large in the tenth book of his Ecclesiastical History. I shall here in a great measure follow his description, as one of the most ancient and authentic that we have, only intermixing such other things as are necessary to explain the forms and parts of other churches, since, as I have observed, they were not all alike, but differed in form, in site, and in several parts from one another.

To begin with their situation or posture: they were commonly so placed, as that the front or chief entrances were toward the west, and the sanctuary or altar part toward the east: yet in some churches it was otherwise, as is evident from the observation made by Soerates¹³ upon the church of Antioch, that it stood in a different posture from other churches; for the altar did not look toward the east, but toward the west. Which observation is also made by Paulinus Nolanus¹⁴ upon one of his own structures. And the temple of the other Paulinus at Tyre seems to have stood the same way. For Eusebius describes the entrance to it, and not the altar part, as fronting the rising sun. So that though the author of the Constitutions,¹⁵ among other rules of this nature, gives directions for building churches toward the east, yet it appears from these instances, that the practice was not so universal, but that it admitted of exceptions, as necessity or expediency required. Which observation has been made not only by Bishop Usher,¹⁶ and Cardinal Bona,¹⁷ but long before them by Walafridus Strabo, who says,¹⁸ 'The ancients were not nicely curious which way their churches stood, but yet the most usual custom was for Christians to pray toward the east, and therefore the greatest part of the churches were built with a respect to that custom. But St. Patrick in Ireland, as Bishop Usher observes¹⁹ out of Jocelin, the writer of his Life, varied from all others: for he built a church in Sabul, hard by Down in Ulster, which fronted neither east nor west, but stood from north to south, ab aquilonali parte versus meridianam plagam. So that ecclesiastical history affords us instances, if we make a curious inquiry, of churches standing in all postures.

Next, to consider the several parts of the ancient churches, we are to observe, that as in the temple of God at Jerusalem, not only the holy and the most holy were reckoned parts of the temple, but also the outward courts, and even the court of the Gentiles, which is expressly called the house of God, and the house of prayer; so in Christian churches, which were built with some regard to the Jewish temple, the whole ambitus or circumference about

Sect. 3.
Commonly divided into three parts, and sometimes four or five.

⁹ Cedren. Vit. Justin. in Compend. Hist. p. 390.

¹⁰ Antonin. ap. Vales. Not. in Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. 3. c. 53. Est ibi basilica aedificata per quadrum, et atrium in medio discoopertum, &c.

¹¹ Gruter. Thesaur. p. 1166. ¹² Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4.

¹³ Soerat. lib. 5. c. 22. Ἡ ἐκκλησία ἀντίτροφον ἔχει τὴν Ζεᾶσιν ἢ γὰρ πρὸς ἀνατολὴν τὸ Ζωσιαστῆριον, ἀλλὰ πρὸς δύσιν ὁρᾷ.

¹⁴ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. Prospectus basilicæ non, ut usitator moestem, orientem spectat, sed ad Domini mei beati felicis basilicam pertinet, memoriam ejus aspiciens.

¹⁵ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57.

¹⁶ Usher. Letter. 49. ad Selden.

¹⁷ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 20. n. 4.

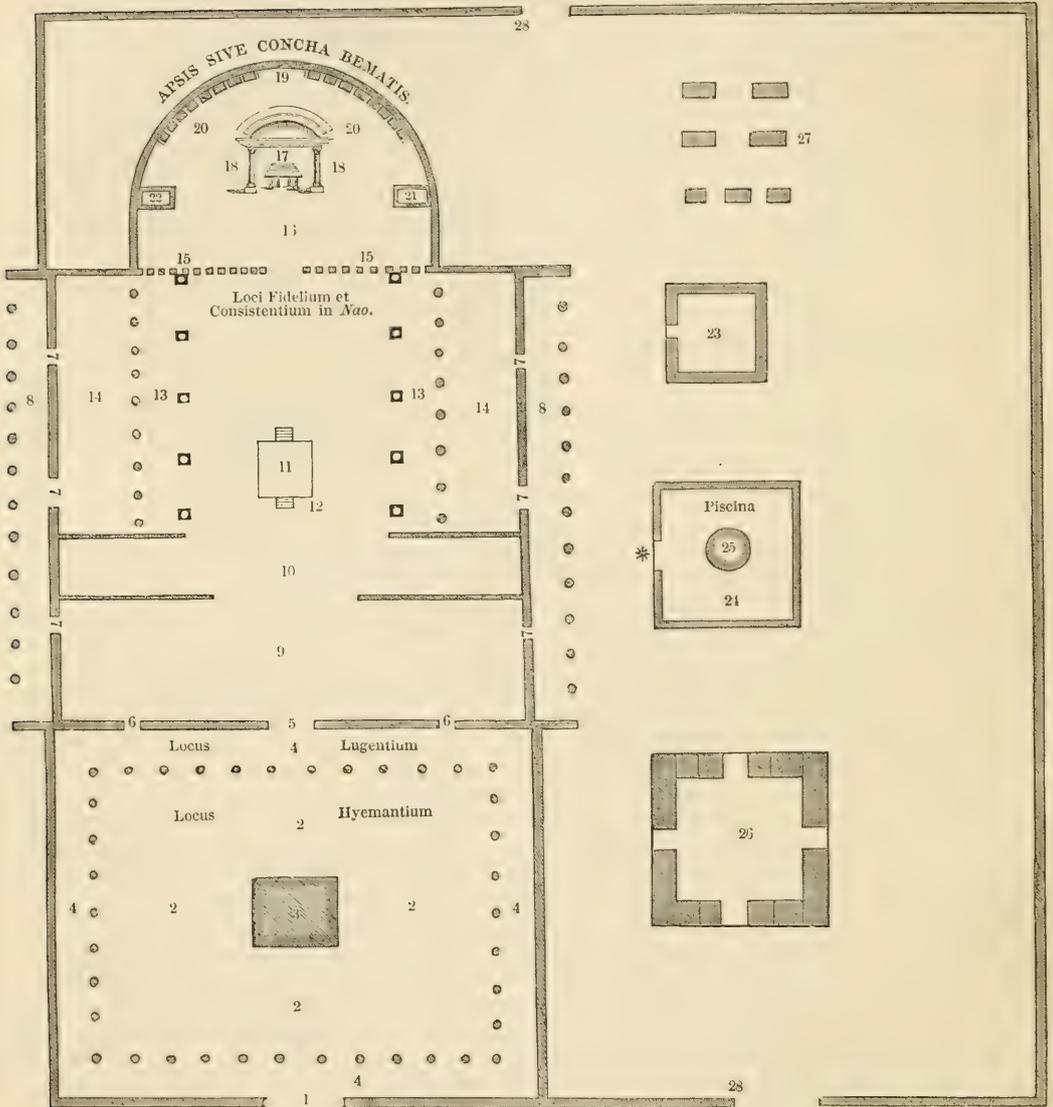

¹⁸ Strabo de Rebus Eccl. c. 4.

¹⁹ Usher's Letters, Ep. 49.

THE PLAN OF AN ANCIENT CHURCH,

WITH ITS EXEDRÆ,

AS DESCRIBED BY EUSEBIUS AND OTHER WRITERS.

- 1 Propylæum, or vestibulum magnum, the great porch, or first entrance into the area before the church.
- 2 The μεσαύδιον, atrium, or area, leading from the porch to the church.
- 3 Cantharus, or phiale, the fountain of water in the middle of the square.
- 4 The porticos or cloisters about the area, otherwise called the exterior narthex of the church, and place of mourners.
- 5 The great gate into the church.
- 6 The two lesser gates on each side of the other.
- 7 The northern and southern gates.
- 8 The cloisters on the north and south side of the church.
- 9 The ferula, or inner narthex, where the

- catechumens and hearers stood with Jews and Gentiles.
- 10 The place of the substrati, or third degree of penitents, behind the ambon.
- 11 The ambon, or reading desk.
- 12 The ascent on both sides the ambon.
- 13 The inner porticos, or cloisters, for men below.
- 14 The catechumenia, or hyperoia, upper galleries for women, above the porticos of the men, upon pillars.
- 15 Cancelli bematis, the rails of the chancel.
- 16 The bema, or chancel.
- 17 The altar, or communion table.
- 18 The pyrgus, or cyborium, the arched canopy built round the altar.

- 19 The bishop's throne, with
- 20 The second thrones of presbyters, in a semicircle about the altar.
- 21 Diaconicum minus, the inner vestry.
- 22 Prothesis, or paratorium.
- 23 Scuophylacium, or diaconicum magnum, the great repository or greeting house.
- 24 Baptistery. * The porch.
- 25 The font in the middle of the baptistery.
- 26 Pastophoria, dwelling-houses for the clergy, with schools, libraries, &c., on each side of the church.
- 27 Exedrae ecclesie, the outer buildings.
- 28 The περιβολος, or utmost bounds allowed for refuge or sanctuary.

them was esteemed in a large sense as part of the church; and accordingly, when churches became asylums, or places of refuge, under Christian emperors, not only the inner buildings, but the outer courts and boundaries, were reckoned a sufficient sanctuary, as we shall see in the latter part of this book. Now, hence arose a twofold division of churches, as taken in a stricter or a larger sense. In the strictest sense, including only the buildings within the walls, they were commonly divided into three parts: 1. The narthex, or ante-temple, where the penitents and catechumens stood. 2. The naos, or temple, where the communicants had their respective places. And, 3. The bema, or sanctuary, where the clergy stood to officiate at the altar. But in a larger sense, there was another ante-temple, or narthex, without the walls, under which was comprised the πρόπυλον, or vestibulum, the outward porch; then the atrium, or area, the court leading from that to the temple, surrounded with porticos or cloisters, as we shall presently see in the temple of Paulinus. There were also several exedrae, such as the baptistery, the diaconica, the pastophoria, and other adjacent buildings, which were reckoned to be either without or within the church, according as it was taken in a stricter or a larger acceptation.

Eusebius, in describing the church of Paulinus, takes it in the largest sense, and therefore he begins his description with the περίβολον, or wall that enclosed the whole circumference of the outward courts, which we may call the ante-temple, or exterior narthex, to distinguish it from the narthex within the church. In the front of this sacred enclosure toward the east, at some distance from the church, the first building that presented itself was a great and lofty porch, which Eusebius and other Greek writers call the πρόπυλον μέγα, and the Latins, vestibulum magnum, the great porch, to distinguish it from the lesser porches, which joined to the church. He calls it also πρώτην είσοδον, the first entrance, to distinguish it from the second, which were the gates of the church.

Between this porch and the church was a large area, or square plot of ground, which Eusebius calls αΐθριον,²⁰ and Paulus Silentarius, αύλην,²¹ in his description of Sancta Sophia; the Latins term it atrium and impluvium, because it was a court open to the air, without any covering, save only on each side of the square, which was surrounded with porticos or cloisters, σποαί Eusebius calls them, and these built upon columns, whence, as Du Fresne²² observes, this place is called sometimes τετράστυλον, and quadriporticus, in modern authors. In this place stood the first class of penitents, according to Eusebius, who says²³ expressly, it was the mansion of those who were not allowed to enter further into the church. That is, they stood either in the porch or the porticos, to beg the prayers of the faithful as they went into the church. Or perhaps, if they were more notorious criminals, they were cast out of these also, and obliged to wait in the court or open air, and stand there exposed to the weather, as part of their penance: which seems to be intimated by Tertullian,²⁴ when, speaking of some monstrous sinners, he says, They were expelled not only from the doors of the church, but from every place that might afford them any shelter or covering. So that the atrium was always an open place or court before the church: and therefore those authors who confound the atrium, or vestibulum, and porticus into one, wholly mistake the form of the ancient churches; for these, as I have showed, were distinct parts of the ante-temple.

It is further to be noted, that in the middle of the atrium there was commonly a fountain, or a cistern of water, for people to wash their hands and face, before they went into the church. Eusebius expressly mentions this in the temple of Paulinus. He says, In the court over against the church he placed κρήνας, fountains of water, as symbols of purification, for such to wash as entered into the church. Paulinus, bishop of Nola, takes notice of the same thing, but gives it the name of cantharus,²⁵ which signifies any capacious vessel that will hold much water, and sometimes a statue made to spout out water at its mouth: as Du Fresne has observed, that in some places the fountain was surrounded with lions thus spouting out water, whence this place has the name of leontarium in some modern Greek writers. It is also called by some nymphæum, εμβάτης, and κολυμβέιον, which all signify a fountain. Paulus Silentarius, in his description of Sancta Sophia, gives it the name of φιάλη, phiale, which we may English, the basin. And Socrates calls it φρεάρ, the spring. For speaking of a skirmish that happened between the catholics and Macedonian heretics in the church of Acacius at Constantinople, he says, Such a slaughter was made, that the αύλη, the atrium or court of the church, was filled with blood, insomuch that the

Sect. 4.
And these subdivided into other parts. The outward narthex, or ante-temple, included, 1. The πρόπυλον, or vestibulum, the porch.

Sect. 6.
3. In the middle of which stood a fountain for washing as they entered into the church; called cantharus and phiale in some authors.

Sect. 5.
2. The atrium, or the area, or court before the church, surrounded with porticos, or cloisters.

²⁰ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. It. de Vit. Const. lib. 3. c. 35.

²¹ Paul. Silent. par. 2. ver. 174.

²² Du Fresne, Com. in Paul, Silent, p. 536.

²³ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. Πρώτη αὐτῆ διατριβῆ, τοῖς τῶν πρώτων εἰσαγαγῶν ἐπι δεομένοις, κατὰλληλον τῆν μονὴν παρεχομένην.

²⁴ Tertul. de Pudicit. c. 4. Reliquas autem libidinum furias—non modo limine, verum omni ecclesiae tecto submovemus, quia non sunt delicta, sed monstra.

²⁵ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. Sancta nitens famulis interluit atria lymphis cantharus, intrantumque manus lavat amne ministro.

φοεῖα, the fountain that stood in it, was overflowed²⁶ therewith, and ran through the adjoining στοὰ, the portico or cloisters, even into the street. St. Chrysostom²⁷ also speaks of these fountains, as of things of common use in the atria, or courts before the churches. And frequently, in his popular discourses, alludes to the custom of washing their hands before they went into church.²⁸ Which is also done by Tertullian,²⁹ who exposes the absurdity of going to prayers with washed hands, whilst men retained a filthy spirit and polluted soul. In like manner Synesius³⁰ speaks of the cisterns, or vessels of water, set for washing in their ante-temples.

The writers of the church of Rome, Baronius³¹ and others, commonly derive and defend the use of their holy water from this ancient custom: but Du Fresne³² seems to speak more properly, when he says, their lustral water rather succeeded in its room. For the washing of the ancients had nothing of expiation in it, but was only an indifferent ceremony of corporal decency, or at most, but an admonishing emblem of that purity of soul, with which men ought to enter the courts of the most holy God. And therefore any one that compares these matters nicely together, must conclude, that the latter custom is but a fond imitation or mere corruption of the former; if it owe not rather its original to a worse fountain, the περιόραντήρια, or sprinkling with holy water, so often spoken of among the heathen. The things are so like one another, that some modern transcribers of Sozomen have mistaken them for one another. For whereas Sozomen, speaking of Julian's going into a temple to sacrifice in Gaul, with Valentinian to attend him, says, The priest sprinkled them³³ with water as they went in, according to the heathen custom; Valesius has observed, that in some copies it is read, according to ecclesiastical custom, instead of heathen custom: which he imputes to some modern transcribers, who were minded to make church holy water of it; whom he ingenuously chastises for their ignorance or impudence in corrupting good authors, as they justly deserved.

But to return to the business of the ancient churches: whilst we are speaking of the ante-temple, it will not be improper to observe, that for many years after burying-places were allowed in cities, they were still kept out of that which was strictly and properly called the church, and only allowed in those parts of the ante-temple, the atrium and porticos, which we have been describing: as appears from a canon of the council of Nantes, anno 658, which prohibits any to be buried³⁴ in the church, but allows of it in the atrium or porticos, or exedre of the church. Which I note only to show what use these parts of the ante-temple were put to. But of this more when we come to treat of cemeteries, and the funeral rites of the ancient church.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE INTERIOR NARTHEX, AND THE PARTS AND USES OF IT.

HAVING taking a view of the exterior narthex, or outward ante-temple, we are next led by Eusebius into the interior narthex, or ante-temple within the church. For in such stately structures as that of Paulinus was, the narthex, or προνάος, which I English ante-temple, was a name common to more parts than one. And in some of the most magnificent churches, as that of Sancta Sophia, as Du Fresne has observed out of Procopius and Paulus Silentarius, there were no less than four distinct nartheces. The entrance into the interior narthex in the church of Paulinus, was out of the porticos or cloisters before the church, by three inner porches, (τὰ ἐνδοτάτω πρόπυλα Eusebius calls them,) and as many gates opening out of them, the middle one being the greatest and highest of the three, as we commonly see in our modern cathedrals, only with this difference, that those fronted to the east, and ours to the west. It had also porticos adjoining on the north and south,¹ and as many porches and doors to enter out of them. These porches in such churches as had no other ante-temple served to receive the first class of penitents, called the mourners, which otherwise were remitted to the atrium and porticos before the church, as I have showed already in the temple of Paulinus. And these things are accurately to be observed by those who would not mistake the ancients, when they seem to speak differently of the place of the mourners. Du Fresne

Sect. 1.
Of the lesser πρόπυλα, or porticoes before the doors of the church.

²⁶ Socrat. lib. 2. c. 38.

²⁷ Chrysost. Homil. 57. t. 5. Edit. Savil. p. 390. Τὰς κρήνας εἶναι ἐν ταῖς ἀυλαῖς τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν οἰκῶν νερόμισται.

²⁸ Chrys. Hom. 52. in Matth. Hom. 72. in Johan. Hom. 3. in Ephes. Hom. 36. ad Popul. Antioch. Hom. in Psal. cxl.

²⁹ Tertul. de Orat. c. 11. Quæ ratio est, manibus quidem ablutis, spiritu vero sordente, orationem obire?

³⁰ Synes. Ep. 121. Anastasio. Τὰ ἐν τοῖς προτεμενίσμασι χέρνιβα, &c.

³¹ Baron. an. 57. n. 107.

³² Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 539.

³³ Sozomen. lib. 6. c. 6. Ὁ ἱερεὺς νόμῳ ἑλληνικῶ περιέρβαινε τοὺς εἰσιόντας.

³⁴ Cone. Nannetens. c. 6. In ecclesia nullatenus sepeliatur, sed in atrio, aut porticu, aut in exedris ecclesie.

¹ See also Euseb. de Vita Const. lib. 3. c. 37. of the church of Jerusalem.

has also observed out of Paulinus Nolanus,² that these porches and gates are sometimes called arcus, from the manner of their structure, which was arch-work; and apsides for the same reason, for apsis denotes any thing that is framed in the figure of an arch or a convex, as the heavens: and therefore he thinks the thirty-second canon of the third council of Carthage is to be understood of this place, when it says,³ That such penitents as had committed very notorious and scandalous crimes, known to the whole church, should have imposition of hands before the apsis; that is, before the porch or doors of the church. Here it was also that the poor of the church placed themselves both before and after Divine service, to ask alms of such as came from the altar. Which custom is mentioned by Gregory Nazianzen⁴ and St. Chrysostom,⁵ who elegantly, after his manner, upon this account styles the poor, and aged, and the lame, and the blind, the guards of the royal palace, meaning the church.

Being entered by these gates into the church, the first place that occurs to our view, is the προνάος, or ante-temple, within the walls. This in the modern Greek rituals is always called the narthex, and is peculiarly allotted to the monks or women, and used to perform the offices of rogations, and supplications, and night watches in: here also they place dead corpses, whilst their funeral rites are performing, as Suicerus⁶ shows at large out of their Triodion, Pentecostarium, and Typicum, and other authors. Morinus thinks⁷ the ancient churches for above five hundred years had no narthex, but were divided only into two parts, the sanctuarium and aula laicorum, the place of the clergy and the place of the laymen, and that the narthex was first introduced by the Eastern monks in the sixth century; but in this he is evidently mistaken. For though the name perhaps be not very ancient, yet the thing itself is; for this was always a distinct and separate part of the church, as any one will easily imagine, that considers the ancient use of it.

For the church, ever since she first divided her catechumens and penitents into distinct orders and classes, had also distinct places in the church for them. And this lower part of the church was the place of the energumens, and such of the catechumens and penitents, as were commonly called ἀκροώμενοι, or audientes, that is, hearers, because they were allowed to stand here to hear the psalms and Scriptures read, and the sermon made by the preacher, after which they were dismissed without any prayers or solemn benediction. As may be seen in the author of the Constitutions⁸ and the Canons of St. Basil,⁹ Gregory Nyssen,¹⁰ and several others.

Hither also both Jews, and heathens, and heretics, and schismatics were sometimes allowed to come, to hear the Scriptures read, and the sermon preached, because this part of the service was for their edification and instruction. The council of Laodicea¹¹ indeed prohibits heretics to come within the church. But in Africa and other places it was allowed. For in the fourth council of Carthage¹² there is a canon express to this purpose, That the bishop shall not prohibit any, whether heathen, heretic, or Jew, to come into the church, and stay there to hear the word of God, till the time of the dismissal of the catechumens. And it appears further from several, both of St. Chrysostom's and St. Austin's homilies, that this was the common practice. Now, then, it is reasonable to suppose, that all these had their station together in the lower part of the church, called the narthex, or whatever other name it went by.

Dr. Beverege and some others seem here also to place the font or baptismery, as in our modern churches. But there is nothing more certain, than that for many ages the baptismery was a distinct place from the body of the church, and reckoned among the exedrae, or places adjoining to the church. For which reason I omit speaking any further of it here, intending to do it more fully in the latter part of this Book, when I come to the exedrae of the church.

If it be inquired, why this part of the church was called narthex; I answer, because the figure of it was supposed to resemble a ferula, which was the Latin name for it, that is, a rod or staff: for any oblong figure, or dromical, as the Greeks called it, was by them called a narthex, as Suicerus and Du Fresne have observed out of Theodorus Zygomala.¹³ And therefore this part of the church, being a long, but narrow part, cross the front of the Sect. 2. Of the narthex, pro-naos, or ferula.

Sect. 3. The use of it for the catechumens and penitents of the second order.

Sect. 4. Also for Jews, heathens, heretics, and schismatics to hear in.

Sect. 5. This not the place of the font, or baptismery, as in our modern churches.

Sect. 6. Why called narthex, and of the different sorts of narthexes in several churches.

² Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. Alma domus triplici patet ingrediendibus arcu. -
³ Conc. Carthag. 3. c. 32. Cujuscunque penitentis publicum et vulgatissimum crimen est, quod universa ecclesia noverit, ante apsidem manus ei imponatur.
⁴ Naz. Orat. 16. de Amore Pauperum, t. 1. p. 246.
⁵ Chrysost. Hom. 10. in 1 Thess. p. 1484.
⁶ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Νάρθηξ.
⁷ Morin. de Pœnit. lib. 6. c. 1.

⁸ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 5.
⁹ Basil. can. 75. ¹⁰ Nyssen. Ep. ad Letoium, c. 5.
¹¹ Conc. Laodic. can. 6.
¹² Cont. Carth. 4. c. 84. Ut episcopus nullum prohibeat ingredi ecclesiam et audire verbum Dei, sive Gentilem, sive hæreticum, sive Judæum, usque ad missam catechumenorum.
¹³ Zygomal. ap. Crucium Turco-Græc. Πάν δρομικόν νάρθηξ καλεῖται.

church, was termed narthex, or ferula, upon that account. And it is further to be observed, that some churches had three or four narthees, but those without the walls: for the porticos or cloisters of such churches as Sancta Sophia, which were built to the north, and west, and south of them, were called narthees, as Du Fresne¹⁴ shows out of Procopius and Paulus Silentarius, and the sixth general council, because these were long narrow buildings in figure or shape of a narthex. And such churches, he thinks, had no other narthex within the walls, but these porticos were the proper station of the penitents, and such others as were not allowed to come within the nave of the church. But in such churches as had no porticos adjoining to them, the narthex was the lower part of the church within the walls, which was made to answer the use of porticos in other churches. And this seems to be the true state of the matter, and the only way to reconcile the different accounts that are given by authors of the ancient narthex of the church.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE NAOS, OR NAVE OF THE CHURCH, AND ITS PARTS AND USES.

Sect. 1.
Of the beautiful and royal gates: why so called. AFTER the narthex followed that part which was properly called νάος, the temple, and navis, the nave or body of the church. This was separated from the narthex by certain rails of wood, as all other places in the church were commonly distinguished. The entrance into it from the narthex was by the gates, which the modern rituals and Greek writers call πόλαι ὡραῖαι and βασιλικαί, the beautiful and royal gates: which seem to be so named in allusion to the name basilica, as denoting the royal palace of God, his house and temple. Though perhaps another reason might be assigned for it among the modern Greeks, who might call it the royal gate, because here their kings were used to lay down their crowns, before they proceeded further into the church. Which is observed by Leo Grammaticus in the Life of Michael¹ the emperor, where he notes it as an insolent and indecent thing in him, that when he came to the royal gates, he did not lay aside his crown, as kings were used to do. Some festivals among them were for a like reason called crown days, ἑορταὶ θεοσεπτὰι, dies coronati, because the em-perors were used to go in their regalia to the great church of Sancta Sophia on those days, which were twelve particular days in a year. So that as these days, so those gates of the temple might have their denomination from some particular ceremony used by the imperial powers at their entrance by them: but I take the other reason to be more probable, and had scarce mentioned this, had it not been to explain a custom or two, which fall in our way upon the mention of it.

This part of the church seems to have been usually a square building, in the middle between the sanctuary and the narthex; as we find it described in a letter of Theodosius and Valentinian at the end of the council of Ephesus,² and inserted also into the Theodosian Code,³ where, speaking of churches as places of refuge, they divide them into these three parts, 1. The θυσιαστήριον, the altar part or sanctuary; 2. The ἐκτῆριον τοῦ λαοῦ τετραγώνιον, the four-squared oratory of the people; and, 3. The remaining part from that to the outer doors of the church. Now, as this last is a plain description of the narthex forementioned, though it be not called by that name, so is the second a description of the nave or middle of the church, called the people's oratory, because the people chiefly filled this place, having their different stations or apartments in it, according to the difference of age, or sex, or quality, or state and condition, which distinctions were anciently observed in some, though perhaps not in all churches.

For here, first of all, at the very entrance of the royal gates, in the lowest station of this part, behind the ambo, stood the ὑποπίπτοντες, or substrati, the penitents of the third order, so called from the custom of prostrating themselves before the bishop or priest as soon as the sermon was ended, to receive his benediction with the imposition of hands, and be made partakers of those prayers which the congregation particularly offered to God for them; after which they were obliged immediately to depart, before the communion service. This sort of penitents are mentioned in the council of Nice,⁴ though no particular place is assigned them: but we may collect from Tertullian and Sozomen, that their station was in this part of the church. For Tertullian,⁵ speaking of the Roman discipline, says, Pope Zephyrin brought penitents into the church in sackcloth and ashes, and prostrated them in the midst before the widows and presbyters, to implore their commiseration and excite their tears. This

Sect. 2.
The nave of the church usually a square building, called by some, the oratory of laymen.

Sect. 3.
In the lowest part of which stood the substrati, or penitents of the third order.

¹⁴ Du Fresne, Com^{en} in Paul. Silentiar. p. 534.

¹ Leo Gram. Chronograp. p. 466. ² Conc. t. 3. p. 1236.

³ Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 45. de his qui ad Eccles. confugiunt, Leg. 4. p. 366.

⁴ Conc. Nicen. can. 11.

⁵ Tertul. de Pudicit. c. 13. Pœnitentiam mœchi ad exorandam fraternitatem in ecclesiam inducens, conciliatum et concineratum cum dedecore et horrore compositum prosterinis in medium ante viduas, ante presbyteros, omnium lachrymas suadentem, &c.

must be a different station of penitents from those called mourners, for their station (as we have seen before) was without the church doors, but these before the widows and presbyters in the middle of the church. And so Sozomen⁶ plainly represents it, when he says, The bishop fell prostrate with them, and all the congregation wept with tears, and then the bishop rising up, made the proper prayers for them and dismissed them. These were exercises to be performed in the church, and not at the church door; and therefore this order of penitents are not without reason placed by all expositors within the royal gates, behind the ambo of the church.

The ambo itself was what we now call the reading desk, a place made on purpose for the readers and singers, and such of the clergy as ministered in the first service, called missa catechumenorum. It had the name of ambo, not, as Walafridus Strabo imagines, ab ambiendo, because it surrounded them that were in it; but from ἀναβαίνειν, because it was a place of eminency, to which they went up by degrees or steps. For the original name is ἄμβων, which, as Valesius and Habertus have rightly observed, in old Greek writers, Æschylus and Eustathius, signifies the ascent or height of a mountain, and thence it comes to signify this place of eminency in the church. Sozomen⁷ gives it the names of βῆμα upon the same account; but to distinguish it from the other bema, which was the sanctuary, or the altar, he calls it βῆμα γνωστῶν, the readers' bema, as the other was more properly the bishop's and presbyters'. In St. Cyprian it is called pulpitum, and tribunal ecclesie, and the use of it is also explained by him to be a reading desk: for here it was the readers stood to read the Gospels and Epistles, as we learn from the account which he gives of Celerinus and Aurelius, two famous confessors, whom he ordained readers,⁸ that they who had made confession of Christ's gospel from the rack, might read it also from the pulpit or tribunal of the church. Here it was also that the singers had their station, as is evident from that canon of the council of Laodicea,⁹ which forbids all others to sing in the church, beside the canonical singers, who went up into the ambo, and sung by book. Here also the diptychs, or books of commemoration, were read, as appears from a noted passage in the council of Constantino-ple, under Mennas,¹⁰ where the people cry out, Τὰ δῆπτυχα τῷ ἄμβωνι, Let the diptychs be laid upon the reading desk. Bona¹¹ thinks the bishop and presbyters here also made their sermons to the people. For which he cites Prudentius¹² and Sidonius Apollinaris,¹³ from whose words he further concludes, that the ambo was sometimes called ara, or altar. But this observation seems to be founded on a mistake. For the bishops anciently did not use to preach from the ambo, but more commonly from the rising steps of the altar, as Valesius¹⁴ shows that the custom continued in France to the time of King Childbert. And therefore both Socrates¹⁵ and Sozomen seem to speak of Chrysostom's preaching in the ambo as an unusual thing; but he did it for conveniency, Socrates says, that he might be the better heard by the people. We cannot hence therefore conclude, that the ambo was the ordinary place of preaching, but rather the altar; and that when we read of bishops preaching from the ascent of the ara, it is rather to be understood of the altar than the ambo. Yet in Africa St. Austin seems to have made his discourses to the people from the ambo, which he sometimes calls exedra,¹⁶ and sometimes apsis,¹⁷ which I the rather note, because these words are of various signification among the ancients, sometimes denoting the ambo, perhaps from its orbicular form, and at other times the cross wings and outer buildings of the church. Some take the apsis for the ambo in that canon of the third council of Carthage, which says, Notorious and scandalous criminals¹⁸ shall do penance before the apsis. But Du Fresne, as I have noted¹⁹ before, takes it in another sense, for the porch of the church, and it is not always easy to determine exactly the meaning of it.

But to proceed: in this part of the church, all the faithful, or such as were in the communion of the church, had their place assigned them; and among them the fourth order of penitents, whom they called consistentes, because they were allowed to stay, and hear the prayers of the church, after the catechumens and other penitents were dismissed, but yet they might not make their oblation, or participate of the sacrifice of the altar.

⁶ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 16. ⁷ Sozom. lib. 8. c. 5. lib. 9. c. 2.
⁸ Cyprian. Ep. 33. Ad pulpitum post catastam venire, &c. It. Ep. 34. Quid aliud quam super pulpitum, id est, tribunal ecclesie, oportebat imponi, &c.
⁹ Conc. Laodic. c. 15.
¹⁰ Conc. Constant. 5. Act. 5.
¹¹ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 2. c. 6. n. 3.
¹² Prudent. Hymn. de Hippolyta. Fronte sub adversa gradibus sublime tribunal tollitur, antistes prædicat unde Deum.
¹³ Sidon. Carm. 16. ad Faustum. Seu te conspicuis gradibus venerabilis aræ, concionaturum plebs sedula circumstetit.

¹⁴ Vales. Not. in Socrat. lib. 6. c. 5.
¹⁵ Socrat. lib. 6. c. 5. Sozomen. lib. 8. c. 5.
¹⁶ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. c. 8. In gradibus exedræ, in qua de superiore loquebar loco, feci stare ambos fratres, cum eorum legeretur libellus.
¹⁷ Aug. Ep. 225. Honoratiore et graviore in apsidem ascendentes, cum episcopo colloquantur, &c. It. Ep. 203. In futuro Christi judicio nec apsidem gradatæ nec cathedræ velatæ, &c.
¹⁸ Conc. Carth. 3. c. 32. Ante apsidem ei manus imponatur.
¹⁹ Chap. 4. n. 1.

Sect. 4.
 And the ambo, or reading desk.

Sect. 5.
 And above this the communicants and fourth order of penitents, called con- sistentes, had their places.

In which respect they are said to stand and communicate with the rest of the people, but in prayers only, without the oblation, as the canons of Nice²⁰ and St. Basil²¹ word it. Whether they were separate from other communicants in a distinct place by themselves, I find not in any other author save only Eligius Noviomensis, who lived about the year 640. He, in one of his homilies²² to the penitents, tells them they were placed on the left side of the church, because the Lord at the day of judgment would place the sheep, that is, the righteous, on his right hand, and the goats, that is, sinners, on his left. But because this is a later writer, and learned men²³ are also doubtful about his homilies, whether they be genuine or not, we can determine nothing from this passage concerning the original custom of the church.

Only this is certain from good authors, that, anciently, men and women had their different places in this part of the church. The author of the Constitutions speaks of it as the custom²⁴ of the church in his time, when he gives directions about it, that women should sit in a separate place by themselves; and accordingly makes it one part of the office of deaconesses to attend²⁵ the women's gate in the church; Let the door-keepers stand at the gate of the men, and the deaconesses at the gate of the women. St. Cyril²⁶ also takes notice of this distinction as customary in his own church at Jerusalem, saying, Let a separation be made, that men be with men, and women with women, in the church. The like intimation is given us by St. Austin, that each sex²⁷ had their distinct places in the church; and he particularly mentions the women's part, as distinct also in the baptistery²⁸ of the church. Paulinus²⁹ takes notice of the same in the Life of St. Ambrose, telling us how St. Ambrose was once furiously assaulted in a church by an Arian woman, who, getting up into the tribunal to him, would needs have haled him by his garments to the women's part, that they might have beat him, and made him fly the church. This distinction was so generally observed in the time of Constantine, that Socrates³⁰ says his mother, Helena, always submitted to the discipline of the church in this respect, praying with the women in the women's part. And it was usually made by rails, or wooden walls, as St. Chrysostom terms them, who has these remarkable words concerning the original of this custom: Men ought to be separated³¹ from women, says he, by an inward wall, meaning that of the heart; but because they would not, our forefathers separated them by these wooden walls. For I have heard from our seniors, that it was not so from the beginning. For in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female. Do we not read, that men and women prayed together in their upper room? Yet Eusebius³² makes this distinction as ancient as Philo Judæus and St. Mark, and many learned men think it came from the Jewish church into the Christian, not long after the days of the apostles. Some are a little too curious in fixing this women's part always precisely to the north or right side of the church. For though this might be the custom of the Western churches in later ages, when Amalarius Fortunatus, and Radulphus Tungrensis, and the authors of the Micrologus and Ordo Romanus lived, which writers are cited by Durantus³³ for it; yet it appears to have been otherwise anciently in many of the Greek churches. Nor does that funeral inscription, which some produce out of the Roma Subterranea, prove the contrary, which speaks³⁴ of persons lying interred sinistra parte virorum, on the south or left side of the church, where the men sat. For not to inquire into the antiquity of that inscription, it proves no more, but that the men sat on the left side in the Roman churches: which does not hinder the women from having their apartment on that side too, if the same custom was at Rome which was at Constantinople and other Greek churches, which was for the men to sit below, and the women in porticos or galleries above them, on the left side of the church, if not on the right also. For thus Gregory Nazianzen³⁵ describes his temple of Anastasia, making the men to stand by the rails of the chancel, and the virgins and matrons to be hearken- ing from their upper galleries above the other. And ²⁰ Conc. Nicen. c. 11.

²¹ Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 56. Conc. Ancyr. can. 8.

²² Eligius, Hom. 8. ad Pœnit. Bibl. Patr. t. 2. p. 99. Cur ergo in sinistra parte ecclesiæ positi estis? Non sine causa usus ecclesiæ hoc obtinuit, sed quia Dominus in judicio oves, id est, justos, a dextris: hædos vero, id est, peccatores, a sinistris ponet.

²³ Vid. Albertin. de Euchar. lib. 3. p. 906.

²⁴ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. Αἱ γυναῖκες κεχωρισμένως καὶ αὐτὰ καθέξουσιν.

²⁵ Ibid. lib. 2. c. 57. lib. 8. c. 20 et 28.

²⁶ Cyril. Præfat. in Catech. n. 8. Διεσπάλθω τὰ πράγματα, ἄνδρες μετὰ ἀνδράν, καὶ γυναῖκες μετὰ γυναϊκῶν.

²⁷ Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 2. c. 28. Populi confluent ad ecclesiâ casta celebritate, honesta utriusque sexus discretionem.

²⁸ Ib. lib. 22. c. 8. Admonetur in somnio innocentia, appropinquante pascha, ut in parte feminarum observanti ad baptisterium, quæcunque illi baptizata primitus occurrisset, eundem locum signo Christi signaret.

²⁹ Paulin. Vit. Ambros. p. 3. Tribunal conscendens, apprehenso vestimento sacerdotis, cum illum attrahere vellet ad partem mulierum, &c.

³⁰ Soerat. lib. 1. c. 17. Ὡς καὶ συνεύχεσθαι ἐν τῷ τῶν γυναϊκῶν τάγματι.

³¹ Chrysost. Homil. 74. in Matth.

³² Euseb. lib. 2. c. 17.

³³ Durant. de Ritib. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 18.

³⁴ Roma Subterranean. lib. 2. c. 10. n. 23.

³⁵ Nazian. Somnium de Templo Anastas. t. 2. p. 78. Αἱ δ' ἄρ' ἀφ' ὑψηλῶν τεγέων ἐκποσκον ἀκοὴν ἀγναὶ παρθε- νικαὶ κλῖνον ἄμ' ἐσθλοτάμοις.

so it was in the church of Sancta Sophia, and many other churches.

Upon this account, these places of the women are, by such Greek writers as speak of them, termed ὑπερώια, upper rooms; as by Evagrius,³⁶ in his description of the temple of Sancta Sophia, and more particularly by Paulus Silentarius,³⁷ who styles them expressly Ἐκκλησιῶν ὑπερώια, the upper galleries of the women. These were also called κατηχούμενα, as appears from an edict of the emperor Leo,³⁸ which makes these upper rooms and the catechumena to be the same thing. Suicerus³⁹ and Hospinian, and many other learned men, mistake these for the place where the catechumens stood, and where the catechetical books were kept: but Du Fresne⁴⁰ more truly observes, that they were so called, because they were places of hearing, where the women sat in their upper galleries to hear Divine service. In one of these the empress commonly had her apartment, as Du Fresne observes out of Evagrius. And by that one may easily understand what Paulus Diaconus⁴¹ means, when, speaking of the empress Eirene, he says, She went up by the ascent of the brazen gate into the catechumenia of the church, that is, into the place of hearing among the women's apartments in the church. These galleries were sometimes also made use of for councils to sit in, as Leo Allatius⁴² has observed of the council of Constantinople, in the time of Johannes Comnenus, anno 1165, that it was held ἐν τοῖς δεξιῶς κατηχομένοις, in the right-hand galleries of the church of Alexius, and some others are mentioned⁴³ as held in the same place.

The inner parts of these porticos were sometimes divided into little cells or places of retirement on the walls of the church, and that not only in the women's parts, but the men's also, as may be collected from the account which Paulinus Nolanus gives of them, who calls them cubicula, little chambers, and tells us, the use of them⁴⁴ was for people to retire into, that were minded to give themselves to reading, or meditation, or private prayer. These were looked upon as parts of the catechumenia, and were sometimes abused to profane uses instead of

Sect. 8.
Private cells for meditation, reading, and prayer on the back of these.

pious: for as we may collect from the decrees of the council of Trullo,⁴⁵ and the emperor Leo,⁴⁶ some made use of them for lodgings instead of oratories, and cohabited with their wives there: to correct which abuse, it is ordered in both those decrees, that all such persons should be expelled from the catechumenia of the church.

It is to be noted further, that not only men and women had their distinct places, but also virgins and widows a peculiar apartment assigned to them. Which we learn from St. Ambrose's discourse to a lapsed virgin, telling her⁴⁷ that she ought to have remembered that place in the church, railed out from the rest, where she was used to stand, whither the religious matrons and noble women came thronging to receive her salutations, which were more holy and better than herself. This appears also from the author⁴⁸ of the Constitutions, who, speaking of the order in which persons were appointed to sit in the church, first places the virgins, widows, and aged women in the highest rank; then married women below them in a place by themselves; then their children, daughters with their mothers, and sons with their fathers, or next behind them; and last of all young men, according to their age, in different stations. This was the order in such churches as had none of those hyperoæ or galleries before spoken of: for otherwise, as has been noted out of Nazianzen, the virgins and matrons had their distinct places in the porticos above. I do not here allege Origen, after Durantus and Bona, because they plainly mistake the sense of their author, who speaks not of the Christian church, but of the Jewish temple, and that with such a formal story, that it is a wonder any learned men could mistake him. He tells us, he had it from an old tradition,⁴⁹ that there was a place in the temple peculiar for virgins to worship God in, whither no married woman was allowed to come. But the Virgin Mary, after she had brought forth our Saviour, went and stood to worship there: which when they that knew she had borne a Son would not allow of, Zacharias, the father of St. John Baptist, stood up and said, She is worthy to stand in the place of virgins, for she is yet a virgin. Upon which they rose up against

Sect. 9.
The place of the virgins and widows distinguished from others.

³⁶ Evagr. Hist. lib. 4. c. 31.

³⁷ Paul. Silentiar. Descr. S. Soph. part. 1. ver. 256.

³⁸ Leo, Novel. 73. 'Εν τοῖς τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν ὑπερώοις ἄπερ ὀ πολὺς ἀνδρῶπος κατηχούμενα καλεῖν ἔγρω.

³⁹ Suicer. Thesaur. Eccl. voce Κατηχούμενα.

⁴⁰ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 550.

⁴¹ Paul. Diacon. Miscel. lib. 23. Ascendit imperatrix Eirene per aenæ portæ ascensum in catechumenia ecclesie.

⁴² Leo Allat. de Consensu Eccles. lib. 2. c. 11. p. 645.

⁴³ Leo Allat. ibid. c. 12. p. 682.

⁴⁴ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. Cubicula intra porticus quaterna longis basilica lateribus inserta, secretis orantium, vel in lege Domini meditantium, præterea memoriis religiorum ac familiarium accommodatos ad pacis æternæ reliquum locos præbent.

⁴⁵ Conc. Trullan. can. 97.

⁴⁶ Leo, Novel. 73.

⁴⁷ Ambros. ad Virgin. Lapsam, c. 6. Nonne vel illum locum tabulis separatam, in quo in ecclesia stabas, recordari debuisti? Ad quem religiosæ matronæ et nobiles certatim currebant, tua oscula petentes, quæ sanctiores et meliores te erant.

⁴⁸ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. Αἱ παρθένοι καὶ αἱ χήραι, καὶ πρεσβυτέραι, πρῶται πασῶν σηκίτωσαν, ἢ καθεξέστωσαν.

⁴⁹ Origen. Hom. 26. in Matth. p. 162.

Zacharias, as a breaker of the law, in permitting a married woman to stand in the place of virgins, and slew him between the temple and the altar. I make no further reflection on this passage at present, but leave it, as I find it, to the judgment of the reader. As to the place of virgins in the Christian church, I have only this one thing more to remark out of St. Ambrose, which is, that usually some profitable texts of Scripture⁵⁰ were written upon the walls of the church in this place, proper to the virgin state, such as that of St. Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 34, "There is difference between a wife and a virgin: the unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit." Which lesson, St. Ambrose tells the virgin he writes to, she ought to have remembered, because it was written before her eyes upon the walls of the church.

Sect. 10.
The σωλαεῖον, or solea, that is, the magistrate's throne in this part of the church. There is one place more to be taken notice of in some churches, before we leave this part of the temple to go into the sanctuary, which is, what Codinus⁵¹ and some other modern Greeks call the σωλαεῖον, a place of some note in the church of Sancta Sophia, but not exactly agreed upon by learned men, either what or where it was, or what use it was put to. Gretser, in his Notes upon Codinus,⁵² fancies it to be nothing else but the pavement at the entrance of the sanctuary, or some such thing adjoining to it. Morinus⁵³ and Allatius⁵⁴ say it was some place between the bema and ambo. Schelstrate is a little more particular,⁵⁵ that it was the place before the rails of the sanctuary, where the emperor had his seat on the right hand, and the readers and subdeacons on the left. But Suicerus⁵⁶ and Meursius are more positive, that it was only the emperor's throne, and called σωλαεῖον, from the Latin solium. And Dr. Beverege⁵⁷ inclines to the same opinion. Du Fresne⁵⁸ allows of this as probable likewise, but he also fancies it might signify the limina cancellorum, the threshold or raised foundation upon which the rails of the chancel were erected, and be so called from solium, whence comes the French name seuil, and the English sill, or groundsel. This was usually adorned and beautified very richly, he thinks, with gold and precious stones, and sometimes revered with the kisses and salutations of the people; whence the phrases, Exosculari limina, et liminibus martyrum affundi, in Sidonius and Prudentius, are by him interpreted to this purpose. But I conceive the former opinion most probable, which takes it for the emperor's throne, which was toward the east end of the church in the men's portico, over against the altar, where now the sultan has his seat among the Turks. For that place which Dr. Beverege calls the embolus, and others the circuitus, or side aisles on both sides, were in the temple of Sancta Sophia porticos for men below, and women above. And as the empress had her seat in the upper end of the women's apartment, so the emperors had theirs in the men's apartment next to the chancel, from the time that Sozomen⁵⁹ tells us Theodosius submitted to the reproof of St. Ambrose, who blamed him for taking his seat within the rails of the sanctuary (though it had been customary for the emperors so to do): after which admonition both he and his successors always took their place without the rails, whence that place seems to be called the solium, the royal seat. Which is confirmed a little by what Suicerus observes out of Cedrenus and Codinus, that Justinian made the solea of gold and onyx stone, which are proper materials to adorn a throne, but not so proper to be laid in the pavement of a church. Not far from this Du Fresne⁶⁰ observes in some modern churches a place called the senatorium, which some take to be only another name for the seats of the bishop and presbyters, who were the senate of the church: but Du Fresne thinks it was rather the seat of the magistrates, called senators, whence their apartment had the name of senatorium in the church.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE BEMA, OR THIRD PART OF THE TEMPLE, CALLED THE ALTAR AND THE SANCTUARY, AND THE PARTS AND USES OF IT.

THE third and innermost part of the ancient churches was that which we now call the chancel; but originally it was known by many other names. One of the most common names was that of βῆμα, or tribunal, which, as I have noted before, is a word of various signification, denoting sometimes the ambo or reading desk, and sometimes the altar, and sometimes the seats or thrones of the bishop and presbyters, and sometimes the whole space where these thrones and the altar stood. In which sense I understand that canon of the council of Laodicea,¹ which for-⁵⁰ Ambros. ad Virgin. Lapsam, c. 6. Nonne vel illa præcepta, quæ oculis tuis ipse scriptus paries ingerebat, recordari debuisti? Divisa est mulier et virgo, &c.

⁵¹ Codin. Origin. Constant. lib. 3. c. 12.

⁵² Gretser. Not. in loc.

⁵³ Morin. de Ordinat. par. 2. n. 52.

⁵⁴ Allat. de Templis Græcor. Dissert. 2.

⁵⁵ Schelstrat. Concil. Antioch. p. 192.

⁵⁶ Suicer. Thesaur. voc. σωλαεῖας, et Meursius in Glossar.

⁵⁷ Bevereg. Not. in Conc. Nicen. c. 11.

⁵⁸ Du Fresne, Not. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 585.

⁵⁹ Sozom. lib. 7. c. 25.

⁶⁰ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiar. p. 560.

¹ Conc. Laodic. can. 56.

bids presbyters to go into the bema and sit there before the bishop comes. Suicerus has observed it² frequently to be thus used in the liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil. And Chrysostom³ in one of his homilies more particularly describes it to be the place whither the bishop went by an ascent into it, to preach, to pray, to stand by the holy temple, and offer the tremendous sacrifice for the people. By which it is easy to understand, that he takes it not barely for the altar alone, or the bishop's throne, but for the whole place where they stood, and where these several offices were performed. And the reason of the name bema was what Chrysostom also intimates, when he says, they went up by an ascent into it. For bema and ambo have both the same original, from ἀναβαίνειν, because they were places exalted above the rest, and, like the tribunals of judges, had an ascent by steps into them. Now, the bema was more peculiarly allotted to the clergy, and upon that account, as I have noted before⁴ in a former book, the clergy were sometimes styled οἱ τοῦ βήματος, and τάξις τοῦ βήματος, the order of the bema, or the sanctuary.

For the name sanctuary was also appropriated to this part of the church. The Greeks peculiarly styled it ἅγιον, the holy; and from thence the altar was called ἅγιον ἅγιον, the holy of holies, which is the term that Eusebius⁵ uses in describing the temple of Paulinus. In other places⁶ he calls it ἁγίασμα, which is the name whereby the Seventy call the sanctuary in the Old Testament. The Latins called it sacrarium, the sanctuary. As in the first council of Bracara, which forbids laymen⁷ to come into the sanctuary to communicate. And the council of Vaison, which⁸ speaks of the office of ordering or disposing the things of the sanctuary. And the fourth council of Carthage, which forbids the oblation of such as are at variance one with another, to be received⁹ either in the treasury or the sanctuary.

The Greeks also termed it θυσιαστήριον, the altar part. For though that word commonly signifies the altar itself, or the Lord's table, yet in some ancient canons and ecclesiastical writers, as Habertus¹⁰ and Mr. Mede¹¹ have observed, it is used to denote the whole sanctuary within the rails, where none but the clergy were allowed. As in the councils of Laodicea¹² and Trullo,¹³ which forbid women and laymen to come into the θυσιαστήριον, it must mean the whole altar part, or chancel. And so in Socrates,¹⁴ and Theodoret,¹⁵ and many others, who speak of St. Ambrose excluding Theodosius the emperor from within the rails of the sanctuary.

St. Cyprian, in his fifty-fifth epistle, calls it consessus cleri, the presbytery. And Forbesius,¹⁶ and some other learned men, think it was also called diaconicum, from the presbyters sitting, and the deacons ministering there. Thus they understand the council of Laodicea,¹⁷ which forbids subdeacons to have any place in the diaconicum, or to touch the sacred vessels of the Lord's table. But I must note, that though the name diaconicum in that canon may signify the chancel or sanctuary, yet it more commonly means the vestry, or repository of the sacred vessels, of which we are to give a further account, when we come to speak of the exedra of the church.

In some canons it seems also to have had the name of chorus, whence comes our English quire. As in the fourth council of Toledo, which thus appoints¹⁸ the order and manner of men's communicating in the church, so as that the priests and deacons should communicate before the altar, the inferior clergy in the quire, and the people without the quire. Though some take the chorus to signify rather the place of the singers and readers in the other part of the church.

Eusebius, describing this part of the temple of Paulinus, says it was divided curiously and artificially wrought in the form of net-work, to make it inaccessible to the multitude. These the Latins call cancelli, whence comes our English name chancel. In other Greek writers they are termed κιγκλίδες. Whence in Theodoret²⁰ τὰ ἐνδον τῶν κιγκλίδων, the place within the rails, is but another name for the altar part, or chancel. And to lay hold of the rails, in the phrase of Synesius,²¹ is the same thing as to take sanctuary at the altar.

By these rails, as Eusebius words it, this whole altar place was kept inaccessible to all but the clergy in time of Divine service. The council of Sect. 2. Also ἅγιον, or ἱερατεῖον, and σacrarium, the holy, or the sanctuary.

Sect. 4. Presbyterium and diaconicum.

Sect. 5. Also chorus, or quire

Sect. 6. This place separated from the rest by rails, called cancelli, whence comes chancel.

Sect. 3. And θυσιαστήριον, the altar part.

Sect. 7. And kept inaccessible to the multitude. Whence it was called adyta.

² Suicer. Thesaur. Eccl. voce Βῆμα.

³ Chrysost. Hom. 39. de Pentecost. t. 5. p. 553.

⁴ Book 1. chap. 5. sect. 11. ⁵ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. p. 381.

⁶ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 18.

⁷ Conc. Bracar. 1. c. 31. Ingrēdi sacrarium ad communicandum non liceat laicis, nisi tantum clericis.

⁸ Conc. Vasens. c. 3. Cujus officium est sacrarium disponere et sacramenta suscipere.

⁹ Conc. Carth. 4. can. 93. Oblationes dissidentium fratrum, neque in sacrario, neque in gazophylacio recipiantur.

¹⁰ Habert. Archierat. p. 663.

¹¹ Mede, Comment. Apocalyp. p. 479.

¹² Conc. Laodic. c. 44.

¹³ Conc. Trull. can. 69.

¹⁴ Socrat. lib. 1. c. 25.

¹⁵ Theodor. lib. 1. c. 14.

¹⁶ Forbes. Irenic. lib. 2. c. 11. p. 221.

¹⁷ Conc. Laodic. can. 21.

¹⁸ Conc. Tolet. 4. c. 18. Sacerdotes et Levitæ ante altare communicant, in choro clerus, extra chorum populus. Vid. Conc. Turon. 2. can. 4.

¹⁹ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. p. 381. Ἵς ἂν εἴη τοῖς πολλοῖς ἄβατα, ἀπὸ εὐλοῦ περιέφραττε δικτύοις, &c.

²⁰ Theodor. lib. 5. c. 18.

²¹ Synesii Catastasis, p. 303.

Laodicea has one canon²² particularly forbidding women to come within the altar part. And another in more general terms, allowing none but the ιερατικοί to communicate there.²³ In which canon some take the word ιερατικοί, to mean all the clergy, inferior as well as superior: but Habertus²⁴ thinks it means only the superior clergy, priests and deacons; and that all the inferiors, subdeacons, readers, &c., were excluded from this part as well as the people. However, it is agreed on all hands that the people in that age had no place there. For St. Ambrose would not permit the emperor Theodosius himself to communicate in this part,²⁵ but obliged him to retire as soon as he had made his oblation at the altar. Which custom continued for some ages after. As appears from what Theodosius junior says of himself in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus,²⁶ that he only went up to the altar to make his oblation, and having done that, retired again to the exterior court or atrium of the people. And so we find it decreed, correspondent to this practice, in the council of Trullo,²⁷ That no layman whatsoever should come into the altar part, except only the emperor, when he had made his oblation to the Creator, according to ancient custom. And hence it was that this part of the church was called ἄβαρα, and ἄδυνα, by Theodoret²⁸ and Eusebius, and other Greek writers, and adyta by the Latins, that is, inaccessible; because there was no place of access here for the people, who were wholly excluded from it. Though I must note, that according to the difference of times and places, different customs seem to have prevailed in this matter. For the most ancient custom was both for men and women to come up to the altar and communicate there, as it appears to have been in the third century, in the time of Dionysius of Alexandria, who speaks both of men²⁹ and women³⁰ standing at the holy table, and reaching forth their hands to receive the eucharist there. And so Valesius understands it.³¹ And the same privilege was allowed the people in France in the sixth century. For the second council of Tours, anno 567, orders the holy of holies³² to be open both for men and women to pray and communicate in at the time of the oblation; though at other times, when there was any other service without the communion, they were not allowed to come within the chorus of the singers or rails of the chancel. By which also we learn what part of the church in this age in France was called the chorus, namely, that which was immediately within the rails of the chancel, where the inferior clergy had their station in the time of the oblation.

The modern Greeks call the entrance into this part the holy gates, because they open from the body of the church into the holy of holies. But there is little mention made of these in ancient writers. But they often speak of the use of veils or hangings in this place to cover the prospect of the altar. Athanasius calls them βῆλα τῆς ἐκκλησίας, the hangings of the church. For, speaking of the fury of the Arians, and their ravaging a church in the time of Constantius, he says, They took the bishop's throne, and the seats of the presbyters,³³ and the table which was of wood, and the veils of the church, and whatever else they could, and carried them out and burnt them. In Synesius³⁴ they are called καταπέτασμα μυσικόν, the mystical veils. And in Chrysostom and Evagrius, ἀμφίδουρα, from their opening in the middle as folding-doors. These were sometimes richly adorned with gold, as that which Evagrius³⁵ says Chosroes gave to the church of Antioch. The use of them was partly to hide the prospect of this part of the church from the catechumens and unbelievers, and partly to cover the sacrifice of the eucharist in the time of consecration, as we learn from these words of Chrysostom, When the sacrifice is brought forth, when Christ the Lamb of God is offered, when you hear this signal given, let us all join in common prayer; when you see the veils³⁶ withdrawn, then think you see heaven opened, and the angels descending from above. There were also several other veils, to note this by the way, in other parts of the church. For Paulinus³⁷ speaks often of veils before the doors of the church. And St. Jerom commends Nepotian, for that among other parts of his concern for the decency of the church, as he took care that the altar, and the walls, and the pavement should be kept clean, so also that the doors should have their keepers, and the gates³⁸ their veils. In like manner Epiphanius, speaking

Sect. 8.
The holy gates,
and veils or hangings dividing the chancel from the rest of the church.

²² Conc. Laodic. c. 44. "Ὅτι οὐ δεῖ γυναῖκας ἐν τῷ θυσιαστηρίῳ εἰσέρχεσθαι.

²³ Ibid. can. 19. Μόνον ἐξόν τοῖς ἱερατικοῖς εἰσιέναι εἰς τὸ θυσιαστήριον καὶ κοινωνεῖν.

²⁴ Habert. Archieratic. par. 10. Obser. 9. p. 268.

²⁵ Vide Theodoret, lib. 5. c. 18. Sozomen. lib. 7. c. 25.

²⁶ Edict. Theodos. ad calcem Conc. Ephes. t. 3. p. 1237. Τοῦ ἀγιωτάτου θυσιαστηρίου διὰ μόνην τὴν τῶν δωρεῶν προσφορῶν ἐφαπτόμεθα.

²⁷ Conc. Trull. can. 69. ²⁸ Theodor. lib. 5. c. 18.

²⁹ Dionys. ap. Euseb. lib. 7. c. 9. Τραπέζην παραστάντα, &c.

³⁰ Dionys. Epist. Canon. can. 2.

³¹ Vales. Not. in Euseb. lib. 7. c. 9.

³² Conc. Turon. 2. can. 4. Ad orandum et communicandum laicis et fœminis, sicut mos est, pateant sancta sanctorum.

³³ Athan. Ep. ad Solitar. t. 1. p. 847.

³⁴ Synes. Ep. 67. ad Theophil. p. 240.

³⁵ Evagr. lib. 6. c. 21.

³⁶ Chrysost. Homil. 3. in Ephes. p. 1052. "Ὅταν ἴδῃς ἀνελκόμενα τὰ ἀμφίδουρα, &c.

³⁷ Paulin. Natal. Felic. 3. Aurea nunc niveis ornantur limina velis. Id. Natal. 6. Pulchra tegendis vela ferant foribus.

³⁸ Hieron. Epitaph. Nepotian. Erat sollicitus, si niteret altare, si parietes absque fuligine, si pavimenta tersa, si janitor creber in porta, vela semper in ostiis, &c.

of the church of Anablatha in Palestine, says,³⁹ he found a veil hanging before the doors of the church, which he tore in pieces, not because it was a veil, but because it had the image of Christ or some saint painted on it, which was contrary to the rules of the Christian church. He therefore ordered the guardians of the church to bury some poor man in it, and sent them at his own expense another plain one in its stead. There were also veils between the pillars of the hyperoa, or women's galleries, to be drawn in time of the oblation, as Du Fresne⁴⁰ has observed out of Paulus Silentiarius, and Amphilochius in the Life of St. Basil. And some others of like nature will easily be observed by a curious reader.

At the upper end of the chancel was commonly a semicircular building, which, from the figure and position of it, is by some authors called apsis, and exedra, and conchula bematis. For these are words that signify any arched or spherical building, like the canopy of heaven, to which St. Jerom applies the name of apsis.⁴¹ It was called concha, because in figure it resembled something the fashion of a shell, as Du Fresne shows out of Procopius, and Paulus Silentiarius, and Paulinus, and other writers. Du Fresne⁴² thinks it is also called exedra by St. Austin, who says the conference between the catholics and Emeritus the Donatist bishop was held in the exedra of the church; which he interprets, the place where the bishops and presbyters had their usual residence, in the upper end of the bema, beyond the altar. But Valesius⁴³ and other learned men take exedra here in the common sense for one of the outer buildings of the church. And it is not easy to determine so nice a controversy between them.

However, this is certain, that the bishop's throne, with the thrones of his presbyters on each side of it, were always fixed in this part of the church, in a semicircle above the altar. For, anciently, the seats of the bishop and presbyters were joined together, and all called thrones, as is evident from Eusebius his description of the temple of Paulinus, who says,⁴⁴ he adorned it with thrones set on high for the honour of the presidents or rulers of the people; that is, the bishop and presbyters together. Hence it is that Nazianzen, speaking of the presbyters⁴⁵ as the rulers of the people, and venerable senate of the church, calls their seats the second thrones. Constantine, in his letter to Chrestus bishop of Syracuse, summoning him to the council of Arles, uses the same phrase, bidding⁴⁶ him bring with him two of the second throne, that is, two presbyters. I know, indeed, Carolus a Sancto Paulo⁴⁷ by those of the second throne understands bishops, in opposition to primates or metropolitans, which he reckons to be those of the first throne. But the use of the phrase both in Eusebius and Nazianzen⁴⁸ leads us rather to believe that he meant presbyters, who sat with their bishop in the church upon thrones, as they style them, of the second order. For this, as I have had occasion to show in another place,⁴⁹ was the difference between them, that the bishop's was generally termed the high throne, and the presbyters' the second throne; or, as Athanasius⁵⁰ calls them, the throne, and the joint chairs or seats of the presbyters. The bishop's throne was otherwise called βῆμα, the tribunal, as we may see in Eusebius,⁵¹ where he relates the censure of the council of Antioch, passed on Paulus Samosatensis, for erecting his throne or tribunal too stately, with a veil or secretum to it, in imitation of the tribunals of secular judges, which they did not allow of in the Christian church: and hence the whole chancel was sometimes called the bema, as I have showed before. The Latins more commonly use the names of sedes and cathedra for a bishop's throne, whence come our English names of cathedral and see, for a church where the bishop's chair or seat is fixed. The manner of their sitting is noted by Gregory Nazianzen in his description of the church of Anastasia, where he speaks of himself as bishop⁵² sitting upon the high throne, and the presbyters on lower benches on both sides about him. And so it is described by the author of the Constitutions,⁵³ and Theodoret,⁵⁴ who calls the bishop's throne the middle seat upon this account. And there are some learned persons⁵⁵ who suppose all this to be done in imitation of the Jewish synagogues, in ³⁹ Epiphanius, Ep. ad Johan. Hierosolym. Inveni ibi velum pendens in foribus ejusdem ecclesie, &c.

⁴⁰ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiari. p. 551.
⁴¹ Hieron. lib. 2. in Ephes. c. 4. p. 223. In summo caeli fornice, et ut ipso verbo utar, apside.
⁴² Aug. de Gestis cum Emerito. t. 7. p. 250. Cum deuterius episcopus metropolitani—una cum caeteris episcopis in exedram processissent, praesentibus presbyteris et diaconis et universo clero, ac frequentissima plebe, &c. Vid. Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silentiari. p. 565.
⁴³ Vales. Not. in Euseb. de Vita Const. lib. 3. c. 50.
⁴⁴ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. Θρόνοις τοῖς ἀνοτάτω εἰς τὴν τῶν προέδρων τιμὴν, &c.
⁴⁵ Naz. Carm. Iambic. 23. Πρῶτον μὲν οἱ τὰ δεύτερα θρόνον λελογχότες, λαοῦ προέδροι πρεσβύται, σεμνὴ γερούσια.

⁴⁶ Ap. Euseb. lib. 10. c. 5. Δυὸ γὰρ τινας ἐκ τοῦ δευτέρου θρόνου.
⁴⁷ Carol. a S. Paulo, Geograph. Sacr. p. 47.
⁴⁸ Vid. Naz. Carm. de Vita Sua. It. Somnium de Templo Anastas.
⁴⁹ Book II. chap. 9. n. 7. Book II. chap. 19. n. 5.
⁵⁰ Athan. Ep. ad Solitar. t. 1. p. 847. Θρόνου καὶ συμψέλλια.
⁵¹ Euseb. lib. 7. c. 30.
⁵² Nazian. Somn. Anastas. t. 2. p. 78. Ἐξίσθαι δοκεῖσκον ὑπέρθρονος,—οἱ δὲ μοι ἀμφοτέρωθεν ὑπεδριόωντο γεραῖσι ποιμνῆς ἡγεμόνες, &c.
⁵³ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. ⁵⁴ Theodor. lib. 5. c. 3.
⁵⁵ See Bishop Hooper, Disc. of Lent, par. 2. chap. 6. p. 249.

which, according to Maimonides, at the upper end looking toward the Holy Land, the law was placed in the wall in an arch, and on each side the elders were seated in a semicircle. The bishop's seat was usually covered with some decent covering, suitable to the dignity of his office and person. As we learn from Athanasius in his second apology⁵⁶ to Constantius, where he asks, how they could have any concern for the throne episcopally covered, who sought to kill the bishop that sat thereon. And St. Austin⁵⁷ seems plainly to allude to this, when he tells Maximinus, the Donatist bishop, that when bishops came to stand before the tribunal of Christ at the last judgment, they themselves would then have no tribunals, no lofty seats or covered chairs, though such honours were exhibited to them for a time in this world, for the benefit and advantage of the church.

This doubtless was the posture anciently of the thrones of the bishop and presbyters in the Christian church, as they are represented in the several models of the primitive structures. From which it will be easy to observe further, that the place of the communion table or altar was not close to the wall at the upper end, but at some little distance from it; so as that the bishop's throne might be behind it, and room enough left in a void space to encompass or surround the altar. This seems pretty plain from an expression in Synesius,⁵⁸ who, speaking of his being forced to take sanctuary, says, he would fly into the church, and encompass the altar. Which implies, that it was set in such manner, as that he might go round it. And this is the meaning of Eusebius, when, having first spoken of the thrones of the bishop and presbyters in the church of Paulinus, he then adds, that he set⁵⁹ the holy of holies, the altar, in the middle. Which is not to be interpreted, as some have misunderstood it, of the altar's being placed in the middle of the nave or body of the church, but in the middle of the bema, or sanctuary, at such a distance from the upper end, as that the synthronus, the seats of the bishop and presbyters, might be behind it. St. Austin seems to refer to the same thing, when he says, The table of the Lord⁶⁰ stood in the middle. And in the council of Constantinople under Mennas⁶¹ it is represented in such a posture, as that it might be encompassed round. For it is said, when the names of Pope Leo and some others, which had been struck out of the diptychs, were inserted again, the people for joy at the time when the diptychs were read, after the repetition of the creed, ran round about the altar for to hear them. Dr. Hamond⁶² and some other learned men think, not improbably, that this posture of the altar in Christian churches was something in imitation of the altar in the Jewish temple, to which the psalmist alludes, when he says, "I will wash my hands in innocency: and so will I compass thine altar," Psal. xxvi. 6: from whence they suppose the phrase περικυκλοῦν θυσιαστήριον, compassing the altar, in the ancient rituals to be taken.

Great dispute has been raised in the last age about the name of the communion table, whether it was to be called the holy table, or an altar. And indeed any thing will afford matter of controversy to men in a disputing age; but we never read of any such dispute in the primitive church. For the ancient writers used both names indifferently; some calling it altar, others, the Lord's table, the holy table, the mystical table, the tremendous table, &c., and sometimes both table and altar in the same sentence together. Mr. Mede thinks it was usually called altar for the two first ages, and that the name table⁶³ is not to be found in any author of those ages now remaining. Ignatius uses only the name⁶⁴ θυσιαστήριον, altar, in his genuine epistles, three of which are alleged by Mr. Mede, to which the reader may add another testimony out of his epistle⁶⁵ to the Magnesians, where he uses both the name temple and altar. Irenæus⁶⁶ and Origen⁶⁷ use the same name, when they speak of the communion table. Tertullian frequently applies to it the name of ara Dei and altare. Will not your station or fast, says he,⁶⁸ be more solemn, if you stand at the altar of God? that is, receive the communion on a fast-day? So also in his book⁶⁹ ad Uxorem and de Castitate.⁷⁰ But they are led into an error by the

Sect. 11.
And of the altar or communion table.

Sect. 12.
Both these names
indifferently used in the primitive church.

⁵⁶ Athan. Apol. 2. t. 1. p. 736. Πῶς οἱ θρόνον τὸν ἱστολισμένον ἐπισκοπικῶς δούρομένοι, τὸν ἐν αὐτῷ καθήμενον ἐπίσκοπον ἀνελεῖν ζητοῦσιν.

⁵⁷ Aug. Ep. 203. In futuro Christi judicio nec apsidæ gradatæ, nec cathedræ velatæ—quæ pro tempore propter ecclesiæ utilitatem honori nostro exhibentur.

⁵⁸ Synes. Catastasis. p. 303. Κυκλώσσομαι τὸ θυσιαστήριον, &c.

⁵⁹ Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4. Τὸ τῶν ἀγίων ἁγίου θυσιαστήριον ἐν μέσῳ θείσ.

⁶⁰ Aug. Serm. 46. de Verbis Domini, t. 10. p. 68. Christus quotidie pascit. Mensa ipsius est illa in medio constituta.

⁶¹ Conc. Constantinop. act. 5. Conc. t. 5. p. 185. Τοῦ ἁγίου μαθήματος κατὰ τὸ συνηθὲς λεχθέντος, καιρῷ τῶν διπτύχων συνέδραμον ἔπαν τὸ πλῆθος κύκλω τοῦ θυσιαστήριου.

⁶² Hamond. cont. Blondel, Dissert. 1. c. 13. n. 8.

⁶³ Mede, Disc. of Altars, p. 386.

⁶⁴ Ignat. Ep. ad Ephes. n. 5. Ep. ad Trallian. n. 7. Ep. ad Philad. n. 4.

⁶⁵ Ignat. Ep. ad Magnes. n. 7.

⁶⁶ Irenæ. lib. 4. c. 34. Nos quoque offerre vult munus frequenter ad altare, &c.

⁶⁷ Origen. Hom. 10. in Num. t. 1. p. 207.

⁶⁸ Tertul. de Orat. c. 14. Nonne solennior erit statio tua, si et ad aram Dei steteris.

⁶⁹ Tertul. ad Uxor. lib. 1. c. 7.

⁷⁰ Tertul. de Exhort. Castit. c. 10.

corrupt edition of Rhenanus, who cite his book de Pœnitentia for the same thing; for though in that edition we find mention made⁷¹ of kneeling at the altar, aris Dei adgeniculari; yet better editions since teach us to read it more truly, charis Dei adgeniculari, kneeling down to the beloved of God; alluding to the custom of the penitents falling down at the church doors, to beg the prayers of the faithful as they went in. Cyprian, the disciple of Tertullian, sometimes uses both names, table and altar, as when he says, Those words of Solomon, Prov. ix. 2, "Wisdom hath furnished her table," &c., typified the Christian⁷² altar. But more commonly he uses the name altar alone,⁷³ which argues that to have been at least a very usual name in his time in the African and Latin churches. Mr. Mede cites also Zeno Veronensis as an author of the third century, contemporary with Cyprian, who is indeed one that speaks plain enough both of the *cancelli*⁷⁴ and the altar; but now learned men⁷⁵ are agreed to thrust him down a whole century lower, so that he is not a competent witness for the third age, but he may serve for the fourth, in which age, one may venture to say, there is scarce an author that speaks of the Lord's table, but he also calls it altar. On the other hand, it is certain they did not mean by the altar, what the Jews and heathens meant; either an altar dressed up with images, that is, idol-gods, as the heathens commonly had theirs adorned, or an altar for bloody sacrifices, which was the use of them both among Jews and Gentiles.

In the first sense they always rejected altars, both name and thing. In what sense the ancients say, they had no altars. For their altars had no images either above, or about, or upon them, as the heathen altars always had. And upon that account the ancient apologists, Origen,⁷⁶ Minucius Felix,⁷⁷ Arnobius,⁷⁸ and Lactantius,⁷⁹ when the heathens object to them, that they had no altars, roundly and freely confess it in the sense that the objection was made; that is, that they had no altars furnished with idol-gods, and fitted for idol-worship, such as the heathen pleaded for. In like manner they denied that they had any altars in the Jewish sense, for offering bloody sacrifices upon: but for their own mystical unbloody sacrifice, as they called the eucharist, they always owned they had an altar, which they scrupled not to term indifferently ἑσπαστήριον, ara, altare, and sometimes βωμῆς: for though Mr. Mede thinks they never used that name, yet it appears that, with the addition of ἀναίμακτος, they sometimes did; for Synesius,⁸⁰ speaking of the holy table, expressly styles it ἀναίμακτον βωμόν, the unbloody altar.

Yet these same authors, to distinguish their notion more exactly, commonly use the name table for the altar, with the addition of some singular epithet, implying the peculiar use of it in the Christian church. In Chrysostom,⁸¹ it is most usually termed τράπεζα μυστική, and φρικτή, the mystical and tremendous table; sometimes the spiritual, Divine, royal, immortal, heavenly table; of which the reader may find instances enough collected by Suicerus⁸² out of that author. St. Austin⁸³ usually gives it the name of mensa Domini, the Lord's table; whence mensa Cypriani in that author, signifies either⁸⁴ the altar, or the church, erected in the place of St. Cyprian's martyrdom. It were easy to add a thousand other testimonies out of Athanasius, Synesius, Socrates, Sozomen, Paulinus, and the rest of that age, where the altar is called the holy table, to signify to us their notion of the Christian sacrifice and altar at once, that it was mystical and spiritual, and had no relation either to the bloody sacrifices of the Jews, or the more absurd idolatries of the Gentiles, but served only for the service of the eucharist and oblations of the people.

If any is desirous to know the matter and form of the ancient altars or tables; St. Austin will inform him, that they were of wood in his time in the African churches. For speaking of a great outrage committed by the Donatists against a catholic bishop, whilst he stood ministering at the altar, he says, They beat him cruelly with clubs and such like weapons, and at last⁸⁵ with the broken pieces of the timber of the altar. This is further confirmed by the testimony of Optatus, who, objecting to the Donatists their sacrilegious abuse of the catholic altars, says, They broke them⁸⁶ in pieces in such places, as would afford them plenty of wood to make new ones

Sect. 14.
Of the names,
holy table, mystical table, &c.

Sect. 15.
Altars generally made of wood till the time of Constantine.

⁷¹ Tertul. de Pœnitent. c. 9.
⁷² Cypr. Ep. 63. ad Cæcil. It. Testimon. adv. Judæos, lib. 2. c. 2.
⁷³ Vid. Cypr. Ep. 40, 42, 55, 64, 70.
⁷⁴ Zeno, Serm. 9. ad Neophyt. Ecclesia sacri altaris feliciter enutrita cancellis.
⁷⁵ Cave, Hist. Literar. p. 176.
⁷⁶ Orig. cont. Cels. lib. 8. p. 389. 'Ἡμῶς βωμοὺς καὶ ἀγάλματα καὶ νεῶς ἰδρῶσθαι φεύγειν.
⁷⁷ Minuc. Octav. Cur nullas aras habent, templa nulla, nulla nota simulacra?
⁷⁸ Arnob. cont. Gentes, lib. 6. Non altaria fabricemus, non aras.

⁷⁹ Lactant. lib. 2. c. 2. Quid sibi templa, quid aræ volunt, &c.
⁸⁰ Synes. Catastatis, p. 303.
⁸¹ Chrysost. Hom. 21. Quod oportet hæreses esse, t. 5. p. 313. It. Hom. 39. de Pentecost. p. 553.
⁸² Suicer. Thesaur. Eccles. voce Τράπεζα.
⁸³ Aug. Ep. 59. ad Paulin. Hom. 26. de Verbis Domini.
⁸⁴ Hom. 26. ex editis a Sirmondo, ad Mensam Cypriani.
⁸⁵ Aug. Ep. 50. ad Bonifac. p. 84. Stantem ad altare, fistibus et hujusmodi telis, lignis denique ejusdem altaris effractis, immaniter ceciderunt.
⁸⁶ Optat. lib. 6. p. 94. Alio loco copia lignorum frangi jussit; alio, ut altaria raderent, lignorum inopia imperavit.

of; but in places where there was a scarcity of wood, they contented themselves with scraping or shaving them by way of pretended expiation. Nay, the workmen who wrought in this egregious service, had wine given them, heated with fires made of the fragments of the altars. Athanasius has likewise occasion to tell us, their communion tables were of wood, in a parallel story upon the Arians, who, in one of their mad humours, as he complains, went into a church, and took the throne and seats of the presbyters, and the table, which was of wood,⁸⁷ and the veils, and whatever other combustible matter they could find, and carried them out and burned them. So that there is no question to be made, but that about this time the altars were only tables of wood in Africa and Egypt, as these testimonies plainly imply. Bona⁸⁸ thinks they had stone altars before, even in times of persecution, but he offers no proof but his own opinion. Yet it is generally thought, by Hospinian⁸⁹ and other learned men, that they began to come in from the time of Constantine, together with the stateliness and magnificence of churches. The Pontifical speaks of silver altars dedicated by Constantine: and Gerson and others, alleged by Hospinian, make Pope Sylvester, who lived in the time of Constantine, to be the author of a decree, that all altars should be of stone: but these authorities are of no weight, and the stories contradict one another. What is certain in the case is this: that about the time of Gregory Nyssen, altars in some places began to be of stone; for he, in his discourse of baptism, speaks of a stone altar. This altar, says he, whereat we stand⁹⁰ is by nature only common stone, nothing different from other stones, whereof our walls are made and our pavements adorned: but after it is consecrated and dedicated to the service of God, it becomes a holy table, an immaculate altar, which may not be promiscuously touched by all, but only by the priests in time of Divine service. In the next age, in France, we find a general decree made in the council of Epone,⁹¹ anno 509, that no altars should be consecrated, but such as were made of stone only. And this seems to be the first public act of this nature, that we have upon authentic record in ancient history. And from the time of this change in the matter of them, the form or fashion of them changed likewise. For whereas before they were in the form of tables, they now began to be erected more like altars, either upon a single foot or pillar in the midst, or upon an edifice erected like a tomb, as if it were some monument of a martyr, as Bona tells us there are some such now to be seen in the catacombs of Rome⁹² and other places.

It will perhaps be something more material to remark here, that anciently ^{Sect. 16.} But one altar anciently in a church. there was never above one altar in a church. One bishop and one altar⁹³ in a church, is the known aphorism of Ignatius. And Eusebius is supposed upon this account to call the altar in the church of Paulinus at Tyre, μονογενὲς θυσιαστήριον, the single altar,⁹⁴ as Habertus truly observes upon it, who ingenuously confesses, that it has ever been the constant custom of the Greek churches to have but one altar in a temple; in confirmation of which he cites Athanasius, Nazianzen, Synesius, Socrates, Theodoret, Evagrius, and many others. Cardinal Bona also owns,⁹⁵ he could find no footsteps of the contrary practice till the time of Gregory the Great, and then only in the Latin church. For the Greeks have always kept to the ancient custom. He thinks indeed the contrary custom was in the Latin church of old, but he only shows his willingness to believe it without proof; and Schelstrate⁹⁶ very justly censures him for it, showing out of Optatus and St. Austin, that the Latins, as well as the Greeks, had then but one altar in a church. For Optatus⁹⁷ speaks of the altar of Cyprian's church, as one only and no more, both in the time of Cyprian and afterward, and thence concludes that the Donatists were schismatics, because they went from Cyprian's altar, and set up another altar against it. And St. Austin argues against them⁹⁸ upon the same foundation, that there ought not to be two episcopal altars in one city. This supposes then but one altar in a church among the Latins, as well as the Greeks; and so Christianus Lupus⁹⁹ and Pagi,¹⁰⁰ the learned corrector of Baronius, affirm it to have been the constant practice of the primitive church. Though now (to see what improvement has been made in later ages) there are no less than twenty-five altars, besides the great altar, in St. Peter's church at Rome: and the great altar itself is no less than twenty-five feet square, with a cross —Ibid. Calida de fragmentis altarium facta est. Vid. p. 95. ibid.

⁸⁷ Athan. Ep. ad Solitar. Vitam agentes, t. 1. p. 847. Ἀρπάσαντες τὰ συμφέλλια, καὶ θρόνον, καὶ τὴν τράπεζαν, ξυλίην γὰρ ἦν, &c.

⁸⁸ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. cap. 20. n. 1.

⁸⁹ Hospin. de Templis, lib. 2. cap. 6. p. 34.

⁹⁰ Nyssen. de Baptismo Christi, t. 3. p. 369.

⁹¹ Conc. Epauuens. can. 26. Altaria, nisi lapidea, infusione chrismatis non sacrentur.

⁹² Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 20. n. 1.

⁹³ Ignat. Ep. ad Philadelph. n. 4. Ἐν θυσιαστήριον πάση τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, καὶ εἰς ἐπίσκοπος. Vid. Ep. ad Magnes. n. 7.

⁹⁴ Habert. Archierat. p. 661. ex Euseb. lib. 10. c. 4.

⁹⁵ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 14. n. 3.

⁹⁶ Schelstrat. Concilium Antiochen. p. 193.

⁹⁷ Optat. lib. 1. p. 42. Erat cathedra episcopalis, erat altare loco suo, in quo pacifici episcopi retro temporis obtulerunt, Cyprianus, Lucianus et ceteri. Sic exitus est foras, et altare contra altare erectum est.

⁹⁸ Aug. Hom. 3. in 1 Johan. Si in unitate sumus, quid faciunt in hac civitate duo altaria?

⁹⁹ Lupus Concil. t. 3. Respons. ad Michael. Cerular.

¹⁰⁰ Pagi, Critic. in Baron. an. 313. n. 15.

of twenty-five inches long upon it, as Dr. Potter observes out of Onuphrius, and Angelus Roccha, in his ingenious book¹⁰¹ of the number six hundred sixty-six.

Some improve this observation, of one altar in a church, a little further, and think that anciently there was but one altar in a whole city, or diocese and country region belonging to a bishop; though there might be many lesser churches, as there were many synagogues among the Jews, though but one temple and one altar. Mr. Mede¹⁰² is of opinion, that it was so when Justin Martyr wrote his Second Apology, because of those words of his, On Sundays all that live in the towns or in the country meet together in one place for the celebration of the eucharist. And he concludes the same from several of Cyprian's epistles,¹⁰³ where bishop and altar are made correlatives. Christianus Lupus and Pagi seem to think¹⁰⁴ it continued the custom within the walls of Rome to the time of Pope Innocent I. For he seems to say in one of his epistles,¹⁰⁵ that the presbyters of the several tituli or lesser churches within the city had the sacrament sent to them every Sunday from the bishop's altar: but the presbyters of the cemeteries, or churches without the walls, had liberty to consecrate the eucharist in them, because the sacraments were not to be carried to places at too great a distance. But Dr. Maurice¹⁰⁶ and other learned men think the Roman tituli had always communion tables, and the communion administered in them from the beginning, only the consecrated bread was sent to them from the oblations made at the bishop's altar. For the oblations, they think, at first were only made at the bishop's altar, and always blessed at the bishop's altar, though not always consecrated there. Upon which account the name of altar might be appropriated to that of the bishop's church. I shall not pretend to make any judgment or decision in this dispute, being a matter involved in great obscurity, but leave the reader to judge for himself: Dr. Hamond heretofore passed the same censure on it,¹⁰⁷ thinking it too dark a point to be over-boldly determined. All I shall say further upon it is only this, that it makes nothing for the congregational way, (as some pretend,) though it were certain there was but one altar in a diocese at the first. For there might notwithstanding be many churches. Or if there was but one church in a diocese, while the number of believers was very small; yet it does not follow that there ought to be no more, when their number so increased in any city or territory, that one church would not contain them.

But I return to the business in hand. In some of the more stately churches, as that of Sancta Sophia, the altar was overshadowed with a sort of canopy, which, from the fashion of it, is termed by Paulus Silentarius¹⁰⁸ πύργος, the turret; by others,¹⁰⁹ umbra culum; but among the Greeks most commonly, κιβώριον, which Durantus¹¹⁰ and other modern ritualists usually mistake for the pyxis, where the host is kept; but Du Fresne¹¹¹ shows it to have been anciently quite another thing, viz. an ornamental canopy hanging over the altar. This was raised in the form of a little turret upon four pillars at each corner of the altar. The heads of the pillars were adorned with silver bowls, which was a usual ornament in those days, as is evident from the description which Eusebius¹¹² gives of the twelve pillars in Constantine's church at Jerusalem. The top of it was in the form of a sphere, adorned with graven flowers, whence it has sometimes the name of sphæra, lilia, and malum. Above the sphere stood the cross, as Paulus Silentarius¹¹³ represents it. And the several arches below between the pillars were hanged with veils or curtains, called, as some others, ἀμφίθυρα, which served also to cover or conceal the whole altar. I have been the more particular in describing this ornamental structure about the altar after Du Fresne, because the common ritualists so generally apply the name ciborium only to their pyx, whereas in the most ancient writers it signifies this beautiful fabric about the altar.

In some places, after images and pictures began to be allowed in churches, the Holy Ghost was represented in the effigies of a silver dove hovering over the altar; and their baptisteries had the same, as we learn from the complaint against Severus, bishop of Antioch, in the council of Constantinople under Men-¹⁰¹ Vid. Synops. Criticor. in Apocal. xiii. 18.

¹⁰² Mede, Disc. of Churches, p. 326.

¹⁰³ Cyprian. Ep. 40, 72, 73.

¹⁰⁴ Pagi, Crit. in Baron. an. 313. n. 15.

¹⁰⁵ Innocent. I. Ep. 1. ad Decent. c. 5. De fermento, quod die Dominica per titulos mittimus, superflue nos consulere voluisti, cum omnes ecclesie nostræ intra civitatem sunt constitutæ. Quarum presbyteri, quia die ipso propter plebem sibi creditam, nobiscum convenire non possunt, idcirco fermentum a nobis confectum per acolythos accipiunt, ut se a nostra communione, maxime illa die, non judicent separatos. Quod per parochias fieri debere non puto, quia non longe portanda sunt sacramenta. Nec nos per cœmeteria diversa constitutis presbyteris destinamus, sed presbyteri eorum facienda jus habent atque licentiam.

¹⁰⁶ Maurice, Dioces. Episc. p. 38. Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 23. n. 9, differs in this, that he thinks every church had her own oblations and the eucharist consecrated out of them.

¹⁰⁷ Hamond. Dissert. cont. Blondel. 3. c. 8. n. 15. In re incomperta non est audacter nimis pronuntiandum.

¹⁰⁸ Paul. Silent. par. 2. ver. 303. ¹⁰⁹ Ordo Romanus.

¹¹⁰ Durant. de Ritib. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 16.

¹¹¹ Du Fresne, Com. in Paul. Silent. p. 569.

¹¹² Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. 3. c. 38.

¹¹³ Paul. Silent. ibid. "Υψηθὶ δ' αὐτοῦ σταυρὸς ὑπερέταλον ἀναφάνεται.

nas, anno 536, where he is accused for diverting¹¹⁴ to his own use, among other treasures of the church, the silver and golden doves that hanged over the baptistery and the altar, as types or symbols of the Holy Ghost. And this, I think, is the first time we meet with any thing of this kind. For no credit is to be given to the author of the Life of St. Basil, under the name of Amphilochius, when he says, St. Basil was used to reserve the eucharist in one of these silver doves; because he is known to be a spurious writer. However, when the thing came to be in use, the place over the altar where it hanged, was called peristerion, from περιστέρα, the Greek name for a dove, as Du Fresne and others have observed. If it be inquired where the eucharist was reserved according to ancient custom; I answer, in times of persecution the priests seem to have had it¹¹⁵ in their own private custody at home, as may be collected from an epistle of Dionysius in Eusebius, where he relates how Serapion had the eucharist sent him in the night by a boy, the presbyter being sick and not able to attend upon him. At other times it was kept in one of the pastophoria, which were certainly places distinct from the altar. For so the author of the Constitutions¹¹⁶ plainly informs us. In process of time it came to be kept at the altar, either in those silver doves we have been speaking of, or in an ark or pyx at the foot of the cross, which by some canons is ordered to be placed upon the altar. For in the second council of Tours, anno 567, a decree was made,¹¹⁷ that the eucharist should not be kept in the armario, but under the figure of the cross upon the altar. And so in process of time the pyx took the name of ciborium, which originally is an Egyptian name for the husk of a bean, as Suicerus¹¹⁸ notes out of Hesychius, and thence used by the Greeks to signify a large cup or bowl, broad at the bottom and narrow at the top, and from that resemblance perhaps it came also to be the name of this turret or spiral structure about the altar.

From the forementioned canon of the council of Tours it is plain, that in the French churches the figure of the cross was another part of the ornament of the altar, since the eucharist, or sacramental body of

Sect. 20.
When first the figure of the cross set upon the altar.

Christ, is ordered to be laid under it. But when crosses came first to be set up in churches is not so easy to be determined. That they were not in use for the three first ages, seems evident enough from the silence of all the writers of those times, and from Eusebius, who has frequent occasion to describe minutely the churches of Constantine and others, but never once mentions a cross erected in them, though he speaks frequently of crosses set up in other public places, as a learned writer¹¹⁹ has judiciously observed out of him, who thinks they began not to be set up in churches till after the year 340. Chrysostom¹²⁰ speaks of the sign of the cross as used at the Lord's table, in the consecration of priests and celebration of the eucharist; but that seems to be meant of the transient sign made in the forehead, (which St. Austin¹²¹ and the author of the Constitutions¹²² speak of likewise,) and not of any material cross set upon the altar. But Sozomen¹²³ speaks of material crosses lying upon the altar; though not in the time of Constantine, (as Gretser¹²⁴ mistakes, whose error is justly corrected by Valesius,) but in his own time. And after him Evagrius speaks of silver crosses given by Chosroes¹²⁵ to one of the churches of Constantinople to be fixed upon the altar. So that the original of this custom is not to be deduced from Constantine, as many suppose, but from the following ages of the church.

But it is more certain that the altars were always covered with some decent cloth, used for ornament, not for mystery, as in after ages. Optatus, pleading against the Donatists, that the altars could not be polluted by the catholics touching them, (as the Donatists vainly pretended,) uses this argument to confute them, that if any thing was polluted, it must be the coverings, and not the tables; for every one knew that the tables¹²⁶ were covered with a linen cloth in time of Divine service: so that while the sacrament was administering, the covering might be touched, but not the table. And for this reason they pretended to wash the palls (as he calls them in another place) in order to give them an expiation.¹²⁷ Victor Uticensis makes a like complaint of one Proculus, an agent of King Geisericus, who, having plundered the catholic churches in Zeugitana, made himself a shirt and

Sect. 21.
Of some other ornaments and utensils of the altar.

¹¹⁴ Conc. Const. Act. 5. t. 5. p. 159.

¹¹⁵ Euseb. lib. 6. c. 44.

¹¹⁶ Constit. Apost. lib. 2. c. 57. lib. 8. c. 13.

¹¹⁷ Conc. Turon. 2. can. 3. Ut corpus Domini in altari, non in armario, sed sub crucis titulo componatur. So it is read in Crab's edition. But others, instead of armario, read it, in imaginario ordine, and explain it by ciborium. See Du Fresne, p. 575.

¹¹⁸ Suicer. Thesaur. voce Κιβώριον.

¹¹⁹ Dallæus de Cultu Relig. lib. 5. c. 8. p. 773.

¹²⁰ Chrysost. Demonstrat. Quod Christus sit Deus, c. 9. t. 5. p. 810.

¹²¹ Aug. Hom. 118. in Joh. Quid est signum Christi nisi crux Christi? Quod signum nisi adhibeatur sive frontibus credentium, sive ipsi aquæ ex qua regenerantur, sive oleo quo chrismate unguuntur, sive sacrificio quo aluntur; nihil horum rite perficitur.

¹²² Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 12.

¹²³ Sozom. lib. 2. c. 3, says of one Probianus, that he saw in a vision, σταυροῦ σύμβολον τῶν ἀνακειμένων τῷ θυσιαστηρίῳ.

¹²⁴ Gretser. de Cruce, lib. 2. c. 13. ¹²⁵ Evagr. lib. 6. c. 21.

¹²⁶ Optat. lib. 6. p. 95. Quis fidelium nescit in peragendis mysteriis ipsa ligna linteamine cooperiri? Inter ipsa sacramenta velamen potuit tangi, non lignum.

¹²⁷ Optat. ibid. p. 98. Lavistis proculdubio pallas, &c.

brecches of the palls of the altar.¹²⁸ Isidore of Pelusium takes notice also of the sindon,¹²⁹ or fine linen, upon which the body of Christ was consecrated. But sometimes they were of richer materials, and more sumptuous. Palladius¹³⁰ speaks of some of the Roman ladies, who, renouncing the world, bequeathed their silks to make coverings for the altar. And Theodoret¹³¹ says of Constantine, that, among other gifts which he bestowed upon his new-built church of Jerusalem, he gave βασιλικὰ παραπετάσματα, a royal pall, or piece of rich tapestry for the altar. But that may signify the curtains or hangings of the ciborium, as well as the covering of the altar; and so every utensil or ornament about the altar may be supposed to be rich and splendid in such churches as were of a royal foundation. The holy vessels which they made use of to administer the eucharist in, were another part of the ornament of the altar. But the richness of these was not always estimated from the materials they were made of, but from the use they were put to. For the materials were sometimes no better than plain glass or wood. Irenæus,¹³² and Epiphanius after him,¹³³ speaking of Marcus, the father of the Marcosian heretics, say, he used a glass cup in the celebration of the eucharist: which is not noted as any singular thing in him; for both Baronius¹³⁴ and Bona¹³⁵ think it was then the common custom of the church. And it is evident it continued in some places to the time of St. Jerom. For he, speaking of Exuperius, bishop of Tholouse, and commending his frugality, tells us¹³⁶ that he ministered the body of Christ in a basket of osiers, and the blood in a glass cup. Baronius and Bona will furnish the reader with a great many other instances to the same purpose. I shall only add, that in one of our own synods here in England, the synod of Calcuth, anno 787, there is a canon¹³⁷ which forbids the use of horn cups in the celebration of the eucharist; which seems to imply that they were in use before. But yet I must note, that it was commonly necessary that drove the church to use vessels of such ordinary materials; either when she laboured under extreme poverty, or thought fit to dispose of her silver and gold plate for the redemption of captives, or the relief of the poor, of which I have given a great many instances in another place,¹³⁸ which show that the church had her vessels of silver and gold, else she could not have melted them down for such pious uses. Nay, even in times of persecution, when there was some danger of being plundered and despoiled, the wealthier churches had their sacred vessels of silver and gold. This is evident, from what Prudentius observes in the Roman church in the time of Laurentius the martyr, who suffered in the persecution of Valerian. It was part of his crime, that he would not deliver up the golden plate,¹³⁹ in which they were used to celebrate their sacred mysteries. And that we may not think he spake only with a poetical flourish, we may see the same thing observed by Optatus of the church of Carthage, in the Diocletian persecution. For when Mensurius the bishop was forced to go to Rome, to have his trial there, he was at some loss¹⁴⁰ what to do with the plate and other silver and gold ornaments of the church, which he could neither hide in the earth, nor carry with him. At last he comes to this resolution, to leave them with the elders of the church, first taking an inventory of them, which he gave to a deaconess, with these instructions, that if he never returned, she should, when times of peace returned, give it to the person whom she found seated on the bishop's throne. Which she did as soon as Cæcilian was chosen bishop, who, calling upon the elders to deliver up their trust, they, having embezzled the things, denied that ever they had received them; and to be revenged of Cæcilian, they joined with his antagonists, Botrus and Celcius, who were competitors with Cæcilian for the bishopric, and the first authors of the schism of the Donatists. What this inventory contained we may judge by another about the same time given up to the persecutors by Paul, bishop of Cirta, who was one of those called traditors upon that account. There we find two¹⁴¹ gold cups, six silver cups, six silver water-pots, a silver cucumellum, which I take to be a flagon or bowl, seven silver lamps, &c. All which were vessels or utensils belonging to the service of the church and the altar. For as they had vessels for the wine, so they had vessels also for the water, which in those days was always mingled with the wine, and was used also for washing their hands in the time of the ob-

¹²⁸ Victor. de Persec. Vandal. lib. 1. p. 593. De pallis altaris, proh nefas! camisia sibi et femoralia faciebat. Qui tamen Proculus frustatim sibi comedens linguam, in brevi turpissima consumptus est morte.

¹²⁹ Isidor. Pelus. lib. 1. Ep. 123.

¹³⁰ Pallad. Hist. Lausiæ. c. 119.

¹³¹ Theodor. lib. 1. c. 31.

¹³² Irenæ. lib. 1. c. 9.

¹³³ Epiphani. Hær. 34. num. 1. ¹³⁴ Baron. an. 216.

¹³⁵ Bona. Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 1.

¹³⁶ Hieron. Ep. 4. ad Rustic. Nihil illo ditius, qui corpus Domini canistro vimineo, sanguinem portat in vitro.

¹³⁷ Synod. Calcuthens. c. 10. apud Spelman. Conc. Brit. t. 1. p. 291.

¹³⁸ Book V. chap. 6. sect. 6.

¹³⁹ Prudent. περὶ στεφανῶν, Hymn. 2. Hunc esse vestris orgiis morenque et artem proditum est, Hanc disciplinam fœderis, libent ut auro antistites. Argenteis Scyphis ferunt fumare sacrum sanguinem, &c.

¹⁴⁰ Optat. lib. 1. p. 41. Erant ecclesie ex auro et argento quamplurima ornamenta, quæ nec defodere terræ, nec secum portare poterat.

¹⁴¹ Gesta Purgation. Cæciliani ad calcem Optati, p. 266. Calices duo aurei: item calices sex argentei: urceola sex argentea; cucumellum argenteum: lucernæ argenteæ septem: cereofala duo, &c.

lation, of which customs it will be more proper to speak in another place. These vessels we here see were of silver in the church of Circa as well as others. Their candlesticks or lamps were of the like precious substance, and some golden, as Prudentius¹⁴² represents them, when he brings in the tyrant demanding of Laurentius, the Roman deacon, the golden lamps which they used in their night assemblies. These are frequently mentioned by Athanasius,¹⁴³ and the Apostolical Constitutions,¹⁴⁴ which allow oil to be offered for the lamps. Paulinus also¹⁴⁵ and St. Jerom¹⁴⁶ speak of them, and seem to intimate that in their time they were lighted by day as well as by night: which was an innovation upon the old custom: for the first and primitive use of them was owing to necessity, when Christians were forced to meet in nocturnal assemblies for fear of persecution. At which time they did not allow or approve of lighting them by day. Nor does St. Jerom say, there was any order of the church, or so much as general custom, to authorize it; but only it was tolerated in some places, to satisfy the ignorance, and weakness, and simplicity of some secular men: and all he pretends to offer in justification of it, is only, that there was no idolatry in it, as Vigilantius had heavily laid the charge upon it. However, there was this difference between the age of St. Jerom and those which went before, that the former ages positively condemn it. For not to mention what Lactantius¹⁴⁷ and others say to expose the like custom among the heathens, the council of Eliberis expressly forbids it in a very plain canon,¹⁴⁸ though the reason be something dark that is given for the prohibition: Let no one presume to set up lights in the day-time in any cemetery or church; for the spirits of the saints are not to be molested. I shall not now stand to inquire into the meaning of this reason: it is sufficient that the thing was then prohibited in plain terms: from whence it is evident the contrary custom must be new, though prevailing both in the East and West in the time of Paulinus and St. Jerom. Some also plead hard for the antiquity of censers and incense, deriving them down from apostolical custom and practice. So Cardinal Bona¹⁴⁹ and others of the Romish church. But there are no footsteps of these things in the three first ages of the church. The Canons under the name of the Apostles indeed¹⁵⁰ mention incense in the time of the oblation. But it still remains a question, whether those Canons belong to any of the three first ages. Hippolytus Portuensis is another author produced by a learned person¹⁵¹ of our own church in this cause. But besides that his authority is as questionable as the former, all that he says may be interpreted to a spiritual or figurative sense. For speaking of the times of antichrist, and the desolations of the church in those days, he says, The church shall mourn with a very great mourning, because her oblation and incense is not duly¹⁵² performed. Which may mean no more than that the liturgy or service of the church will be abolished. For the prayers and worship of the saints are called the Christian incense, Rev. v. 8; and so I think we are to understand those words of St. Ambrose also,¹⁵³ who, speaking of the angel's appearing to Zacharias, standing on the right side of the altar of incense, says, I wish the angel may stand by us when we incense the altar and offer our sacrifice. Yea, doubtless the angel stands by us, at the time that Christ stands there and is offered upon the altar. Here, I take it, the sacrificing of Christ and the incensing of the altar are both of the same nature, that is, spiritual and mystical: and therefore hence nothing can be concluded for the use of incense and censers in the most strict and literal sense as yet in the Christian church. Neither do we find any mention made of censers in any part of the Constitutions under the name of the Apostles, which is an argument, that when the author of those collections wrote, they were not yet become utensils of the altar; as they were when Evagrius¹⁵⁴ wrote his history; for he mentions golden censers, as well as golden crosses, given by Chosroes to the church of Constantinople. By which we may guess that crosses and censers were the product of one and the same age, and came into the church together. Images and relics upon the altar are usages also of later ages. And so are many utensils of the present Greeks, as the lancea, asteriscus, dicerion, tricerion, and cochlear, which ¹⁴² Prudent. de Coron. Hymn. 2. Auroque nocturnis sarcis adstare fixos cereos.

¹⁴³ Athanas. Ep. ad Orthodox. t. I. p. 946.

¹⁴⁴ Canon. Apost. c. 3.

¹⁴⁵ Paulin. Natal. 3. S. Felicis. Clara coronantur densis altaria lychnis: lumina ceratis adolentur odora papyris: nocte dieque micant, &c.

¹⁴⁶ Hieron. Ep. 53. ad Ripar. Accensique ante eorum tumulos cerei, idololatriæ insignia sunt? &c. Id. cont. Vigilant. t. 2. p. 123. Aliqui propter imperitiam et simplicitatem sæcularium hominum—hoc pro honore martyrum faciunt.

¹⁴⁷ Lactant. lib. 6. c. 2. Accendunt lumina; velut in tenebris agenti Deo, &c.

¹⁴⁸ Conc. Eliber. c. 31. Cereos per diem placuit in cœmiterio non incendi. Inquietandi enim sanctorum spiritus non sunt.

¹⁴⁹ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 9.

¹⁵⁰ Canon. Apost. c. 3. Θυμίαμα τῶ καιρῷ τῆς ἁγίας προσφορῆς.

¹⁵¹ Bever. Cod. Canon. Vindic. lib. 2. c. 1. n. 5.

¹⁵² Hippol. de Consum. Mundi, Bibl. Patr. Gr. Lat. t. 2. p. 357. Note, The words are not in the genuine Hippolytus published by Combefis Auctario Novissimo.

¹⁵³ Ambros. Com. in Luc. i. 11. p. 599. Utinam nobis quoque adolentibus altaria, sacrificium deferentibus, assistat angelus, imo præbeat se videndum. Non enim dubites assistere angelum, quando Christus assistit, Christus immolatur.

¹⁵⁴ Evagr. lib. 6. c. 21.

Bona¹⁵⁵ says were never known in the Latin church, much less in the ancient church. So I shall not stand to explain them. Nor say any thing here of the Bible, the Diptychs, and their ritual books, which were both utensils and ornaments of the altar, because these will be spoken of in other places. The altare portatile, or movable altars, of the Latins, and the antimensia, or consecrated cloths, of the Greeks, to be used in places which have no altars, I omit likewise, as being a modern invention of later ages. Habertus,¹⁵⁶ indeed, is very solicitous to have their portable altars thought as old as St. Basil, because St. Basil in one of his epistles speaks of ἰδία τράπεζαι, private tables, in some churches. But he wholly mistakes his author's meaning: for he is only speaking of the rudeness of some heretics, who, according to their usual custom, pulled down the catholic altars, and set up their own altars, or tables, in the room. So that it is not those portable altars he is discoursing of, but heretical altars set up in opposition to the catholics, which Habertus would hardly own to be the altars of the Romish church. Durantus¹⁵⁷ and Bona¹⁵⁸ do not pretend to find them in any author before the time of Bede and Charles the Great, and therefore we may conclude they were a modern invention. But the ῥιπίδια, or flabella, are somewhat more ancient, being mentioned by the author of the Constitutions,¹⁵⁹ who makes it one part of the deacon's office in the time of the oblation, to stand on each side of the altar, and with these instruments in their hands, (brushes or fans, we may English them,) to drive away all such little insects as might drop into the cups or infest the altar. The author of the Fasti Siculi, or Chronicon Alexandrinum,¹⁶⁰ calls them τίμα ῥιπίδια, and reckons them among the holy utensils of the altar, which were laid up among the rest in the scuophylacium, or vestry of the church. For which reason I thought it not improper to mention them, whilst we are speaking of the utensils of the altar.

In many churches, besides the communion table, in one of the lesser recesses or conchas of the bema, there was a place where the offerings of the people were received, out of which the bread and wine was taken that was consecrated at the altar. In the liturgies under the names of Chrysostom¹⁶¹ and St. James,¹⁶² and other modern Greek writers, this is called πρόθεσις and παραράπεζον, the side-table. In the Ordo Romanus it has the name of oblationarium and pro- thesis also, for the one is made the explication of the other. And here also it is termed paratorium, because, when the offerings were received, preparation was made out of them for the eucharist. There is little question to be made but that the ancient churches had something answerable to this, but it went under other names; for we never meet with a prothesis, or paratorium, or oblationarium, in express terms in any ancient writer. But the thing itself we often find. Cyprian¹⁶³ seems to speak of it under the borrowed name of the corban, rebuking a rich and wealthy matron for coming to celebrate the eucharist without any regard to the corban, and partaking of the Lord's supper without any sacrifice of her own, but rather eating of the oblations which the poor had brought. In the fourth council¹⁶⁴ of Carthage this place goes by the general name of the sacrarium, or sanctuary, as being that part of the sanctuary where the oblations for the altar were received. For they had two repositories for the offerings of the people, the one without the church, called the gazophylacium, or treasury, and the other within the church, which was this sacrarium, or corban. And therefore it is that that council forbids the offerings of such Christians as were at variance one with another, to be received either in the treasury or the sanctuary. Paulinus is more exact in describing this place than any other ancient writer, yet he gives it a different name, calling it one of the secretaria of the church. For he tells us¹⁶⁵ there were two secretaria, one on the right hand, and the other on the left hand of the altar. That on the right hand was the same with the prothesis, or paratorium, we are speaking of, and the use of it he describes in these verses, which were set over it:

Hic locus est veneranda penus qua conditur, et qua
Promitur alma sacri pompa ministerii.

This is the place where the holy food is reposit, and whence we take provision and furniture for the altar. That on the other side was the same with the diaconicum bematis, the use of which he describes in part, in these two other verses, set over it also:

Si quem sancta tenet meditandi in lege voluntas,
Hic poterit residens sanctis intendere libris.

If any one, (that is, any of the priests, whose apartment this was,) is minded to meditate in the law of God, here he has room to sit and read the holy books. A little before¹⁶⁶ he makes the like descrip-

¹⁵⁵ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 6.

¹⁵⁶ Habert. Archieratic. p. 664. Portatilia illa altaria videntur dici a basilio ἰδία τράπεζαι, Ep. 72.

¹⁵⁷ Durant. de Ritib. Eccl. lib. 1. c. 25. n. 7.

¹⁵⁸ Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. 1. c. 20. n. 3.

¹⁵⁹ Constit. Apost. lib. 8. c. 12.

¹⁶⁰ Chronic. Alexandr. p. 892.

¹⁶¹ Chrysost. Liturg. Bibl. Patr. Gr. Iat. t. 2. p. 74.

¹⁶² Missa Jacobi, ibid. p. 21.

¹⁶³ Cyprian. de Opere et Eleemos. p. 203. Locuples et dives es, et Dominicum celebrare te credis, quæ corbonam omnino non respicis; quæ in Dominicum sine sacrificio venis; quæ partem de sacrificio, quod pauper obtulit, sumis?

¹⁶⁴ Conc. Carthag. 4. can. 93. Oblationes dissidentium fratrum, neque in sacrario, neque in gazophylacio recipiantur.

¹⁶⁵ Paulin. Ep. 12. ad Sever. p. 154.

¹⁶⁶ Paulin. ibid. p. 152. Una earum immolanti hostias ju- tion of these two secret apartments in prose, telling us, that the one was the place which prepared the host or oblation of joy for the priest: (whence doubtless in after ages, as I noted before, it got the name of paratorium :) and the other was a place, whither the clergy retired, after the sacrifice was ended, and the people were dismissed, to make their concluding prayers in private.

Sect. 23.
Of the scœtophylacium, or diaconicum bematis. This latter place was a sort of vestry within the church, whither the deacons brought the vestments and vessels and utensils belonging to the altar, out of the greater diaconicum, to be in a readiness for Divine service. And in this respect it had also the name of σκευοφυλάκιον, the repository of the sacred utensils, because hither they were carried back immediately by the deacons as soon as the service was ended, or whilst the post-communion psalm was singing by the people, as the author of the *Chronicon*¹⁶⁷ Alexandrinum represents it. Here the priests also put on their robes they used to officiate in: and hither they came again, when the public service was ended, to make their private addresses to God, as has been noted already out of Paulinus; and in the liturgies ascribed to St. James, St. Mark, St. Chrysostom,¹⁶⁸ there are the forms of prayer appointed to be used in this place, one of which particularly in St. James's liturgy is ushered in with this title or rubric,¹⁶⁹ The prayer to be said in the scœtophylacium, after the dismissal of the people. The deacons commonly had the care of this place, and thence it is often called the diaconicum, and bematis diaconicum, to distinguish it from another diaconicum, which we shall find in the next chapter among the exedrae, or outer buildings of the church. Du Fresne¹⁷⁰ thinks also that the name diaconicum was sometimes more peculiarly given to that part of the bema or chancel, which was between the veils of the chancel and the veils of the ciborium or altar; and that the place within the veils of the altar was distinguished particularly by the name of presbyterium, because it was the place of the presbyters, as the other was the place of the deacons, alleging for this a canon of the council of Laodicea,¹⁷¹ which others understand in a different sense,¹⁷² for the whole chancel or sanctuary of the church.

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE BAPTISTERY, AND OTHER OUTER BUILDINGS, CALLED THE EXEDRÆ OF THE CHURCH.

